FIRST SKANDHA

CHAPTER ONE

I. Let us meditate upon the Supreme Spirit who is real; from whom emanate the creation etc. (i.e. creation, preservation and destruction) of this (universe), (as can be inferred from) his presence in all that exists and his absence from all that is non-existent; who is omniscient and self-refulgent; who extended (i.e. revealed) to the first knower (or wise one) viz. god Brahmā, through his heart, the Veda about which even the learned ones are perplexed; in whom (i.e. resting on whom) the creation of the three attributes (viz., sattva, rajas and tamas) appears real like the apparent transmutation of the light, water and earth (for example, appearance of water in the heat and light of the sun as in the mirage etc.); who by his lustre has always dispelled illusion.\(^1\)

---

I. This verse has been differently interpreted by different commentators.

(1) ŚR. (Śridhara), the oldest commentator on the Bh.P. (Bhāgavata Purāṇa) states that he is recording the traditional interpretation of the Bh.P. in his Com. (commentary), the Bhāvārtha-dīpikā.

\text{Śrī-Bhāgavata-Bhāvārtha-dīpikeyam pratanyate} \]

According to ŚR., the Supreme Spirit or Reality is both immanent and transcendent. The universe originates from the Supreme Spirit, is sustained therein and finally dissolves into the same Spirit. During this world process, the Supreme Spirit is eternally established in its original grandeur, the world process being traceable to cosmic illusion.

He interprets the verse as follows:

(i) Let us meditate on the Supreme Lord (who is) real; in whom (i.e. depending on whom) the creation of the three attributes of the Cosmic Illusion (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas)—though unreal—appears to be real, just like the transmutation of Fire, Water and Earth enter se (For example, a mirage wherein water, though non-existent, appears to exist in the blazing heat and light of the Sun.). In him, this three-fold creation is unreal. By his own lustre, He has dispelled delusion. (Let us contemplate on) him from whom is the creation (preservation and destruction) of the universe (as can be) inferred by logical concomitance and discontinuation.

OR (ii) the Supreme Being is the cause and the universe the effect. He, being the cause, is in (all) things and is different as the things are effects.
OR (iii) This universe being composed of parts, its creation etc. is due to him as can be deduced from positive and negative proofs, but he should be distinguished from the primordial nature (prakrti or pradhama as he is self-refulgent and omniscient (of his own accord.) Hence neither prakrti nor jiva are worth meditating. Nor so is god Brahm as) he—the Supreme Being—revealed to the first sage (god Brahman), through his mind, the Vedas which have perplexed the learned ones.

SR. concludes that the word dhimahi in this verse shows that this Purana deals with the science of the Supreme Being. He quotes other Puranas in h.s support.

SR. is obviously a follower of non-dualism (advaita) of Saunaka.

(2) VR. (Vira-raghava), a follower of Ramanuja explains his ontology succinctly in his com. Bhagavata Candrikā. According to Ramanuja. Brahman or the Supreme Reality is qualified by sentence and non-sentence (siddha-siddha). Brahman enters the world of sentient and non-sentient things which emanate out of him and are sustained by him and enter into him. This relation of Brahman to the sentient and non-sentient creation has been elaborated by Ramanuja in his concept of sarira-sariri-bhava (body-Soul relation), visesa-visesa-bhava (substance-attribute relation), seita-tesi-bhava (dependent and -'depended-upon' relation), amsa-amsah-bhava (part-whole relation), adhara-vishayabhava (supporter-supported relation), niyanta-niyata-bhava (ruler-ruled relation) and raksha-rakshabhava (redeemer-redeemed relation).

The interpretation of this verse as gathered from VR's exposition is as follows:

Let us meditate on that real Supreme Brahman from whom emanate the creation etc. of this sentient-cum-non-sentient universe, both as the material cause and the efficient cause (as he is different from the Primordial Nature prakrti—and individual Souls—Jivatman); him who is omniscient, independent (not controlled by karmas), self-resplendent; who by his will-power revealed to God Brahman, the Vedas about which learned sages (like Kapila, Kanada etc.) get perplexed; from whom proceeds the combination of the elements such as Fire, Water and Earth; about whom the three-fold creation (of the attributes sattva, rajas and tamas) is unreal (guna-traya-srjate prapañcaḥ... yasmin...mrṣa, mithyā); who has dispelled delusion by the light of His infinite knowledge.

(3) VJ. (Vijaya-dhvaja), a follower of Dualistic (dvaita) Vedanta of Madhava, in his com. Pada-ratnolali, construes this verse differently and interprets as follows:

Let us contemplate on that eternally blessed Narayan from whom come forth the creation etc. ('etc.' includes sustenance, destruction, control, bondage, liberation) of this existing universe as evidenced by logical positive, and negative proofs (and by Sruti and Smriti); who thoroughly comprehends all objects; who is his own Lord (or who manifests himself at his own will) and is not subordinate to anyone else; who, out of affection, extended to the first sage (god Brahmā) the Veda (along with its auxiliaries—akgas).
About whom (the past, present and future) gods like Brahmā and others have no knowledge. In whom the three-fold creation of Íśvara, individual souls and non-sentient things is of no avail like the combination of Fire, Water and Earth (They are real due to His support), who has dispelled illusion (Vīśnu does not create the universe as an illusion but as a reality).

(4) The word dhīmaḥi in this verse seems to have led the writers of the Matsya and other Purāṇas to equate this verse with the sacred Gāyatri Mantra (RV. III, 62.10 and occurring in other Vedas). This Vedic verse is in the Gāyatri metre and is addressed to Savitṛ (the Sun who is the source and inspirer of everything). It literally means ‘We contemplate upon that longed-for refulgence of the divine Savitṛ who may inspire our intellects.’ (For the sacredness of the Gāyatri mantra see P.V. Kane—Hist. of Dharmaśāstra Vol. II, 1303-304). Commentators of different schools of Vedānta endorse the above view of the Purāṇa-writers. VJ. spells out this equation between the Gāyatri Mantra and this verse (Bh.P.1.1.1) as follows:

<tr>
<th>Gāyatri</th>
<th>Bh.P. 1.1.1</th>

<tr>
<td>dhiyo yo naḥ pracoṛdaiḥ</td>
<td>tene Brahma hṛdā Ādi-kavaye</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>dhīmaḥi</td>
<td>dhīmaḥi</td>
</tr>

VJ. states that the Bh.P. verse is an ‘explanation or elucidation’ of the Gāyatri Mantra.

(5) SD. (Śuka-deva) in his siddhānta-Pradīpa presents the point of view of the Nimbārka or the dualistic-cum-nondualistic (Dvaitādvaita) Vedānta. Here significant differences in the interpretation of the words in this verse (from that of ŚR.) are briefly noted.

Jamnādyasya—This refutes the schools which deny the existence of Brahma.

Satyaṁ dhīmaḥi—Let us meditate on the Lord who is described by Śruti as being ‘Real, Infinite knowledge, Brahma’.

Param—cause of the universe.

Jamnādyasya yato'nvayād itarataḥ—Herein jamnādī—means creation, preservation, destruction and liberation. The Lord is within all (sarvādhān) both by positive and negative proofs (anvaya and vyatiṣṭhā).

Yo'rtiṣvaśabhijātāḥ—This refutes the Sāṁkhya theory that the primordial Nature (pradhāna) is the cause of the world. He knows all objects while they are being created.

Muhantān yat sūryaḥ—Though He is the cause of the world, Kapila and founders of other schools of philosophy do not know him and are deluded.

teto-nāri-mrdībh yatāḥ vinimayaḥ—Hereby he refutes Vaiśeṣika theory of the creation of the universe. Just as the effects of Fire, Water and Earth viz. sparks, bubbles and pitcher are created out of some positive—existing—substances, the threefold creation is also real. This refutes the doctrine of the māyā-vādins (believers in cosmic illusion) who regard the three-fold creation as illusory.

dhāmā vena sadā nirasta-kukakam—Faultlessness of Brahmā. * Owing to his inherent refugence, the Supreme Lord is never soiled by the faults due to the three-fold creation.

(6) VB. (Vallabha), the exponent of pure non-dualistic (Śuddhādvaita) Vedānta, declares in his Com. Subodhinī that the world is real and is subtly Brahmā. The individual souls and the inanimate world are in essence one with Brahmā. He admits that individual soul (jīva), time (kāla), prakṛti or māyā are eternal existences. Brahmā can create the world without any connection with māyā. He (Brahmā) is not only an agent (karta) but also an enjoyer (bhokta). According to VB., the highest goal is not liberation (mukti) but rather eternal service of Kṛṣṇa and participation in his sports in the celestial Vrndāvana. Non-difference alone is said to be real.

The following are the important differences in explanation from ŚR:

janmādi asya yatāḥ—(i) That from which the sky is created. (ii) That of which (sustenance and destruction) creation is the beginning.

asya—One assuming the form of crores of worlds and one who is beyond the capacity of the mind to cognize.

yatāḥ—Brahmā, though the ‘seed’ (cause) of the universe does not undergo a modification just as the wish-yielding cow, tree or gem remain unchanged when they give the desired object.

anugyād itarataḥ etc.—Brahmā is both the material and instrumental cause of the world.

svarāj—(i) Due to His self-splendidness (omniscience—GD.) He is not interested in objects of enjoyment etc. (ii) One who is absorbed in the joy of His own Self. has no worldly occupation (kleśa).

ḥṛtā—Along with the Purāṇas—‘Purāṇa is regarded as his heart’ (Purāṇam hṛtayam smṛtam) yatrag-mṣā—The characteristics of non-sentients and individual souls (jada-jīva-dharmāḥ) are not found in the Supreme Lord. GD. (Giridhara) in his Com. Bālaprabodhinī explains: In the Supreme Lord’s person, the creation of three attributes of the primordial nature (prakṛti) viz. sattva, rajas and tama, are false.

dhāmāvā svena etc.—(i) Destroyer of the nescience of all by manifesting himself.

kukako—Fraud, viz. false identification of the body and sense-organs with the soul.

sattram.....dhimahi—Let us love or meditate on the Supreme Man, who is unaffected by Time and well known in the world and described in the Vedas.

(7) The Bengal School of Vaiṣṇavism with their emphasis on Rādhā and the Parakiṣṇa Preman cult shows great reverence to ŚR. who in fact knows nothing of Rādhā and never advocated Parakiyā Premān (love between a man and a woman who is the wife of another person).

Caitanya had to develop this concept to absorb the Buddhist Sahajiyas and their followers in orthodox Hindu fold. JG. (Jīva Gōsāmī), a great exponent of this school, states that his Com. on the Bh.P.—The Kṛma Sandartha—is complementary to ŚR. elucidating some points omitted or briefly explained by him.

*Svāmi-pādair na yaa vyaktām yad vyaktām cāsāphuṣam kvaṣit / Tatra tatra ca vijñeyāḥ Sandartha-Krama-nāmakāḥ /

Actually they differ so much from ŚR. They admit of five principles: God, souls, māyā or prakṛti, the inherent power of God (svarūpa lakti) with its elements of jñāna (knowledge), buddha-tattva (pure matter) and kāla (Time). The ultimate reality is Viṣṇu, the personal God of love and grace, possessing the usual attributes of sat, cit and ánanda. He is both nirguṇa and sāguṇa as he inheres the qualities of omniscience, omnipotence etc.

According to JG., this verse enjoins meditation upon the Supreme Being who is the creator, omnipresent, free from all defects, full of inherent knowledge and the giver of liberation. The Com. of JG. is too big to be summarised here.

GS. (Gaṅgāsahāya) in his Com. Anvītārtha-prakāśikā maintains that this verse is pregnant with the contents and meaning etc. of the entire Bh.P. All the 10 characteristics of Purāṇas are found herein. Obviously he accepts the Sk. terms of the characteristics mentioned in the Bh.P. II.10.1., viz. (1) Sarga, (2) visarga, (3) sthāna, (4) poṣaṇa, (5) úti, (6) manvantara, (7) tīṇukathā, (8) nirodha, (9) mukti, (10) āśraya.

The use of 1 p. atm. pada shows 'the rightful claimant' and the meditation suggested in this. II
2. Here, in this celebrated Bhāgavata composed by the Great Sage, is explained the highest Duty (Dharma), completely free from deceit, (viz. interest about this world and even the desire about liberation—ŚR.). (It is the Dharma) of the righteous who are devoid of envy (and hence kindly to all beings—ŚR.). Here the thing to be known is the absolute Reality (Or it is the individual soul, when a part of this thing or Reality is meant; it is māyā or Cosmic Illusion, when the power of the thing is implied; it is the universe when its effects are understood—the non-difference of these all from the absolute Reality can be easily understood—ŚR.) It gives the highest bliss and destroys the three kinds of misery. Can the Supreme Lord be realized in the heart immediately by the teachings of other (treatises)? No. (But in this Bhāgavata) he can be so comprehended at once by the meritorious who have a desire to hear (and study) this (Bhāgavata Purāṇa).

2. The great sage Nārāyaṇa is regarded as the original author of the Bhāgavata. The four verses in the Bh. P. II.9.32-35, narrated by the Supreme Lord to God Brahmā are regarded as the nucleus of this big epic. But VR. takes this sage as Vyāsa.

3. The following is the traditional classification of miseries: (i) ādhyātmika—The internal and external pangs and miseries suffered by the body and/or the mind. (ii) ādhībhautika—miseries from contact with gross elements and their products, e.g. accidents, tortures etc. (iii) ādhidaivika—tortures meted out after death, in the other world, according to one's misdeeds.

GD. (Giridhara) however limits these miseries to life on the earth and classifies: (1) caused by fever, grief etc., (2) caused by evil influence of stars, ghosts etc., (3) caused by heat, cold, tigers, serpents etc.

4. The Sk. commentators, hold that this verse describes the four requisites of the Bh.P., viz. (1) adhikārin—Persons qualified to read the Bh.P. (2) Viṣṇu—The main topic of this work. (3) Prayojana—The object or the 'Why' of the treatise. (4) Sambandha—The relationship of (2) and (3).

The following are the summaries of the Sk. commentaries of the principal schools of the Vedānta:

(1) VR. explains

The main subject of discussion in this Purāṇa is dharma. It is twofold: (1) siddha (established) viz. the Supreme Soul described herein 'from Vedya... tātparyayamālam'. (ii) sādhyā (to be achieved) is the 'devotion' described in nir-matsarāgānān satām. The objective is two-fold: Direct—The revelation of the presence of God in the heart and, Indirect—destruction of three types of misery.

(i) sādhyā-dharma—In this Purāṇa the highest Duty of the non-jealous saintly persons is described. It being the 'highest', is above exorcizing or magical practices and fruit-yielding actions prescribed in the Vedas and implies virtues like tranquillity, self-restraint, essential for aspirants to Liberation. Grace and pleasure of the Supreme Lord is its objective and achievement.

(ii) siddha-dharma—This Purāṇa is called Bhāgavata as it deals with the form, nature, inherent qualities and powers of the Lord. It is composed by Bādarāyaṇa Vyāsa. Herein is described the Thing which is the Reality, giver of the auspicious bliss of Liberation, destroyer of the three types of misery. This Reality is to be comprehended by the good, saintly persons.

Other false scriptures are of no use. People in whom the desire to hear the Bhāgavata arises become blessed immediately and the Lord at once enters their hearts as soon as they listen to this Purāṇa.

(2) According to VJ., this verse describes the main topic of the Bh.P., the means to achieve it, the qualifications of the listener-and the objectives of this Purāṇa.

Here in the beautiful profound Bhāgavata is taught the Path which leads to the attainment of the Supreme Lord (or that which controls the 'falling' man or destroys the sins) and completely absolves one from hypocrisy, i.e. the ego of being the doer of acts, and makes him perform acts without any desire to enjoy their fruits. This path or Dharma is the highest due to the doer's offering of all the acts to God (OR It destroys the enemy (para) viz. the cycle of the transmigration of the soul). Hence this Path is characterised by devotion (bhakti-yoga-lakṣaṇa). Persons of pious actions and free from envy are eligible for this. The object of knowledge is the eternally existing flawless Reality imparting the highest bliss and uprooting three types of misery. Here, the relation characterised by the path of devotion (Bhakti-Yoga) and its object, i.e. God are expounded. There is no propriety in recounting other paths which may lead to heaven. When this treatise called the Bhāgavata composed by the great sage is properly studied by persons with disciplined intellect and adopted in serving the spiritual preceptor and such other great ones and the Lord, God is seen 'fettered' in their heart at once, by the ties of devotion. Persons duly equipped with sādhanā can visualize the Lord the very moment they are introduced to the Bhāgavata.

(3) JG. states that this verse establishes the superiority of the Bh.P. to other treatises dealing with (religious) acts, knowledge and devotion. The repetition of the word 'here-in' (atra) is for emphasizing this speciality of the Bh.P. over other scriptures.

The Bh.P. teaches about the great religion viz. devotion to the Supreme Lord. This devotion is so motiveless that the devotee does not hanker after liberation also. The envylessness of the devotees implies kindly feelings to all beings so that the devotees refrain from animal-sacrifices. The Reality described herein is so powerful that it destroys three types of misery caused by Māyā (illusion) and nescience and gives the highest bliss. The adjective 'Śrīmad' in 'Śrīmad Bhāgavata' implies its great potentiality. Its author is the great sage Nārāyaṇa who composed it originally in 4 verses. The greatness of the author establishes the superiority of this work. By following other scriptures men may attain liberation with difficulty but the superiority of the Bh.P. lies in its power to put its listeners in immediate communion with God. Thus this being the science of immediate God-realization, the Bh.P. is the greatest of all scriptures.

(4) SD. explains:

This verse establishes the superiority of the Bh.P. over other scriptures from the point of its anubandhas (viz. the main topic, objective, the relation between the two and the qualifications of the listener of the Bh.P.). The Bh.P. is qualified by the adjective ‘Śrimad’ as it contains the beautiful description of the person, qualities etc. of the Supreme Lord. This is composed by the great sage Vyāsa (the son of Parāśara), the knower of the Vedas and an incarnation of the Supreme Lord. The greatness of the authorship shows the superiority of this scripture over others. Herein is to be known the great religion of devotion (Bhakti) which is selfless (motiveless) and which is adopted by pious person free from jealousy. The Thing (the Reality) the principle called Śrīkṛṣṇa which uproots the three kinds of misery and blesses with liberation, is to be understood here. The Reality consisting of the three principles, viz Brahma, the sentient individual soul and the non-sentient are to be comprehended. Thus this scripture is superior to others due to its authorship, topic of discussion and the qualification of its listeners. The meritorious who have a desire to listen to the Bh.P. at once find Śrīkṛṣṇa ‘stabilised’ (present) in their heart.

This verse gives the five objectives:

(1) The Thing (Reality, Śrī-kṛṣṇa)—object of devotion.
(2) The Sentient, individual soul, the devotee.
(3) Liberation—the fruit of the grace of the Lord.
(4) The sentiment of devotion (bhakti-rasa).
(5) ‘Opposition’ suggested by the word (para).

The other scriptures, their injunctions, the eligibility of their followers etc. are different or opposite to those of the Bh.P.

The envyless devotee is the eligible person (adhkāri) and liberation is the objective (prapujana).

(5) GD. (Giridhara), a descendant of VB. and an exponent of pure non-dualistic (Śuddhādvaita) school of Vedānta lucidly explains as follows:

As there are number of works dealing with paths of Knowledge, Action and Devotion, the superiority of the Bh.P. over all other works and from the points of four anubandhas is given. Here in the Śrimad Bhāgavata is taught the best path of Duty, of all those described in other scriptures. It is free from deception and is of the nature of nine-fold devotion. The singular dharma is used as all these varieties of devotion result in one—viz. attainment of Liberation. The adhkārin of the Bh.P., being jealousy-less, kindly disposed, pious person, it is superior to Karma-kāṇḍa which gives scope to jealousy. Reality, the object to be known, is a bestower of the highest bliss and destroyer of three kinds of misery. That this pure principle called Vāsudeva who liberates all, is understood by women and Śūdras (i.e. by persons not eligible for Vedic rites) and by all irrespective of their intellectual equipment, shows the superiority of this treatise to others. The author—Bādarāyaṇa Vyās
3. *This (Bhāgavata Purāṇa) is the (ripe) fruit of the wish-yielding tree⁶ of the Vedas, that has been dropped down from the mouth of (the sage) Śuka (as from the mouth of a parrot=Śuka); that is full of (lit. endowed with) ambrosial juice⁸ (viz. the highest bliss). Oh appreciators of beauty, the connoisseurs of its (the Bh.P.'s) peculiar excellences⁷, you do drink⁸ constantly this Bhāgavata—a fruit which is entirely or the Supreme Lord—is also the most authoritative one. This shows the greatness of the Bh.P. among treatises of Jñāna Kāṇḍa.

The desire to listen to the Bh.P. does not arise without meritorious action. Lord Vāsudeva described in the 1st verse gets instantaneously bound in the heart of those who desire to listen to the Bh.P. What of those who are intent on hearing (and studying) it? The repetition of the words showing instantaneousness (viz. sadyah and tabṣṣyāmar) shows how very quickly His presence is established in the heart. This immediate fulfilment of the objective proves that the Bh.P. is superior to other scriptures. Hence its superiority to other treatises dealing with upāsanā kāṇḍa.

GD. repeats the four anubandhas of the Bh.P. like other Commentators.

*VJ. interprets as follows:

'Oh men of the world who can appreciate excellence! Till the fall of your material body (liṅga-Sarīra) you do drink again and again the delicious juice of the ripened fruit called the Bhāgavata which was made to fall by me (Vyāsa) from the wish-yielding tree, viz. the Vedas, the sweetness of which is increased due to its flow from the mouth of Śuka ('the sage') and 'the parrot.' It is well-known that the parrots eat only the ripe fruit.

5. nīgama-kalpataruḥ—Kalpataru is a mythological wish-yielding heavenly tree. The Vedas are the means of obtaining the objectives of human life (purusārthas). As the Vedas are thus productive of all desires, they are compared with kalpataru—ŚR., VR. As the Bh.P. contains the essence of the Vedas, it is called the 'fruit' of the Veda-Tree—VR.

6. amṛta-drava-sānyuta-—amṛta—(i) The highest bliss—ŚR. (ii) Liberation—VR., VJ.

(a) mixed with the essence of liberation. Devotion full of the joy of experiencing (the presence of) the Lord—VR.
(b) That which leads to Liberation (muktī)—VJ.
(iii) The essence of the sports of Hari—JG.

7. bhāvukāḥ—(i) Expert judges of qualities of special kinds of tastes—ŚR.

(ii) Persons devoted to the enquiries about the glorious Lord—VR.
(iii) The abode of the highest auspiciousness (paraṁ-mahāgāyana) —JG.

8. pibata rasam—It is not possible 'to drink' a fruit. But the Bh.P is like a fruit which is entirely full of juice without any seed.
a sweet juice—here and in the state of the Final Beatitude. 9

4. In the Naimiṣāraṇya forest, a sacred place of Viṣṇu, sages whose leader was Śaunaka held a sacrificial session lasting for one thousand years, for attaining the heavenly abode of Viṣṇu. 12

5. The sages, who had offered the morning oblations 13

(i) The word rasa is used as a correlative of phala as juice when fallen down cannot be drunk—ŚR., VR.

(ii) Pā (pib) means ‘to eat’ as well—VJ.

9. ālayam—(i) up to death—VR. (ii) till the fall of the physical body (liṅga śarīra)—VJ. (iii) laya or pralaya is the 8th sāttvika stage. Till one reaches that stage—VC. (Viśvanātha Cakravarti). (iv) Which is the cause of the dissolution of the cycle of births and deaths (pāpaṇca)—VB. Or it (The Bh.P.-juice) should be drunk disregarding the desire for liberation

10. ŠR. and VB. record the popular etymology of the word “Naimiṣa” as “a place where the felly of the wheel (created by god Brahmā) was broken” : Brahmā viṣṭāiya cakrasya nemiḥ śiryate kuṇṭhīkavatī yatra / ŠR. quotes the authority of the Vāyaviya which states that when some sages went to Brahmā for a suitable place for performing penance, he created a wheel and asked the sages to follow it till it came to a standstill. The wheel owing to the breakage of its felly stopped at a place which came to be known as Naimiṣa:

The alternative spelling of this word is “Naimiṣa” which according to the quotation of the Varāha P. given by ŠR. is derived from Viṣṇu’s exploit of destroying an army of Dānavas (demons) within the twinkling of eyelids (nimiṣa).

Modern Nimsar, on the bank of the Gomati in the Sitapur district of the Uttar Pradesh is regarded as the site of the old sacred place called Naimiṣāraṇya (Vide Śiva P., P. 432, F.N.).

11. He belonged to the Bhrigu clan according to MBH. He was the leader of the sages who performed the great sacrificial session in the Naimiṣa forest and to whom the MBH, and the Puraṇas were recited by the Sūta. (Vide Śiva P. 1, F.N. 1).

12. According to ŠR., svarga means the God Viṣṇu. He explains svargāya lokaṁ as follows :

svaḥ svarga gīyata iti Svargāya Hariḥ, sa eva loka bhaktānāṁ nivāsa-sthānam, tasmāi tat-prāptaye / VJ. slightly differs. He interprets svarga as Viṣṇu Svarata Viṣṇuḥ tena gato loko Vaiśvānārāyaḥ tasmāi /

VB. also disapproves the explanation of ŠR. and explains “Bhagavānandāṁśa-bhūtah svargaḥ /Lokātmakastu mahān aisiḥ /Sa hyatra phalam /”

13. In the place of huta-udāgajaya, VJ. accepts the reading huta-huta with which is better, though we have followed ŠR. in the above translation.
(both of the daily routine and the special ones of the sacrificial session), once, respectfully asked the Sūta who was hospitably received and (comfortably) seated:

6. Oh sinless one! Mythological epics (Purāṇas) along with history (Itiḥāsa e.g. the Mahā Bhārata) and Law-books (like Smṛtis composed by sages, e.g. Manu, Yājñavalkya and others) as well, have been not only studied but also expounded by you.

7. Oh Sūta! Whatever the venerable Bādarāyaṇa, greatest among the learned ones, knows and whatever other sages who

14. ekadā: VB. interprets as “the time of singing or reciting the Kṛṣṇa-legend” (Hari-Gāthopāgayana-kālāḥ). It is at this time of the sacrificial session that the Sūtas come. VB. thinks that this Sūta is not a Brahmin and though as per formalities, he was expected to stand in the assembly of those Brahmin sages, he was specifically asked to sit comfortably for narrating Kṛṣṇa’s life. (vide Subodhinī i.1.5, page 8).

15. A.D. Pusalker thinks that this narrator of the Purāṇas is a Brahmin, a view accepted by the editor of the Śiva P. (vide P.1, FN. 2). But I think it is still an open question.

The Sūta who narrated the BH.P. was the son of Romahārṣaṇa, the disciple of Bādarāyaṇa (BH.P. 1.1.6-8).

16. Purāṇa—‘Ancient legendary history’. Name applied to 18 well-known sacred works containing the whole body of Hindu mythology; supposed to be composed by Vyāsa. Each Purāṇa treats of the following topics: The creation, the destruction and renovation of the universe, the genealogy of Gods and ancient heroes, the reigns of Manus and the narratives of their descendants. These are enumerated thus:

Sargaś ca Prati-Sargaś ca Varāha Manvantarāṇi ca /
Vamśānuvardhitaṁ caiva Purāṇam pañca-lakṣaṇam //

Different lists of the 18 Purāṇas are available. ASD 67 gives the following titles:

17. Ca, VJ. include Upa-Purāṇas, 18 in number, but Bhāratīya Sanskriti Kola (Vol.I, P. 667) enumerates 51 titles.

18. Śāstra—VB includes secular sciences like artha-Śāstra under this.

19. A name of Veda Vyāsa, the reputed author of the Brahma Sūtras. Authorship of all Purāṇas and Upa-Purāṇas and the Mahābhārata is attributed to him.
know the saguṇa (possessing attributes) and nirguṇa (attribute-less) [aspects of] *Brahman*²⁰, know,

8. Oh gentle one! You know all that (completely and) accurately through his (Bādarāyaṇa's) favour. Teachers disclose even their deepest secrets to an affectionate pupil.

9. Oh long lived one! You are fit to tell immediately what is entirely for the good of men, as has been properly decided by your honour directly from the (Purānic) text.

10. Oh honourable one! In this Kali age, men are generally short-lived, lazy, of dull intelligence, unfortunate and victims of diseases.

11. Numerous are the religious rites (requiring a number of technical performances) which deserve to be heard in details. Hence, Oh righteous one! After determining the essentials out of these by your keen intelligence, tell them to us, the reverentials, so that our minds will be thoroughly soothed.

12. Oh Śūta! God bless you. You know (the objective) why the venerable Lord of the Sātvatas²¹ (or the protector of His worshippers—ŚR) was born of Devaki²² and Vasudeva.

13. Well, Sir! You will be pleased to describe to us who are desirous of hearing about him who se incarnation is for the good and prosperity of all beings.

²⁰ I followed ŚR in interpreting the words para and avara. The other commentators differ as follows:

VR. The Supreme Soul (paramātma-tattva) and the lower self or prakṛti-puruṣa-tattva.

VJ. takes these as two aspects of Brahman and as an alternative explanation “One who knows the past and the future”—an explanation endorsed by VB. VB. also thinks that para signifies Gods like Brahman while avara means men like ourselves. GS. takes para as ‘Brahman’ and apara as prakṛti etc.

²¹ Sātvata—Name of the Yādava clan. It is also interpreted as ‘Worshipper’.

²² Devaki—Wife of Vasudeva, mother of Kṛṣṇa and cousin of Kaṁsa; regarded as an incarnation of Aditi and Pṛśni. According to Padma P., in Devaki's marriage a voice from heaven predicted the death of Kaṁsa at the hands of the 8th child of Devaki. As a precautionary measure, Kaṁsa imprisoned both Vasudeva and Devaki and tried to kill all her children. But Kṛṣṇa, the 8th child, was saved. Kṛṣṇa killed Kaṁsa and got his parents honourably released. She stayed with him throughout his life. After Kṛṣṇa’s death, she entered fire. (PGK p. 452)
14. A person who, having fallen into this dreadful circuit of worldly existence, becomes utterly helpless and utters his name, is then immediately liberated. Fear itself is afraid of him.

15. Oh Śūta! Sages who have taken resort to His feet and who are the abodes of tranquillity, purify immediately by their presence (when approached); whereas the water of the divine Gaṅgā sanctifies after actual contact, i.e., ablutions (lit. 'by actual service').

16. Or what person desirous of purity of heart, will not listen to the glory of the venerable Lord whose deeds are praised by persons of auspicious fame—the glory that cleanses the sins of the Kali age.

17. Describe to us who are very eager (to hear) his great acts which are eulogised by the learned ones (like Nārada, Vyāsa or Brahmā etc.)—acts of him who sportively assumes different forms.

23. It is alternately explained: '......Lord who is of sanctifying fame and well known beautiful deeds.' VJ., VD.

24. 1. great e.g. the creation of the universe—ŚR. SD. 2. removing sins—udgata-dosā—VJ. 3. creating (lit. giving) highest rapture—JG. 4. giving the desired objects to devotees—VGC. 5. awarding the four highest goals in human life (purusārtha) viz. dharma, artha, kāma and mokṣa—G.D.

25. dadhataḥ—This present participle signifies the eternal nature of His pastimes—VGC.

26. Kalāḥ—1. Forms e.g., Brahman, Rudra etc.—ŚR. 2. All incarnations—VJ., VGC. 3. Incarnations in the shape of man etc.—JG. 4. Kṛṣṇa was the only complete incarnation (purusāvatāra) is implied by this—VR., GD. 5. VD. waxes eloquent in explaining the concept of incarnation (avatāra). The incarnations are of three types—(i) purusāvatāra viz. Saṅkarṣapa, Pradyumna and Aniruddha of the Pañcaratṛa system; (ii) guri-vatāra e.g. Brahman (representing rajo-guṇa), Rudra (for tamoguṇa) &c. (iii) lilāvatāra—All incarnations from Sanaka, Sanandana upto Kalki (described in BH.P.I.3).

VD. gives another fourfold classification of these incarnations in ascending powerfulness, according as they are due to: (1) influence or āvesa (e.g. Sanaka, Nārada, Prthu etc.); (2) miraculous power or Prabhāva (e.g. Mohini, Vyāsa, Datta etc.); (3) magnificence or Vaibhava (e.g. Nara, Nārāyaṇa, Hayagriva etc.) and (4) of the highest stage or Parāvasthā, which are in ascending hierarchy Narasimha, Rāma and Kṛṣṇa.

Thus Kṛṣṇa is regarded as the most complete incarnation. Kṛṣṇa eva svayam bhagavān, na tato dhikāḥ Ko'pyasti—VD.
18. Oh intelligent (Sūta)! Describe to us fully the auspicious narratives of the incarnations of Hari, the Supreme Ruler, who by his mystic power called "Illusion"\textsuperscript{27} indulges at will in his pastimes.

19. We, however, do not feel thorough satisfaction in hearing about his glorious\textsuperscript{28} prowess which according to listeners who are connoisseurs of tastes is of increasing sweetness\textsuperscript{29} every moment.

20. Lord Keçava, (though the Supreme Being is) concealed in human disguise\textsuperscript{30}, has certainly performed super-human acts of heroism, along with Balarāma\textsuperscript{31}.

21. We, apprehending the arrival of the Kāli age, have engaged ourselves in a sacrifice of a long duration in this field consecrated by Lord Viṣṇu. Hence, we have sufficient leisure\textsuperscript{32} to hear the story of Hari.

\textsuperscript{27} ātma-Māyā—(1) His own power called 'miracle' (āścarya-sakti).—VR. (2) 'Knowledge' (saikalpa-sūpa jñāna) (3) 'Will-power', but with the following different implications: (a)Śvarūpa-bhūta-icchā—VJ. (b) nijeschārūpa-saktiḥ.—JG., VD. quote mahāsāṁhitā :

Ātma-māyā tad-icchā syād—Guna-māyā jaḍātmikā
d (4) 'Mystic power' (yoga-māyā)—VG.

28. Uttama-śloka—(i) whose glory dispells the darkness in the form of ignorance of the mind or nescience (avidyā—SR., GD. (ii) which is praised by the best (persons)—VC., VD. (iii) whose glory is the best—VG. (iv) one who is praised by the liberated who experience the joy of Brahma, VB.

29. Svādu—svādu—more tasteful than tasteful things—SR. However, VJ. is followed here.

30. Kāpata-mānuṣāḥ—(a) 'Disguised as man; Having the appearance of man.'—VR., GD. &c. JG. explains: The Supreme Lord has no material body implied by the word 'man'. He is the Supreme being appearing in human shape. (b) 'Mānuṣetvapi kāh sukham patati prāpnoti'—VJ.

31. Balarāma: An incarnation of Śrī, son of Vasudeva and originally of Devaki but by womb-transfer, was born of Rohini, another wife of Vasudeva. He was fair in complexion and was usually dressed in blue. He was brought up along with Kṛṣṇa by Nanda in Gokula. He is represented as armed with a ploughshare and a pestle-like club. He was a lifelong associate of Kṛṣṇa, sharing with him all vicissitudes of life. He was noted for his great physical power and short temper and addiction to wine and dice. He married Revati. At the time of the last internecine fight among the Yādavas, he quietly retired and left his human mortal body by yogic process and resumed his form as Śeṣa (Details—Viṣṇu P.; Harivamsa). DHM. 40-41, PI. 2.463-65.

32. kṣaṇa—Joy, desire (utsava)—VD.
22. By the creator (or Lord Viṣṇu) you have been clearly pointed out as the helmsman (of a ship) to us (who are) desirous of crossing the ocean (in the form of) the Kali Age which is difficult to be crossed over and which deprives (men) of goodness\textsuperscript{33} (or ‘Strength’ as applied to ocean).

23. Tell us to whom righteousness has now resorted for refuge (when) Kṛṣṇa, the master of Yogic-mystic powers, wellversed in the Vedas, the protector of religion, has returned to his abode.\textsuperscript{34}

CHAPTER TWO

Vyāsa said:

1. Being highly pleased at these courteous questions of the Brāhmaṇas (Sūta, Ugraṇravas) the son of Romaharṣana, complimenting their words (enquiry) began to reply in details.

Sūta said:

2. I bow down to that sage (Śuka) whose ceremony of the investiture of the sacred thread had not taken place (i.e. in that early stage of childhood), who had renounced all actions and set out (of home\textsuperscript{35}) and whom the sage Vyāsa (Śuka’s

\textsuperscript{34} svāṁ kāṣṭhāṁ—
—His own boundary i.e. His own Self—ŚR.
—His own direction, i.e. Vaikuṇṭha-loka—VR.
—His own attribute, full form (guṇa-pūrṇa-svarūpam)—VJ.
—His quarter, i.e. His own eternal abode (nīja-nitya-dhāma)—JG.
—His boundary, the span of life of 125 years while he was in this world—VC.

\textsuperscript{35} pravrajāntam—ŚR. : Set out as a recluse (to enter the 4th stage of life, viz. Saṁnyāsa). But VJ. refutes this on the grounds of theeligibility of Śuka to Saṁnyāsa as his thread ceremony had not taken place. Here pravrajyā does not mean saṁnyāsa but “abruptly going out.” VB. explains pravrajānām as “leaving out all contacts” and not saṁnyāsa.
father Dvaipāyana)⁴⁶, being grieved at his separation from him, called back as “Oh Son” (to which) the trees, being like Śuka on account of his (Śuka’s) existence (entry) into the hearts of all beings⁴⁷ responded (to Vyāsa).

3. I seek refuge in the son of Vyāsa (viz. Śuka, the spiritual master of sages who had, out of compassion for people in the worldly existence desiring to cross over the (ocean of) the blinding darkness (of ignorance), narrated the secret one among the Purāṇas ⁴⁸ (viz. the Bhāgavata Purāṇa), which is the only one lamp of spiritual truth, full of its own (uncommon) glory⁴⁹, and is the essence of all the Vedas.

4. After paying obeisance to Nārāyaṇa⁴⁰ and also to Nara⁴¹ the best of men⁴², and also⁴³ to the goddess of learning, one should narrate Jaya (another name of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa. See VR. and SD.).

⁴⁶. Dvaipāyana—The name of Vyāsa, the son of Parāśara, so called because of his birth on an island in the Jumna—PCK. p. 479.

evaṁ Dvaipāyana jñāne Satyavān guhyam Parāśarāt |
Nyāsto dvipā se ved bālas tasmād Dvaipāyanaḥ smṛtah //

—MBH. I.63.86

⁴⁷. sva-v-bhūta-hṛdayaḥ—ŚR.: Śuka replied through the medium of trees to remove the paternal bond from the heart of Vyāsa.

VB.: One who controls the hearts of all beings; or whose heart is in all beings.

JG.: Upon whom the heart of all beings is placed.

⁴⁹. svānubhāvam—JG.: This expresses the uncommon glory of the BH.P. but VJ.: He who expounded Brahman (svānubhāvam) and who narrated the BH.P. which is...etc. (VJ. construes this verse differently as indicated above).

⁵⁰. Nārāyaṇa : Viṣṇu so called because he lay on the waters of the Deluge before the beginning of Creation: Ṛpo nārā iti proktā ṛpo vai nara-sūnavaḥ | Tā yadasyeśvānaṁ pūrvaṁ tena Nārāyaṇaḥ smṛtah //

⁵². nirūttaṁ—The best of beings. Some treat this as the adjective qualifying Nara.

⁵³. VJ. reads “Vyāsa” for caiva. He interprets this verse rather differently:
5. Oh sages! I have been very nicely asked by your honour about the welfare (or bliss) of the people because (your) relevant question is about Kṛṣṇa, whereby the soul becomes completely soothed.

6. That is certainly the sublime religion\(^44\) for men, (religion) from which is created the devotion to Lord Viṣṇu—devotion which is without any (ulterior) motive, unobstructed (or constant) and by which the soul becomes deeply pacified.

7. Loyal devotion (applied) to Lord Vāsudeva\(^45\) immediately\(^46\) generates non-attachment which leads to causeless\(^47\) knowledge.

8. If that religion, howsoever well-practised, does not create love for the stories of Lord Kṛṣṇa, it is certainly sheer labour.

9. Verily, wealth is not the proper objective of the religion leading to Liberation\(^48\). The desire (for worldly

"After paying homage to Nārāyaṇa (the subject of the Bhāgavata Śāstra), Vyāsa (the author of the BH.P.), the goddess Lakṣmī, Vāyu, the greatest of men, the highest teacher, Sarvasvātī (the goddess of learning) and Nara, I expound the BH.P. (due to the favour of the above deities)." JG. states: ‘Of this Bhāgavata Śāstra, Nara & Nārāyaṇa are the presiding deities (adhisthāt-devate), Śrī-Kṛṣṇa is the Devatā, Sarvasvātī is the Śaktī, Vyāsa is the Seer (Rṣi), OM (prāṇava) is the Bija, and Gāyatrī is the Metre (Chandras). As pointed out by Nilakanṭha in his Comm. on the Devī-Bhāgavata, the 1st verse of the BH.P. is not in the Gāyatrī metre (vide Ft. Note on BH.P.I.1.1)’ \(^44\) ŚR.: This verse answers the 1st question (in Bh.P.I.1.9). \(\text{para dharmā} \) : Religion is of two kinds—\(\text{apara dharmā} \) (i.e. Dh. the object of which is Liberation) and—\(\text{para dharmā} \) (which creates devotion to Kṛṣṇa).

\(^45\) Vāsudeva—VR.: All pervader, VJ.: One who dwells (pervades) everywhere or One who makes all to dwell in Him. \(\text{vasati sarvatra, svasmin sarvam vāsayati=vasuḥ. vasuś cāsau devaś ca} \)

\(^46\) āstu—JG. Quickly. As soon as the Bh.P. is heard, the knowledge described therein is created.

\(^47\) ahatukā—ŚR.: Free from unnecessary arguments & JG.: Derived from the Upaniṣads. VD.: The object or cause of which is “A” (i.e.) Vāsudeva. VJ.: With no ulterior motive like money etc. VR.: Bhakti as an end in itself. SD.: That which does not result in anything but devotion. VB.: Knowledge which is not inferrable but is generated directly by realization (sākṣātkāra)

\(^48\) āpavargya—VR., VJ.: “That which leads to Liberation”. JG.: Devotion—Unconditional devotion of the individual spirit to the divine spirit. The devotion which does not expect any gain in return but gives oneself up to God.
things) is never enjoined for the attainment of that (kind of) wealth which has religion as its end (object).\(^{49}\)

10. It is not proper to satisfy the senses (by enjoyment of desired objects but to limit) that much enjoyment of desired objects as is essential for (the sustenance of) life. The aim of life in this world is enquiry about the Truth (or the essential nature of the Supreme Being = Tattva) and not (the desire for enjoyment in Heaven) by performing religious rites.

11. Those who possess the knowledge of the Truth (tattva) call the knowledge of non-duality\(^ {50}\) as the Truth. It is also variously designated as Brahman, Paramātman or Bhagavān.

12. The sages who have faith in it (Brahman) visualize their own soul in themselves, through devotion which is combined with knowledge and non-attachment and which is developed by listening to the Vedānta.

13. Hence, Oh greatest of the twin-borns! Gratification (grace) of Hari is the consummation of religion practised well by men according to the division of castes and stages of life.

14. Therefore, the Venerable Lord of the Sātvatas (deserves always to be) heard, eulogised, meditated and worshipped with concentrated attention.

15. Who will not love (listen to) His narratives by whose sword-like meditation, the learned ones, becoming one with the

\(^{49}\) dharmāṅgaṁya—VJ “That of which Dharma is the only definite fruit”. VR. endorses the same when he says: Dharmāṅga-prayojaṁsvārthaṁ viśaya lābhaṁ prayojaṁ na kāmo na svātāḥ [Arthaṁ prayojaṁ na kāmo bhavati | It may be noted that kāma he means our needs of life annaṁpanādi.]

\(^{50}\) advayā—ŚR. : Non-duality. Here Bh. P. anticipates the theory of momentariness of the Buddhists. VJ : “Having neither equal nor superior”. VR. : “incomparable with It”, also avaya-bheda-raktā, or jātyādi-bhedaraktā. JG. : Knowledge is nothing but consciousness (cit) and has no second (advayā) and is of the Supreme Being. Although the Bh. P. uses the word Tattva in the sense of Brahman, Paramātman and Bhagavān, one is the Pure knowledge beyond everything, the other is the internal controller having abundance of Māyā—power, while the last is complete within Himself. Verse 12: ātmanī—ŚR. : “In sentient beings”, JG. “In the purified hearts of sentient beings”
Supreme Spirit cut asunder the knot-like acts producing bondage.

16. Oh Brähmaṇas! Love about the narratives of Vāsudeva will be generated in (persons) desirous of hearing (or devoted to service) and full of faith, by performing holy pilgrimages and through the service of the great (holy) people.

17. The reason is that Kṛṣṇa, hearing and glorifying (whose episodes) is meritorious and who is the well-wisher of the good, exists in the hearts of the listeners to His narratives and shakes off all evil.

18. When Evils are all but destroyed by continuous services of the devotees of the Lord, firm devotion to the Lord of excellent fame, is generated.

19. Then, mind, not being affected by perturbations (qualities or "aspects" like Passions (rajas) and Ignorance (tamas) and by desire, avarice and others, and being stabilised in goodness, is quietened (soothed).

20. Thus the knowledge of the reality of the Lord is produced in the person whose mind is pacified and who has freed himself from attachment through the devotion of the Supreme Lord.

21. As soon as the Supreme Lord is seen within oneself, his knot (of ego) in the heart is cut asunder, all doubts are

52. granthi—ŚR.: Knots i.e. acts producing ego, JG.: Acts producing ego in different bodies.

53. or the study of the Bhāgavata.

54. uttama-śloka—ŚR.: (1) As in Bh.P. 1.1.19 He whose glory dispels darkness of ignorance in mind. (2) The Lord who is praised by persons whose hearts are absolved from ignorance.

55. bhāva—According to Sāṅkhyas, the perturbation of Prakṛti results in the non-balance of its guṇas i.e. "attributes or constituents" which Dr. Radhakrishnan prefers to call "aspects". But he prefers to use the original Sk. guṇa in Hist. of Ind. Phil. Vol. II pp. 262-65. I have however, followed the traditional translation of these terms.

56. JG. thinks that the communion with the Supreme Lord is felt from within without the influence of thinking power.

57. V.J. takes hṛdaya-granthi as Mind and not ego. Quoting Vedic scriptures he states that on this point ŚR.'s explanation is against the tenets of the BH.P. (Bhāgavata-jñānād advaita-niśedhā ca / ) solved and his actions (good or bad, of the previous period which are not exhausted by enjoying the fruits) are annihilated.

22. Hence, verily, wise men always practise with great delight (their) devotion in Lord Vāsudeva which purifies their hearts.\(^58\)

23. Sattva (goodness), rajas (passion) and tamas (ignorance)—These are the attributes or constituents of Nature (Prakṛti). The Supreme Being possessing these attributes is one. Here He assumes names like Hari, Viriṇci (Brahmadeva), and Hara (Śiva) for the preservation (creation and destruction) of the universe. There (from among them) the good (Final Beatitude) comes from Him whose body is Sattva (goodness) itself.

24. To the earthly wood, the smoke issuing from it is superior. To such smoke the Fire is superior as being connected with all sacrificial acts prescribed in the Vedas. (Similarly) the quality of rajas is better than that of tamas, but sattva-guṇa (the quality of goodness) is the best as the Supreme Spirit (Brahman) is realized in it.\(^59\)

25. Therefore, formerly sages worshipped Venerable Viśṇu (who is of purest goodness i.e. sattva-guṇa incarnate). Those who follow them here become fit for final beatitude.

26. So also, disregarding the lords of goblins of terrible forms, persons desirous of Liberation (being) quiet and free from malice adore images of Nārāyaṇa.

27. Verily, longing for wealth, power and offspring, persons whose nature (is dominated by) the qualities of rajas (passion) and tamas (ignorance) and who are of the kindred nature (as lords of manes etc.) adore the Lords of the manes, goblins and created beings and others.

28. Vāsudeva is the highest objective of the Vedas.

\(^{58}\) ŚR. : "Though the Supreme Being assumed three different names for three different functions, the real good of men will result in devotion to Vāsudeva who is full of Sattva-guṇa.

\(^{59}\) ŚR. Explains : The quality of rajas is more expressive of the Supreme Being than tamas. The particle tu shows that rajas has but little value as compared with sattva (Goodness) which fully expresses the nature of the Supreme Being. Thus the superiority of Viśṇu, the presiding deity of sattva-guṇa over the other two presiding deities of rajas and tamas (viz. Brahmadeva and Śiva) is obvious.
(Vedic) sacrifices are intended for Vāsudeva. The Yogic practices (and as a matter of that) all (religious) actions have Vāsudeva as their goal.

29. The object of knowledge is (the comprehension of) Vāsudeva. Religious penance is for the sake of Vāsudeva. Vāsudeva is the goal of Religion. Vāsudeva is the end to be reached in liberation.

30. The Supreme Lord who is without attributes (and) all-pervading by nature, formerly created this (Universe) by His will-power called Illusion (Māyā) which consists of (three) qualities (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas) and is of manifested and unmanifested form or “expressive of cause and effect (law of causation).

31. (The Supreme Lord) having manifested Himself by His Knowledge or Intellectual Power⁶⁰ and entering into these attributes created by Māyā appears as if He has attributes.

32. Just as the same fire placed in wood from which it is created, appears of different forms, (so also) the Purusā⁶¹—the Soul of the Universe appears different in created beings.⁶²

33. This (Supreme Lord), by entering into beings created by Himself by the effects full of attributes, of gross and subtle elements, organs of senses and Soul-mind, enjoys their attributes.⁶³

⁶⁰. vijnāna—ŚR.: Intellectual power, VR.: Soul (jīva), SD.: Individual soul (jīva) who is a part of the Universal soul and is of the nature of knowledge.

⁶¹. puruṣa—ŚR.: The Supreme Lord, the Soul of the universe. VR.: The individual soul (jīva). VJ., however, supports the above (our) translation.

⁶³. VC. differs. He takes asau as individual soul. The gist of his interpretation: “The individual soul enters the bodies of gods etc. created according to their past actions, and enjoys the objects of senses and does acts resulting into merits or sins”. Alternatively he suggests that the Supreme Lord enjoys through individual souls and not directly. VJ. thinks that the Supreme Lord enters these bodies in a detached manner. If he enters an unfortunate body, the Supreme Soul has not to suffer miseries like the individual soul.
34. Certainly, this Creator of the Universe, being fond of pastimes like incarnations in gods, non-human beings and men, protects the Universe, by his power.

CHAPTER THREE

Sūta said:

1. At the beginning, with the desire to create the Universe, the Lord assumed the form of Man (purusa) consisting of sixteen parts created from the tattvas (primary substances) of which Mahat (the Great or “Intelect”) is the first.

64. loka-bhāvanah—ŚR. “Protector of the Universe”. VJ., VR. : “The Creator of the Universe”.

65. ānu-rāta—SD. “Ready to protect the religion as needed at a particular period”. VJ. thinks that ānu means The Lord is not bound to but may at His will incarnate as per necessity of the world. He is not bound by the law of Karman to do so.

66. pauruṣam rūpam—ŚR. : Though the Supreme Spirit has no such human form, for the convenience of meditation or worship. He is regarded as Vīraṣ (one residing in or knowing the affairs of sentient beings.)

VJ. explains : The Supreme Being collected and preserved the whole of the universe in its subtle form in his “Belly”, at the time of the Deluge and lay covered in the darkness of his Prakṛti. At the time of Creation of the Universe, he drank up the Darkness covering him and manifested himself. This is “the assumption of the Puruṣa form”. Alternatively “the assumption of forms like Rāma, Kṛṣṇa etc” may be accepted.

V.B. : He assumed of his own accord body consisting of pure sattva (the constituent power—guna—of goodness) which is composed of tattvas (principles). It may not be a human form.

JG. : Puruṣa implies 3 forms of Viṣṇu, as (1) the Creator of the principle Mahat (Intelligence), (2) the Being in the Egg, and (3) the Being in all bhūtas. The Supreme Lord described as possessing 6 attributes of glory etc. is now described as Puruṣa. Rūpa according to VR. indicates here the cause of Brahmāṇḍa (Brahmāṇḍa-kāraṇam samaṣṭi-tattva-jālam), while with SD. rūpa is the effect of Samaṣṭi (aggregate which is considered as made up of parts each of which is consubstantially the same with the whole) and the material cause of vyāṣṭi (an aggregate viewed as made up of many separated bodies)—samaṣṭi-kāryātmokām vyāṣṭiṣṇopādāna-bhūnam

67. śoḍālakalam—ŚR., SD., VB. : 10 organs of senses + Mind + 5 mahābhūtas (Elements) = 16 parts.

68. mahādādhibhīḥ—ŚR. : Consisting of the “principles” (tattvas) called
2. Brahmā, the Head of the progenitor of the Universe, was born of the lotus of the deep-lake-like navel of the Lord who was lying on the waters (of the post-Deluge ocean) extending his yogic meditation-slumber.

3. Verily that form of the Lord on the formation of whose limbs is based the extent of the Universe, is very pure, excellent, and full of sattva (goodness).

4. They (i.e. yogins) with their vision of vast knowledge visualise this form wonderful (on account of its having) thousands of feet, thighs, arms, mouths, thousands of heads, ears, eyes and noses, shining on account of thousands of crowns, garments and earings.

5. This (original form of the Supreme Being, the Ādi-Nārayana) is the indestructible seed and the receptacle (place of return) of different incarnations and from whose parts and parts of parts, beings such as gods, subhuman beings (like animals, birds), men and others, are created.

by Sānkhyas as Mahat (the Great or Intellect), ahamkāra (ego or self-sense) and tanmātras (subtle pure elements corresponding to the 5 organs of sense).

69. viśva-srjām patīḥ—Brahmā, the Creator of the universe at first created 10 Prajāpatis (Lords or generators of created beings) e.g. Marici, Atri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu etc. In the Vāyupurāṇa we have another list: Kardama, Kaśyapa, Śeṣa, Vikrānta, etc. (For details vide PI. II.404)

VB. remarks that the word pati shows that to these generators of created beings, the order of Brahmā was inviolable.

70. nābhi-hradānmbujāḥ—VB. explains that the word nābhi (Navel) is used to signify the existence of the Universe in the belly of the Lord. ŚR. says that this refers to the Supreme Being’s assumption of Puruṣa form in the Padma Kalpa.

71. Yoga-nidrā—ŚR.: “The sleep of samādhi (meditation). VB. says that yoga-nidrā is a certain kind of power of the Lord. It relieves the agonies of beings and brings them to him. He extends it for the creation of the Universe.

72. adabhra-cakṣuṣā—ŚR.: “With their eyes of vast knowledge” VJ.: “Of full knowledge” SD.: “Of great knowledge”.

73. etad—VR. thinks that this is the Aniruddha form, VJ. calls this Padma-nābha while JG. “the Being in the egg of Brahman”.

74. bija—ŚR.: Place of origin; JG.: Embryo. VR.: The root cause.

75. amśāntena—ŚR.: Nārayana is the seed of incarnations as well as of all animate things as they are created out of his parts. Brahmā is the
6. At first\textsuperscript{76}, that very God manifested (Himself) as Youths\textsuperscript{77} and (becoming) Brāhmaṇa, practised unbroken celibacy which is difficult to practise.

7. Secondly, also, the Lord of Sacrifices (Nārāyaṇa) with the object of creation, assumed the body of a boar for raising up the Earth which had sunk down to the lower region called Rasatala\textsuperscript{78}.

8. And thirdly, He, having become the Divine Sage (Nārada\textsuperscript{79}) in the Ārṣa Creation (pertaining to sages), expounded the religio-mystical treatise pertaining to the Sātvatas (the devotees of Viṣṇu) namely Paṅcarāṭāgama by following which actions become void of their binding force.\textsuperscript{80}

9. In the fourth incarnation, having been born of the wife of Dharma (namely Mūrti, daughter of Dakṣa Prajāpati) as the twin sages Nara and Nārāyaṇa\textsuperscript{81}, He performed severe penance with fully pacified mind.

\textsuperscript{76} prathamam—ŚR.: This word is used for numerical reference only and does not indicate superiority or inferiority.

\textsuperscript{77} kaumāram—ŚR.: This is a name of Creation like Ārṣa, Prajāpatya etc. It includes Sanaka, Sanandana, Sanatana, Sanatkumāra. They were mind-born sons of Brahmā, and were Brāhmaṇas. They refused to create progeny and led a celibate life. SD., VR., JG. agree with ŚR.

\textsuperscript{78} Rasātalā—One of the seven sub-terranean regions. They are as follows: Atala, Vitala, Sutala, Talātala, Rasātalā, Mahātala and Pātāla. These are inhabited by Nāgas, demons etc.

\textsuperscript{79} Nārada: The beloved 10th son of Brahmā; one of the 12 who knew the Dharma ordained by Hari; a celibate; was taught the Bhāgavata by his father; he recited it to Vyāsa; author of Sātvata Tantra; mentioned many times in the Bh.P.

\textsuperscript{80} naiskarmyam—ŚR.: That from which the cause of the binding force of an action becomes null and void. VS.: means leading to Liberation.

VR. observes Those who perform niścitt type of karma should not follow pravṛtti dharma VI.: By performing karmas as prescribed in the Sātvata Tantra, one attains liberation.

\textsuperscript{81} These twin sages performed penance at Badarikāśrama. When Indra sent god of Love and heavenly damsels to disturb his contemplation, Nara created a number of beautiful ladies and asked the god of Love to select one for heaven. They took Urvāśī to heaven and reported the superior powers of the sages. Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa are regarded as the incarnations of Nara and Nārāyaṇa respectively.—PI. II.205., 291.
10. The fifth (incarnation) was by name Kapila, the chief of Siddhas (who) explained to Āsuri the Sānkhya doctrine which determined all the principles, which was lost (formerly) in the course of time.

11. In the sixth (Incarnation) He, being requested by Anasūyā became the child (lit. accepted the child-ship) of Atri, taught Metaphysics (ŚR: knowledge of the Soul) to Alarka, Prahlāda and others.

82. Kapila: Born of Kardama and Devasūti; taught knowledge of Brahma to his mother; propounder of the Sānkhya philosophy which he taught to Āsuri; one of the twelve who knew the Dhārmā ordained by Hari; burnt down 60,000 sons of Sāgara when they attacked him on suspicion of theft of their sacrificial horse. (Pl. I.311). Apart from the mythological account, Kapila seems to be a historical figure—an exponent of a system of philosophy in Pre-Buddhist period.

83. Āswi: N. of the disciple of Kapila; a siddha but did not comprehend Hari’s Māyā; was invited to Yudhīśthira’s Rājaśuya sacrifice. Pl.I.180.

84. Sānkhya: The system takes its name from its method of arriving at conclusions by theoretical investigation. The word Sānkhya is derived by some from Saṁkhyā or number and is appropriate to this system which gives an analytical enumeration of the principles of the cosmos. But this tendency to enumeration is common to all Hindu systems of thought...In the early texts, Sānkhya is used in the sense of philosophical reflection and not numerical reckoning. This particular system, which expounds by careful reflection the nature of pūruṣa or spirit and the other entities, acquired this significant title. — S. Radhakrishnan—Hist. of Ind. Phil. II. 248-34.

Cf. Śuddhātma-lattra-vijñānam Sānkhyam yadabhidhiyate / Śaṅkara—Comm. on Viṣṇu-sahasranāma.

85. Anasūyā: The wife of the sage Atri and a daughter of Kardama; mother of Datta, Durvāsas and Soma; mother of 5 Ātreyas and a daughter Śruti—Pl. I.53.

86. Atri: A son of Brahmā; married Anasūyā appointed by Brahmā for the creation of the world. While engaged in meditation on Mount Rkṣa, the Trimūrtis blessed him with 3 sons being their own parts (amśus). Accordingly Datta (Viṣṇu), Durvāsas (Śiva) and Soma (Brahmā) were born.—Pl. I.41.

87. Alarka: PCK (p. 76) records different Alarkas, but the one mentioned here seems to be the king of Kāśi; youngest son of Rādhvai and Madālasā; was expounded the spiritual knowledge by his mother and Dattātreya.

88. Prahlāda: Son of Hiranyakaśipu and Kayādhū; was initiated in the Bhāgavata Dhārmā by Nārada. For him Viṣṇu incarnated as Man-lion and killed Hiranyakaśipu. Prahlāda became the Lord of Dāityas. His
12. Then, in the seventh (incarnation), Yajña was born of Ruci and Ākuti. He along with gods of whom Yama was the first, protected the period assigned to the Manu called Svaśayambhū.

13. In the eighth (incarnation), Lord Viṣṇu (lit. One with wide steps) was born of King Nābhi and queen Meru Devi. He (as Rṣabha) showing to the strong-minded ones the path (of sannyāsa), the most respectable of all the stages of life.

14. Oh Brāhmaṇas! Having been implored by sages, (He) assumed the ninth body (incarnation) pertaining to (i.e. known as) Prthu. From this (earth), he milked (medicinal) plants. Thereby he became the most pleasant.

15. At the time of oceanic deluge in the epoch (Manvantara) called Cākṣuṣa he assumed the form of a fish and protected Vaivasvata Manu by making him board the earth-boat.

spiritual preceptor was Dattātreya. It was due to him that Kṛṣṇa spared the life of Bāṇa. Prahlāda lived in Sutala and attained liberation by Sat-saṅga.—PI. II.435-36.

89. Yajña: An incarnation of Viṣṇu, son of Ruci and Ākuti; reported to have married his twin-sister Dakṣinī; was Indra in the period called Svaśayambhva Manvantara.

90. Yama: Name of the 1st son out of 12 sons born of Yajña and Dakṣinī. He was a god in Svaśayambhva Manvantara.

91. Svaśayambhva Manvantara: Period relating to Svaśayambhū. Svaśayambhū was the first Manu (out of 14 Manus). Šatarūpā was his wife. They had 2 sons—Priyavrata and Uttanāpāda and 3 daughters viz. Ākūti, Devahūti and Prasūti who were married to Ruci, Kardama and Dakṣa respectively. As Ākūti was married by putrikā-dharma, he took over son Yajña. In the period (Manvantara) of Svaśayambhū, Marici, Atri, Anāgiras, Pulastyā, Pulaha, Kratu, and Bhrigu were the seven mind-born sons of Brahmā, Yajña was the Indra and Dakṣinī the Indrāṇī and their sons called Tuṣita were the gods.—BPK. 370.

92. Rṣabha—Ādinātha, an incarnation of Viṣṇu. For details see Bh.P. V.3-6.

93. Cākṣuṣa—The epoch (Manvantara) of the 2nd Manu Cakṣu. He was the son of Vyūṣṭa and Puṣkari; wife Ākūti, son Manu.—PI. I,574

94. mātasya rūpam—The Fish incarnation. Though this is the 10th incarnation here, it is regarded as the 1st incarnation of Viṣṇu, popularly.

95. Vaivasvata Manu—in his former life, V.M. was King Satyavrata of Tamil Nad, who by his obligations on Viṣṇu in his initial stage of Fish-
16. In the eleventh (incarnation) in the form of a tortoise, the omni-present Lord supported the Mandara mountain on his back while gods and demons were churning the ocean.\textsuperscript{96}

17. The twelfth (incarnation) is of Dhanvantari\textsuperscript{97}, and the thirteenth, the female form of Mohini\textsuperscript{98} who after deluding others (i.e. demons) enabled (lit. made) the gods to drink nectar.

18. Assuming the fourteenth Man-lion form\textsuperscript{99}, he tore up the chest of the powerful king of the Daityas with his claws like a weaver of mats (tearing) the rushes (grass).

19. Proposing to beg three paces (of land) but desirous of recovering (lit. taking back) heaven, he assumed the Pigmy incarnation was blessed with Manu-ship. He is the 7th Manu whose epoch continues at present. In his regime, Vasu, Rudra, Āditya, Viśve Deva, Marudgana, Aśvini-kumāra and Bhū are the gods. Purandara, the Indra and Kāśyapa, Atri, Vasiṣṭha, Viśvāmitra, Gautama, Jamadagni and Bhara-dvāja are the 7 sages.—BPK. 307, also PI. II.601.

96. This refers to the occasion of churning the ocean for nectar. The gods and demons cooperated in churning the ocean with Mount Mandara as the churning staff, serpent Vāsuki as the string. Fourteen valuable things such as the goddess Lakṣmi, Kaustubha gem etc. were obtained. Nectar \textit{(amṛta)} was one of them. The deadly poison Halāhala was drunk up by god Śiva to save the world.

(For details vide PI. I.87)

97 \textit{Dhanvantara}: An incarnation of Viṣṇu. He appeared with the jar of nectar during the ocean-churning for nectar. Another account shows him to be the king \textit{Dirgha-tamas} of Kāśi; the originator of Āyur-Veda and the father of Ketumān.—PI. II.156-57

98. \textit{Mohini}: The 13th incarnation of Viṣṇu to delude the Āsuras from having any share in the nectar and distribute it to Devas (gods).

—PI. II.156-57.

99. \textit{Narasīṁha} (also Nārasīṁha and Nrṣīṁha): Viṣṇu came down on the earth to punish Hiranyakaśipu for his insolence and cruelty. Hiranyakaśipu harassed his son Prahlāda for his devotion to Viṣṇu.—the omni-present. When asked whether Viṣṇu existed in the column of his hall, Prahlāda said “Yeś” on which Hiranyakaśipu kicked it, when Viṣṇu appeared before the demon and killed him.
form and arrived at Bali's sacrifice.

20. In the sixteenth incarnation, being angry at the hostility of kings to Brähmanaś, he extirpated the warrior class from the earth for twentyone times.

21. In the seventeenth (descent on the earth) he was born of Satyavati from Parāśara. Seeing people of low intelligence, he divided the tree in the form of Veda into several branches.

22. After this (i.e. after the 18th incarnation), with a desire to help gods (lit. to do the work of gods viz. to kill Rāvana etc.), he assumed kingship and performed acts of valour such as control of the sea (by building a bridge over it.)

23. In the nineteenth and the twentieth (incarnations),

100. The origin of this incarnation is “The three strides of Viṣṇu” mentioned in the Rg-veda. In the Tretā-yuga (2nd Age), the pious Daitya King Bali acquired the dominance of the three worlds by defeating the gods. To remedy this Viṣṇu was born as a diminutive son of Kaśyapa and Aditi. The dwarf appeared before Bali and begged of him to donate him three pieces of land. The generous king agreed. Viṣṇu manifested his original form and covered the heaven and earth in two strides. But respecting his (Bali’s) virtues, He made Bali the King of the subterranean region Sutala and assured him of Indra-ship in the 8th Manvantara (Epoch).

101. Bali: A son of Virocana and grand-son of Prahlāda; married Vindhyāvali and Aṣāṇā; had 100 sons of whom Bāna was the eldest; defeated gods on the battlefield and performed 100 Horse-sacrifices. In the 100th horse-sacrifice, he was deceived by Viṣṇu in a dwarf form. (for the rest vide the above note).—P.I. 2.460-71.

102. This refers to Paraśurāma incarnation of Viṣṇu, in the Tretā age. He was the son of Jamadagni and Reṇukā (a princess). Haihaya king Kārtavirya Arjuna forcibly took away Jamadagni’s Kāmadhenu (Wish-yielding cow). The scuffle led to Paraśurāma’s killing of Kārtavirya. Jamadagni disapproved of this and ordered Paraśurāma to go on pilgrimage for one year in expiation of this. After the departure of Paraśurāma, the sons of Kārtavirya killed Jamadagni. In the struggle between Bhārgavas and Haihayas that followed this, Paraśurāma defeated them 21 times, which has been poetically described as “extirpation” of the Kṣatriya class. After this he retired to perform penance on Mahendra mountain. He is regarded as “deathless”, was discomfited by Dāśarathi Rāma; taught Astra-vidyā to Bhīṣma and Karna; guided Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma to Gomāntaka.

—P.I. II.291.

103. Parāśara: Son of Śakti, grandson of Vasiṣṭha; father of Vyāsa.

—P.I. II.293-4.
having taken birth in the Vṛṣṇi family as Rāma (Balarāma) and Kṛṣṇa, he lessened the burden of the earth.

24. Then after full advent of the Kali Age, (He) will be born with Buddha as His name, and as a son of Ajana in the Kikaṭa country.\(^{104}\)

25. Then in the twilight of the Kali Age, when kings will be as good as robbers, this protector of the world will be born of Viṣṇuyaśas under the name Kalki.

26. Oh twice-born ones! Just as thousands of canals flow forth from inexhaustible lake, similarly innumerable are the incarnations of Hari, the ocean of goodness (the Sattva-guna).

27. Sages, Manus\(^{105}\), gods as well as very powerful sons of Manu along with Prajāpatis (gods presiding over creation) are all parts of Hari only.

28. But\(^{106}\) Lord Kṛṣṇa is the Supreme Being himself and all these, parts and smaller parts of the Supreme Being who give happiness to the world (when it is) troubled by the enemies of Indra (i.e. demons) in every epoch.

29. The man who, exerting himself with devotion, recites in the morning and in the evening this mysterious (account of the) births (incarnations) of the Lord, is completely released from all kinds of misery.

30. This form of the formless Lord whose true constitution is the Spirit itself, has been indeed created in the Soul

\(^{104}\) Kikaṭa: Name of the land where Buddha was born; noted for the sacred Gayā, the garden park Rājagrha and the hermitage of Gayavana.

\(^{106}\) JG. explains the difference between Bhagavān and his parts as follows: The Supreme Lord, by His divine will, can manifest His power anywhere without interruption, while the parts (anāsias) or incarnations can manifest these for performing their appointed mission. Though Kṛṣṇa is included in the list of incarnations, He is not merely a part (anāśa) of the Supreme Being but the Supreme Being Himself. The particle tu in the above verse is used to distinguish him from other incarnations.
31. Just as a stream of clouds (is attributed) to the sky or the dust (particles of the earth) is ascribed to the wind (by ignorant persons), similarly the quality of being seen is attributed to the seer by unintelligent ones. (The spirit is wrongly misunderstood as being material body.)

32. From this is created a different body which is made up of unmanifested attributes (or parts of the body like hands, feet etc.) and which is subtle due to the invisibility and inaudibility of its essential nature. It is the Jīva (spirit) due to which transmigration (takes place).\textsuperscript{107}

33. When these two forms sat and asat (i.e. two bodies gross and subtle) attributed to the soul through ignorance are negativized by Self-knowledge, it is the visualization of Brahman (i.e. identification of Jīva with Brahman)\textsuperscript{108}.

34. They know that if this divine pertaining to the Omniscient Spirit) and resplendent (or sportive)\textsuperscript{109} Māyā

\textsuperscript{108} VR. interprets Brahma as "the liberated soul" and dāriana as "the knowledge of the nature of the 'pure' soul devoid of any contamination or contact with Prakṛti". So this verse means: "That knowledge by which one realizes that origination (birth) and destruction (death) really belong to the non-Spirit (acer) and that they are ascribed to the Soul through ignorance (avidyā) and that they are to be denied of the Soul (Ātman) by the knowledge of the ātman, is the real knowledge of Brahman."

But VJ. states: "That knowledge is the knowledge of Brahman leading to liberation from samsāra (the cycle of births and deaths)—the knowledge which consists in seeing that the forms consisting of the Primordial Nature (Prakṛti) and its products are, from the very beginning, different from the Supreme Soul (Paramānand) due to His self-knowledge. It is due to Nescience (Avidyā) that he mistakes them as belonging to Himself.

VR: When this cosmic illusion (Māyā or Prakṛti) becomes capacious with Mahat etc. and the consequent pride or belief of thinking the body and the Soul as identical, ceases or disappears, then the individual Soul comes to be worshipped (respected) as having realised his own glory as the liberated with the eight excellent qualities which are manifested on the realization of the Supreme Soul.
(illusion), transforming itself to knowledge ceases itself (automatically), (the Jiva or Spirit) becoming perfect (i.e. identical with Brahman) is glorified in its own greatness).

35. The wise ones describe in this way, the births and deeds of the Birthless and Actionless, the Lord of the hearts (antaryāmin) whose deeds are mystically described in the Vedas.\(^{110}\)

36. Or he whose sports are not ineffective, creates, protects and eats up (destroys) this Universe but is not attached to this.\(^{111}\) And this Master of six qualities\(^{112}\) lies concealed in the hearts of all beings and remaining (aloof) independent, he enjoys (as if it is fragrance) the objects of six senses.

37. Just as an ignorant person does not understand the performance of an actor, (similarly) no being of dull intelligence can comprehend by mind, words or skill (in argumentation or Logic)\(^{113}\) the pastimes of the Supporter (of the universe) who extends greatly\(^{114}\) his names and forms.

38. He who is attached to the fragrance of his lotus-like feet, without crookedness and obeys him continuously, knows the way to the Pre-eminent Lord, the protector of the universe (who is) of infinite power and the holder of the discus (lit. a part of the chariot).

39. Hence, Oh venerable ones! Blessed are you in this world! As you have thus shown complete devotion to Vāsudeva, the Lord of all the people, there is no terrible transmigration again.

40. The venerable sage (Vyāsa) compiled this epic (Purāṇa) called Bhāgavata, equal in status to the Vedas, describing the deeds of him of pious reputation.

\(^{110}\) VJ. differs: "The wise describe the secrets contained in the Upaniṣads: The births (incarnations) of Him whose birth is not like that of other individual souls, whose acts are not meant for any selfish purpose, who is present in and controls the minds of all.

\(^{111}\) ŚR: The differentia between the jīva and God is the unconcernedness of God with the universe.

\(^{112}\) Viz. Jñāna, Śakti, Bala, Aiśvarya, Vīrya and Tejas.

\(^{113}\) nīpuṇena: VD. By skill in knowledge and yoga.

\(^{114}\) viṣṇu-vatāḥ—VR.: He extends the world of forms by his mental resolve or will.

VJ.: manovacobhir nāma-rāpātmakam prapaścitaḥ svātāḥ /
41. For the highest good of the people, he (Vyāsa) made his son (Śuka), pre-eminent among those who have realized the Soul, receive this great (Bhāgavata Purāṇa) which is the means of securing Bliss.

42. He (Śuka) made the great king Parīkṣit hear attentively this (Bhāgavata), the choicest essence of all the Vedas and History (Mahābhārata).

43-44. Oh Brāhmaṇas! While he (Parīkṣit) was sitting on the banks of the Ganges fasting himself unto death, and was surrounded by great sages, and Śuka, the Brāhmaṇa sage of great brilliance (splendour) was narrating the Bhāgavata, I learnt the Bhāgavata while I sat there due to his favour. I shall narrate to you whatever I have learnt to the best of my ability (intelligence).

45. When Kṛṣṇa retired to His abode along with Righteousness, knowledge and other things, this sun in the form of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa has now arisen in the Kali Age for persons who have lost their (intellectual) sight.

115. svastayāna: Lit. averting of evil by recitation of mantras or performance of expiatory rites.
116. Parīkṣit: A son of Uttarā and Abhimanyu; a great king of Hastināpura; the foremost of Bhāgavatas; married Irāvatī, daughter of Uttarā; had 4 sons of whom Janamejaya was the eldest; visualised the symbolic advent of the Kali Age. Due to his act of throwing a dead snake round the neck of a meditating sage, he was cursed with death by Takṣaka’s bite. Parīkṣit, knowing his doom, sat in ṗṛyopacārā, where Śuka visited him and narrated the Bhāgavata Purāṇa. Afterwards Parīkṣit sat in contemplation in detached spirit, was bitten by Takṣaka and his body was reduced to ashes by the poison.
CHAPTER FOUR

(Arrival of Nārada)

Vyāsa said:

1. Śaunaka, the oldest\textsuperscript{117} of the sages (who were) performing the sacrifice of long duration, (being) the head of the congregation of sages\textsuperscript{118}, and conversant with the Rgveda, highly praised the Śūta who was thus speaking\textsuperscript{119} and addressed (him as follows).

Śaunaka said:

2. Oh Śūta! Oh highly fortunate one!\textsuperscript{120} The finest of speakers! Tell us the sanctifying (holy) narrative pertaining to the Supreme Lord (the holy narrative of the Bhāgavata), which\textsuperscript{121} was recounted by venerable\textsuperscript{122} Śuka.

3. In what age or (in which) place and with what objective was this (narrative) commenced? By whom\textsuperscript{123} was the dark sage\textsuperscript{124} (Vyāsa) inspired to compile this text?

4. His son who is a great Yogi (contemplative saint) and who has visualized the Supreme Spirit (Brahman)\textsuperscript{125}, and

\textsuperscript{118} \textit{kula-pati}—Originally it signified a Brāhmaṇa sage who maintained, fed and taught 10,000 pupils. ŚR. interprets it as above (prāṇi-mukhya). VB. explains it as the regulator or controller of the group of sages (kulaśya tsi—kulaśya patiḥ niyāmakaḥ).

\textsuperscript{119} \textit{bhuvaṇa}—VB. : "Śaunaka was so eager that he did not even wait for the completion of the Speech of the Śūta, as is the normal etiquette".

\textsuperscript{122} \textit{bhagavān}—VB. : "possessing all good qualities" (pūrṇa-guṇaḥ).

9. Oh Śūta! (Parīkṣit) the son of Abhimanyu is reported to be the best among the devotees of the Lord (Viṣṇu). Describe to us his extremely wonderful birth and deeds.

10. For what reason did the emperor (Parīkṣit), the enhancer of the honour of Pāṇḍavas (lit. Pāṇḍu's139 progeny), disregarding the glory of emperorship, sit on the bank of the Ganges fasting himself unto death?

11. Oh (Śūta)! How wonderful it is! How did the young hero (warrior-king) to whose footstool (near the throne), enemies, for their own good, bring riches (as tribute) and pay their homage, desire to renounce the royal majesty (lit. wealth) which it is very difficult to give up, along with (his) life?

12. The persons who are devoted to Lord Viṣṇu (lit. He whose renown or glory dispels the darkness of ignorance) live for the happiness,140 abundance,141 and prosperity142 of

137. ŚR. states that this verse raises the doubt how the BH. P. could be narrated within a short period as Śuka stayed at the house of a householder for the time required for milking a cow. This period is, according to ŚR., 1/8th of a muhūrta i.e. 15 kalās.

¹⁴³. Vāsavi—N. of the daughter of King Uparicara Vasu; brought up as Satyavatī in the house of a fisher-man; the mother of the sage Vyāsa. (BPK. 285).

¹⁴⁴. Sarasvati—A sacred river famous in the Vedas. The Ghaggar in the Panjab is regarded as its modern name. ŚR. interprets “upasprśya” as “having taken bath” etc while VJ. “After the performance of morning duties e.g. sandhyā, etc”.

ŚR. suggests that Vyāsa was sitting at this time in Badarikāśrama (which is so far away from the Panjab). VD. explains this by stating that ŚR. does not mean the Badarikāśrama near Mount Gandhamādana but a separate place of the same name in the forest on the bank of the Sarasvati in Sindh. SD. and JG., note this place as Śamyāprśa.

19. Observing that the Vedic rites performed by four sacrificial priests\textsuperscript{150} purify the people, he (Vyāsa) separated the (single) Veda into four for the continuity of (the institution of) sacrifices.

20. The four Vedas namely the Rg., Yajus, Sāman and Atharvan were divided. \textsuperscript{51} And History-cum-Mythology (the Mahābhārata and the Purāṇas) is called the fifth Veda.

21. Out of these, Paila\textsuperscript{152} was the receipient of the Rg-veda, the wise sage Jaimini\textsuperscript{153} the master of singing the Sāman, Vaiśampāyana\textsuperscript{154} alone was expert in the Yajur Veda.

\textsuperscript{148} niḥsattva—Without courage or constancy (ŚR.) Without energy (VJ.).

\textsuperscript{149} omogha-dṛṣṭi—VJ.: Whose knowledge is fruitful (avandhyajñāna) VR. Whose wishes are not fruitless (avitaṭha-sankalpa)

\textsuperscript{150} The four sacrificial priests are Hotṛ, Udgātr, Adhvaryu and Brahman and they represent the Rg, Sāman, Yajus and Atharvan (Vedas) respectively.

\textsuperscript{154} Vaiśampāyana: A pupil of Vyāsa in charge of Yajur Veda. He was the maternal uncle of Yajñavalkya. (BK. 309).

\textsuperscript{155} Sumantu: VJ. states Sumantu as the son of Varuṇa (& reads Vāruṇaḥ for dāruṇaḥ). He was taught the Atharva-veda by Vyāsa.
the Atharva Veda relating to the Aṅgirasas, and my father, Romaharsaṇa, in History-cum-Purāṇas.

23. The sages divided their own respective Veda in different parts. Those Vedas were separated into (a number of) branches by (their) disciples, disciples of disciples and their students.

24. The venerable Vyāsa who was compassionate to the helpless, arranged the Vedas in such a way as can be retained in memory even by persons of low intelligence.

25. The three Vedas are not to be heard by women, Śūdras and lowest among the twice-born ones (i.e. unworthy persons of Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya, and Vaiṣya castes). In order that the welfare of such (persons) ignorant about actions leading to the good (results) may be (achieved) this way here, that the sage (Vyāsa) compiled the narrative called the Bhārata.

26. Oh twice-born ones! The mind of (Vyāsa who was) thus always and in all respects trying for the welfare of all beings, was, however, not satisfied thereby—

27. Vyāsa, the knower of the path of duty, whose mind was not much pacified and who was sitting in solitude on the holy bank of the Sarasvati, conjecturing (about the reasons etc. of his unhappy state of mind), spoke out this:

28. ‘Being intent (keen) on observing my duties, the Vedas, preceptors and (holy) fires have been sincerely (lit. without any deceit) worshipped and (their) commands have been obeyed by me.’

29. ‘And verily, the (meaning) of the Vedas has been explained by compiling a work of the title Bhārata in which (subjects such as) religion and others are known by (under-privileged persons e.g.) women, Śūdras and the like.’

itself appears to be underdeveloped (not having reached the stage of the Supreme Spirit\(^{158}\) (or not reached its natural condition)."

31. Or (because) religious systems (religion) pertaining to the Supreme Lord which are liked by the ascetics of the highest order, have not been considered (by me) in details. And those are really liked by the Infallible Lord (Acyuta)

32. In this way, (while Vyāsa was) considering himself deficient and was distressed (at the thought of his deficiency), Nārada approached the hermitage of Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana as described above.

33. The sage (Vyāsa), having known the arrival of Nārada who was worshipped by gods, at once, rose from his seat to welcome him and worshipped (received) him with due formalities.

CHAPTER FIVE

(The Dialogue Between Vyāsa and Nārada)

*Sūta said :

1. The divine sage (Nārada) of great fame,\(^{159}\) holding a lute in his hand, and being comfortably seated, spoke with a slight smile,\(^{160}\) to the Brāhmaṇa sage who was sitting near him.\(^{161}\)

\(^{158}\) asampannah—ŚR.: Not reached its natural stage. VJ.: One who has not achieved his life's mission. VR.: a-sampdha.

\(^{159}\) bhārachravah—ŚR.: whose fame is great. GD.: One whose fame for omniscience has spread everywhere.

\(^{160}\) Commentators attribute various reasons for this smile. ŚR.: "Because even a great man is sometimes deluded". VD.: "This great man does not deserve to be thus perplexed". VB., VG.: Nārada smiled as he was unable to conceal his pleasure (about the prospective discussion).

\(^{161}\) upāsinam—VD; Who received him with due formalities.
Nārada said:

2. Oh highly fortunate son of Parāśara, is your son, associated with (lit. proud of) your body or with your mind, quite satisfied with your body or mind (respectively)?

3. Have you not thoroughly comprehended whatever you desired to know, as you have compiled the great, wonderful Bhārata which is full of matters pertaining to the principal goals of human life (viz. dharma, artha, kāma, mokṣa)?

4. The eternal Brahma (Supreme Spirit) (Or the Veda) which has been so much coveted by you (for its knowledge and attainment) has been known and attained by you. (Or in the case of the Veda: “has been studied and considered by you by composing the Vedānta Sūtras”). Still, Oh learned (sage), you are worrying yourself as if you have not achieved your goal.

162. śāriṛa ātmā mānasa eva vā: śāriṛa ātmā: ŚR., VG : Soul who is proud of the body (śarirābhimāni ātmā). SV. : “Presiding over the body”.

mānasa ātmā : ŚR., VG : proud of the mind. SV. : controller of the mind. BP. : Soul which is proud of the gross and subtle bodies.

163. susampannam—ŚR. Fully acquainted with. GD. : Properly comprehended with ease.

164. jijñāsitam—ŚR. : What was worth knowing e.g. religion etc.

165. mahadadhutam—VR. : Extensive (vipulam) and wonderful in its composition and meaning (śabdataḥ arthataḥ ca citram) SV : śabdārtha-bhyām vicitram/

166. sarvārtha-paribhāhitam—ŚR. : Full of matters concerning the four goals of human life e.g. dharma, artha, kāma and mokṣa. SV. & VB. support this as follows : sarvaiḥ sāṅgopāṅgaiḥ ca dharmabhīr arthaiḥ paribhāhitām pūrṇam/

167. Brahma—It means both “the Veda” and “the Supreme Spirit” and the verse is to be construed as applying to both. ŚR. takes it in the latter sense.

168. jijñāśita—ŚR. : Considered, but GS. adds “Considered by composing the Brahma Sūtras.” SV. VR. and VB. take “Brahma” as “the Veda” and interpret, “You have studied the Veda word by word and from the point of its meaning and implication have composed the Mīmāṁsā Sūtras."

169. adhitā—ŚR. : “Attained” (adhigata, prāpta).

170. prabhō—VJ. : One of vast learning (prabhūta-jñānin).
Vṛṣa said:

5. (Although) all that has been described by you, is certainly in me; my soul\(^{171}\), however, is unsatisfied. I ask the (underlying) latent\(^{172}\) cause of it to you, as you have unfathomable knowledge\(^{173}\) and are born from Brahman\(^{174}\).

6. Verily your honour knows all the secrets\(^{175}\), as you have adored the Primeval Man (Lord Viṣṇu, who is) the regulator of (everything) high or low\(^{176}\), and who, without being attached\(^{177}\) creates, protects and destroys the universe by means of attributes (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas), as soon as He wills it (by His will-power).

7. You who travel in the three worlds (the Heaven, the earth and the subterranean regions) like the Sun (and thereby know the external things), and who, like the breath (wind) moving within, (are) a witness unto the hearts of others\(^{178}\), explain to me sufficiently clearly the deficiency in me though I have dived deep into the Supreme Spirit by Yogic practices (e.g. meditation etc.)\(^{179}\) and have mastered the Vedas by religious observances\(^{180}\).

171. ātmā—ŚR.: The soul both corporeal (śārīra) and mental (mānasa).
172. aiyaktam—ŚR.: Not clear, latent; VB.: not explicit VR.: Not known to me.
175. samasta-guhyam—VR., BP.: Minds of all beings.
176. pātāvareśaḥ—ŚR.: Regulator of all cause and effect (kārya-kāraṇa-n-yentā). VR.: The Lord to whom gods like Brahmā and others are subordinate; Controller of all.
177. asaṅgaḥ—VD., VR. Unattached to attributes (Guna-saṅga-rahitāḥ)
178. ātma-sākṣi—ŚR.: Knowing the intelligence and course of conduct (buddhi-critti-jīva).
179. dharmataḥ ŚR.: para Brahmaṇi dharmato yogena nispātaḥ/ VR. takes dharmataḥ as nivṛtti-dharmatāḥ.
180. Paścara Brahmaṇi—ŚR.: dvāra-bracha is the Vedas which are mastered by means of “Self-study, observance of religious vows etc.” VB. explains para as that which has been explained by the Upaniṣads (Vedānta), apara Brahma is the Veda.
Nārada Said:

8. Your honour has not practically described the pure\textsuperscript{181} glory of the Lord. I think that knowledge\textsuperscript{182} by which the Supreme Being is not pleased is incomplete.

9. Oh great sage! You have not really described the glory of Vāsudeva (in the same proportion) as you have extolled in details the goals (of human life) like Religion (dharma) and others (viz. artha, kāma and mokṣa) and\textsuperscript{183} its cognate subjects.

10. The speech composed of words with rhetorical charm\textsuperscript{184} but which seldom describes the world-purifying glory of Hari, is\textsuperscript{185} regarded like a place of pleasure worthy of enjoyment for worldly persons where ascetics\textsuperscript{186} of pure mind\textsuperscript{187}, who dwell in (are merged in) the Supreme Spirit (Brahma\textsuperscript{188}) never like to stay, like swans from the Mānasa lake, who have beautiful dwelling places, do not find pleasure in the pools that are the pleasure-resorts of crows alone.

\textsuperscript{184} citra-pada—In Rhetorics, citra is one of the 3 main divisions of Kārya (Poetry). It is of 2 kinds: sabda-citra and artha-citra, and the poetical charms lie mainly in the use of figures of speech, dependent on the sound or sense of the word. The Bh. P. naturally regards Lord Hari's glory superior to rhetorical beauty. VD. explains this as "Wonderful" (vismayaya sthānom : vismayakāri)
\textsuperscript{185} Hari’s devotees are likened to swans dwelling in the Mānasa lake. Just as these swans avoid dirty places which are enjoyed by crows, similarly poetry not singing of the glory of the Lord is not liked by the true devotees. ŚR. and VR. interpret vāyusāṁ tṛtham as a place of enjoyment of pleasures for persons desirous of worldly things. VD. explains vāyusā as "Trade or profession for one's livelihood".
\textsuperscript{186} hānisa—ŚR.: (1) Swans, (2) Recluse.
\textsuperscript{187} mānasāḥ—(1) Living in the Mānasa lake (2) Of good (sāttvic frame of mind). To this VD. adds: (3) Devotees staying in the mind of Hari, (4) Mind-born sons of Brahmadeva, like Śanaka, etc.
\textsuperscript{188} utikṣayaḥ : ŚR., VR. Vj. agree to this but with different etymologies.
11. That outflow of words\textsuperscript{189} which though not properly composed\textsuperscript{190} in every verse, makes good people (saints) hear, sing and praise the names (which are as if) imprinted\textsuperscript{191} with the glory of the Infinite Lord, destroys the sins of the people.

12. Knowledge, (though) actionless\textsuperscript{192} and pure\textsuperscript{193}, (if) devoid of devotion to the Imperishable Lord (Viṣṇu), does not appear sufficiently bright (purificatory).\textsuperscript{194} And how can again the action which is always unblissful, even though (performed) without any desire of its fruit appear bright (i.e. will have purificatory effect, if it is not dedicated to God.)?

13. Oh highly fortunate one! (Your Honour) of correct insight\textsuperscript{195}, of pure (spotless) glory\textsuperscript{196}, lover of the truth, and observer of religious vows, should recollect (and describe) with concentrated mind\textsuperscript{197}, the various acts of the Lord with wide steps\textsuperscript{198} (i.e., Viṣṇu in Vāmana incarnation) for liberation from all bondages (of this Sāṁsāra).

14. Since you were looking for (objects) other than (the Lord’s deeds) and were desirous of speaking (i.e. describing) something else (than the pastimes of the Lord), your mind, which has become unstable on account of the words and forms (created by your above-mentioned desire) will not get a stable position anywhere and on any matter, like a boat driven by a gale (lit. "struck by a wind").

15. A gross negligence\textsuperscript{199} (has been committed by you) in advising censurablr acts (for the sake) of religion, to persons who by nature are addicted to secular desires. Ordinary people have followed those actions, thinking them to be (real) religion, on account of (Vyāsa's) words.\textsuperscript{200} (Ordinary man) does not think of setting aside that (way of life).

16. By abstaining from worldly acts, a very clever person becomes capable of knowing the blissful nature of the All-pervading, Limitless Lord. Therefore, your honour (should please) describe the diversions of the Supreme Lord to (persons) who are devoid of spiritual intellect\textsuperscript{201} and who due to qualities viz. Sattva, Rajas, and Tamas are engaged in acts (holding out future promises).

17. (If) a person, discarding his own (form of) religion, resorts to the lotus-like feet of Hari, (and happens) to fall while in an immature stage, will evil befall unto him in whatever place or in whichever (circumstances) he may be? Or what benefit has accrued to a non-devotee following his own religion?\textsuperscript{202}

\textsuperscript{200} yod tākyataḥ—ŚR. and JG. but VR. "For the sake of the good of the beings you (Vyāsa) have acted to the contrary. Due to your description of the 1st three goals of human life (viz. dharma, artha, & kāma) people do not know that you intended to advise them to set aside these three for the sake of the 4th goal, viz. mokṣa. JG. thinks that this verse pinpoints Vyāsa's deficiency. He had done wrong to the world by describing a course of religion devoid of Hari's glorious acts. (In MBH. Kṛṣṇa is a secondary figure.)

\textsuperscript{201} anātmanāḥ—ŚR. : Proud of the physical body. JG. : Devoid of spiritual intellect. SD. : Of undetermined intellect.

\textsuperscript{202} V.J. "No puruṣārtha (goal of human life) is achieved by faultless observation of one's own pravṛtti-dharma. I request you to describe the science of Niṣṭhī-dharma" VG. The daily and occasional religious observances should be abandoned in favour of devotion to Hari.
18. The learned one should specially try for that objective (viz. "the experience of the supreme Spirit") which is not obtained while wandering in higher or lower (types of births). That happiness (i.e. enjoyment of worldly objects) comes to (our) lot unsolicited like misery from other sources (from actions of previous life) everywhere due to (passage of) time which has great velocity.\textsuperscript{203}

19. Oh! A person who is serving Lord Kṛṣṇa will not certainly be entangled into the cycle of transmigration of the soul. There is such an attraction of that sweetest thing\textsuperscript{204} that he who remembers the (joy or test of) clasping the feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa, will never desire to let them go.\textsuperscript{205}

20. This universe is verily the Supreme Lord Himself but in a way different\textsuperscript{206}. As your honour already knows it, (it is) from him that the preservance, destruction and creation of the Universe (take place). Only a spanful has been indicated to you by me.

21. Oh (sage) of unerring view!\textsuperscript{207} You know it yourself that (though) you are birthless, you are born as a part of \textsuperscript{203} gambhīra-rahasā—VR. Whose velocity is too fast to be observed.

\textsuperscript{205} According to VR: The devotees of the Lord even though they have not mastered the Bhakti-yoga thoroughly, do not even then return to the cycle of births and deaths (ṣaṁsāra) like ignorant persons, or non-devotees (VJ).

\textsuperscript{206} ŚR. adds one more explanation: This universe is the Supreme Lord. The individual spirit, though apparently separate from the Lord, is also the Supreme Lord. There is nothing animate or inanimate beyond the Supreme Lord who alone is the Truth or Reality. VJ. states the position of the Dualistic School: The Lord is verily like the universe (Not the Universe itself). He is different from it. For it is from the Lord that the creation, preservation and destruction of the Universe proceeds (and He is endowed with all powers of omniscience, omnipotence etc.). The Lord Himself knows this. (Like a pupil exhibiting his little knowledge before the preceptor) I have shown my limited knowledge to you.

\textsuperscript{207} amogha-ātri—ŚR.: Full of accurate knowledge. VR.: One who sees the whole of reality as it is.
the Supreme Soul (who is) the Greatest Man, for the welfare of the world. Therefore, let the glories of the Lord of great prowess be described in details by you.

22. The act of extolling the qualities of the Lord of excellent renown, has been declared by wise men, as the indestructible fruit of a man’s penance, hearing (the scriptures), performance of the best sacrifices, recital of Vedas and of intelligence and charities.

23. Oh sage! As for myself, formerly (in a former cycle of Ages), in (my) previous birth, I was born of a certain female servant of sages conversant with the Vedas. Even while (I was) a child, I was appointed to wait upon (some) ascetics who wished to stay together (in one place) during (the four months of) the rainy-season.

24. Although the sages had equality of outlook (towards all beings) they began (to show) favour to me whose unsteadiness had completely disappeared, (who was) self-controlled, obedient, and a willing servant of few words.

25. Being allowed by the twice-born (sages) to eat the remanents of the food sticking to their dishes whereby (my) sin had been destroyed, I used to take meal once a day. I was behaving thus and my heart had been well purified. (Thus) a self-interest in their (Bhāgavata) religion also had developed (in me).

26. There, by the favour of the singers, I heard attractive (interesting) narratives of Kṛṣṇa, every day. Oh Vyāsa! (As) I heard every word of those narratives) with special attention, my devotion in the Lord whose renown is so dear, developed.

27. Oh great sage! Then I developed liking for (the Lord) whose fame is dear (to all). My intellect became un-

210. VB. says that these were the 4 sages : Sanaka, Sanandana etc. in their previous birth.

211. VJ. the recluses eat once a day, so did Nārada.

212. v.l. anusavan—VR. and VJ. Interpret this as ‘‘Three times a day, viz. morning, noon and evening (tri-sandhyam).’’ deviating from the right course whereby I could see that due to my illusion, this grossness and subtlety had been imagined in me who am (really) higher Brahma (Supreme Spirit).

28. In this way, during the rainy season and the Autumn, I, who heard attentively the spotless glory of Hari extolled thrice a day by the sages of noble souls, had got created in me devotion which removes the rajas and tamas of the Soul.

29-30. At the time of their departure those sages, who were kind to the poor, taught the most esoterical knowledge which has been conveyed by the Supreme Lord Himself, to me who, as a child was attached to them, and (was) humble, full of reverence, self-controlled and had been serving them (with devotion).

31. On account of which (knowledge) only, I came to comprehend the efficacy of the power called Illusion of Lord Vāsudeva, the Creator of the Universe. (It is) by that knowledge (that) the people attain to His feet (i.e. Liberation).

214. sad-asat—ŚR. Gross and subtle. While JG. takes it as vyāṣṭī (An aggregate viewed as made up of many separate bodies) and sāmāṣṭī (An aggregate considered to be made of parts each of which is consubstantially the same with the whole). To quote JG. aham etat sadasad vyāṣṭī-sāmāṣṭyātmakaṁ yaj jagat tad vyāṣṭyāmāṁ mayi jivaṛūpe svaviṣayaka-bhagavan-māyāyā kalpitam pañye.

215. According to VJ., “I see that all this universe of cause and effect is the creation by the will of Hari who is in me and that it is maintained and destroyed by him”. He strongly objects to the adhyāsa theory as false knowledge (mīhājñāna.)

216. See F.N. 212 above.

217. guhyatama—ŚR. and BP.: Knowledge about the practice of religion is guhya (secret); pure knowledge derived from the practice of religion is guhyatara (secret of a higher degree); Knowledge derived from the above about the Supreme Lord (Īśvara-jñāna) is the most secret (guhyatama).

218. māyānubhāva—Māyā has been variously interpreted by commentators as intellectual capacity (cicchakī) of the Lord (JG., VD.), the prakṛti consisting of 3 attributes viz, sattva, rajas and tamas (VR.). “anubhāva” is the power or the effect of Māyā.
32. Oh Brähmaṇa! (It has been) well-known\textsuperscript{210} that action which is dedicated to the Lord, the Supreme Spirit, the Controller of the universe, removes the three types of miseries (viz. those pertaining to the body, caused by Fate and caused by animals etc.—called in Sk. ādhyātmika, ādhidaivika and ādhīthautika).

33. Oh good observer of religious vows! Verily the stuff which causes disease to beings, does not cure it (the disease by itself). But (if) administered after medical Purification\textsuperscript{220}, it cures\textsuperscript{221} (that disease).

34. In the same way, the performances of all\textsuperscript{222} actions\textsuperscript{223} (which are) the causes of worldly existence\textsuperscript{224} (i.e. the transmigration of the soul) are capable of destroying themselves\textsuperscript{225} if those (very actions) are dedicated to the Supreme Spirit.

35. In this world, knowledge which is coupled with \textsuperscript{210} samīcīta—VD.: "Suggested, not directly spoken". JG.: (Suggested) by persons well-versed in Scriptures. VR.: by Śrutis and Smṛtis; VJ.: Properly suggested to the people, (Samīcīnaḥ sūcitam lokasya).

\textsuperscript{222} saarve—VD. VR.: This includes meritorious actions also. GS.: Both usual (niṣya) and occasional (nāmaśīka) actions performed with attachment (kāmya-karma).

\textsuperscript{224} sānīṣṭi-hetuḥ—VD.: Causes of bondage.

VD. interprets differently: "In this world, knowledge which is accompanied with devotion (e.g. śravaṇa, kirtana and others) is definitely pleasing to the Supreme Lord. This knowledge is born of actions which are performed without attachment and dedicated to the Supreme Lord."
devotional contemplation\textsuperscript{226}, is certainly dependent on actions which are performed for the gratification of the Supreme Spirit.\textsuperscript{227}

36*. Where persons always perform actions according to the teaching of the Lord, they extol the qualities and names of Kṛṣṇa and meditate on him.

37. Salutations to you Venerable Vāsudeva. Obeisance to Pradyumna, Aniruddha and Saṅkarṣaṇa\textsuperscript{228}. We meditate (on you all).

38. He who thus by taking the names of these (above-mentioned four) forms, worships the Sacrificial Man who is formless yet has his body made up of holy incantations, becomes full of correct perception.\textsuperscript{229}

\textsuperscript{227} JG. thinks that this verse describes the superiority of actions which are pleasing to the Lord Hari, while VJ. thinks that performance of actions removes the bondage of Karma by generating knowledge.

VR. explains: “Just as actions always done according to the instructions of the Lord, create devotion, similarly they make (the devotee) to meditate upon his attributes and names”.

The so-called instructions of Hari mentioned in VR. above are quoted from the Bhagavad Gītā e.g. \textit{yat karoṣī yad ausāsi} etc. (BG. IX. 27), \textit{mayi sarvāṇi karmāṇi} etc. (BG. III. 30).

According to VJ. this verse explains how knowledge is generated by performance of actions (karmas). When they perform sacrifices as ordained by the Lord, at various steps, they remember the glorious qualities of the Lord and sing Lord Kṛṣṇa’s name. In this way knowledge develops through performance of actions.

\textsuperscript{228} Although these are names of Kṛṣṇa, his son, his grandson and his (Kṛṣṇa’s) brother, these are technically called the Vyūhas in the Pañcarātra system of philosophy. Its application to the Bhāgavata sect is as follows: The 1st category evolved from Prakṛti is \textit{mahat} which contains the germs of the entire universe; it is pure translucent \textit{sattva} (also called Gītā or Vāsudeva). From the category of \textit{Mahat} the threefold \textit{akhādāra} viz. vaikārika, tājasa and tāmāsa was produced. This \textit{akhādāra} is called Saṅkarṣaṇa. The category of \textit{Manas} is produced from Vaikārika \textit{akhādāra} and it is called Aniruddha in the terminology of the Bhāgavata cult. Pradyumna stands for the desire; desires are but functions of the category of \textit{manas} and not a separate category.

39. Oh Brähmana! Keśava (Lord Viṣṇu), knowing that I practised his sacred precept, bestowed on me knowledge pertaining to the Controller of the Universe and devotion unto him.

40. Oh sage with wide knowledge! You also describe the great glory of the All-pervading Lord, which satisfies the desire for enjoyment on the part of the learned ones. Persons who are constantly afflicted by miseries take resort to (his) glory (as it is not) otherwise pacified (at all).

CHAPTER SIX

(Dialogue between Vyāsa and Nārada)

Sūta said :

1. Oh Brähmana! Having thus heard about the birth and deeds of the divine sage (Nārada), the venerable Vyāsa, the son of Satyavatī, asked him again.

Vyāsa said :

2. When the religious mendicants (sannyāsinś) who initiated you in the special spiritual knowledge departed (to a distant country), what did your honour do in that primary stage of life?

3. Oh son of the self-existent god Brahmā! In what way did you lead your later life? How did you give up your body when the time (of your death) arrived?

4. Oh the best of gods! How is it that (even though) Time is all-destructive it has not shadowed your memory (of matters) pertaining to the previous epoch?

*VR. : Vyāsa was eager to know the sequel of the narration after BH. P.1.5.30 (anuvocāna gamīyaṁ kṛpayā dīna-vatsalāḥ etc).

230. surasattama—VJ: Greatest of the knowers.

Nārada said:

5. When the recluses who taught me the special spiritual knowledge set out (on their distant journey) I, who was in my primary stage of life, did as follows.

6. My mother, to whom I was the only son, being an ignorant woman—a maid servant—bound me by (her) affection as I was a son who had no other shelter.

7. Although she desired (to provide) for my well-being, she, being not independent, was unable to do so. People are subject to (the Will of) the Almighty like a doll of wood.

8. And I, as a child of five years of age, being ignorant of directions, regions or time, stayed in the Brāhmaṇa’s house expecting that (termination of the bond of maternal affection).

9. Once, when my innocent mother went out at night (to milk the cow), a serpent (as if) ordered by the god of death, was touched by her foot on the way, bit her while she was milking (the cow).

10. Then, looking upon it (my mother’s death) as the grace of the Lord who is solicitous about the well-being of his devotees, I proceeded to the northern direction.

11. (While going alone) in that direction, I saw prosperous countries and capital towns, villages, habitations of cow-herds and mines, villages of cultivators, habitations adjacent to hills and streams, parks, jungles and gardens.

12. (I saw) mountains of variegated colours due to the ores of different metals, (covered with) trees the branches of which are broken by elephants, lakes of clear water and lotus-pools enjoyed by gods (and) beautified by the droning of the black-bees which are roused by wonderful warblings of the birds (lit. wing-vehicled beings).

13-14. I who traversed alone such a long distance saw a vast, unbearably terrible looking forest* which had cavities form-

234. I have followed ŚR. in this interpretation.
235. ŚR.: "Mountains of variegated colours due to metals like gold and silver".

ed by Nala grass, (solid) bamboos, clumps of white reeds and Kūsa grass and clusters of hollow bamboos (whistling with wind) which was (as it were) a play-ground of serpents (wicked elephants) owls and jackals.

15. I, who was physically and mentally exhausted, and was both thirsty and hungry, got relieved from the fatigue by bathing in the deep lake in the river-bed and by drinking (the river-water and by performing the religious sipping of (water (from the cavity of the hand).

16. In that tenantless forest, I, who was seated at the foot of a Pippala tree, meditated internally (by my mind or intellect) upon the Supreme Spirit that was (present) within me, as per instructions heard (from the recluses.)

17. While I was meditating upon the lotus-like feet (of Hari) with my mind overwhelmed or subdued with devotion, and my eyes overflowing with tears for longing (to see Hari), Hari manifested himself slowly in my heart.

18. Oh sage! I, whose hair were standing on their ends owing to the rapturous love (for the Supreme Spirit), and who was deeply satisfied and was immersed in the flood of delight, could not see both.

19. When I could not see the beautiful form of the Lord so pleasing to the mind and dispeller of sorrow, I felt dejected and suddenly stood up through bewilderment.

20. Being desirous of seeing it (the form of the Lord) when I again tried to see him by concentrating my mind within itself, I was not able to see him and became anxious like a diseased person.

21. (He) who is unapproachable to speech, addressed in a voice deep yet sweet and grief-assuaging, to me who was thus struggling alone (to see him) in solitude.

236. v.1. āśrita—VB: Leaning against (the Pippala tree).
237. ubhayam—ŚR: “Myself and others”; VR: “Body and Soul” the Individual Spirit and the Supreme Spirit. SD. construes it differently: “Being excessively unsatisfied due to my inability to see him, I became over-eager and with a desire to see him again, I concentrated my mind within me and tried to see him but in vain.”
238. From Aparaśyan sahaso etc. BH.P.I.6.15b to the end of 22 are deleted in some Mss.
22. “Alas! In this life you are not eligible to see me here. I am difficult to be seen by immature Yogins whose taints (sins) have not been wiped out.

23. On Sinless one! It was just out of love for you that the Vision (Form) was shown to you once. A saintly person who loves me shakes off all the desires in his heart gradually.

24. Due to the service of the saints for a short while, your mind has become firmly fixed in me. After leaving this inferior world (censurable body as Nārada was lowborn), you will attain the position of my personal attendant (pārśada).

25. This intellect of yours which is stabilised in me, will never be incapacitated. And despite creation or destruction of the world, your memory shall persist due to my grace”.

26. That Great Spirit of sky-like form, invisible (yet) controller of all, stopped after speaking this (much). I, who deserved compassion, paid my obeisance with my head to him who was the greatest of the great;

27. With the sense of bashfulness shed off, reciting the names of the Infinite (Lord), musing over the mystic and auspicious deeds (of the Lord), with a satisfied mind free from desire, pride and jealousy, I wandered over the earth waiting for the time (of my death).

28. Oh Brāhmaṇa! In this way, with my mind (intellect) fixed in Kṛṣṇa and unattached, and of pure soul, death appeared (suddenly to me) at the proper time like a garland-like lightning.289

29. That great spirit of ethereal form (having no material body), invisible (yet) controller of all, stopped after speaking this (much). I who was an object of his grace, paid obeisance with my head to him who was greater than the great.

30. Biding for the time (of my death), I wandered over the earth, reciting the names of the Infinite without any sense of shyness and musing over the Mystic and auspicious deeds (of the Lord), with a heart satisfied, free from desire, pride and jealousy.

289. vidyut saudāminīyatāḥ—ŚR. "Lightning flashed in the vicinity of a mountain of crystal called Sudāman." This alternate explanation has been echoed by VR. who adds, "This example is given to suggest the transitory nature of death." VC. thinks that just as one lightning emerges out of another, the body of Viṣṇu’s attendant (pārśada) was ready after the falling away of Nārada’s human body.

31. Oh Brāhmaṇa! In this way, just as lightning flashes in the vicinity of the crystalline mountain Sudāman²⁴⁰ at the proper time, death came, in due course, to me whose mind was pure and fixed on Kṛṣṇa and was unattached (to worldly things).

32. While I was being transferred to that pure body pertaining to the (attendant of the) Lord, (my) gross body composed of the five elements fell off²⁴¹, indicating the exhaustion of actions (due to which one gets one’s body).

33. I entered along with his breath in god Brahmā who desired to sleep within Lord Nārāyaṇa when at the end of the world he (Nārāyaṇa) sleeps on the waters of the ocean withdrawing this (world) within him.

34. At the end of one thousand ages²⁴² he woke up and desired to create the world (when) I, along with sages of whom Marīci was prominent, was born from the breath (or organs of senses) of god Brahmā.

35. I wandered in and out of the three worlds, without the violation of any vows²⁴³ (as) my movements were unhindered by the grace of the great Viṣṇu.

36. Playing on this lute (Viṇā) gifted to me by the Lord and adorned with Brahmān in the form of the seven notes of the musical gamut I go about singing the episodes of Hari.

37. When I sing of the exploits of the Lord whose feet are holy and glory lovable, he manifests himself in my heart immediately like an invitee.

²⁴⁰. Saudāmini—SR. and VR. explain it as above. VR. adds: this example is given to suggest the momentary nature of death.

²⁴¹. VB. explains that Nārada had not to undergo pains of death. SD. states that Nārada returned to his original divine body after the complete fruition of the Brāhmaṇa’s curse whereby he was born as the son of a maid servant.

²⁴². Yuga—The group of four ages (viz. Kṛta, Tretā, Dwāpara and Kali)—VD.

²⁴³. askandita-vrataḥ—(i) Whose vow of celibacy remained unviolated—SR., VR. (ii) One whose vow of devotion to the Lord remained unbroken—VD., JG.
38. For, this singing of the deeds of Hari is (regarded) as a boat to cross the ocean of worldly existence for those whose hearts are often afflicted by yearning for enjoying (the pleasures of the world).

39. The mind (lit. Soul) which is frequently afflicted by passions and avarice is not pacified (to that extent) by the paths of Yoga consisting of Yama, niyama etc., as is directly done by the service of Kṛṣṇa.

40. Oh sinless one! Whatever has been asked by you about the mysteries of my birth and deeds, has been narrated by me to your mind's satisfaction.

Sūta said:

41. After having spoken thus to the son of Vāsavi (Vyāsa), the Venerable Nārada bade good-bye and departed while playing upon his lute; for the sage has no purpose of his own.

42. Oh! How blessed is this divine sage (Nārada) who while singing of the glory of Viṣṇu (lit. god with a bow of horns) is transported with joy and delights this afflicted world by playing upon the lute (Viṇā).

CHAPTER SEVEN

(Punishment of Āśvatthāman)

Śaunaka said:

1. Oh Sūta! After having listened to the suggestion of Nārada, what did the venerable and glorious Bādarāyaṇa do on Nārada's departure?

244. Tānāḍibhir yogapathaṁ—Patañjali in YS ii. 29 gives the following 'aids' (āṅgas) of Yoga: Abstentions (Yama), observances (niyama), postures (āsana), regulations-of-the-breath (prāṇāyāma), withdrawal-of-the-senses, (pratyāhāra), fixed attention, (dhyāna), contemplation, (dhyāna) and concentration (samādhi). YS ii. 30 enumerates yamas as follows: "Abstinence from injury, falsehood, theft, incontinence and acceptance of gifts." (For details vide J.H. Woods—The Yoga System of Patañjali, pp. 177 ff). The path of Yoga was greatly respected and followed by Jainas and Buddhists. The five great vows (Pañca Mīhāvratīs of Jainas correspond
Sūta said:

2. On the western bank of the Sarasvatī, the presiding deity of which is god Brahmā (Or which is resorted to by Brāhmaṇas) there is a hermitage called Śamyāprāsa which encourages (lit. extends) the sacrificial sessions of the sages.

3. Sitting in his own hermitage beautified by a cluster of jujube trees, Vyāsa, after ‘touching water’ (i.e. sipping it from the palm of his hand as is usually performed before any religious act or taking meals), concentrated his mind (as instructed by Nārada).

4. In his mind purified by devotion and thoroughly concentrated, he saw at first the Primeval Being and (his power called) Māyā (Illusion) depending on him.²⁴⁵

5. Though the individual soul is beyond the three attributes, he, being deluded by her (Māyā), regards himself as consisting of the three attributes and suffers calamities (e.g. birth, death, three types of misery etc.) caused by the notion.

6. Realizing that the path of devotion to Viṣṇu directly subsides the calamities (of saṁsāra mentioned above), the learned Vyāsa composed the sāttvata saṁhitā (the Bhāgavata Purāṇa) for ignorant people.

7. Verily, by listening to this (the Bhāgavata Purāṇa) devotion unto Krṣṇa, the Supreme Man, is developed. It (devotion) dispels all grief, infatuation and fears (of man).

8. Having composed and arranged the Bhāgavata Saṁhitā, the sage taught it to his son Śuka who was firmly fixed in renunciation.

Śaunaka said:

9. The sage (Śuka) is (known) to be devoid of attachment to the world and is unconcerned everywhere (to every thing). For what purpose did he who was delighted in his Higher Self, learn this big tome?

²⁴⁵. Māyāḥ tadāpratyayā—The binding power called Māyā which involves individual Souls (jīvas) in worldly existence and transmigration (saṁsāra) but which is subservient to Hari-VJ.

to yama. The Bh. P. has elaborated the five yamas and the five niyamas of Patañjali into twelve each (vide the Bh. P. 3.28. 2-4, 11.19.33-35.).
Sūta said:

10. Hari is of such (excellent) attributes that sages who are delighted in the Soul and even those whose knots of worldly bonds are severed, perform motiveless devotion to Viṣṇu (lit. the god with wide strides).

11. The venerable son of Bādarāyaṇa (Śuka) whose mind was fascinated with the (excellent) qualities of Hari and who liked the devotees of Viṣṇu (Or who was loved by the devotees of Viṣṇu) studied this great legendary narrative (the Bhāgavata Purāṇa).

12. I shall, henceforth, narrate to you the birth, deeds and death (or liberation) of king Parīkṣit and the great journey (to heaven) of the Pāṇḍavas in such a way as will bear upon the stories of Kṛṣṇa.

13*. When, in the battle of Kauravas and Śṛṅjayas, the warriors had gone the way of heroes (i.e. died on the battlefield) and the son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra (Duryodhana) had his thighbone broken by the stroke of the mace hit by Bhīma.

14. The son of Droṇa (Āśvatthāman) thinking that it would be liked by the master (Duryodhana) cut off and presented (to him) the heads of the sons of Draupadi (while they were asleep)—an act disagreeable to Duryodhana and for which people censured him.

15. Then (Draupadi), the mother of the children, having heard of the death of her sons became terribly tormented and wept bitterly with her eyes flowing with tears. Arjuna consoling her said.

16. “Oh blessed lady! I shall have redressed your grief when I shall present to you the head of the wretched Brāhmaṇa

*This introduces the story how Kṛṣṇa protected Parīkṣit (who was in his mother’s womb) from the Brahma-missile of Āśvatthāman.

246. VR, thinks that the murder of the children of Draupadi was not liked by Dhṛtarāṣṭra. VC.’s statement that this killing was disagreeable to Duryodhana, has no basis in the MBh. According to the MBh, Sautpīka Purāṇa 9.54, Duryodhana praises Āśvatthāman as follows: ‘What you, Kṛṣṇa and Bhīma achieved for me today, was not done by Bhīṣma, Karna or your father. That wretched Dhṛṣṭadyumna was killed along with Śikhandin. I, therefore, regard myself as equal to Indra today... Farewell. May you be blessed. We shall meet again in heaven.”
murdered, 247 cut off by arrows discharged from my Gāndiva bow, and when you, whose sons are killed, would set your foot on it (Aśvatthāman's head) and take your bath.’”

17. Having thus consoled his beloved (wife Draupadi) with various sweet soothing words, Arjuna whose friend and charioteer was Krṣṇa, put on his armour, wielded a terrible bow and with monkey banner flying on his chariot rode in it, pursuing the son of his preceptor.

18. Seeing from a distance Arjuna pursuing him (Aśvatthāman), the murderer of (Draupadi's) children, with a trembling heart, fled in his chariot to the best of his capacity on the earth to save his life, as the god Brahmā 248 (v.l. Arka the Sun-god) did through the fear of god Śiva.

19. When the son of Brāhmaṇa (Aśvatthāman) found that his horses were fatigued and he had become helpless, he thought that the use of the missile Brāhma-Śiras 249 was his only protection.

20. Then, being in a peril of life, he sipped water from the palm of his hand concentrated his mind and let the missile go, even though he did not know how to withdraw it.

247. ālatāyin—A person who commits a heinous crime, e.g. a thief, a ravisher, a murderer, incendiary, a felon etc. Śukra Niti enumerates them as follows:

\[ \text{Kṣetra-dāra-haraś caiva saṃga vidyād ālatāyinā} \]

248. ŚR. refers to the episode of god Brahmā's flight when Rudra wanted to punish him for his lust after his daughter. ŚR. notes another v.l. Arka—the Sun-god—and states that this refers to the story in Vāmana Purāṇa. Vidyumāli, a demon, got from Śiva, a heavenly car of gold in which he followed the Sun, dispelling the darkness in the part of the world when the Sun had set. The Sun, finding the disappearance of night from the world, melted down the heavenly car of Vidyumāli. At this, Śiva got enraged with the Sun and opened his third eye. The Sun, terrified at the terrible fire so released, ran for his life but was scorched by it and fell down at Vāraṇasī where he is known as ‘Loṭārka’. VJ. reads ērki, the son of Arka, i.e. the Saturn and refers to the story in the Viśu Purāṇa in which the Saturn had to flee for his life before the fire emanating from the third eye of Rudra.

249. ŚR. regards Brahma-Śiras and Brahmāstra as the same. But as VD. points out, they are different missiles. He. quotes Śkaudā Purāṇa as his authority.
21. Then, seeing the terrific glare of light (of the fierce flame of the missile) manifested in all directions and endangering his life, Arjuna spoke to Kṛṣṇa.

Arjuna said:

22. Oh Kṛṣṇa! Oh highly fortunate one! The saviour of your devotees from fear! You are the reliever of persons who are being burnt in the fire of worldly life. You are the First, Primeval Man, the direct controller of the universe, higher than the Primordial Nature (Prakṛti). Having dispelled the Cosmic Illusion (Māyā) by your intellectual power (Cicchakti) you stay established in your own pure nature.*

24. You are the same as He (God, described above). By your power, you confer blessings such as Dharma and others (Wealth, Liberation etc.) on all beings whose minds are deluded by Illusion (Māyā).

25. Moreover, this incarnation of yours is both for lessening the burden of the earth as well as for the convenience of

*Some more interpretations:

(i) ŚR: 'You are the direct controller (of the universe) as you are the Man beyond the Primordial Nature (Prakṛti). You are the First cause who having dispelled Illusion (Māyā) by your intellectual Power (Cicchakti) are established in the absolutely pure state of your Self.'

(ii) VR. distinguishes between the individual Soul (Jīva) and God; the individual soul, due to his limited knowledge, wrongly attaches the attributes of the body to the Soul while God dispels them by His Power of Knowledge (Cicchakti), God being within all individual Souls, dispenses the fruit according to the actions of respective individual Souls and acts as their support.

VR. interprets the text of this verse as follows: 'You alone are the veritable Ruler (of the universe). You are the First (cause of the universe), Man (existing in all individuals and controlling them) untouched by the attributes of Prakṛti (Primordial nature). By your Power of knowledge you are untouched by Māyā. You lie established in your own absolute greatness.'

(iii) VJ: 'You are the destroyer of sins (Puruṣāḥ), the First (existing before everyone and everything); the controller incarnate, superior to Intelligent Primordial Nature (Prakṛti). By your Power of Knowledge, you, having removed the power of bondage (Māyā) stay established with Your Self which is absolute (=beyond the bonds of Prakṛti).
constant meditation by your devotees who have set their hearts only on you.

26. Oh God of gods! I do not know the nature and the source of this very terrible fire which is encompassing us from all directions.

The Lord said:

27. Know that this is the Brahma missile (astra) detonated by the son of Droṇa (Aśvatthāman) under peril of life. He does not know the method of withdrawing it.

28. There is no other missile except this very astra (missile) which can curb its power. You are conversant with missiles. By the force of the same (Brahma) missile, therefore, destroy the fierce fire of that astra.

Sītā said:

29. Hearing the words of the Lord, Arjuna, the vanquisher of valiant foes, touched water (i.e. sippedit as ācamana), circumambulated him (Kṛṣṇa) and discharged his Brahmastra against (Aśvatthāman's) Brahmastra.

30. The flames emanating from Brahmastra-charged arrows of both (Arjuna and Aśvatthāman) mingled with each other and surrounded by fiery arrows they covered the earth, heaven and the space-between and increased the conflagration like the fire and the Sun (at the end of the world.)

31. All beings who were scorched (by the Brahmastras) and saw the terrific fire of (their missiles) burning the three worlds, felt that it was the fire of Pralaya (which burns down the world).

32. Seeing the distress of the people and the destruction of the world and noticing the view of Vāsudeva, Arjuna withdrew both the missiles.

33. Then Arjuna, with his eyes reddened with rage, swiftly overtook the terrible Aśvatthāman (lit. the son of Gautami) and roped him forcibly like a (sacrificial) beast.

34. The Lotus-eyed Lord (Kṛṣṇa) spoke angrily to Arjuna who fastened the enemy with a rope and desired to take him per force to the camp.
35. Oh Pārtha, you should not spare this (fellow). Kill this wretched Brāhmaṇa who has murdered innocent children while they were asleep at night.

36. A person, knowing the restrictions of religion (Law) does not kill an enemy who is intoxicated, inattentive (or unguarded), haunted by a ghost (or insane), asleep, or a child or a woman; (nor does he kill) a dullard (lunatic), a suppliant for protection, (an enemy) with a broken chariot or (feeling) in a frightened condition.

37. He who supports his life by killing others is merciless and wicked. To mete out capital punishment to him is in his interest as he really goes to hell on account of that crime (if not expiated by judicial punishment).

38. It was in my presence (lit. while I was hearing) that you promised to Draupadī: 'I shall bring to you the head of the man who killed your sons.'

39. Oh valiant one! Let, therefore, this sinful desperado, the murderer of your sons, be slain as he is a disgrace to his family and has acted against the interests of his master.

40. Though thus urged by Kṛṣṇa who tested his (Arjuna's) sense of Dharma, the great son of Pṛthā (Arjuna) did not wish to kill his teacher's son (even though he was) the slayer of his children.

41. Having returned to his camp, Arjuna, whose dear charioteer was Kṛṣṇa, presented him (Aśvatthāman) to his beloved who was weeping.

42. Seeing the evildoer, the preceptor's son, produced before her, bound with a rope like a (sacrificial) beast with his head bent low due to his censurable act, the good-natured Draupadī bowed to him out of pity.

43. And the virtuous lady (Draupadī), not tolerating the act of bringing him thus bound (with cords) said, "Let him be released immediately, especially as this Brāhmaṇa is veritably the preceptor.

44. Through his favour Your honour has studied the Dhanurveda (the Military Science) along with its secret formulae (incantations or Mantras) and a number of missiles along with the technique of discharging and withdrawing them.

45. This (Aśvatthāman) is venerable Droṇa existing in the form of a son. Kṛṣṇa who is Droṇa’s (better) half, is alive; she did not immolate herself after him as she was the mother of a warrior.

46. Therefore, Oh highly fortunate one who know religion, the family of the preceptor which deserves constant respect and worship, should not be subjected to misery by Your honour.

47. Let not his mother Gautami who regards her husband as a god, weep just as I constantly do, with my face full of tears, due to grief at the death of my children.

48. The Brāhmaṇa race which is provoked by Kṣatriyas of uncontrolled tempers and is subjected to grief, burns down within a short time, that Kṣatriya family with its kith and kin.”

Sūta said:

49. Oh Brāhmaṇas, King Yudhiṣṭhira (son of Dharma) approved of the queen’s speech of great significance which was consistent with religion and justice and was remarkable for its compassion, sincerity and equitability.

50. Nakula, Sahadeva, Śāyaki, Arjuna, the venerable son of Devaki and other ladies present also expressed their approval (of her speech).

51. There (then) the enraged Bhīma spoke:

'It is desirable (even from the point of Aśvatthāman) that he should be killed as he killed the sleeping children in vain neither in the interest of his master nor his own.'

52. Hearing the words of Bhīma and Draupadi, the four-armed250 Kṛṣṇa looked at the face of his friend (Arjuna) and spoke smilingly as follows:

Sī Kṛṣṇa said:

53. “The (two) injunctions that a Brāhmaṇa even though fallen, should not be killed and that a wreckless ruffian deserves capital punishment, have been laid down by me. Carry out the twofold command.

250. ŚR. states that Kṛṣṇa manifested his four arms as he used two arms to prevent Bhīma from killing Aśvatthāman and two to ward off Draupadi who suddenly came in the way of Bhīma for warding him off from that act.
54. Carry out what you have promised to your beloved (Draupadi) at the time of consoling her. Do what is agreeable to Bhīma, Pāṇcāli and me as well."

Sūta said:

55. Understanding at once the intention of Hari, Arjuna, with his sword, took away the jewel that was in the head of the Brāhmaṇa along with the locks of hair.

56. Releasing him (Aśvatthāman) from the rope (with which he was bound), Arjuna drove him (Aśvatthāman) out of the camp, as he had lost all his lustre due to the murder of children (committed by him) and the loss of the brilliant gem.

57. (For, disgraceful) shaving of the head, confiscation of property as well as expulsion from the place (of residence) is a (veritable) capital punishment to unworthy Brāhmaṇas; there is no other physical punishment prescribed for that caste.

58. All the Pāṇḍavas along with Draupadi, who were afflicted with grief for their sons, performed rites connected with the funeral of their relatives.

CHAPTER EIGHT

(Kunti’s Eulogy of Kṛṣṇa and Yudhīṣṭhira’s Repentance)

Sūta said *

1. Then, they (Pāṇḍavas) along with Kṛṣṇa and with women (going) in front, proceeded to the Ganges for offering libations of water to their dead kinsmen who desired (such) water.

*VJ.’s text gives the following additional verses, the gist of which is as follows:

All the Pāṇḍavas along with Draupadi were deeply grieved at the death of their sons. They performed the prescribed funeral rites of their kinsmen.

Then the Lord showed to Draupadi the various warriors slain, as promised by him formerly when she fell at his feet weeping.
2. Having offered the libations and bewailing bitterly again, all of them bathed in the waters of the river sanctified by the dust of the lotus-like feet of Hari.

3-4. Explaining the irresistibility of the (effects of) Time (or Death) on living beings, Mādhava (Krśṇa) along with sages consoled the Lord of Kurus (Yudhiṣṭhira and his younger brothers, Dhr̥tarāṣṭra[261], Gāndhāri[262] aggrieved at the loss of her sons, Pr̥thā (Kuntī)[253] and Draupadī, who sat there bereaved of their relatives (and hence) given to sorrow;

5-6. Having made Yudhiṣṭhira[254] regain his kingdom cheated away from him by rogues, and having got killed the wicked whose life was cut short due to touching the hair of the queen (Draupadī) and having enabled (Yudhiṣṭhira) to per-

'Oh queen! See the wives of your enemies who with hair dishevelled, are lamenting, embracing their husbands whose thighs or chests are broken with the mace of Bhīma'.

251. Dhr̥tarāṣṭra—Eldest son of Vicitravīrya or rather Vyāsa and Ambikā. He married Gāndhāri and had one hundred sons the eldest of whom was Duryodhana. He was blind and hence his younger brother Pāṇḍu superseded him to the throne. The Mahābhārata war was fought between the sons of Dhr̥tarāṣṭra and Pāṇḍu. After the war, Dhr̥tarāṣṭra, bereaved of his sons, stayed for some time with the Pāṇḍavas and then resorted to forest along with Gāndhāri and Kuntī where they were burnt in a forest conflagration—DHM 91.

253. Kuntī (Pr̥thā)—Daughter of the Yādava Prince Śūra, sister of Vasudeva; given as a child to Śūra's childless cousin Kuntibhoja. Pleased with her services in her maidenhood, Durvāsas gave her a charm whereby she could invoke any god. She used the incantation to invoke the Sun-God and she gave birth to Kṛṣṇa without loss of her virginity. Later, she married Pāṇḍu and bore him three sons—Yudhiṣṭhira, Bhīma and Arjuna who were respectively from the gods Yama-dharma, Vāyu and Indra.

During the forest-dwelling of Pāṇḍavas, she stayed at Hastinapura. After the Bhārata war, she retired into the forest along with Dhr̥tarāṣṭra and Gāndhāri and all of them perished in a forest-fire, HDM 171.

24. ajātalatraḥ—Normally it means 'One having no enemy;' but VJ and VD interpret ajāla as Duryodhana as he was born from a pitcher and not in the normal way. In support of this they quote from Mbh. 1.114 wherein the birth of the sons of Dhr̥tarāṣṭra is described. These annotators interpret this as 'one whose enemy is Su (Dur) yodhana' form thrice the horse-sacrifice with the best method\textsuperscript{255}, he (Kṛṣṇa) caused his Yudhiṣṭhira's) fame spread in all directions like that of god Indra (the Performer of hundred Sacrifices).

7-8. Oh Brāhmaṇa! And having taken leave of Pāṇḍava and having exchanged mutual worship with Brāhmaṇas like Dvaipāyana (Vyāsa), Kṛṣṇa, accompanied by Śātayaki and Uddhava got into chariot with the intention of going to Dvārakā when he saw Uttarā\textsuperscript{256} running towards him stricken with panic.

\textit{Uttarā said:}

9. "Protect me, Oh great Yogin, save me, Oh God of gods, Protector of the world. As people are victims of death\textsuperscript{257}
I do not see safe shelter with any one else but with you.

10. Oh all-pervading Lord! An arrow with a red-hot iron tip rushes towards me. Oh Lord! Le it burn me at will but let not the embryo (in my womb) be fallen."

\textit{Sūta said:}

11. Having heard her speech, the Lord who loves his devotees, knew that it was the missile of Aśvatthāman discharged to extirpate the race of Pāṇḍavas.

12. Oh great sage, then at that very time, Pāṇḍavas, having noticed five blazing arrows rushing towards them, resorted to their missiles.

\textsuperscript{255.} \textit{uttama-kalpakai-k—(i) With faultless detailed formalities of recitation of Mantras, gifts to Brāhmaṇas at the appropriate stages of the sacrifice—VR.
(ii) With the best method of performing religious rites—VJ.
(iii) With the best materials—VB., VD.
(iv) With the best performers of sacrifices like Vyāsa and others—VD.

256. The daughter of Matsya King Virāṭa and queen of Abhimanyu. Mother of Parīkṣit. When Aśvatthāman discharged the Brahmāstra against the child in her womb, she invoked Kṛṣṇa's help who protected her by his Sudarśana discus and saved Parīkṣit—PI. 1.219.

257. \textit{Yatra . . . parasparam—Where men are the death of one-another ŚR.}
13. Having seen the disaster of Pāṇḍavas who were absolutely devoted to him, the mighty Lord ordained their safety by his missile called Sudarśana.

14. Hari, the Lord of yoga, who is the Soul residing within all beings, covered the embryo (in the womb) of the princess of Virāṭa (Uttarā) by (his power called) Māyā (Illusion) for the continuation of the Kuru race.

15. Oh descendant of the Bhṛgu clan (Šaunaka)! Even though the missile called Brahmaśiras is irresistible and uncounteractable, it became quiescent when it came into contact with the lustre of Viṣṇu.

16. Do not regard this as a miracle, for Acyuta who though unborn, creates, protects and destroys the world by his refulgent (power) Māyā, is miraculous in every way.

17. The virtuous Prthā (Kunti) in the company of Draupadi, and her sons who were saved from the flames of the missile Brahma-Śiras addressed thus to Kṛṣṇa who was about to start.

Kunti said:

18. I bow to you the First (=the cause of world) Man, the Lord (of the universe), beyond Prakṛti, imperceptible yet pervading all beings from within and without.

19. (I am) ignorant (and hence can simply bow down to) you who are concealed behind the screen of Māyā (Illusion), beyond the ken of sense-perception and immutable. You cannot be realised by the false perception of ignorant person just as an actor in his role in the drama is not recognized by an ignorant spectator.

20.* You cannot be perceived by pure-hearted sages of the highest order. How can we, women, know you in order to follow the path of devotion unto you?

ŚR: How can we, women, know you that are incarnated (on this earth) to teach the Paramahamsas (recluses of the highest order) the Bhakti Yoga (path of devotion) and to attract the minds of the (meditative) sages of devotion and to teach them (how to follow) the path of devotion.

VR: How can we women (ineligible for performing yoga and of impure mind) know you? You reveal yourself to the intense devotion of recluses of the highest order, pure in mind and given to meditation of yourself.
21. Again and again I bow to Kṛṣṇa Vāsudeva, the joy (son) of Devaki, the young child of the Cowherd Nanda, Govinda.258

22. Bow to him from whose naval sprouts up the Lotus; salute to the wearer of lotus-garland; respect to the lotus-eyed god; bow to him whose feet are like lotus.

23. Oh Hṛṣikeśa!259 Just as (your) sorrow-stricken (mother) Devakī who was incarcerated for a very long time by Kṛṣṇa,260 was released by you, so also I along with my sons, was often saved in a number of difficulties by you alone as my protector.

24. Oh Hari, we have been completely protected by you from poison,261 from the great fire,262 from the sight of cannibalistic demons263, in the assembly of the wicked264, from the danger of forest-dwelling265, from the missiles of great warriors in every battle266 and the missile of the son of Droṇa (Aśvatthāmān).

258. V.J. gives rather unusual derivations of some of the epithets used here, e.g. Vāsudeva—One who shines after pervading the world. Govinda—One who is attained to by Vedas. Nandagopa-Kumāra—One who cured the leprosy of a king called Nanda.

239. The controller of the sense-organs, i.e. Kṛṣṇa.

260. Kṛṣṇa—a tyrannical king of Mathurā, son of Ugrasena and cousin of Devaki. He married two daughters of Jarāsandha, king of Magadha. He deposed his father. Due to a prediction that the eighth child of Devaki will kill him, he imprisoned both Devaki and Vasudeva. He tried to kill all the children of Devaki but Kṛṣṇa, the eighth child was smuggled away and was kept under the protection of Nanda, the cowherd chief. Kṛṣṇa became a great persecutor of Kṛṣṇa and tried to kill him but was eventually killed by Kṛṣṇa—DHM 149.

261. vīśāl—Refers to administration of poison-food to Bhima by Durvodayana and throwing him in the Gaṅgā after fastening down with creepers (Mbh. I.127.45-54).

262. māhāgnāḥ—This refers to Durvodayana’s attempt to burn down Kuntī and Pāṇḍavas in the house of lac at Vāraṇāvata (Mbh. I.147).

263. This refers to the encounter of Pāṇḍavas with demons like Hidimba (Mbh. I.153), Baka (Mbh. I.162 etc).

264. This refers to the assembly of dice-players in which Draupadī was humiliated (Mbh. II. 67-68).

265. Refers to the different hazards which Pāṇḍavas faced during their stay in the forest for twelve years.

266. Refers to the Bhārata war in which Pāṇḍavas had to face a number of enemy missiles.
25*Oh Master of the Universe! May there always be calamity at every step (if in every such calamity we are blest with) your sight which relieves people from the cycle of rebirths.

26. Verily a man puffed up with pride of noble birth, power, learning and wealth never deserves to speak of (i.e. remember) you who are worthy of being known by desireless persons or Paramahamsas.

27. Salutations to you, who regard your sincere devotees as your wealth and from whom tendencies towards attributes (guṇas) viz. the objectives of Dharma, Artha and Kāma have disappeared; I bow to you who delight in His your Self and devoid of attachment and who is the Lord of (one who can grant the Final Beatitude.

28* I look upon you as Time (or Death), the Controller of the Universe, beginningless and endless. Although quarrels (wars) among beings arise from you (as the efficient cause), you move with equality (and dispense pleasure and pain according to their past actions).

29. Oh Lord! Nobody knows what you intend to do. You appear to behave like men. Nobody is either favourite with you nor any one antagonistic in the least. It is the mind of men which is prejudiced.

*VJ. differs:
‘Oh Lord of the Universe! May there be continuous difficulties in our various worldly dealings. In these, however, we should have a sight of you which shows the way to Liberation (Mokṣa).

267. akiñcana-vittaya—akiñcana is one who wishes to get nothing else but Śrī Kṛṣṇa; hence ‘a sincere devotee’. This compound means:
(i) Who are the wealth to his sincere devotees;
(ii) One who loves his sincere devotees.

* Another interpretation:
I regard you as Time-bodied one who control god Brahmā and others and hence who are free from birth and death. Quarrels among beings arise due to Time though you move with equality (the charges of inequality and mercilessness cannot be levelled against you).—VR.

SD: It is due to ignorance that persons bear a prejudiced attitude to you even though you are really devoid of favouritism or antagonism. VB. endorses the same interpretation with his usual details.
30.* Oh soul of the Universe! That you who have no birth and no actions, have incarnations and actions to perform among non-human beings (e.g. the boar-incarnation), human beings (e.g. Rāma, Kṛṣṇa), sages (e.g. Vāmana) and aquatic animals (e.g. the Fish incarnation) is a great imitation (a matter of your will to imitate these).

31. When for a fault committed by you, the cowherdess (Yaśodā) took a rope, the then spectacle of your standing with head bent down, showing expression of fear on your face with eyes full of tears mixed with black collyrium, really enchants me, as even fear is afraid of you.

32. Some (persons) say that you, though unborn, appeared to take birth in the Yadu race for (spreading) the reputation of your dear friend Yudhiṣṭhira of pious fame and that of beloved Yadu, just as the sandal tree (grown on the Malaya) for the (reputation of the) mountain Malaya.

33. Others say that you are the unborn one who, in response to (their) prayer, was born of Vasudeva and Devakī for the good of the world and the destruction of the enemies of gods.

34. Others say that as per prayer of god Brahmā (lit. the self-born god), you were born to lessen the burden of the earth which, like (an overloaded) boat in the sea, suffered from overpressure (of demons and wicked persons).

35. Some others (regard that you are born) for performing deeds worth hearing and remembering by (persons) suffering in this worldly existence on account of nescience,*268 desires and actions (karmas done previously).

* Another interpretation:

You are the birthless (due to absence of actions leading to birth) and the actionless (due to disinclination to do any action on account of non-existence of actions motivating new actions) soul of the universe. That you should have births in (and indulge in actions suitable to) non-human beings, human beings, sages and aquatic animals is extremely deceptive.

268. avidyā—(i) Ignorance about the nature of the highest joy—ŚR.
   (ii) Ignorance caused by the confusion between the Soul and the body—VR.
   (iii) Absence of the knowledge of the Soul and the non-Soul—SD.
36. Only those persons who constantly hear, sing, glorify, remember and take delight in your likeable deeds, will see before long your lotus-like feet which terminates (dries up) the current of worldly existence.

37. And, Oh Lord (Kṛṣṇa) who fulfill the wishes of your devotees! Do you today abandon us, your friends and dependants, who have brought so much grief to the princely class and have no other refuge than the lotus-like feet of your honour?

38* If Your honour is out of sight, what are we Pāṇḍavas and Yadus but (merely) name and form, just as the sense-organs are worthless (dead) in the absence of the Soul (lit. controller of the sense-organs).

39. Or holder of the mace (Kṛṣṇa)! The land (in our kingdom) will not appear beautiful (after your departure) just as now it appears decorated by your feet imprinting on the ground your special (divine) marks.

40. It is by your (favourable) looks that these lands with well-ripened plants and creepers, with their forests, mountains, rivers and seas, prosper (richly).

41. Therefore, Oh Lord of the Universe! the Universal Soul! All-pervading Lord! Cut asunder my bond of love to my kinsmen—this strong attachment towards Pāṇḍavas and Vṛṣṇis.

42. Oh Lord of Madhus (＝Yādavas)! May my mind be constant and firm in devotion to you and be not attached to any other object just as the stream of the Ganges flows into the sea (alone without minding any obstacles).

43. Oh Śrī Kṛṣṇa, friend of Arjuna, the best of the Vṛṣṇis, Fire (destroyer) of the prowess of the kings who harassed the earth, of undiminished power and might, Possessor of the wealth of wish-yielding cows (Govinda), one who incarnates for removing the afflictions of cows, twice-born ones (Brāhmaṇas) and gods, Oh Lord of Yogas, the Preceptor of all, Oh Venerable Lord, I bow to you.

* Another interpretation:

(i) When we have visualised you as when the sense-organs find their controller (the Soul), we have become through your grace, Yādavas and Pāṇḍavas—VR.

(ii) The sense-organs function when the controlling agency—the Soul—is with them. The existence of our name and form is due to your presence with us. Otherwise we shall be reduced to nameless and formless category.
Sūta said:

44. Vaikuṇṭha (Kṛṣṇa) whose entire glory was thus eulogized in sweet words by Prthā (Kuntī), smiled gently as if enchanting the world by his Māyā.²⁶⁹

45. Having blessed her (Kuntī) that her desires would be fulfilled²⁷⁰ and entering Hastināpura, he took leave of the ladies and was about to leave for his capital when he was detained by the king, out of love.

46. Even though he (Yudhiṣṭhira) was advised with illustrations from historical incidents by Vyāsa and others who did not comprehend the intention of the Lord (that it was Bhīma who was to enlighten Yudhiṣṭhira and not they) and by Kṛṣṇa (himself) of miraculous deeds, he (Yudhiṣṭhira) did not understand it (as) he was overcome with grief.

47. Oh Brāhmaṇas, the king Yudhiṣṭhira (son of Yama-dharma) brooding over the death of his friends (and well-wishers) and with his mind becoming defunct in judgment like that of common people, spoke as follows.

48. Alas! Look at the ignorance grown in the heart of a wicked man like me. For the sake of my body which is for others (for being devoured by carnivorous animals like dogs, jackals etc.) many divisions²⁷¹ (of the army) are killed.

49. Even for crores of years there is no hope of my release from hell as I have done wrong to children (like Abhimanyu, Lakṣmaṇa), Brāhmaṇas (like Droṇa), relatives, friends, elders, brothers and preceptors.

50. The precept that killing enemies in a righteous war is not a sin in the case of a king protecting his subjects, cannot convince (enlighten) me (as I was not a ruler of the people).

51. Here the sin accrued to me by the wrong done to women whose relatives were slain for my sake, cannot be expiated by me by (religious) acts prescribed for householders.

²⁶⁹. Māyā: (i) ŚR. quotes ‘Māyā is the smile (of the world) which maddens the world.
(ii) Divine Love—VC.
²⁷⁰. After accepting Kunti’s prayer (regarding her constancy in devotion etc.)—ŚR.
²⁷¹. Akṣauhini—A division of the army consisting of 21870 chariots, as many elephants. 63610 horses and 109350 foot-soldiers: Total—218700.
52. Just as one cannot purify muddy water by mud or the sin of drinking wine by means of (profuse) wine, similarly one cannot expiate a single act of killing a living being by (performing) a number of sacrifices (involving the deliberate slaughter of animals).

CHAPTER NINE

(Yudhiṣṭhira's Acquisition of Kingdom)

Sūta said:

1. Thus, being afraid of disaffection of the subjects Yudhiṣṭhira, with a desire to know religious duties of all (kinds), proceeded to the battlefield\(^{272}\) (Kurukṣetra) where Devavrata\(^{273}\) (Bhiṣma) was lying.

272. Vinaśana—Although ŚR. and VJ. identify this with Kurukṣetra, SD. identifies it with the spot where Bhiṣma fell from his chariot in the battle ("yatra Devavrato Bhiṣmo rathad apatad Vinaśanam . . . Kurukṣetrāntargataṁ sthānam/"") Bh. P. 1.9.1.

273. Devavrata—Lit. an observer of religious vows; an epithet of Bhiṣma, the 8th son of Śantanu and Gaṅgā; and heir to the throne of Hastināpura after his father; to enable his father to marry Satyavati, he renounced his claim to the throne and vowed not to marry or beget children; he came to be known as Bhiṣma due to this dreadful vow; after his father’s death, he installed Satyavati’s son Vicitravirya on the throne and got him married to two princesses of Kāśirāja; afterwards when Vicitravirya died childless, he advised Satyavati to persuade her daughter-in-laws to have issues by niyoga and Bhiṣma became the guardian of his nephews and grandsons; in the great Bhārata war, he was the first commander-in-chief of the Kaurava army. On the tenth day of the battle, Arjuna being shielded by Śiṅkhaḍin, pierced Bhiṣma with innumerable arrows and Bhiṣma fell down from his chariot only to be upheld from the ground by "the bed of darts". Due to the boon given to him by Śantanu, Bhiṣma could choose the time of his death. He survived 58 days after this. When Yudhiṣṭhira approached him after the war, he delivered to him several didactic discourses on all aspects of religion. At last when the Sun crossed the vernal equinox, he cast off his mortal coil with his mind fixed on God. Bhiṣma was an ideal hero noted for his continence, wisdom, firmness of resolve and devotion to God.

(ASD. 407, DHM. 53-55 and PI. II. 566-67).
2. Then all the brothers riding in chariots decorated with gold and drawn by excellent horses followed him along with Brāhmaṇas like Vyāsa, Dhaumya\textsuperscript{274} and others.

3. Oh Brāhmaṇa sage! The Lord (Krṣṇa) accompanied by Arjuna (followed him) in a chariot. With them (in their company) the king appeared (glorious) like Kubera\textsuperscript{275} (the God of wealth) surrounded by Guhyakas\textsuperscript{276} (his attendants).

4. Seeing Bhīṣma lying on the ground like a god fallen from the Heaven, Pāṇḍavas along with their followers and Krṣṇa (lit. the holder of the discus) bowed (to him).

5.* Of greatest saint! All Brāhmaṇa sages, divine sages and royal sages assembled there to see (Bhīṣma) the prominent one among the Bhārata clan.

6. Parvata\textsuperscript{277}, Nārada\textsuperscript{278}, Dhaumya\textsuperscript{279}, the venerable Bādarāyaṇa (Vyāsa)\textsuperscript{280}, Brhādaśva\textsuperscript{281}, Bharadvāja\textsuperscript{282}, and the \textsuperscript{274} Dhaumya—The family priest of Pāṇḍavas; was invited for Yudhiṣṭhira’s Rājasūya sacrifice; accompanied Pāṇḍavas in their exile in the forest; followed Yudhiṣṭhira on a visit to the dying Bhīṣma.

\textsuperscript{275} Kubera—The god of riches; the ruler of the city of Alakā in the north; the head of demi-gods like the Yakṣas, Guhyakas and Kinnaras; traditionally he is regarded as a custodian of gold, silver, precious stones and such treasures.

\textsuperscript{279} Dhaumya—See note 274.
\textsuperscript{280} Bādarāyaṇa (Vyāsa)—See note 19.
\textsuperscript{281} Brhādaśva—According to PI. II. 492, he was the son of Sahadeva and father of Bhānumat; called on the dying Bhīṣma. In the MBH, he is said to have narrated the story of Nala to Yudhiṣṭhira, taught him the technique of gambling by dice. (BPK 213).

\textsuperscript{282} Bharadvāja—Son of Brhaspati; was invited for the Rājasūya of Yudhiṣṭhira; called on the dying Bhīṣma; later he came to see King Parīkṣita when he was practising his Prāyopaveśa. (PI. II. 541-42).
son of Reṇuka (Paraśurāma) along with his disciples.

7. Vasiṣṭha, Indra-pramada, Trita, Grātṣamada, Asita, Kakṣīvān, Gautama, Atri, Kauśika and then

283. Son of Reṇukā—Paraśurāma.

284. Vasiṣṭha—Lit. 'the wealthiest'. A celebrated Vedic sage to whom many hymns are ascribed. In the Bh. P., he is a mind-born son of god Brahmā in the Svāyambhuva epoch (manvantara). In the present epoch (manvantara), he was again born from god Brahmā; married Arundhati; had 100 sons who were killed by Viśvāmitra. He tried to commit suicide but the rivers Vipāś and Śatadru did not drown him. He was the family priest of Ikṣvākus. The detail of the struggle between Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra is given in the MBH., the Rāmāyaṇa and the Purāṇas. The feud started with Viśvāmitra's futile attempt to carry away Vasiṣṭha's wish-yielding cow Nandini and ended with his attainment of the status of a Brāhmaṇa sage (Brahmarṣīlva) and Vasiṣṭha's recognition of Viśvāmitra as such and Viśvāmitra's paying due honour to his former rival.

(DHM. 339-42, BPK 280)

285. Indra-pramada—A sage who called on Bhiṣma lying on his bed of arrows (BPK. 32).

286. Trita—According to Nirukta a Vedic seer connected with Grātṣamada family. In the MBH. he is said to have been pushed in a well by his brothers to appropriate his cows, but was saved by gods. He was invited to Yudhiṣṭhira's Rājasūya sacrifice; he called on Bhiṣma in his death-bed.

(PCK. 399-400, PI. 2.43, DHM. 321-22).

287. Grātṣamada—A sage who called on dying Bhiṣma. His identity with the famous Rṣvedic seer and other sages of the same name is unconfirmed. For details about other Grātṣamadas vide PCK. 322-23, DHM. 114, BPK. 94).

288. Asita—A famous sage who called on dying Bhiṣma; was invited for Yudhiṣṭhira's Rājasūya; came to Śyāmanta-panchaka to see Kṛṣṇa; accompanied Kṛṣṇa to Mithilā; acted as a sacrifice priest at Kṛṣṇa's sacrifice in Kurukṣetra.

(PI. 1.136, BPK. 26, PCK. 88-89).

289. Kakṣīvān—Originally a Vedic sage connected with the worship of Aśvins; an Aṅgiras and seer of mantras; called on Bhiṣma while he was lying on his bed of darts.

(PCK. 181, PI. 1.296, DHM. 139-40).

290. Gautama—PI. mentions 16 sages of this name. This Gautama who came to see dying Bhiṣma, is said to have called on Parikṣit engaged in Prāyopaveśa (fast unto death).

—PI. 1.556-57.

291. Atri—PI. mentions 7 sages of this name (PI. 1. 41-42). He is regarded as the son of Brahmā and father of Dattātreya; taught āṇviktiki to Alarka, Prahlāda and others; visited Bhiṣma in his death-bed; came to see Parikṣit practising Prāyopaveśa.

292. Kauśika—PI. 1. 473-74 enumerates 11 sages of this name while PCK. 286-87 mentions 20 persons of this name. About the sage mentioned in this verse both regard him as a sage who called on dying Bhiṣma.
Sudarśana.

8. Oh Brāhmaṇa! And other sages like Brahmarata (Śuka) and others like Kaśyapa, Aṅgirasas (and others) arrived there along with their disciples.

9. Seeing that those great personages have assembled to visit him, the greatest of Vasus (Bhīṣma) who knew religious duties and understood the proper behaviour suitable to particular time and place respectfully received them (by his mind and words due to his physical inability to get up Şr.)

10. And (Bhīṣma) who knew the superhuman power of Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of the Universe who has assumed human form by His power called Māyā (Illusion) and who (though)

293. Sudarśana—A sage who visited Bhīṣma in his death-bed. Other 10 persons of the same name mentioned in BPK. 349-50 are different.

294. Brahmarata alias Śuka—Son of Vyāsa; a yogin from his birth. He was initiated in spiritual lore by Bahulāśva Janaka of Mithilā; was taught the Bhāgavata Purāṇa by Vyāsa which he narrated to king Parikṣit while he observed paryopaveśa (fast unto death).

295. Kaśyapa—Out of the 7 Kaśyapas mentioned in PI. 1. 341-42, the sage mentioned here was a contemporary of Kṛṣṇa; was invited for Yudhiṣṭhira’s Rājasūya sacrifice; came to Syamantapaṇcaka to see Kṛṣṇa; one of the sages who left for Piṅḍāraka; met by Takṣaka on his way to see Parikṣit.

(PI. 1.342 also BPK 55).

296. Aṅgirasas—A contemporary of Kṛṣṇa; with his pupils visited Bhīṣma lying on his bed of arrows; came to see Kṛṣṇa at Syamantapaṇcaka; went to Dvārakā to request Kṛṣṇa to return to Vaikuṇṭha; came to see Parikṣit practising paryopaveśa.

The remaining 10 persons of the same name given in PI. 1.22-24 are different.

—PI.1.22-23.

297. Māyā—This word is highly ambiguous. Brahma Sūtra iii. 2.3 compares it with dreams but commentators argue that world is not māyā as dreams are. Bhāskara takes it as “artha-pratyaya-Sūnyatva”, with Saṅkara it is “dṛṣṭa-nāṣṭa-svarūpatva”, with Rāmānuja “as caryātmakatva” and “sarva-bhavana-samartya” with Vallabha. In stead of entering into the disputations of different schools of Vedānta, I have translated as “the power of Brahma called Māyā”, though some times it is simply translated as “Illusion”.

Verse 9: The portions marked with asterisks are the interpretations given by commentators mentioned in the brackets e.g. VJ., ŞR.
occupying the hearts (of all) was sitting (by his side) worshipped him (Krṣṇa).

11. With his eyes blinded with tears of affection, he spoke to the sons of Pāṇḍu who sat near him with humility and love.

12. “Oh sons of Dharma! Alas how painful! How much unjust! You who have resorted to Brāhmaṇas, religious duties and Acyuta (Krṣṇa) do not deserve to lead such a miserable life!

13. When the unrivalled chariot-fighter Pāṇḍu passed away, with young offspring, my daughter-in-law Prthā (Kunti) whose children were very young, was frequently subjected to great sufferings for your sake.

14. And I think whatever unpleasant (has happened to you) is brought about by Time (Fate) under whose influence lies all the world along with its guardians of the quarters (of the world) just as a row of clouds under the control of the wind.

15. (Can there be calamity) where the king is the son of Dharma (Yudhiṣṭhira), Bhīma (wolf-bellied one) with a mace in hand, the dark-coloured hero (Arjuna) the bearer of the Gāṇḍiva bow and the knower of missiles and (having) Krṣṇa as a well-wisher?

16. Oh King! No body really could divine the intentions (lit. desire to do certain things) of this (Krṣṇa). As a matter of fact, even learned people who try with a desire to fathom it become perplexed.

17. Therefore, concluding (deciding) that all this is in the power of the Providence, Oh King! Lord (of the people) the most excellent Bharata! protect these protectionless subjects in compliance of His orders.

258. JG on verses 12-14 differs: 'It is very distressing to think that although you are the son of Dharma, you consider yourself unworthy of living. Moreover, being the refuge of Brāhmaṇas, it is also distressing to think and improper on your parts to consider that you are not fit to live.

299. Sa-pālaḥ—Along with the guardian deities of the eight cardinal points. They are as follows: Indra of the East, Agni (Fire) of the South-east, Yama of the South, Nirṛti of the South-east, Varuṇa of the West, Vāyu (wind) or Marut of the North-west, Kubera of the North, Iśāna or Śiva of the North-east.
18. This venerable Lord is veritable Nārāyaṇa the Primal Man who deluding the world with his power called Māyā (illusion) moves incognito among the Vṛṣṇis.

19. Oh King! Lord Śiva, the divine sage Nārada, the venerable lord Kapila know his (Krṣṇa’s) secretmost prowess.

20. He whom you regard as maternal-cousin, a dear friend and the best well-wisher and to whom out of good feelings you employed as a counsellor, an emissary and a charioteer, is Nārāyaṇa Himself.

21. There never has been any change in his mind (regarding the dignity or otherwise) for acts performed by him (who is) the Soul of all, who is impartial, without a second, free from ego, and free from all sins.

22. (In spite of Krṣṇa’s being equal to all), Oh protector of the earth! Look at his compassion on (his) staunch devotees that Krṣṇa himself has appeared before me, when I am giving up life.

23. While concentrating the mind upon whom with devotion, and repeating whose name by words, a Yogi, who quits his body, becomes liberated from desires and actions.

24. Let the venerable four-armed God of gods whose lotus-like face is beaming with gracious (pleasing) smile and reddish eyes and who is the object of meditation, wait till I cast off this mortal frame (body).”

Sūta said:

25. On hearing that (speech of Bhīṣma), Yudhiṣṭhira asked (questions on) various (types of religious) duties (to Bhīṣma) who was lying in the bed of arrows (lit. cage of arrows) while the sages were listening.

26. Oh sage! (Bhīṣma) the philosopher, described to him the religious duties prescribed according to the nature of men and those according to castes and stages of life; duties of two-fold characteristics (viz. those characterised by Pravṛtti or active participation in worldly life and those characterised by Nivṛtti or abstention from worldly activities) due to attachment (rāga) and non-attachment (vairāgya) as (they, i.e. duties, have been) handed down in the sacred books (Vedas) (āmnāta).
27. [He explained] briefly and in details rules (duties) regarding charities, kingship, (laws pertaining to) the path of liberation, (duties) of women and those pertaining to the Bhāgavata religion.

28. (He described) the four goals of human life, viz. righteousness, attainment of worldly prosperity, Love and Liberation, along with the means to attain them as exemplified in different histories and legends.

29. While he was explaining religious duties, the time of the Summer solstice (as) longed for by Yogis who have the power to die as per their pleasure, also drew near.

30. Then (Bhīṣma), the leader of the thousands (of charioteers) concluded his speech. With his eyes unclosed, he fully concentrated his mind completely free from attachment, on the Primeval Man, the four-armed Kṛṣṇa with shining yellow garments, standing before him.

31. Bhīṣma whose sin was destroyed by his purest concentration of mind and whose pangs of wounds caused by weapons had immediately been removed (subsided) by his (Kṛṣṇa’s favourable) glance and the movements of whose sensory organs had stopped and the delusion (regarding the identity of the mind and the body) disappeared and who was (about) to quit this body praised Janārdana, i.e. Kṛṣṇa (as follows):

32. “Thus (at the time of my death) my mind free from thirst (i.e. desire for enjoyment of the fruition of actions) is fixed in the venerable Lord (Kṛṣṇa) the best in the Sātvata (Yādava) clan, who is overfull of abundance (lit. has surpassed

300. hatāsūbhah—‘The Fate that was delaying his union with God’—VR., SD.

301. dhāranā—‘Fixed attention’—

Patañjali defines it as ‘Binding the mind-stuff to a place’ (deśabandhas’ cittasya dhāranā—Yoga Sūtra 3.1).

Vyāsa explains, ‘Binding of the mind-stuff, only insofar as it is fluctuation to some place’ like the heart-lotus or the tip of the nose or to an external object is Dhāraṇā. Viṣṇu Purāṇa and Nārada Purāṇa recommend Viṣṇu for such objects of concentration.

abundance), and is full of ecstatic happiness that is inherent in Him, and who sometimes with a desire to play, associated himself with Prakṛti\textsuperscript{303} or Māyā (illusion), from which starts the stream of worldly existence.

33. Immaculate be my devotion to the friend of Vijaya (Arjuna), i.e. Kṛṣṇa, who has assumed a body most fascinating in three worlds, with Tamāla (tree) like complexion, wearing spotless garment yellow like the rays of the morning Sun, and lotus-like face covered with pendent locks of hair.

34. May my mind be (concentrated) in Kṛṣṇa whose face was bedecked with drops of perspiration scattered by his hair flowing in all directions, (appearing) grey with dust (kicked up by the hoofs) of horses in the battle, and with his armour glittering with the dint of my keen-edged arrows piercing his body (lit. skin).

35. May my love be (fixed) on Pārtha's (Arjuna's) friend who, immediately after listening to the words (of request) of his friend, posted his chariot between the two armies, his and his enemy's, (and who as it were) carried away the lives (the life-spans) of the hordes of the enemy by a glance of his eyes.

36. Let my love be upon the feet of the Lord who by his spiritual knowledge (power) removed the wrong knowledge (understanding) [of Arjuna] who at the sight of the head (i.e. the leaders) of the (enemy) army at a distance, became averse to kill his kith and kin, thinking that to be a wrong act.

37. In order to (enable me to) carry out my vow, in supersession of his own (regarding non-participation in the battle with arms), he who was seated in a chariot jumped out, and carrying the wheel of a chariot and shaking the earth and with his upper garment fallen away, attacked me like a lion killing an elephant.

38. May the Lord Mukunda who being pierced by sharpened arrows, was bathed in blood, as his armour shattered; \textsuperscript{303} Prakṛti—The Sāṁkhyas regarded this as the evolver of the universe and called it Pradhāna. It is translated as Nature or Matter as opposed to Spirit (Puruṣa). Later on, it came to be regarded as the personified will of the Supreme Being and the proto-type of the female sex, identified with Māyā or illusion and the Śakti or the energy of the deity.

ŚR. interprets this as ‘Yoga Māyā’. Dowson—HMP. 240. who in order to kill me, violently attacked me (rushed at me) who was endeavouring to kill him, be my shelter.

39. Let my devotion be in the Lord who treats the chariot of Arjuna as a member of his family, who has taken a whip (in his hand) and held the reins of the horses (in another), whose splendour is worth looking at, while I am lying at the door of death, as those who were killed after having a look at him, attain his resemblance in form.

40. [Let my love be on Kṛṣṇa] by imitating whose actions became verily merged with him, the cowherdesses who have performed the great worship by (their) graceful movements, amorous gestures, sweet smiles, solicitous looks, though (they were thus) blind with fatuation (for him).

41. This (Universal) Soul who, being attractive to look at, was endowed with the place of honour (agra-pūjā) in the assembly crowded with sages and prominent kings at the time of the Rājasūya sacrifice of Yudhiṣṭhira, has manifested himself to me (lit. my sight).

42. I who have shed off differences (dualism—bheda) and delusion (moha), have attained to him, the unborn (aja), enthroned in (each and every) heart of beings (corporate beings) created by him just as the Sun (though one) appears different to every (individual) onlooker.”

Sūta said:

43. In this way, having merged himself with Lord Kṛṣṇa with the functions of his mind, speech, sight, he (Bhīṣma) ceased to breathe within.

44. Knowing that Bhīṣma is being merged with the attributeless Brahman, all kept quiet like birds after sunset.

45. There was a beating of drums by men and gods. The good ones among the kings praised him. Flowers were showered down from heaven (the sky).

46. Oh Bhārgava (Śaunaka of the Bhṛgu clan), Yudhiṣṭhira having got performed the funeral rites etc. of the deceased (Bhīṣma) became mournful awhile.

304. JG. observes that this verse should not be explained as having any reference to Brahma, as in V. 30 the reference is clearly to Kṛṣṇa.
47. Then (after the death of Bhisma), sages pleased Krsna by (reciting) his sacred (guhya) names and with their hearts pleased and devoted to Krsna they went back to their hermitages.

48. Then Yudhisthira along with Krsna went to Hastinapura and consoled his uncle (Dhrtarashtra) and miserable Gandhari.

49. Then as per order of the uncle (Dhrtarashtra) and the consent of Vasudeva, the powerful Yudhisthira ruled his ancestral kingdom as per religious precepts.

CHAPTER TEN

(Krsna's Departure to Dvaraka)

Saunaka said:

1. How did Yudhisthira,305 the greatest among the upholders of religion, who regained his kingdom306 after killing the heinous criminals, the grabbers of his wealth(kingdom),307 proceed to rule his kingdom? What did he do then?

Suta said:

2. Hari, the donor of prosperity to His devotees,308 made the Kuru family which (due to internecine war and the missile Brahmastra fired at their last scion Parikshit, then in womb) was burnt down like the jungle of bamboo-canes in a forest conflagration, sprout forth again (by reviving Parikshit). Verily, He

305. v.l. gaviṣṭhira—One who is firm in his promise.
306. āryavaruddha-bhojanah—
   (i) One whose enjoyment is lessened due to grief caused by the killing of his relatives—ŚR.
   (ii) One who got enjoyment by the acquisition of kingdom—ŚR.
   (iii) One who has regained his kingdom —VR.
307. sva-riktha-spydhah—Those who sought for acquiring wealth—ŚR.
308. bhava-bhāvanah—Makes Lord Siva to meditate upon his Pastimes—VD.
(Hari) felt profound happiness after installing Yudhisthira on his own kingdom.

3. He (Yudhisthira) whose delusion had been dispelled by the dawning of accurate knowledge after listening to the speeches of Bhishma and Acyuta (Krsna), and whose supporter was the invincible (Krsna) and who was surrounded by his younger brothers, ruled over the earth circumscribed by the seas, as Indra, whose supporter was Acyuta (the Lord Visnu) governed the Heaven.

4. It rained at the proper times; the earth (as if) milked out all the desired products; cows with big udders overflowing with milk, gladly drenched even the ground of the cowpens.

5. In every season, rivers, seas, mountains, medicinal plants, trees and creepers—all yielded (lit. fruitioned in) his (Yudhisthira’s) desires.

6. While Yudhisthira (lit. one having no adversary) was the king, there was no mental anguish, physical pain and miseries caused by superhuman agencies, elements or body, to any being.

7-8. Having stayed in Hastinapura for alleviating the grief of his friend and for the pleasure of his sister, and having requested for and obtained permission to leave, Hari mounted the chariot embracing and saluting Yudhisthira, himself being embraced and bowed (by his hosts according to their status).

9-10. Subhadrā, Draupadi, Kunti, the daughter of Virāta (Uttarā), Gándhāri, Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Yuyutsu, the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), Kṛpa (of the Gautama clan), Bhīma, Dhaumya and ladies like Satyavatī (lit. the fisherman’s daughter) and others swooned away (or were bewildered) as they could not bear separation from Kṛṣṇa (lit. the wielder of the Śārīga bow).

11. A wise man, freed from association with bad persons due to good company, is not enthusiastic about giving it up; (similarly), having once listened to his enlightening glory, a wise man would not bear separation from him.

12. How can the sons of Pṛthā (Pāṇḍavas) who have entrusted (i.e. fixed) their minds on him in their acts of seeing, feeling, talking (or conversing), sleeping, sitting and eating (with him), endure the (grief of) separation (from him)?

13. Looking at him with unwinking eyes and following him with their minds, all of them verily moved here and there and brought articles of worship etc. as they were deeply attached to him through affection.

14. When the son of Devaki (Kṛṣṇa) moved out of the house, the women-relatives controlled their (oozing) tears of (affectionate) anxiety, lest any evil should befall.

15. (At the time of the departure of Kṛṣṇa) were sounded the tabors, conchs, kettle-drums, lutes, cymbals, horns, dhundhuri (a musical instrument), large military drums, bells and large kettle-drums.

16. Ascending the tops of the palaces with a desire to see Kṛṣṇa, ladies of the Kuru clan, with eyes expressive of love, bashfulness and smiles showered flowers on Kṛṣṇa.

17. Arjuna (the Lord of Sleep), the dear one (friend of Kṛṣṇa) held over his dearest friend, a white umbrella decked with pearl-strings and jewelled handle.

18. Uddhava and Śāyāni held very wonderful fans (on both his sides) on the way. The lord of Madhu (Kṛṣṇa) who was being showered with flowers, appeared resplendent.

19. The true blessings uttered by the twice-born (Brāhmaṇas) which were inapplicable to the attributeless but to the soul possessing qualities, were heard (by Kṛṣṇa) at different places (wherever he went).

20. The mutual conversation of the ladies of the capital of the King of Kuru’s, whose minds were concentrated on Kṛṣṇa (lit. one whose glory dispels the darkness of ignorance) was attractive to the ears (minds) of all.\footnote{sarva-śruti-manoharaḥ—In SK. Śruti means ‘the Veda’ and ‘the ear’ and hence the commentators have differently interpreted this phrase as follows:
1. Even Upaniṣads incarnate would have complimented that conversation (sañjalpa)—ŚR., VC., SD.
2. Captivating to the ears, i.e., minds of all—VR., VD.
3. The presiding deities of the Vedas wondered how these ladies knew better the Lord—VD.
4. Containing the essence of all Upaniṣads—GD.}
21. * This is verily the Primeval Man (spirit) who, without a second, existed in his own nature undifferentiated, without any manifested universe before the disturbance of the equilibrium of the qualities (gunaś) [which results in the creation of the universe] and in the night of the dissolution of universe when the individual souls lie absorbed in the Supreme Spirit, with their powers lying dormant.

22. It is he, the revealer of the Vedas (scriptures) who, again, with a desire to attribute name and form to the nameless and formless spirit, presided over (lit. followed) his nature (prakṛti) which being directed by his power (viz. Time) has a desire to procreate, and deludes the individual souls—his own parts.

23. Verily this is he (i.e. Kṛṣṇa) whose feet (or real form), the sages who have subdued their sense-organs and have control over their life-force (by prāṇāyāma etc.) visualize, in this (very) world, with their hearts purified, due to their devotionful longing (to see him). Certainly this very Kṛṣṇa is capable of completely purifying our intellect.

*VR. explains—This Kṛṣṇa is the same person who is one and is both the material and efficient cause of the Universe (its creation etc.). He alone was during the period called the night of Deluge (when all the three attributes were inactive) when all forces lay dormant, when He Himself, the Soul of the Universe of animates and inanimates, the Controller, had withdrawn in himself the thought of creation and lay without creating gross products (the earth and other Bhūtas).

310. aviśeṣa ātmani—ŚR. explains ‘niṣ-prapañcē nivasvarūpe’.

311. nimālīdātman etc.—ŚR. raises the point about the possibility of merging of the souls (jivas) as they are themselves Brahman and replies, ‘When all the powers of the individual souls are dormant, it is as good as destruction—suptārū jātiṣu satīṣu jīva-pādhi-bhūta-satōdayi-lakti-layaḥ eva jīva-layaḥ

312. GD. emphasizes that it is due to his grace (and not simply by the efforts of the sages) that he can be seen.

313. VJ. prefers the reading na tu and explains: He purified the heart thoroughly by devotion and not by action (karma).

V. follows the reading na na and explains: It is certain that this (Kṛṣṇa) alone can purify the intellect thoroughly and not Yogic exercises etc. The sagehood (sārīti), mastery over sense organs and control of life-force etc. are due to devotion (to him) alone and not to yogic practices.

314. ŚR. gives an alternative explanation:
24. Oh friend! This is verily he (Krṣṇa) whose meritorious episodes are eulogised in the Vedas, mystical scriptures (like Upaniṣads and Āgamas) by persons well-versed in the mysteries (of this literature), and who is the only one Lord, who out of his sportiveness creates, protects and destroys the universe, and is not attached to it.

25. In every age, when evil-minded kings rule (lit. live) irreligiously, this (Lord Krṣṇa) certainly assumes forms (incarnations) by his sāttvic power and sustains the sovereignty (divine faculties of omnipotence, omnipresence etc.), truth, religious order, grace and glory for the prosperity (of persons who have resorted to his feet).

26. Oh! How wonderful it is that this Superman (lit. Supreme Being), the Lord of the Goddess Lakṣmī, has made the race of Yadu, the most praiseworthy of the praiseworthy by his birth (despite the curse of Yayāti and has rendered the forest of (the demon) Madhu the sacredmost of the most sacred regions by his birth as well as by his wanderings.

When he goes out of sight, he may not please destroy his knowledge from our mind i.e. He would not be unseen although he might journey to a distant place. We should accompany him.

315. v.l. sātvataḥ—'To his devotees like gods etc.' (VJ.).
316. ṭam—(1) Speech which is both sweet yet true—VC., SD.
(2) Religious practice (anuṣṭhitamāno dharmaḥ)—VB. I preferred this older connotation to
(3) yathārthopadesatavo of ŠR., BP., GD.
(4) pious act (puṇyaṁ karma)—VR.
317. bhavāya—stability, preservation—ŚR., SD.; but I followed VJ., VC., VR., GD. and translated it as 'prosperity'.

318. The use of the present tense for this past event is vigorously defended by VC. on the ground that the pastimes of the Lord never end, due to their continuance in the infinite number of the worlds. VD. endorses VC.'s view.

319. Yadu—Son of king Yayāti of the Lunar race and founder of the Yādava clan in which Krṣṇa was born. He refused to bear the curse of old age passed upon his father by the sage Śukra and in consequence he incurred his father's curse. —DHM. 371.

320. Madhu-vanā—This forest was the dwelling place of demon Madhu. Śatrughna founded a city—Mathurā—after Madhu's death here. This region includes the city of Mathurā and its surrounding region including Vṛndāvana—VB., GD.
27. Oh! Dvārakā (Kṛṣṇa’s capital) surpasses the glory of the Heaven! It gives sanctity and glory to the earth as its resident-subjects always see their lord’s smiling looks favoured on them in his grace.

28. Oh friend! The ladies whose hands have been clasped by Him (in marriage) must have certainly worshipped the Lord (God) by observances of religious vows, ablutions and oblations to the sacred fire as they frequently drink the nectar of his lower lip for which the women of Vraja (Gokula) whose hearts were yearning for that nectar, entranced with fascination.

29-30. Those ladies like the mothers of Pradumna (i.e. Rukmiṇī), Sāmba (viz. Jámbavati), Ambā (i.e. Nagnajitī) who were taken away (by Kṛṣṇa) after paying (their price) of valour, by subduing the powerful kings like Caidya (Śīṣupāla) and others at the assembly of suitors convened for the selection of the bridegroom by the bride, and thousands of others abducted ladies after killing the son of the Earth (viz. the

321. VB. gives the details of the excellence of Dvārakā over the Heaven as follows:

There are gods in Svarga, in Dvārakā dwells the God of gods. There are heavenly damsels in Svarga while in Dvārakā lives the goddess of Wealth (Lakṣmī). The denizens of Svarga fall down (when their balance of good deeds is exhausted) while the citizens of Dvārakā go up (and are liberated from the worldly existence).

322. v.l. anugrahahostam—Who made it his place of residence out of his grace—SR. Vide VR.

anugrahena uṣitam adhivasantam /
VC.—Where his grace is desired—anugraha eva iṣitah iṣṭah yatra tam /

323. VC. and VD. explain:—The ladies of Vraja whose hearts were set on testing the nectar of (Kṛṣṇa’s) lower lip, frequently fell in ecstatic swoon by remembering the previous night’s kisses in the morning (one cannot imagine their condition at the time of actual kissing.)

324. Caidya (Śīṣupāla)—son of Damaghoṣa and Śruta-śravā (sister of Vasudeva). He was the arch-enemy of Kṛṣṇa, as he (Kṛṣṇa) carried off Rukmiṇī, his proposed wife. At the time of the Rājasūya sacrifice of Yudhiṣṭhira, he was slain by Kṛṣṇa in punishment of opprobrious abuse. —BPK 318-9, DHM 294.

325. Bhauma—The son of the Earth i.e. the Asura Naraka; ruled at Prāgjiyotisha; carried away 16000 women to his palace, robbed Aditi of her ear-rings and demanded Airāvata from Indra; at Indra’s request
Asura Naraka—their, indeed, ennable womanhood from which tenderness (or freedom) has been taken away and which is bereft of sanctity, since their lotus-eyed husband does not depart from their apartments and touches their hearts by his presents of desired objects (or by his sweet words of address).

31. Greeting with a smiling glance the words of women of the city talking among themselves in this way, Hari went his own way.

32. Yudhiṣṭhira apprehending danger from the enemies due to affection, appointed an army with four divisions (viz. Infantry, Cavalry, chariots and elephants) out of fond solicitude for the protection of the slayer of the Asura Madhu.

33. Having prevailed upon the affectionate Kauravas (i.e. King Yudhiṣṭhira and others who belonged to the Kuru clan) who, being distressed at the separation, accompanied him to a long distance, to return, he (Kṛṣṇa) proceeded to his capital with his dear ones.

34-35. Oh Bhārgava! Passing through the region of the Kurus, the Jāṅgalas, the Pāṇcālas, the Śūrasenas, along with the Yāmunas, through Brahmāvarta, Kurukṣetra, the kingdom of Matsyas, the Sārasvatas, through deserts and arid regions, the lord with his horses somewhat tired reached the territory of Ānarta which lies beyond Sauvīra and Ābhīra.

36. He was greeted with respectful presents by the people of those (respective) regions through which he travelled. He bent his course westward in the evening when the Sun was sinking into the sea (-water). 326 killed by Kṛṣṇa at Prāgjyotisapura; the articles carried away by him were returned to their owners while all the women joined Kṛṣṇa’s harem; Bhagadatta who sided with Duryodhana in the Mahābhārata war, was Naraka’s son. —PI. 2.206-7, BDP. 163 PCK 1.513.14.

326. SR. alternatively explains:
(1) dismounting on the ground, and repairing to the banks of a river, he performed his evening duties.
(2) he went to the pastures in the guise of a cowherd.
CHAPTER ELEVEN

(Kṛṣṇa's Entrance into Dvārakā)

Sūta said:

1. Arriving in the country called Ānarta, his own kingdom, overflowing with prosperity, he blew his excellent conch, allaying thereby their depressed spirits.

2. Just as a white-bellied swan singing loudly in a cluster of red lotuses appears beautiful, so shone brightly the white-wombed conch, reddened by the red lower lip of Kṛṣṇa (lit. one whose steps are wide) and held in the hollow of (his red-) lotus-like palms while it was being blown by him.

3. Hearing that sound (blast) of the conch creating consternation in the heart of the terrors of the world, all subjects desirous of seeing their Lord, advanced to welcome him.

4. There, just as a lamp is offered to the Sun, those reverential subjects presented offerings to Him who is ever delighted and contented in himself, due to self-realization.

5. Like children speaking to their parents, they, with faces blooming with affection, and voice stifled with joy, addressed their protector, the friend of all:

6. “Oh Lord! We are always submissive to your lotus-like feet adored by Brahmā, his off-spring (Sanaka etc.) and Indra (the lord of gods), the highest resort for the seekers of the supreme beatitude here, a shelter where Time [or death] which dominates everything else, is powerless.

7. Oh creator of the Universe! Be thou for our prosperity. You alone are our mother, friend, husband, father, spiritual preceptor, the supreme deity, by serving whom we consider ourselves as having become blessed.

8. Oh! It is due to you that we have been blessed with a protector. We can behold what the gods can scarcely see, your form beautiful in all respects, your face beaming with affectionate smile and loving looks.

9. Oh lotus-eyed (Lord), when, with a desire to see (your) friends, Your Honour departed to the land of Kurus

327. bhavāya—our good, consisting of knowledge, devotion etc.—VJ.
328. v.1. no bhadān—Your Honour, leaving us in slight—ŚR.
or of the Madhus (Mathurā and region around it, including Vṛndāvana), Oh Acyuta! to us, who are yours, (even) a moment (of separation from you) appears like a long period of ten million years—even as it happens to the eyes (blind-folded) in the absence of the light of the Sun.”

10. Hearing such words spoken by his subjects and spreading out grace by his affectionate glances, Kṛṣṇa who was kind to his devotees, entered the city.

11. (The city which was) guarded by the Madhus, Bhojas, Daśārhas, Arhas, Kukuras, Andhakas and Vṛṣṇis who were as powerful as himself (i.e. Kṛṣṇa), like Bhogavati guarded by serpents.

12. Beautified with lotus-pools surrounded by orchards, flower-gardens consisting of sacred trees and creeper-pavilions, (full of) richness of flowers etc. (produced in) every season.

13. With triumphal arches erected in front of the city gates, house-doors and the public roads: the solar rays have been obstructed in the interior by the tops of banners and flags painted (with various designs).

14. With royal roads, streets, market places and quadrangular places swept clean and be-sprinkled with fragrant

329. Madhus—A family of the Yādava clan—BPK 233.
330. Bhojas—Descendants of king Mahābhōja of the Yādava clan—BPK 228.
331. Daśārha—Son of king Nirṛti or Vidūratha of the Yādava clan, a founder of the dynasty of the same name. (BPK 137). Here it refers to that clan. They were related to Pāṇḍavas and defended Dvārakā—Pl. 2.59.
332. Arhas—a group of people defending Dvārakā and related to Pāṇḍavas—Pl. 1.113.
333. Kukuras—a son of Andhaka and father of Dhṛṣṭa. Here his descendants, the defenders of Dvārakā, are implied—Pl. 1.383.
334. Andhakas—A community of the Yādava tribe defending Dvārakā; at Dvāravatī their overlord was Ugrasena. Relieved by Karna’s death, ended themselves by fighting with their kinsmen. Pl. 1. 67.
335. Vṛṣṇis—The descendants of Vṛṣṇi, the son of Madhu, whose ancestor was the eldest son of Yadu. Kṛṣṇa belonged to this branch of the Lunar race—DHM 369.
336. Bhogavatī—The subterranean capital of the Nāgas in the Nāgaloka portion of the Pātāla.—DHM 54.
waters and strewn with fruits, flowers, grains of sun-dried rice and tender sprouts.

15. The doors of each house (of which city) were beautified by jars full (of water), curds, dried grains of rice, fruit and sugar canes, religious offerings, incense and lamps.

16-17. On hearing about the approach of the dearest one (Krṣṇa), the great-minded Vasudeva\textsuperscript{337}, Akrūra\textsuperscript{338}, Ugrasena\textsuperscript{339}, and Balarāma\textsuperscript{340} of marvellous bravery, (17) Pradyumna\textsuperscript{341}, Cārudeśa\textsuperscript{342}, Sāmba\textsuperscript{343} the son of Jāmbavati—all having refrain-

\item[337.] Vasudeva—son of Śūra of the Yādava clan; married seven daughters of Devaka, the youngest of them Devakī was the mother of Krṣṇa. After the death of Krṣṇa and Balarāma, he gave up his life in spiritual meditation and his four queens immolated themselves along with his body. (DHM 342-43, MNK Mahābhārata Nāmānukramaṇī—300-1).
\item[338.] Akrūra—A Yādava, uncle of Krṣṇa; the son of Śvapalka and Gāndinī; married a daughter of Ugrasena; as per order of Kāṁsa, brought Krṣṇa and Balarāma from Vraja to Mathūrā for Dhanurṣāga; on the way Krṣṇa showed to him his real Divine form. He is chiefly noted as being the possessor of the Syamantaka gem; was killed in the internecine fight amongst the Yādavas at Prabhāsa. (PI. 1.3-4, DHM.10).
\item[339.] Ugrasena—King of Mathūrā, father of Kāṁsa and Devaka. He was deposed by Kāṁsa but Krṣṇa after killing Kāṁsa, restored Ugrasena to the throne. Later he stayed at Dwārakā. After Krṣṇa’s death he entered fire.—(PI. 1.210).
\item[340.] Balarāma—Krṣṇa’s elder step-brother.
\item[341.] Pradyumna—the eldest son of Krṣṇa by Rukminī; when a child only six days old, he was stolen by the Asura Śambara who tried to kill him. Through sheer providence, he survived all attempts and grew up to manhood under the loving care of Māyāvati, actually Rati, his (Pradyumna’s) wife of his previous birth as Kāṁa. He killed Śambara, married Māyāvati and both alighted by air inside Krṣṇa’s palace. Krṣṇa presented the couple to Rukminī. Pradyumna married Kakudmati, the daughter of Rukmin and had by her a son named Aniruddha. Finally, Pradyumna got killed in the drunken brawl of the Yādavas at Prabhāsa. His wives burnt themselves as Sati.—(DHM 237-38; PI. 2. 416-17).
\item[342.] Cārudeśa—a son of Jāmbavati and Krṣṇa; a good archer. (PI. 1.598.)
\item[343.] Sāmba—A son of Krṣṇa by Jāmbavatī; was a noted warrior but led a dissolute life and scoffed at sacred things. When his friends disguised him as a pregnant woman and asked great sages like Viśvāmitra, Durvāsas, Nārada etc. whether she would beget a male child, ed from sleeping, sitting and eating due to the extreme joyous excitement.

18. And being full of respect, joy and in a hurry out of love (for Kṛṣṇa), they, leading the principal elephant (of state) before them, advanced in chariots (to meet him) in company of Brāhmaṇas (with auspicious articles in their hands) reciting the Vedas, accompanied by the blowing of conches and musical instruments.

19. And hundreds of the best courtisans whose beautiful faces and cheeks were glowing with glittering ear-rings, being eager to see him, advanced to greet him in their conveyances.

20. Actors, dancers, singers, scholars versed in ancient legends, family bards and heralds344 sang the wonderful deeds of him whose glory dispels ignorance.

21. Approaching near them, the Lord paid suitable respects to all the kinsmen, citizens and retainers, there.

22. Bowing down his head, saluting (orally), embracing, touching by hands, looking with smile, (giving) desired boons and consoling, the supreme Lord paid honours to all (classes of people) up to the outcaste dog-cookers (caṇḍālas).

23. Even he himself, being endowed benedictions by the superiors (or preceptors), Brāhmaṇas with their wives345, old men, by bards and others, entered the city.

24. Oh Brāhmaṇa! When Kṛṣṇa proceeded on the royal (main) road, women of the good families in Dvārakā, being the sages told that Sāmba will give birth to an iron pestle (or club) which would destroy the Yādava clan. Though Ugrasena got the iron pestle pounded and cast into the sea, the particles grew into rushes, reeds which turned into weapons at the drunken brawl amongst the Yādavas and killed them all. Sāmba was killed in this fight.—(DHM 276, BPK 347, MNK 379).

344. Though all these are panegyrists, the last is applied to those who are learned among them.

ŚR. quotes the duties of these as follows:

Sūtah paurāṇikāḥ proktā Māgadhā varāsa-śaṅsakāh/
Bandinas tvamala-prajñāḥ prastāva-sadrioktayāḥ //

but VD. states that Bandis are the eulogists of the present kings:

Vartamāna-nṛpāṇaḥ stotāro bandinaḥ smṛtāḥ //

345. VB. thinks that this adjective should qualify all the persons in this verse.
greatly delighted at His sight, ascended on the tops of their houses.

25. For, the eyes of the residents of Dvārakā were not thoroughly satisfied, although they were always used to see the Imperishable (Kṛṣṇa), whose person is the home of beauty (and)

26. Whose bosom is the home of the goddess of wealth, whose face is (like) a drinking vessel (of the nectar) to the eyes, whose arms (are the shelter) of the guardians (of the quarters) of the world, and (whose) lotus-like feet are (the refuge) of the Cakravāka birds (in the form of the devotees who sing of Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the essence of the universe).

27. Richly adorned with a white umbrella (lit. sunpro- tector) and Chouries, bestrewn with flowers showered (on him) on the way, the wearer of the yellow raiment (Kṛṣṇa) shone with the garland of forest flowers just as a cloud would shine with (the shining beauty of) the Sun, the Moon (along with stars), the rainbow and the lightning.

28. (When) he entered (his) parents' house, he was embraced by his mothers. With joy, he bowed down with his head to his seven (mothers) of whom Devaki was the chief.

29. Placing the son on the lap, the mothers who with their breasts wet with the milk of motherly affection were beside themselves with joy, sprinkled him with tears (of joy).

346. sāranga—A pun implying—
   (1) the Cakravāka birds and
   (2) singers of the essence (of the universe, viz. Lord Kṛṣṇa)— sārāṁ Śrī Kṛṣṇam gāyantī ti sārangā bhaktāḥ —ŚR.

347. Vanamāḷa—A garland prepared out of the flowers of Kunda, Pārijāta, lotus, Mandāra and Tulasī leaves :
   Tulasī-Kunda-Mandāra-Pārijātāmabhajas tu yā /
   Paścābbhir grathitā mālā vanamāḷetī kṛtyate //

348. In plain words : Kṛṣṇa had a white umbrella on his head and Chouries on both sides. Flowers were showered on him on the way. He wore a yellow garment and a garland of forest flowers. On account of these, he appeared like a dark cloud.

349. Vasudeva had eighteen wives. Kṛṣṇa saluted them all, but special respect was shown to Devaki and her sisters. Vidg ŚR:
   mārṣ-sodarīṇd ādara-viśeṣa-jñāpanārtham uktam /
30. Then (Krṣṇa) entered his own mansion full of all coveted objects and unsurpassed by all other palaces wherein were the edifices of his sixteen thousand and also (one hundred and eight other) wives.

31. Having observed from afar their husband, returned home from a distant journey, the wives of Krṣṇa in whose minds rapturous joy was generated, and with eyes and faces full of bashfulness, immediately sprang from their seats (a bodily action) along with their vows\(^{350}\) (which is a mental action).

32. Oh best of Bṛgus! They being of deep dispositions, embraced their husband with (their) hearts, eyes and (as if through) children. Owing to the distressed condition of their mind, the tears in their eyes though restrained, oozed out of the eyes of those bashful ladies.

33. Although he stood by their side in privacy, his pair of feet assumed newness (every moment). Who can desist from his feet which the goddess of prosperity (Lakṣmī) though (notoriously) fickle, never forsakes?

34. Just as the wind subsides (after burning down a forest of bamboos) by means of fire begotten (of their mutual friction), similarly (Krṣṇa) (although) himself unarmed, got repose after creating hostility among the kings whose birth was a load to the earth, and causing them to kill one another, (with their power exhibited by their armies surrounding them).

35. Coming down in this world of mortals by his divine power (Māyā) and revelling among a bevy of beauties, gems of that sex, the very Supreme Lord enjoys himself like ordinary man.

36. Smitten by the pure and charming smile exhibiting their unrestrained nature and bashful looks of women, the adversary of the God of Love (i.e. Śiva) being fascinated abandoned his bow (Pināka). (But) women of transcendent beauty

\(^{350}\) vrataiḥ sākam—ŚR. explains: ‘While observing the vows of women whose husbands have gone abroad’. It can also be taken as sākam vrataiḥ which means that the rules for such women as prescribed by Yājñavalkya:

\[
\text{Kṛṣṭāṁ sarira-sāṅskāram samājotsava-darśanam} \\
\text{Hāṣyam para-grhe yūnam tyajet prośita-bhārtykā} \\ \text{also: rose up along with the other ladies.}\] not by their cunning (deceits) ruffle the serenity of Kṛṣṇa's mind.

37. Verily people regarding (Lord Kṛṣṇa) just like (themselves), consider Him attached and following like pursuits, although he is really free from worldly feelings and passions. Hence the unwisdom (of the people).

38. This is the superiority of the Almighty that though he is associated with the Primordial Matter, He (Kṛṣṇa) is never affected by its qualities, just as Intellect though resorting to (i.e. in spite of its being in association with) the soul, does not acquire the properties of the soul.\textsuperscript{861}

39. They, the ignorant wives (of Śrī Kṛṣṇa) not understanding correctly the greatness of their husband, thought the Lord as their slave abjectly ministering to their humour in private just as people (lit. minds) [think wrongly about God].

\textsuperscript{861} This verse is interpreted differently. For example:

"That is the control of the Controller (the Supreme spirit) that he (Kṛṣṇa) is not affected by the qualities of the Nature (Primordial Matter) despite His ever presence in the (working of the) Nature, just as the Intellect, though in intimate association with the eternally existing Soul is affected by the qualities inherent in the Supreme Spirit."

ŚR. explains ātmasthit etc : "as the intellect and happiness in the Soul do not unite with each other, similarly Kṛṣṇa is not affected by the attributes of Nature." He further adds, "It may be said that the intellect joins with the attributes of the Supreme Spirit and the material body with its qualities unites with the intellect and the individual spirit with condition; but the Supreme Spirit does not imbibe the qualities of nature, although He is present in it."

VJ. a follower of the Dualistic School of Vedānta explains : The ruling nature of the Supreme Spirit consists in that, though (he is) abiding in Primordial Nature (Prakṛti), he is not limited by Sattva and other attributes, as also by Śabda etc. which are under his control; just as the (Intellect) of the wise. though abiding in the Primordial Nature (Prakṛti), is not affected by the qualities of the Prakṛti, as the Intellect fixed on Kṛṣṇa, is not affected.

JG. follows mainly ŚR. but in explaining the 2nd line of the verse he states, "... as the mind of the devotees under the benign care of the Supreme Lord, is in no way affected by, though it may come in contact with Nature".
CHAPTER TWELVE

(Birth of Parikṣit)

Śaunaka said: 352

1. The foetus in the womb of Uttara which was killed by the missile Brahmāśiras of immense heat, fired (lit. flung, hurled) by Aśvatthāman, was restored to life by the Lord.

2-3. If you be so pleased 353 to speak, I desire to hear the birth, actions (life), the way he met death and the state after death of that highly intelligent and great-souled Parikṣit. Narrate to us reverentials (about him whom) Śuka imparted knowledge.

Sūta said:

4. Dharmarāja who, due to his service to the lotus-like feet of Kṛṣṇa, became unattached to all objects of enjoyment, protected the subjects keeping them contented, with paternal care.

5. Riches, sacrifices, subjects, 354 the queen-consort, brothers, the earth and sovereignty over the isle of Jambū, 355 and glory reaching as far as the heaven.

6. Oh Brahmāṇas! Did those objects of enjoyments covetable even to gods, yield joy to the king whose mind was concentrated on Kṛṣṇa as (objects) other (than food do) to the hungry? [No].

7-8. Oh son of Bhṛgu! while being scorched by the flames of the missile (Brahmāstra) in the womb of the mother, the hero (Parikṣit) saw a certain Being, of the size of a thumb,

352. In Bh. P. 1.7.12 Sūta has promised to describe the life and career of Parikṣit. After describing how Kṛṣṇa returned to Dvārakā after restoring the Pāṇḍavas to their ancestral kingdom, this topic is now taken up.

353. ŚR. states that this expresses prayer or a request and not a command.

354. Lokāḥ—attainment of heavens as a result of the sacrifices —ŚR.

355. Jambūdvipa—One of the seven island-continents surrounding Meru. It is so named on account of the abundance of Jambū (Engenia Jambolana) trees. India forms the major part of this island.
pure, wearing a crown of shining gold, of beautiful appearance, dark complexion, with garments (shining) like the lightning and Imperishable—

9. Of beautiful long four arms, (with) ear-rings of bright (heated) gold, (with) eyes red like blood, with a mace in hand, going around him in all directions, waving (around) constantly the meteor-like bright mace—

10. (Parikṣit) examined carefully who was this (Being) near him extinguishing the flames of the missile by his mace like the Sun dispersing the mist.

11. Having warded off (the Brahmāstra), the omnipresent Lord, Hari, of infinite nature and the protector of religion, 356 disappeared then and there, while the foetus of ten months was looking on.

12. Then, (at the auspicious time) when the favourable planets were in the ascendance, (indicating progressive) increase of all qualities the scion to the dynasty of Pāṇḍu was born, with the prowess like Pāṇḍu reborn.

13. Having got the ceremonial repetition regarding the auspiciousness of the day 357, the king, with a happy heart, got the ceremony of birth 358 (or astrological calculation of the nativity of a child) performed by Brāhmaṇas like Dhaumya, Krpa and others.

14. The king, the knower of the sacred places (and of the proper time, person etc. for donating gifts) gave gold, cows, lands, excellent villages, elephants, horses and sweet food (dishes) to Brāhmaṇas at the auspicious time of the birth of his progeny 359.

356. Dharma-gup : (1) The protector of religion or righteousness (ŚR.) (2) The protector of kings—the protector of religion (VD.) (3) The Performer of his duty of protecting his devotees (VR.) (4) The observer of religion (VJ.)

357. Purvāha-vaśena—Repetition of the words ‘This is an auspicious day’ three times at the commencement of most of religious ceremonies. —ASDP (V.S. Apte : the Practical Sanskrit-English Dictionary, 1965).

358. This is technically known as Jātakarman.

359. ŚR. quotes here a smṛti text which states, “gifts given at the time of a male child and at the time called ‘Vyatiptā’ fruition in eternal good”. It further states that gods and Manes (Pitṛs) remain present at the time of the birth of a male child to twice-born, declaring that as an 15-16. Brāhmaṇas, pleased (as they were) with the modest king, spoke, “Oh chief among the descendants of Puru! When this pure scion of the Puru race was nearly brought to death by the unavoidable Fate, he was given to you by the mighty Viṣṇu out of his grace.”

17. He, therefore, will be widely known in the world as ‘Viṣṇurāta’. (There is) no doubt that he will be the most famous and the greatest devotee”.

Yudhīṣṭhira said:

18. Oh, the best amongst the venerable ones! Will he emulate his great-souled forefathers of holy reputation, the royal sages, in fame and good will (lit. expression of approbation)?

Brāhmaṇas said:

19. Oh son of Prthā (Yudhīṣṭhira), this (Viṣṇurāta alias Parīkṣit) will be the protector of subjects like Ikṣvāku, the son of Manu incarnate, friendly to Brāhmaṇas and true of word like Rāma, the son of Daśaratha.

20. This (Parīkṣit) will be munificent and protector (of the seekers of shelter) like Śibi, the king of Uśīnara, and a contributor to the glory of his relatives, the performers of sacrifices like Bharata, the son of Duṣyanta.

21. This (Viṣṇurāta will be) the foremost among the archers like both the Arjunas (viz. Arjuna, the Pāṇḍava and Arjuna son of Kṛta-viśva of Haihaya dynasty), unassailable like fire, unsurpassable (of unfathomable mind) like the sea.

22. He will be brave like the lion (lit. king of beasts), auspicious day (punyāha). ŚR. quotes another text which explains that there is no impurity on account of the birth of a child until the umbilical cord is cut. VD. endorses the above views by quoting from the Viśnudharma and Varāha. VB., GD. and others follow ŚR.

360. Śibi—He is said to have saved Agni (the god of fire) in the form of a dove from Indra in the form of a hawk, by offering his own flesh equal to the weight of the dove to be so released. When the dove went on increasing weight in the balance, Śibi offered his own body completely.

361. Bharata—a son of Duṣyanta and Śakuntalā; brought up in his childhood by Kaṇva; became a cakravarti after his father; performed 55 horse sacrifices on the banks of the Gāṇgā and the Yamunā; he subjugated Kirātas, Hūṇas, Yavanas, Andhras and all other Mlecchas. He was such a reputed emperor that India was named after him.
worthy of taking shelter just as the Himālayas (are worth inhabiting), forbearing like the earth and tolerant like parents.

23. (He would be) like the God Brahmā (or his grandfather Yudhiṣṭhira) in impartiality (or absence of hatred), like lord Śiva (the Lord of the Mountains) in graciousness, like the god Viṣṇu (the shelter of the goddess of wealth) in being the refuge of all beings.

24. This (Prince would be) equal to lord Kṛṣṇa in the eminence of virtues, generous like Rantideva and righteous like Yayāti.

25. (He will be) like Bali in courage; of (sincere) devotion like Prahlāda, performer of (many) horse-sacrifices, a worshipper of scholars.

26. This (Prince will be) the father of royal sages, the dispenser of punishment to persons going astray (taking to the

362. VC. adds that Parīkṣit was more forbearing than the earth, as the earth has not to suffer sharp, scathing words of the enemies, as he would have to do.

363. Rantideva—A pious and benevolent king of the Lunar race, sixth in descent from Bharata. He was enormously rich, very religious, charitable and performer of grand sacrifices. So many animals were sacrificed at his sacrifices and in his kitchen that a river of blood had issued from hides and was afterwards appropriately called Carmanvati (Chambal in Malwa region). (DHM 263, ASDP. 795.)

364. Yayāti—Son of Nāhuṣa of the Lunar race; had two wives, Devayānī, the daughter of Śukra the preceptor of the Asuras, and Śarmiṣṭhā, the Asura Princess daughter of Vṛṣaparva. From Devayānī was born Yadu and he founded the Yādava dynasty. Puru was his son from Śarmiṣṭhā. He bore the curse of Śukra and exchanged his youth to his father's decrepitude. Yayāti afterwards felt ashamed, returned the youth to Puru; made him a king and retired to forest. Puru was the founder of the Paurava dynasty. (DHM 376-77.)

365. Bali—A good and virtuous Dāitya king, son of Virocana and grandson of Prahlāda. Through his devotion and penance, he defeated gods and extended his authority over three worlds. Viṣṇu had to incarnate as a dwarf and beg from Bali a piece of land measuring three steps. When the boon was granted, Viṣṇu manifested his real form and stepped over heaven and earth in two strides. Bali was made to live in Pāṭāla, the lowest region of the world. (DHM 43.)

366. vṛddhānāṁ jñāna-vṛddhānāṁ paryupāsakaḥ sevakaḥ. The usual meaning is ‘servant of the old people’.
wrong path), the controller of Kali for the (preservation of) religion on the earth.

27. Having heard of his (prospective) death from Takṣaka commissioned by (the curse of) the sage's son, (Śṛṅgin, the son of Śamika), he, freeing himself from worldly attachments, will resort to the feet of Hari (in the holy assembly on the bank of the Ganges).³⁶⁷

28. This (prince) who after having enquired (and subsequently realized) the true nature of the Soul³⁶⁸ from the sage (Śuka), the son of Vyāsa, will certainly attain to the place, free from fear from any quarter (i.e. liberation).

29. After predicting to the king (the details of Parīkṣit's future life), all the Brāhmaṇas, expert in astrological calculations of nativity, getting (their due) worship (and offerings), returned to their respective homes.

³⁶⁷. Hareḥ padam—Gaṅgā- tira - sat - sabhām, tatra hi bhagavat- padam abhivyaktam/VB.
GD. endorses the same in different words.
³⁶⁸. jijñāsita-ātma-yāthātmya—
To understand the different interpretations of the commentators it is important to note that different schools of Vedānta hold different views regarding the relations between individual Soul (jīva) and God. Thus Madhva regards jīvas as parts of God but they are distinct from him, and the identity of the Brahman and the jīvas is only in a remote sense. According to Nimbārka, individual Souls (jīvas) are different from God and yet are similar to him: He regards jīvas as God's parts, but emphasizes the distinctness of the jīvas as well as their similarity to him. Rāmānuja thinks that God holds the jīvas within himself and by his will dominates all their functions, by expanding or contracting the nature of jīva's knowledge. Vallabha holds that the jīvas, being parts of God, are one with Him. They appear as jīvas through his function as āvīrtha and tirobhava, by which certain powers and qualities that exist in God are obscured or manifested in the jīva.

Like ŚR. given above, VC states:

jijñāsitam vicāritam ātmano yāthārthyang vāstavam tattvam yena /
(i) who has enquired of and got the decisive (accurate) knowledge about the real nature of the individual Soul and the Supreme Soul—VR.
(ii) One who has enquired of and got a clear decision by 'Thus-thus-ness' (idamithkatayā) of the real nature of the identity of the individual Spirit (jīva) and God—VB.
30. As the king, meditating him (supreme lord) whom he saw in the embryo, (will) examine (look for him) (for discovering him) in the men here, he will come to be known as Parikśit in this world.

31. The (well-known) prince who was daily being fed by his grand-fathers (on 64 objects of enjoyment) quickly thrived like the moon which grows in size by its digits, during the bright half of the month.

32. The king, wishing to expiate the sin for injury to (and killing of his) relatives, by performing a horse-sacrifice, and being short of funds for the same, pondered over the ways (to procure money) by means other than levying (new tax and inflicting fines).

33. Guessing his (Yudhiṣṭhira's) desire, and being directed by Lord Kṛṣṇa, the four brothers brought immense riches left (buried) in the northern quarters.

34. Having procured the requirements of sacrifice, Yudhiṣṭhira, the son of Dharma, afraid of sin, worshipped Hari by performing three horse-sacrifices.

35. The Lord who was invited by the king (Yudhiṣṭhira) made him (the king) to perform the sacrifice by the Brāhmaṇas and stayed for some months with a desire to render services to his friends.

36. Oh Brāhmaṇa (Śaunaka), then, after taking leave of king (Yudhiṣṭhira), his brothers and Draupadī (Kṛṣṇa), surrounded by Yādavas and accompanied by Arjuna went to Dvārakā (Dvārakā).

369. This refers to the treasures of king Marutta left over by him after performing his sacrifices. This Marutta was the son of Āvikṣit and father of Dama. His sacrifices were of high order. He was a great friend of Indra. (Pl. I. 649)
CHAPTER THIRTEEN

(Discourse of Nārada)

1. Having learnt the knowledge of the Soul\textsuperscript{370} from Maitreya\textsuperscript{371} during the course of his (Vidura’s) pilgrimage, Vidura\textsuperscript{372} returned to Hastināpura as his desire for knowledge was satisfied.

2. While Vidura (Kṣattā) asked a number of questions to Maitreya (Kauśārava), he certainly\textsuperscript{373} desisted from them when complete, whole-minded devotion for Govinda (Kṛṣṇa) was generated in him.

3. Oh Brāhmaṇa! finding his relative arrive, Yudhiṣṭhira along with his younger brothers, Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Yuyutsu\textsuperscript{374}, Sañjaya, Kṛpa, Kuntī, 370. ātmānagatim—(i) The Lord Hari, (who is the highest goal of achievement)—ŚR.

(ii) Knowledge about the real nature of Śrī Kṛṣṇa—VD.
(iii) Devotion to Hari—JG., VD.
(iv) Knowledge about the Supreme Spirit—VR., VJ.
(v) Knowledge about heaven, hell etc. to which the individual soul goes (after death)—VJ.
(vi) The diversions or the workings of the Lord (Kṛṣṇa), the (Supreme) Soul—VB.

371. Maitreya—Also Kauśārava, a siddha who under instructions from Kṛṣṇa explained the science of the Supreme Soul (ātmavidyā) to Vidura. The conversation between Vidura and Maitreya is given in BH. P. Skandha III and IV. (P.I. 2. 739-40.)

372. Vidura—A son of Vyāsa by a maid-servant. She was sent by Ambikā, the widowed queen of Vicitravirya, to Vyāsa when she (the queen) was pressed by her mother-in-law Satyavatī to submit to Vyāsa. Vidura is called a kṣattī (vide the next verse) which is normally applied to a child born of a Śūdra man and Kṣatriya woman (ASDP. 384). He was however treated as a step-brother of Dhṛtarāṣṭra. He was well disposed to Pāṇḍavas and warned them of the evil designs of Duryodhana. According to MBH., Vidura left Hastināpura finally along with Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Gāndhārī for penance. He then went away to perform austere penance alone in the forest. When Yudhiṣṭhira contacted him in a lonely place, Vidura, by his Yogic power, gave up his body and entered the person of Yudhiṣṭhira (MBH. Āśrama 26.20.33).—MNK. 309-12.

373. ha—This particle shows ‘complete satisfaction’—VJ.
374. Yuyutsu—Dhṛtarāṣṭra’s son from of a Vaiśya woman. He was a partisan of Pāṇḍavas.
4. Gāndhārī, Draupādi, Subhadrā, Uttarā, Kṛṣṇi, women of Pāṇḍu’s clan and other women, along with their children,
5. advanced to receive him with great joy, like the body animated by the re-entry of life in it. Having formally received him by duly embracing and saluting Vidura,
6. they who were distressed with anxious sorrow caused by separation from him, shed tears of affection. The king paid respects to Vidura when he occupied his seat.
7. When Vidura enjoyed his food, was relieved of fatigue and was seated comfortably in his seat, the king bowed him respectfully and asked him in the presence of his relatives who were listening.

Tudhiṣṭhira said:

8. “Do you remember us who grew up under the shadow of your wings (i.e. protection due to your partiality to us), who were saved along with our mother from a number of calamities like (the administration of) poison, (setting on) fire (the house of lac) and others.
9. In what way was your maintenance376 (livelihood) carried on while you were travelling over the globe? What places of pilgrimage and important sacred places on this earth377 were visited (lit. served) by you?
10. Oh self-controlled one (Vidura)! Devotees of the Lord (Viṣṇu) like you are themselves tīrthas (sacred places) incarnate. With the Holder of the Mace (God Viṣṇu) residing in the hearts, they sanctify the places of pilgrimage (and restore their original holiness by removing the sins of other persons accumulated in them).

375. Kṛṣṇi—Drona’s wife, sister of Kṛpa, Aśvatthāman’s mother.
376. VB. explains that here the genitive case (vaḥ) is used. as Vidura was unattached and actively disinterested in his life. Hence the instrumental case is not used. V.J. states that Yudhiṣṭhira wanted to know whether Vidura observed vows like eating once a day etc. during his pilgrimage.
377. The distinction between Tīrtha and Kṣetra is as follows: Tīrthas are generally connected with water like sanctified rivers as the Ganges, lakes, like Puṣkara, Mānasā etc. Kṣetra is originally a limited sacred tract of land e.g. Kurukṣetra, Jagannātha Puri. Later on, they came to mean ‘holy places’ in general.
11. Oh father (uncle), have you visited our well-wishers and relatives whose god is Kṛṣṇa? Or have you heard that the Yādavas are living happily in their own city (Dvārakā)?”

12. Vidura, who was thus addressed by Dharmarāja (Yudhiṣṭhira), described fully everything that was experienced by him, in a serial order except the destruction of the Yadu-clan.

13. The compassionate (Vidura being) unable to see distressed persons, did not, of course, report the disagreeable (destruction of the Yādava clan) which (though) took place of itself, was very unbearable to men.

14. Then being received like a god, (Vidura) teaching philosophy (lit. giving instructions on truth) to his elder brother, and securing the love of all, stayed happily for some time, in the city of Hastināpura.

15. While Yama bore the curse of (living) the life of a Śūdra for a hundred years, Aryaman (the 2nd Sun out of the twelve Suns) dispensed punishment to the sinners according to their (respective) sins.

16. With kingdom restored to him and with great royal splendour, Yudhiṣṭhira, having seen his grandson, the maintainer of his family, was happy with his brothers (who were) like the guardians of the quarters (of the world).

17. In this way, unendurable Time of the negligent (blundering people) attached to households (domestic

378. The sage Māṇḍavya was wrongly sentenced to be impaled as he was mistakenly arrested along with the thieves. When the king came to know of the truth, he went to the sage Māṇḍavya, got him down from the stake of impalement and sincerely apologised. Māṇḍavya went to Yama and demanded of him the reason of impalement despite his innocence. Yama explained to him that it was due to his transfixion of an insect during his childhood. He cursed Yama to be born as a Śūdra for giving him such a disproportionately heavy retributory punishment for a comparatively light offence committed during infancy, due to ignorance.

379. JG., VC., VD. exempt Pāṇḍavas from this category, as according to BH. P. 1.12.6 Yudhiṣṭhira (and others) were unattached to enjoyment due to their devotion to Kṛṣṇa. JG. specifically states that Vidura gave the advice only to Yudhiṣṭhira and not to Pāṇḍavas. VR. states that the time or period ordained for worldly enjoyment of Pāṇḍavas had passed.
affairs) passed away imperceptibly, due to their desire (of enjoyment) of such pleasures.

18. Noticing the indications of the Time, Vidura spoke to Dhṛtarāṣṭra, "Oh king! look at the fear (-ful period); let your departure be quick.

19. Oh king, the mighty Time against which no defence can ever be made from any quarter in this world, has now arrived for us all.

20. And overpowered by whom, these people are instantly deprived of their dearest life—what of other things like wealth etc.

21. Your father (i.e. uncle Bhīṣma), brothers, friends and sons are killed. Youth has departed. Your body is overpowered by old age. Still you take shelter in the house of the enemy.

22. Oh! How wonderfully strong is the desire of a living being, for life, on account of which Your Honour accepts like a domestic dog, a lump of food scornfully given to you by Bhima.

23. What value is to that life spared by them (Pāṇḍavas) who were put to fire, were administered poison and whose wife was insulted by you and whose lands, wealth and kingdom were also taken away (deprived by) you.

24. This body of a miserly man like you who wishes to live, becomes old by old age even though you do not wish it, like (the withering away of) your under and upper garments.380

25.* Certainly that person is called wise who being free from attachment to worldly objects and released from the bondage (of pride or ego) and departing in a mysterious way, leaves this body, free from (the desire of) glory etc.

380. VJ., VG. and VD. explain that the upper and inner garments signify gross and subtle bodies. Wrinkles, baldness mark the oldness of the gross body and blindness, deafness etc. of the subtle body.

*VR. interprets as follows:
A person who being desireless (about his body etc.), free from the worldly bondages (of merits and sins), whose passing away is not known (to his relatives), quits this body from which objectives of worldly life (purusārthas) are expected, is called a Ṭaṅgi

VJ. gives a different interpretation, which may be summarised as follows:
26. He is the best of men in whom indifference to the world (worldly objects) is generated either from within or due to the advice of others and who has subdued his mind and who, with Hari in his heart, goes out of home as a recluse.

27. Let Your Honour proceed to the northern direction without the knowledge of your relatives. Mostly the coming period is destructive to the qualities of men.

28. In this way, the king of the Ajamiḍha family, whose intellect was his sight (i.e. who was physically blind) and who was thus enlightened by his younger brother Vidura, firmly cut as under his bond of affection to his relatives and proceeded as per way directed by his brother.

29. The virtuous daughter of Subala ever devoted to her husband, followed him to the Himālayas, (which is) a great delight of the recluses just as fighting (lit. hard blows in fight) is (enjoyable) to warriors.

30. When Yudhiṣṭhira (lit. the adversaryless king, enemy of none) after performing Sandhyā (prayer to the Sun) and offering oblations to fire, and having bowed to Brāhmaṇas by giving sesame seeds, cows, land and gold, entered the house (palace of Dhṛtarāṣṭra) for paying respects to the elders, he did not find his uncles and Gāndhārī (the daughter of Subala).

A person, free from the (pride of his) body, the object of which is the achievement of happiness here and hereafter and thereby liberated from the bonds (of love for one’s wife and others) and whose movements (i.e. departure to forest etc.) are not known, is called wise and should by penance make his body fulfil its objective (viz. liberation).

381. VB. is strongly against even spiritual suicide. One should know the Lord, concentrate on him in his heart, give up the idea of quitting his body. He should continue to recite mentally the most valuable name of God and leave his house as it would come in his way of spiritual progress.

382. Ajamiḍha—A son of Hastin. Had three queens of Kuru line. One branch of his descendants, e.g. Priyamedha and others became Brāhmaṇas while another branch, e.g. Brāhadiṣu and others, was Kṣattriya —BPK 6, PI. 1.30.

383. Subala—King of Gāndhāra; father of Gāndhārī, Dhṛtarāṣṭra’s queen.

384. v.l. sat-samprahāraḥ: Just as a severe battle in which hard blows are given, is liked by the brave, the Himālayas though cold and full of hardships (due to its mountaneous nature) are liked by ascetics.
31. Agitated in mind, he asked Sañjaya who was sitting there, "Oh son of Gavalgaṇa, (Sañjaya) where is our father (uncle) who is stricken with age and blind in eyes?

32. Oh friend! Where has Mother (Gândhārī) distressed due to the killing of her sons, gone (along with) friendly uncle (Vidura)? Has he (Dhṛtarāṣṭra), being aggrieved at the killing of his relatives and afraid of me (as) the guilty ignorant (person), thrown himself in the Gaṅgā along with his wife?

33. Where have uncles who have protected all of us from dangers (difficulties) after the demise of our father Pāṇḍu, gone from this place?

Sūta said:

34. Not finding his master (Dhṛtarāṣṭra), the Sūta (Sañjaya) who, out of compassion and bewilderment due to his affection (for Dhṛtarāṣṭra), grew extremely distressed and emaciated, did not reply (for some time).

35. Wiping out tears by (his) hands and mustering courage (within himself), and remembering the feet of his master, he replied to Yudhiṣṭhira.

Sañjaya said:

36. 'Oh, son of a high family! I do not know the decisions (regarding the course of actions) of your uncles or that of Gândhārī. Oh long-armed one, I am bereaved of the great-souled ones.'

386. ądamsamānah śamalam—Various conjectures are given by the commentators in explaining these words. For example:

(i) Yudhiṣṭhira has not spared a single son. What is the propriety of living now? — VC.

(ii) Yudhiṣṭhira has killed his brothers, usurped their kingdom and expelled me. Has he not become so evil-minded? — VJ.

(iii) 'Let the sin of my death also be visited on his head'. With this desire Dhṛtarāṣṭra threw himself in the Ganges. — JG.

It can also be translated: "apprehensive of an offense from me, a dull-witted person."
37. At that time (there) arrived the great sage Nārada along with Tumburu. He (Yudhiṣṭhira) along with his younger brothers, rose up, saluted them, received them in a way, and asked.

Yudhiṣṭhira said:

38. "Oh revered (sage), I do not know the movements of my uncles. Where have they gone from here? Or where has the poor mother afflicted with the killing of her sons, gone?

39. Oh illustrious one, you are like a helmsman who shows the coast beyond, in this boundless ocean (of worldly existence)."

Thereupon the great Nārada, the best of the sages, replied.

40. "Oh king, do not grieve for anybody as the whole world is under the control of the Almighty, the Controller (of the universe) whom all worlds along with their guardian deities worship, and who unites or separates the beings.

41. Just as bullocks with noses bored through with strings are bound in a row to a rope (carry the load of the master), persons bound by different designations to the big cord in the from of the Veda, carry out the orders of (or perform the worship of) the controller of the universe.

42. Just as assembling and removal of articles of game are done according to the sweet will of the player, so is the union and separation of human beings (brought about) by the will of the Almighty.

43. Even if you consider the world as eternal or non-eternal or both, or neither (eternal and non-eternal) it does not behove you at all to lament for them (relatives) unless it be out of affection, a manifestation of delusion.

387. Tumburu—A Gandharva disciple of Nārada, expert in divine music; accompanied Nārada at the time of this visit to Yudhiṣṭhira and returned with him to heaven. Sang the praise of Kṛṣṇa when he held the Govardhana. His two daughters Manovati and Sukeśā reside in the Sun's chariot in the months of Caitra and Madhu. —PI. 2.29

388. Though no words in the text of this verse support this these words are added in this translation on the authority of eminent commentators like ŚR., VJ., SD., GD.

389. Designations such as Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya or of stages in life, e.g. Brahmacārīn, Gṛhastrā.
44. Therefore, dear sir, give up this grief caused by ignorance of your mind, (thinking) ‘How will they who are without protection and in a miserable condition, live without my protection?’

45. This body is composed of five elements and is subject to the (influence of) Time and (effects of) actions and attributes. How can (a person) save another, like one being swallowed by a serpent (is unable to save) others?

46. The handleless (animals) are the means of sustenance (of life) to the beings possessed of hands (viz. human beings); the footless (i.e. grass) (is so) to the quadrupeds; the inferior are (the food) of the superior; (thus all less powerful) beings are the means of sustaining life to (all other more powerful) beings.

47. Oh king, this (universe) is, therefore, the self manifesting glorious Lord (himself). He is one, the soul of Souls. He shines (manifests) internally and externally (both as enjoyer and the objects of enjoyment). Look, He is manifold (in form) due to Māyā.

48. Oh great king, the Supreme Lord, the creator of beings, has today come down on this earth as the Destroyer for exterminating the enemies of Gods.

49. The work to be done for Gods is (practically) completed, (only some) balance is expected to be completed. You wait for some time, till the God (Lord Kṛṣṇa) is here (on this earth).

50. Dhṛtarāṣṭra, accompanied by his consort Gāndhāri and (his) brother (Vidura) has gone to the hermitage of sages, by the southern side of the Himālayas.

51. (The hermitage) is called Saptasrotas (the shrine of seven streams) as verily the divine Ganges with her seven currents branches itself off into seven separate streams for the satisfaction of the seven sages.

52. Taking bath three times a day (as per twilights),

390. I have mainly followed ŚR. in this literal interpretation, though as usual commentators of non-Śaṅkara Schools stress their viewpoints as ‘tātparyārtha’.

391. The usual list of seven sages is Marici, Atri, Āṅgiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu and Vasiṣṭha.
and offering libations to the fire according to the prescribed religious rules, he who lives on water only, stays with a quiet Soul, free from earthly desires.

53. With mastery over (logic) posture and control over breath and restraint of six organs [five sense organs + mind, the internal organ], he (Dhṛtarāṣṭra) has washed off (lit. shattered) the dirt of the three attributes (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas) by his concentration on Hari (Lord Kṛṣṇa).

54. Having withdrawn mind (ātman associated with Ego-ahamkāra —) from the gross body and merged it with intelligence (buddhi or Vijñānātmā) and that with Soul (kṣetrajñā) and the Soul with Brahman, the basis of all, just as the Vacuum (space) within a jar merges in the bigger Space.

55. One who has destroyed the resultant of the attributes of the Illusion (māyā) and restrained mind (the essence i.e. controller of the mind) and one who has abstained from eating altogether, he (Dhṛtarāṣṭra) sits motionless like a pillar. You should not become an obstacle to him who has given up all actions.

56. He will verily give up his own mortal frame on the fifth day from today and it will be reduced to ashes.

57. When the body of the husband (Dhṛtarāṣṭra) will be burnt by fires along with the hut (hermitage), the virtuous wife (Gāndhāri) standing outside will enter that very fire.

58. Oh son of the Kuru family, having seen that miracle, Vidura with a mixed feeling of joy (at Dhṛtarāṣṭra’s liberation) and sorrow (for his brother’s demise) will go on a pilgrimage to sacred places."

59. Having told this, Nārada, along with Tumburu, ascended to heaven. Yudhīśṭhira, bearing his words in mind, gave up sorrow.
CHAPTER FOURTEEN

(Conjectures of Yudhiṣṭhira)

Sūta said:

1-2. When Arjuna (lit. the victorious) left for Dvārakā to see the relatives and to know the actions (and intentions) of Kṛṣṇa of holy reputation, several months elapsed, but Arjuna did not return. Then Yudhiṣṭhira (the foremost of the Kurus) saw omens of terrific nature.

3-5. (He observed):

The terrible state of Time in which the nature of the seasons was reversed, more sinful behaviour of people full of wrath, avarice, falsehood, crooked ways of the world, friendship mixed with dishonesty (fraud), quarrels among father, mother, friends, brothers and between husband and wife, advent of evil time, extremely dreadful unlucky portents, nature of the people characterised by avarice, (so) the king spoke to his younger brother (Bhima).

Yudhiṣṭhira said:

6. Arjuna (the Victorious) has been sent to Dvārakā with a desire to see our kinsmen and to know the deeds of Kṛṣṇa of auspicious glory.

7. Oh Bhīmasena, seven months are now over, but your younger brother (Arjuna) has not returned, nor do I really understand its reason.

8. Has the period predicted by the divine sage (Nārada) arrived now when the Lord desires to quit his body, which is his instrument to play his part as man?

9. From whom (i.e. through the grace of Kṛṣṇa we got) wealth, kingdom, wife, life, family and subjects. Due to whose (Kṛṣṇa's) favour we (achieved) victory over the enemies and the world.

352. ātmano... ut-sisṛkpoti—
(i) When he desires to leave the earth (which is his body), the arena of his sports—VJ.
(ii) When he wishes to return his portion of Divinity to Vaikuṇṭha i.e. give up his mortal frame—VC.
10. Oh tiger-like man (Bhīma), look at the terribly ominous portents pertaining to the heaven, the earth and my body forboding calamity befalling (deluding) our intellect in near future.

11. Oh Bhīma, my (left) thigh, eye and arm are now and then throbbing. And tremblings in the heart portend evil happenings in near future. [These evil omens will bring evil unto me in near future.]

12. This female jackal vomiting fire, howls (wailingly) at the rising sun. Oh Bhīma, this dog wails at me without any fear.

13. Auspicious beasts go by my left, while others (like donkeys etc.) pass me by the right side. Oh tiger among men (Bhīma), I perceive that my horses are weeping.

14. This pigeon is the messenger of death. The owl which causes my mind to tremble and the crow, both sleepless (throughout the night) desire (as it were) to annihilate (the universe) by their ominous cries.

15. The quarters (of the world are) foggy; misty halos appear round the moon and the Sun\textsuperscript{393}, the earth along with the mountains is quaking; there fell a bolt from the blue along with the thundering of the clouds.

16. The rough wind blows darkening (the world) with the dust; the clouds are showering nauseating blood all around.

17. Look, the Sun is dim (lit. bereft of its splendour); there is a mutual clash of the planets in the sky. The heaven and the earth are as if ablaze with crowds of evil spirits\textsuperscript{394}.

18. Rivers, big and small, lakes and minds as well are agitated. The fire does not burn with ghee. (I cannot comprehend) what (calamity) this period would bring.

19. The babies (or calves) are not sucking (their mothers') breasts (or udders of cows—in the case of calves). The mothers are not yielding milk. In the cow sheds the cows weep with tearful faces and the bulls are not joyous.

\textsuperscript{393} I followed ASDP on \textit{paridhaya} but ŚR. differs. He explains, "As the halo of light encircles the fire, the misty quarters have covered the world."

\textsuperscript{394} 'The followers of Rudra mixed with other beings'—ŚR.
20. Idols of Gods are as if weeping, perspiring and moving. What calamity to these charmless, cheerless countries, towns, villages, gardens, mines and hermitages indicates to us?

21. On account of these portentous phenomena boding great calamities, I guess that the earth, being deprived of the Lord’s feet the beauty of which is unique (lit. not found in any other person), has become luckless (now).”

22. In this way, Oh Brähmaṇa, while the king was thinking with his mind which anticipated the befalling calamities, Arjuna (lit. the warrior with the monkey at the banner of his chariot) returned from Dvārakā (the capital city of the Yadus).

23-24. Seeing Arjuna, pale, feeble, shedding tears from his lotus-like eyes, with his head hung down, lying prostrate at his feet in an unusual manner, the king remembering the words of Nārada in the presence of his friends, spoke with a distressed heart.

Yudhiṣṭhira said:

25. Are our kinsmen Madhu, Bhoja, Daśārha, Arha, Sātvata, Andhaka and Vṛṣṇi living happily in Dvārakā (Ānartapuri)?

26. Or is our venerable maternal grandfather—Śūrasena hale and hearty? Is the maternal uncle Anaka-dundubhi (Vasudeva) along with his younger brothers, well?

27. Are his wives, our aunts, the seven sisters of whom Devaki is the chief, happy themselves, along with their sons and daughters-in-law?

28-29. Is the son-less (or whose son Kaṃsa was wicked) king Āhuka (Ugrasena) and his younger brother (Devaka) alive? Are Hṛdika along with his son (Kṛtavarma), Akura, Jayanta, Gada and Sāraṇa (brothers of Kṛṣṇa) and others like Śatrujit doing well? Is Lord Balarāma, the head of the Sātvata clan in happiness?

30-31. Is Pradyumna, a great warrior among the

395. Vasudeva is so called as Gods beat the drums at the time of his birth as Lord Viṣṇu was to be incarnated as a son to him.

396. mahāratha is thus defined:

eko daśa-sāhasrāṇi yodhayed yastu dhanvinām / Šastra-śastra-pravīṇaś ca viññeyah sa mahārathaḥ /
Vṛṣṇis, well? Are glorious Aniruddha, of terrific speed (in fighting), Suṣena (Kṛṣṇa’s son), Cārudeśa, Samba, the son of Jāmbavatī, and other prominent sons of Kṛṣṇa like Vṛṣabhā along with their sons going on well (lit. living happily)?

32. Similarly, are Kṛṣṇa’s followers such as Śrutadeva, Uddhava and others, and other prominent Yādavas like Sunanda, Nanda, Śīrṣaṇya,

33. and all (others) depending on the power of arms of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa hale and hearty? Do the Yādavas our firm allies and friends, think of our well-being?

34. Is lord Govinda (Kṛṣṇa) who is the friend and well-wisher of the Brāhmaṇas and affectionate to his devotees, at ease in the company of his friends in his assembly-hall called Sudharmā? in the city (of Dvārakā)?

35. The Primeval Man, the friend of Ananta (Balarāma) lives in the ocean of the Yadu clan for the welfare, protection and prosperity of the people.

36. In their own city (Dvārakā), protected by whose (Kṛṣṇa’s) arms, the Yādavas (who are) honoured (by the citizens) sport in delight (or pass their time in great happiness) like the followers of Viśṇu (the Lord of Vaikuṇṭha).

37. By defeating gods in a battle by their pre-eminent act of serving whose (Kṛṣṇa’s) feet, sixteen thousand ladies of whom Satyabhāma was the first, took away (for their enjoyment) blessed objects (e.g. the Pārijāta tree) worthy of Indrāṇi.

38. Yādavas, the great warriors, dependent on the success of whose (Kṛṣṇa’s) arms and free from fear from any quarter, often tread on (and occupy seats in) the assembly-hall called Sudharmā, proper for the greatest among the gods, which (i.e. the assembly hall) they (the Yādavas) brought down (on the earth) by force.

A warrior skilled in the use of arm and the military science, who can engage ten thousand warriors simultaneously is called Mahāratha.

397. Sudharmā: The assembly-hall of Indra in heaven. At Kṛṣṇa’s behest, Indra sent it to Ugrasena for the use of Yādavas. After Kṛṣṇa’s death, it returned to Indra’s heaven.—DHM 306.

398. Mahā-pauruṣikā: (i) followers of Viśṇu—(SR, VC, SD, GD).
(ii) Yākṣas (a tribe of demigods, followers of Kubera)—VR., VJ.
(iii) Possessed of great manly vigour—(VB.)
399. According to SR verses 34 to 38 form one group.
39. Dear brother⁴⁰⁰, you appear to me pale (lit. one who has lost his lustre). Are you hale and hearty? Or did you, who stayed there over-long, not receive due respect and were insulted?

40. (I presume that) you were not hit at (treated) with harsh, bitter (lit. affection-less) words etc. Or have you not kept your word to suppliants after promising them (and thus creating hopes in them)?

41. Have you, the giver of protection, abandoned (i.e. refused to extend protection to) a Brāhmaṇa, a child, a cow, an old man, a diseased person, a woman or other being who sought your shelter?

42. Have you visited (i.e had an illicit intercourse with) a woman not deserving to be approached or a woman worth going but dressed in dirty clothes (i.e during her menses)? Or were you discomfited on the way by your equals (lit. non-superiors) or inferiors?

43. Have you taken your meals leaving behind (hungry) children and old men deserving to be fed? Have you committed some censurable act unworthy of you?

44. Are you always brooding; "I am now a non-entity⁴⁰¹ (as I am) permanently bereaved of the most beloved, intimate friend and personal relative (Krṣṇa)?" Otherwise there is no explanation of your (mental) affliction.

⁴⁰⁰. tāta A term of affection, endearment or pity, applied to any person, but usually to inferiors, juniors, pupils, children etc.—ASDP 471 (1965 Edn.)

⁴⁰¹. Šūnaya— (1) Void—SR.
(2) Dejected, void of joy—VR., SD.
(3) Inauspicious, unlucky—VJ.
(4) Life-less (GD).
CHAPTER FIFTEEN

(Ascent of the Pāṇḍavas to Heaven)

Sūta said:

1-2. In this way Arjuna, the friend of Kṛṣṇa, emaciated due to separation from Kṛṣṇa, and whose form became the ground for different suspicions and conjectures by his brother, the king (Yudhiṣṭhira) [and] whose lotus-like face and heart were dried up due to affliction, and who had lost his complexion, was not able to reply as he was brooding over the same powerful (Kṛṣṇa),

3. Controlling (his tears of grief) with great difficulty and wiping out his eyes by his hands, and being nervous on account of increased affection and eagerness due to his (Kṛṣṇa’s) disappearance,

4. Remembering companionship, obligations and friendliness in Kṛṣṇa’s charioteership, Arjuna spoke to his elder brother, the king, in a voice suffocated with tears.

Arjuna said:

5. Oh great king, I have been deceived by Hari who assumed the form of my kinsman and deprived me of my great lustre, the wonder of gods.

6. I have been undone (now) by that Supreme Man. By separation from whom (him), even for a moment, the world becomes unpleasant (ugly) to look at, just as this (father etc) is spoken of as ‘dead’ when it is bereaved of the vital spirit;

7. By whose (Kṛṣṇa’s) power the prowess of kings who, being infatuated with passion, assembled for suyānuvara (self-election of a husband by the bride) at the palace of Drupada, was surpassed by me (by merely taking up the bow) and the fish was hit (by me) with the equipped bow and won Draupadī.404

402. Verses 6-13 form one group and the word yasya (whose) is connected with tendhamadhyamūṣṭaḥ in verse 13.—ŚR.
403. śaṁ—The body (VJ.)
404. This refers to Draupadī - suyānuvara in which Arjuna fulfilled the condition precedent for winning Draupadī as bride.
8. Ah! In whose (Kṛṣṇa's) presence I quickly defeated Indra along with gods and donated the Khāṇḍava forest to the Fire-god; and got constructed by Maya the assembly-hall, an illusive marvel of architecture, (lit. the illusion in the form of wonderful architecture) and kings from (distant) quarters offered tributes at the time of your (Rājasūya) sacrifice.

9. By whose prowess (my) elder (and) your younger brother possessing the power and energy of ten thousand elephants killed for the (performance of the Rājasūya) sacrifice (Jarāsandha) who had placed his foot on the heads of kings. As the kings who were captured (by Jarāsandha) for the sacrifice to the lord of goblins (Mahābhairava) were liberated by him (Bhima), they brought tributes for your (Rājasūya) sacrifice.

10. Who, by killing their husbands, made the wives of those deceitful gamblers to loosen their hair—the gamblers (by whom) in the assembly-hall, were scattered and seized the beautiful braided hair of your wife which were the most praiseworthy due to the great consecration at the (Rājasūya) sacrifice and from whose (your wife's) face fell tears on the feet when she bowed (to Kṛṣṇa who appeared there in that assembly hall of the gamblers).

11. Who, by coming to the forest and eating the remnant (crumb) of a vegetable preparation, protected us from an unsurmountable calamity (viz. the curse of the sage Durvāsas) engineered by the enemy (Duryodhana) through Durvāsas who wanted to dine at the head of ten thousand (disciples), but whereby (i.e. due to Kṛṣṇa's eating the vegetable) the whole group of sages who were immersed in water, felt the three worlds as satiated (and did not feel hungry).

12. By whose prowess, Lord Śiva along with Pārvatī was made to surprise in the fight (I put with him) and gave me his missile (Pāśupata). Others (viz. guardians of the quarters of the world) also did the same. And I, in this very physical body, reached the palace of the great Indra (at Amarāvatī in heaven) and shared half the seat of the great (god) *

13. While I was staying there, for the destruction of the enemies, the gods along with Indra took shelter of the pair of my arms characterised by the Gāṇḍivā bow. Oh descendant of Ajamīḍha, the exploits were performed (by me by his prowess) ⁴¹⁰.

14. By whose friendship I succeeded with my chariot, in crossing over the limitless ocean in the form of the Kuru army consisting of (warriors gifted with) irresistible power. I have captured the wealth of the enemies and snatched away the highly effulgent jewelled diadems from their heads.

15. Oh Lord, he moved ahead of me (as a charioteer) in the armies of Bhīṣma, Karna, the preceptor (Drôṇa) and Śalya, which were adorned with multitudes of chariots of powerful, great Kṣatriyas, (he), by the glance of his eyes deprived the generals of their duration of life, minds (i.e. powers like energy etc.), strength and skills in firing missiles.

⁴⁰⁹. This refers to MBH. Vana. 263 in which it is described how Duryodhana sent Durrvāsas with his ten thousand disciples to Yudhiṣṭhira in the forest at an odd hour. But Kṛṣṇa appeared at the hermitage of Pāṇḍavas and asked them to give him something to eat. He ate a small remanent of vegetable and identifying himself with three worlds expressed appeasement of hunger of all beings in the universe. The sages automatically felt satisfied and left the place refusing the invitation of Yudhiṣṭhira.

*Vide MBH. Vana. 39. 32-64, Vana. Chs. 40, 41, 42, 43.

⁴¹⁰. The clause: “I am today robbed (undone) by the Supreme Man”, is to be connected with the next three verses (14, 15, 16) as well. The word bhūmnā is interpreted differently as follows:

(1) Who is present in His own greatness (nijamahimā-arasthānena -ŚR.).

(2) Supreme Man (parama-puruṣa —VR.)

(3) The greatest of all (sarva-mahattama —JG.)

(4) The superman whose form consists of limitless joy —VJ.

(5) VG. treats it adverbially as 'I am thoroughly or extremely cheated.'

(6) paripūrṇatamena puruṣena —GD.
16. Just as the missiles of Asuras hurled at Prahlāda did not hurt (him, similarly), the missiles aimed at me by the preceptor (Droṇa), Bhīṣma, Karṇa, Aśvatthāmaṇ (the son of Droṇa), Suśarmā, Śalya, Jayadratha (the king of Sindhu), Bālhiṅka and others did not injure me (as I was) dependant on the (power of) his (Kṛṣṇa's) arms.

17. The controller (of the universe), the giver of strength was employed as a charioteer by me, a vicious-minded fellow (though) His lotus-like feet are resorted to by the excellent persons for Liberation (from the cycle of births and deaths), and (overpowered) by whose prowess, (my) enemies, seated in chariots became vacant-minded and did not assail me while I was standing on the ground due to the exhaustion of the horses of my chariot, on the day of killing of Jayadratha.

18. Oh king, Mādhava's jokes graced with his dignified sweet smile and his heart-touching words such as 'Oh son of Prthū', 'Oh Arjuna', 'Oh friend', 'Oh descendant of the Kuru family', break my heart when recollected.

19. Due to my association with him in all activities such as sleeping, sitting, wandering, prattling (or boasting)

411. Suśarmā, son of Vṛddhakṛṣṇa, the king of Trigarta (identified with Jalandhar Doab and Kangra by General Cunningham) was a sworn enemy of Pāṇḍavas; accompanied Dūryodhana in his attempts to carry away Virāṭa's cattle; he along with his brothers collectively known as Sahāsaptaka joined the side of Kauravas in the Bhārata war and was killed by Arjuna—MN, p. 393; PCK 398-99.

412. Jayadratha—King of Sindhu - Sauvira; married Dūryodhana's sister Duḥśilā; attempted to carry away Draupadi; was killed by Arjuna on the 14th day of the Bhārata war.

413. Bālhiṅka—Son of Pratiṣṭha, younger brother of Śantanu. He was the king of Bālhiṅkas now identified as the people of Balkh.

414. ātivada—(i) the giver of strength (balada)—VR, VJ, VD.
   (ii) One who offers Himself to His devotees—GD.

415. This refers to the episode when Arjuna who wanted to fulfill his vow of killing Jayadratha before the sunset, found his horses fatigued, got down from the chariot, created a pond of water by shooting an arrow on the ground, and fought single-handed with the enemies, while Kṛṣṇa took care of the wounded, tired steeds. —For details vide MBH. Droṇa.99. 35-63.

416. luḥanti—as it were rolling in the heart, do not go out of my heart—VJ.
and eating, he was taunted by me, 'Oh friend, you are really a speaker of the truth'. He tolerated all my faults (like this), just as a friend forgives the comments of a friend or the father, or (the Prattling of) the child.

20. Oh great king! I, being vacant-minded due to the bercavement of my dear friend, the Supreme Man, was defeated like a woman by the wretched cowherds on the way while I was protecting the wives of Kṛṣṇa.

21. The same was the bow; the arrows; the chariot and the steeds were the same; I am the same warrior to whom kings pay every respect. But when devoid of the Lord (Lord's power), in a moment, everything became unreal like oblation offered to ashes (instead of to the fire), gifts of a juggler (or 'donations given to an undeserving Brāhmaṇa'). or seed sown in barren ground.

22-23. Oh king, in our friend's capital (Dvārakā) (out of) our friends about whom you have enquired, only four or five have remained alive—our friends who, being overwhelmed by the curse of Brāhmaṇas and with minds excited with intoxication by drinking the wine (prepared from the wild rice), slew each other with clenched fists (full of erakā grass) as if (they were) unacquainted with each other.

24. It is definitely due to the design of the great Providence that creatures protect (procreate) or destroy each other.

25-26. Oh king, just as, in water, big aquatic animals swallow smaller ones, the powerful (creatures) devour the weak ones, and those which are big and powerful eat each other, similarly, by making the mightiest and greatest Yadus kill others, and by making Yadus to destroy each other mutually, the Omni-

417. After the internecine fight among the Yādavas and Kṛṣṇa's passing away, Arjuna escorted the wives of Kṛṣṇa and other Yādavas to Indraprastha. On his way the Ābhīras attacked him and carried away the Yādava women. For details—MBH. Mausala 7.51-72.

418. According to MBH. Mausala 3.36 ff., this grass turned into clubs in the hands of the drunk Yādavas who cudgeled each other to death with it. It is explained that grass grew out of the particles of iron pestle which, according to the curse of sages, was to annihilate the Yādava clan and which the Yādavas tried to destroy by reducing it to powder.
present Lord (Krṣṇa) lessened the burden of the earth.⁴¹⁹.

27. The words uttered by Krṣṇa pregnant with significance for the occasion and the place, and alleviating the pangs of heart, captivate my mind when recalled.

Sūta said:

28. In this way, the mind (intellect) of Arjuna who was meditating over the lotus-like feet of Krṣṇa, with very deep affection, became quiet (blissful) and pure (unattached).

29-30. The mighty Arjuna from whose intellect were completely wiped out all⁴²⁰ the passions etc. due to devotion the speed (i.e. intensity) of which had been accelerated by continuous meditation of the feet of Vāsudeva, again recollected the knowledge which was sung (explained) to him by the Lord at the head of the battle, but which remained suppressed due to (effects of) time, actions and attachment to pleasure.⁴²¹

31.* Arjuna who, by attainment of (i.e. realization of

⁴¹⁹. ŚR. interprets: "In this way, having killed Duryodhana, Jarāsandha and others by the most powerful great Pāṇḍavas and finishing with Śālva and others by Yadus, and by making Yadus destroy each other, the Lord lessened the burden of the earth."

VJ., being more faithful to the wording of the text, is accepted above.

⁴²⁰. According to VJ., this does not imply the annihilation of each and every act but of those only which deserved to be so destroyed by the great divine grace of the Lord:

\[ \text{Ato'tra asēṣa-sabdō nirmathana-yogya esa prārabdha-viṣaya iti bhāvaḥ!} \]

⁴²¹. JG. differs. He regards time (Kāla) and acts (Karma) as Krṣṇa's sports and tamaś as mind's lack of meditation of Krṣṇa due to absorption in his sports. Arjuna realised the fulfilment of Krṣṇa's promise of absorption in him given at the time of the Kuru-war (viz. māneyasī in the BG, 18.65).

To quote JG. Kāla=bhogavallilecchā-mayaḥ /
Karma=tallīṭā /
Tamaś=tallīṭevāna tadd-amanusandhānaṃ /
Odhyogamat=tan-mahāvishedasya tasyānte'pi tathā... punar mām eva nityasya'sti etad vākyam yathārthatvam 'nubhūtavān /

* I have followed ŚR. in the above translation. But the terms in this verse have been variously interpreted as follows:
his identity with) Brahman (leading to) attributelessness due to the disappearance of nescience and the absence of the subtle body (which is the indestructible origin of the gross or visible body) became free from (the recurrence of) the gross body (i.e. the cycle of births) and his doubt about duality having been (thus) dispelled, became free from affliction.

32. Having heard of the way followed by the Lord and the annihilation of the Yadu clan, the firm-minded Yudhishtira decided to proceed to heaven.

422. Brahma-sampathyā—(i) By the knowledge of the identity of oneself with Brahman obtained by listening to Vedānta—ŚR.

(ii) By the knowledge of Brahman—VR.

(iii) By the direct apprehension of Brahman (Brahmaparokṣa-jñānena) —VJ.

(iv) By the perception of the Supreme Brahman in human form (Krṣṇa)—JG.

(v) By the realisation of the identity of one's individual self and everything else with Brahman.

Sarvam khalidam Brahma, aham Brahmāmi iti Brahmātma-jñānena—GD.

423. Saṁcchinnā-dvaita-saṁsāyaḥ—

(1) Whose doubts about the separateness of gods etc. and the duality about one's self are dispelled—VR.

(2) Whose misapprehension and doubt about the distinctness of the individual Soul and the Brahman is removed.

VJ. interprets dvaita as 'wrong knowledge' dvitam dvitam, dvidhā gatam jñānam tasya bhāvāḥ dvaitam anyathā jñānam while saṁsāya is 'the oscillation between two entities'. (For details about "Illusion and Doubt" in Madhva system of which VJ. is a follower see S.N. Dasgupta Hist. Ind. Philosophy, Vol.IV, pp.173-78).

(3) JG. takes saṁsāya as the doubt that there is a universe quite distinct from the Supreme Being who resides in the heart.

(4) VC. thinks that the doubt is 'Whether I am in any way related to my body'. He adds : When Krṣṇa was in this world, though Arjuna and Krṣṇa were two persons, their one-ness was due to friendship. After His disappearance, Arjuna doubted whether Krṣṇa would absorb him into the bliss of oneness of friendship. This doubt was dispelled.

These different meanings of the above words lead to different interpretations of the above verse. Thus, for example, the gist of VR's interpretation is as follows: "Due to the knowledge of Brahman, he becomes entirely free from misapprehension regarding the Soul as gods, men etc.—a distinction which depends upon the body feeling himself separate from the gross and subtle body, also from the subtle Prakṛti and the three attributes (guṇas). Thus there being no occasion for rebirth, he becomes free.
33.* Having heard of the destruction of Yadus and of the passing away of the Lord as reported by Dhanañjaya (Arjuna), Kunti, who, by single-minded devotion concentrated herself on the Lord Adhokṣaja (Kṛṣṇa—lit. one who is beyond the ken of sense-organ) detached herself from the worldly existence.

34.* Just as a thorn is removed with another thorn (and both are thrown away), similarly the Unborn Being (Lord Kṛṣṇa), gave up that body with which He removed (the burden of the earth, (because) to the Lord both (the bodies which became burdens and His own mortal body) are equal.

35.* Like an actor, just as he assumed various forms (bodies) like those of fish and others and gave them up, he abandoned the body through (the instrumentality of) which he removed the load on the earth.

36. When Lord Kṛṣṇa whose meritorious legends (stories) are worth hearing, left this earth with his body, on that very day, the Kali (age) which is the cause of irreligious actions in thoughtless (lit. unawakened) minds, followed.

37. Finding the spread of a number of irreligious tendencies such as avarice, untruthfulness, crookedness, violence in houses, towns, the nation, and in his own self, the wise Yudhi-

424. Commentators like ŚR., JG., VC., GD. quote BH. P. 11.31.9 and maintain that Kṛṣṇa’s death was not a fact but it appeared to be so to mankind. VJ. omits this and the next 2 verses. Vide Bh. P. XI. 31.6 also.

425. According to VD., ‘Dhanañjaya’ means Nārada as he got over (joya) thoughtlessness (dhana—dham dhairyam nāsayaś ti dhanam avicekaḥ). Kunti heard from Nārada the prediction about the annihilation of Yadu clan and death of Kṛṣṇa before she proceeded to Himalayas.

It is to be noted that JG. and other commentators hold that the annihilation of Yadus was only apparent.

426. (1) became liberated while alive (Jivan-mukta)—ŚR.
(2) Quitted her body—ŚR.
(3) Ceased to be born again; became liberated—JG.

VJ. omits these.

427. Brahman exists. No birth is possible in its case. Hence it is unborn. ASDP (p. 21) quotes on aja:

na hi jāto na jāye'ham na janiṣṭye kadācana Kṣetrajśaḥ sarva-bhūtānāṁ tasmādham ajāḥ smṛtaḥ śthira decided\textsuperscript{428} to go away from the worldly life.

38. In the city of Hastināpura, the emperor (Yudhiṣṭhīra) installed on the throne his grandson who was self-restrained and equal to him in virtues, as the ruler of the land engirdled by waters (seas).

39. Then the monarch (Yudhiṣṭhīra enthroned at Mathurā) Vajra (the son of Kṛṣṇa’s grandson Aniruddha) as the king of (the country called) Śūrasena. Having performed the sacrifice dedicated to Prajāpati, he ‘drank up’ (i.e. established within himself by yogic process) the fires (viz. Daksināgni, Gārhapatya and Āhavanīya).\textsuperscript{429}

40-41. Having given up then and there all his silken garments and gold ornaments like bracelets, and becoming free from all possession, pride and having severed all ties, he sacrificed his speech organ (or offered all sense organs as an oblation to the mind) into the mind, the mind (was merged) into the life-breath, and the life-breath (Prāṇa) into another (viz. apāna). (He then merged) this respiratory vital air (apāna) into (the presiding goddess of) Death and verily the Death unto\textsuperscript{430} the aggregation of five elements (body).

\textsuperscript{429} As a householder (gṛhastha) one has to maintain these sacred fires, viz. Āhavanīya. Gārhapatya and Daksināgni for performing the daily homa (P. V. Kane—\textit{Hist. of Dharmaśāstra}, Vol. II. i. 675-685). Before renouncing one’s house the īṣṭi (sacrifice) called prājāpatya is performed in which all one’s possessions are to be distributed and the three fires—maintained by him—are to be ‘drunk up, to be presumed to have been established within one’s self—by reciting certain hymns.

Prājāpatya bhaved īṣṭis sarvasvam yatram daksinā /
Parivrajyā pakrame sā vīhitā pūrvasūribhiḥ //
Prājāpatyā nirūpyeṣṭim sarva-vedasa-dakṣiṇām /
Ātmanyagniṁ samāroṣya Brāhmaṇaḥ pravrajed gṛhāt //

VD. says that as per Devala Smṛti even a Kṣatriya can follow the procedure prescribed for Brāhmaṇas.

\textsuperscript{430} As ŚR., VD. and other commentators explain, this is a figurative description of Yudhiṣṭhīra’s dissociating his self from all externalities. Yudhiṣṭhīra finally thought of himself to be different from his body which is to be quitted unto death. “tam mṛtyum pāṇcaṭve pāṇca-bhūtānām aikyaṁ dehe, dehasyaiva mṛtyur nātmanā iti bhāvitavān” / This process of figurative sacrifice is described in later verses also.
42. Then the silent sage (Yudhiṣṭhira) offered the aggregate of five (elements) into the triad (of the attributes, viz. sattva, rajas and tamas) of Prakṛti or avidyā and sacrificed these three attributes into Nescience (avidyā). (He then) merged everything into the Soul and the (individual) Soul in the immutable Universal Soul (called Brahman).

43-44. Clad in tree-barks, abstemious in food, desisting from speech, with dishevelled hair, showing himself like a dullard, madman or a goblin, expecting nothing (or without waiting for anyone) he went out (of the palace and the capital) like a deaf incapable of hearing (anything). Meditating about the Supreme Spirit (Brahman) in (his) heart, he entered the northern direction to which other great Souls of the past have proceeded and whence no one returns.

45. Having seen that subjects all over the world were influenced by Kali, the associate of irreligion, all the (Pāṇḍava) brothers, fully resolved, followed him.

46. Knowing in their mind that the lotus-like feet of Kṛṣṇa is the ultimate refuge, they who have well achieved the goals of human life (called puruṣārthaḥ) concentrated their minds on the same.

47-48. They whose intellect has been specially purified by devotion increased by meditating upon him, and whose minds are concentrated on that Supreme Man called Nārāyaṇa, attained that position which is very difficult to reach by the nonsaints who are attached to objects of sensual pleasures, and being free from sins, attain his abode with their souls free from rajas and tamas.

49. Having quitted his mortal frame in Prabhāsa, even the self-possessed (or self-knower) Vidura whose mind being possessed by Kṛṣṇa, was one with him rejoined his post431 (as Yamadharma) along with the Manes.

50. Then, having known the loss of interest (expectation) of her husbands in her, Draupadi concentrated her mind on Lord Vāsudeva and attained to him.

431. Yama, the god of death and the dispenser of rewards and punishments according to the acts of individuals, wrongly punished the sage Māṇḍavya for which Māṇḍavya cursed him to be born as a Śūdra on the earth. When the period of the curse was over, Yama who incarnated as Vidura, the Śūdra, rejoined his post as before.
51. He who thus faithfully listens to the beneficial and holy (account) of departure of Pāṇḍu's sons, the beloved ones of the Lord, frequently gets devotion unto Hari (engendered in him) and attains liberation.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

(Dialogue between the Earth and Dharma)

Sūta said:

1. Oh Brāhmaṇa (Śaunaka)! Then Parīkṣit the great devotee of Kṛṣṇa verily ruled the earth according to the education given to him by great Brāhmaṇas (e.g. Kṛpa). He exhibited the same great qualities as predicted by the experts in astrology on the day of his (Parīkṣit's) birth.

2. He married Irāvati, the daughter of Uttara. He brought forth from her four sons, the first of whom was Janmejaya.

3. Appointing Kṛpa (son of Śaradvat) as the family-priest, he performed, on the bank of the Gaṅgā, three horse-sacrifices with plenty of gifts (to Brāhmaṇas after their completion) wherein sacrifices (deities of the sacrifices) attended in visible form.

4. During the course of his conquest of directions (i.e. the complete earth), at one place, he, by his might, captured Kali, a Śūdra, assuming the insignia of royalty, (while Kali was) kicking a pair of a cow and a bull.

Śaunaka said:

5. For what reason did the king (simply) arrest Kali (and not kill him) as the wretched Śūdra assuming the royal insignia, kicked the cow?

432. The son of king Virāṭa and brother-in-law of Abhimanu. Uttara was killed by Śalya in the Kuru war. His daughter Irāvati married Parīkṣit. —P.I.1.217 DHM 929.

433. What were his (Kali's) special qualities due to which he was spared —SD.
6. Oh greatly fortunate one! Please tell it (the above query) if it is related to the stories of Kṛṣṇa or concerns the saints who are enjoying (lit. licking) the honey in the lotus in the form of his feet.

7. What is the propriety of speaking on other evil topics which is a worthless waste of life of people with a short span of life but desiring final beatitude.

8. The god of Death (the deity called ‘death’) has been invited here for killing the beasts for this sacrifice. Therefore no one can die so long as the god of death is here.

9. Your honour has been invited by the great sages in order that words of nectar in the form of sports of Hari should be drunk to the fill in this world.

10. Verily, the lives of the idle, the dull-witted and short-lived persons are taken away by sleep at night and by the useless acts (committed) during the day.

Sūta said:

11. When Parīkṣit heard the not-very pleasant news (report) of Kali's aggression in Kuru-jāṅgala lying within his jurisdiction (he who was) an expert in warfare took up the bow.

12. Surrounded by his army consisting of chariots, cavalry, elephants and infantry, he started from his capital, in his beautifully decorated chariot yoked with dark-coloured horses and flying a banner with the emblem of a lion, for the conquest of the directions (the whole of the earth).

13. Having conquered Bhadrāśva, Ketumāla, Bhārata, Northern Kurus and big regions such as Kimpuruṣa and

VJ. opines that this is not a question but an objection (for failure in duty) against Parīkṣit.

VR. takes the 2nd line as a separate sentence as follows: 'Who was that Śūdra wearing emblems of a king who kicked the cow?'

434. (i) He was a bit pleased as he got a scope to show his bravery. —VC

(ii) very unpleasant—VR.

435. According to PSK (Prāśna Sthala Kośa) this dry part of the Kuru country corresponds to modern Rohtak-Hissar region (p.539). But Bh.P. 1.10.34 shows it to be on the road from Indraprastha to Dwārakā.

436. v.l. Saṁyuga-Sāvari—who was like Kṛṣṇa in fighting.
others,\textsuperscript{437} he received tributes.

14. Hearing everywhere the extolling of glories of his great-souled ancestors, (which were) expressive of Kṛṣṇa’s greatness,

15. And about his own protection from the fire of Aśvatthāman’s missiles, of the friendship between the Yādavas and the sons of Pṛthā (i.e. Pāṇḍavas) and their devotion to Kṛṣṇa,

16. Being extremely pleased, the greatminded (Parikṣit) whose eyes were expanded with affection gave them (the songsters of glory) very costly clothes and necklaces.

17. Hearing that Kṛṣṇa to whom the world bows, served (his) favourites—Pāṇḍavas—in the capacity of a charioteer, a President of the assembly, an attendant, a friend, an envoy, a sentinel, a follower, praising and saluting (them), the ruler of men (Parikṣit) became devoted to (his) lotus-like feet.

18. Hear from me a wonderful event which occurred soon, while he was thus every day following the conduct of life of his ancestors.

19. (While himself) walking on one leg, Dharma (in the form of a bull) finding the (earth in the form of a) cow

\textsuperscript{437} In the V Skandha of the Bh.P., the ancient geographical ideas are given. The earth consists of seven islands. The first of these islands Jambu-dvīpa consists of nine Vārṣas (continents) : (1) Ilāvṛta, (2) Bhadrāśva, (3) Hari, (4) Ketumāla, (5) Ramyaka,(6) Hiraṇyamaya, (7) Uttara-Kuru, (8) Kimpuruṣa, (9) Bhārata. India is a part of (9). The mountain Meru stands in the centre of the Jambudvīpa. devoid of (her) lustre and face full of tears like a mother who has lost her young one, asked her.

_Dharma said:

20. Oh blessed (one), are you well (free from diseases)? By your melancholy countenance, you appear pale. Oh mother, I find you full of mental agony. About what distant relative are you lamenting?

21. Are you aggrieved to find me with one leg and deprived of (the other three) legs? or about yourself apprehending your being enjoyed by the Śūdras (in near future) or (over) Gods and others whose portion (of the offerings) of sacrifices is lost (due to non-performance of sacrifices) or (over) subjects due to Indra's refusal to pour rain?

22. Oh earth! Are you grieved for women who are not protected (by their husbands) or for children who are not only uncared for but are also oppressed by their fathers (cruel) like man-eaters; or for the goddess of Speech or Learning (who has been) living in the family of vicious Brāhmaṇas or (feel sorry for) those born in the best families ('Brāhmaṇas') serving the kings who are not favourable to Brāhmaṇas.

23. Are you sorry for the mean Kṣatriyas who are possessed by Kali or the countries abandoned (or ruined) by them, or for the mankind indulging in eating, drinking, wearing (fancy) clothes, (enjoying) baths and sexual intercourse everywhere (lit. here and there)?

24. Or, Oh mother Earth, (are you lamenting) remembering the deeds on which depends the Liberation\textsuperscript{438},—(deeds) of Hari who assumed incarnation for lessening your heavy burden, but has (now) disappeared and (you find yourself) abandoned?

25. Oh Earth! tell me the cause of your mental agony by which you are so much emaciated. Oh mother, is your good fortune so worshipped by Gods, stolen away by Time (the god of Death) who is the stronger than the strong.

\textsuperscript{438} v.l. nirvāṇa-vidambitāni—Final Beatitude which has been ridiculed or surpassed by Hari’s deed, i.e. Hari’s deeds are superior to the Liberation—ŚR. and JG.
The Earth said:

26. Oh Dharma, you know verily all about which you have asked me. Due to Kṛṣṇa you were possessing four legs which were conducive to the happiness of mankind.

27.* In whom (Kṛṣṇa) truthfulness, purity, compassion, patience, generosity, contentment, straightforwardness, steadiness of the mind, self-restraint, (control of the organs of senses), austerities, equality, endurance, unconcernedness (even to one's benefits), mastery over learning, 28.* Knowledge, non-attachment, capacity to exercise authority, heroism (courage on the battlefield), strength, judgement or perception of what is proper to do, independence, dexterity, beautiful complexion (personal charm), fortitude softheartedness.

29.* Extreme splendour, humility, good behaviour, skilled activities of the organs of senses, receptacle of enjoyment, mental poise (non-perturbation of the mind), faith, fame, adorability, freedom from pride,

30. Oh Lord, these and 439 other eternal, great qualities (which are) prayed and desired for by a person anxious for greatness, perpetually exist (in him) without decay (lit. never get annihilated).

31. I grieve for the people who are affected by the sight of the evil-minded Kali, (as they are) now bereft of Kṛṣṇa who is the receptacle of all qualities.

32. I feel grief for my own self and about you who are the best of gods. Similarly (I feel grief for) the gods, the

* In verses 27, 28, 29, the interpretation of ŚR. is mainly followed though other commentators emphasise slightly different shades of meaning of the qualities enumerated herein.

439. ca—In addition to the 99 qualities enumerated above, SD. adds the following eternal great attributes: "beauty, sweetness, tenderness, affection, calmness, protective ness and others".

JG. has listed 63 attributes while commenting on verses 27-29 and adds 5 more as understood under ca—and 17 more as app— which are impossible for a jiva (individual soul) to attain. This long list is omitted as it is not directly related to the interpretation of these verses and no other commentator even in the Bhāgavata Vidyā Peeth edition subscribes to it.
manes, sages, good persons, all strata of the society (castes) and all stages of life (āśramas).

33. Being enamoured of the beauty of (his) feet, the Goddess of Wealth for whose favourable side-glance gods like Brahmā and others performed penance for a long time and (thus) was resorted to by the best, adores those (Krṣṇa’s) feet leaving her own residence in the lotus-garden.

34. I, whose body was adorned with the Venerable Lord’s footprints with the marks of the lotus, the thunderbolt, the goad (to control elephants) and flag, possessed the prosperity from him and surpassed the three worlds in beauty. But subsequently at the time of the annihilation of that prosperity he abandoned me who became arrogant.

35. Verily, the self-reliant Being removed the heavy burden of one hundred aksauhiṇīs440 (a big division of the army) of the kings of the Asura race, and assuming a beautiful form in the Yādava clan restored to you (who were) distressed by incompleteness in legs, your pristine state (of four-leggedness) by his manliness.

36. What lady can endure the separation from that Supreme Man who by his amorous looks, enchanting smile and sweet conversation, stole away the steadiness of mind along with pride of women of Madhu clan like Satyabhāmā and others? Being adorned with whose footprints there was (thril and hence) hair-erection in the form of crops of foodgrains etc. due to the happiness felt by me.

37. In this way, while the goddess of the Earth and Dharma were conversing, the royal sage called Parikṣit arrived there where the Sarasvatī flows to the east.

440. aksauhiṇī—a division of the army consisting of 21870 chariots, 21870 elephants, 65610 horse and 109350 foot—PASK, p.84.
CHAPTER SEVENTEEN
(Punishment and Control of Kali)

Sūta said:

1. There (on the eastern turn of the Sarasvatī in (Kurukṣetra) the king (Parīṣṭit) saw the pair of the cow and the bull being beaten like protectionless beings and also the Śūdra wearing the insignia of royalty, with a rod in his hand.

2. (He saw that) the bull, white like the lotus-fibre, as if passing urine through fear, (and thus losing strength every moment), trembling on one leg, sinking down under the beating by the Śūdra.

3. (And) the cow also yielding (milk the products of which, as oblations to sacrifices, are useful for) religion, distressed, (being) heavily kicked by the Śūdra, calf-less, with face full of tears, weak and desiring to eat grass.

4. Riding his gold-plated chariot and holding bow equipped (with arrow) he asked in a voice deep like (thunder of a) cloud.

5. “Who are you who, a mighty person, are hurting the weak ones by force in this world under my protection? Like an actor you are dressed as a king but are a Śūdra in your actions.

6. Who are you who after the departure of Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna (lit. the master of the Gāṇḍiva bow) to a distant place (the other world) are striking the innocent ones in solitary places? You are the culprit deserving to be killed.

7. (Address to the bull). Who are you white like lotus-fibre, (who) being defective in three legs, walk on one leg only? Are you some God who in the form of such a bull make us sorrowful?

8. With the exception of your tears of sorrow, tears of grief of other animals do not fall on the surface of this earth.

441. SR. clarifies: The earth became lean due to non-performance of sacrifices which led to droughts and failure of crops and that she desired to have her share in sacrifices.

442. Kṛśasvatu-paricchadam—SD. and VB. take this as referring to Kali and interpret as ‘wearing gold crown, ear-rings etc.’ which Kali as a Śūdra is not qualified to wear. which is embraced (i.e. protected) by the mighty arms of the best kings in the Paurava dynasty.

9. Oh Son of surabhi, do not feel aggrieved. Let thy fear from the Sudra pass away. (Address to the cow). Oh mother, do not weep. Good betide thee while I am alive to punish the wicked.

10. Oh pious one, the arrogant king in whose kingdom all the subjects are intimidated by the wicked, destroys his reputation, span of life, good fortune and prospects in the next world.

11. It is the highest duty of kings to remove the trouble of the distressed. Hence I shall slay this wicked-most oppressor of beings.

12. Oh four-legged son of Surabhi, who cut down your three legs? Let there be none (distressed) like you in the jurisdiction of the kings who follow Sri Krsna.

13. Oh bull, good betide you righteous people who never commit sins. Report to me who deformed you and (thereby) spoilt the glory of the Pandavas.

14. Perpetrators of crimes against the innocents and their accomplices as well have fear from me from all sides. When the wicked are punished, it contributes to the good of the virtuous.

15. I shall pull off the arms along with the bracelets even of the immortal himself if he, being uncontrolled, commits an offence (crime) against the innocent persons.

16. The greatest duty of a king who punishes, as per religious codes, persons going astray in normal times, is to protect in this world persons abiding by their own religion.

Dharma said:

17. This your speech which dispels fear (from the minds) of the distressed, is worthy of the descendants of the Pandavas due to whose (collection of) good qualities Lord Krsna undertook to work as envoy etc.

443. svarato bhayam—Fear not only from me but from all such as Yama (the god of death) and others—SD.
444. right from the shoulder—SR.
18.* Oh great man, we who are extremely puzzled by discordant doctrines (advocated by different theorists), do not know the Being (who is) the cause of misery (of animated beings).

19. Some (i.e. followers of the Yoga school) who cover up the differences (between the individual and Universal Souls) call the Individual Spirit as the Master (i.e. dispenser of Pleasure and Pain); others (Fatalists), regard the fate (i.e. the presiding deities of planets) to possess such power; others (the followers of the Mimamsa) regard actions (such as performance of sacrifices as having this power); while (some)

* (1) JG. interprets differently: We (the theists) as well as those who are puzzled by the different statements (of sastras) do not know the Being who is beyond the reach of all persons.

(2) VC. explains: We do not know the being from whom 'seeds' of misery are produced. This man Kali who is troubling me is visible. But the very fact that he troubles me only (and not others) shows that there must be some special reason—'seed'—of this trouble. We do not know the Being who is the source of the 'seeds' of distress.

445. vākyā-bheda vimohitaḥ—Confused by a number of Vedic quotations explaining the causes of misery—VJ.

446. klesi-bija: Sins; faults committed against the Lord—VB.

447. kecid vikalpa-vasanā etc.—

(i) Or, the atheists who are covered (possessed) by false logic regard themselves as the Masters (of pleasure or pain) as, according to them Gods have no power to ordain happiness and misery as they (Gods) themselves are slaves of their actions; actions being inanimate—jaḍa—cannot dispense pleasure or pain—ŚR.

(ii) Those of uncertain (dubious) speech regard themselves as the source of their troubles (or the Sāṁkhyaś regard the mind—antaḥkurya—as the cause of one's miseries)—VJ.

(iii) The advaita Vedántins who cover up, i.e. do not recognise the difference between individual Soul and God, hold that there is nobody to dispense pleasure or pain as the duality such as pleasure-pain, is born of the ignorance of the Soul—VC.

(iv) SD. puts forth a similar explanation:

viśeṣesāṁ nāsā-kāraṇā-vādāṁ, vasate āchādayo yama vedāntās tadvidō vā, te āśamās tvamapārtiḥasya ātmānam tat-pradārtham prabhum sukha-duḥkha-pradām dhūḥ /

448. Others (i.e. persons with correct knowledge) regard Hari, the Supreme among the gods, the cause of misery:

eke samyak jñāninaḥ daivam sarva-deva-pradhānām Hariṁ Kleśa-bījām dhūḥ—VJ.
others (the materialists) presume nature (as the ordainer of weal and woe).

20. Some have determined that this (happiness, misery) is from (God who is) incomprehensible by logic and indescribable by words. Oh sage-like king, ponder over this by your intellect.

Sūta said:

21. Oh great Brāhmaṇa (lit. the best among the Brāhmaṇas) while Dharma was speaking thus, the king-emperor with his delusion dispersed, spoke with tranquil mind.

The king said:

22. Oh knower of Dharma (righteousness)! (By not disclosing the name of Kali who is maltreating you) you are expounding religion (which ordains) that the place of the perpetrator of an irreligious act is the same as that of the reporter of the act (i.e. the person who commits a sin and the informer of that sin go to the same place, viz. hell).

23. Or it is certain that course of the Māyā—power of God—is beyond the reach of the mind and speech of (living) beings.

24. In the Kṛta age, austerity, purity, compassion and truthfulness were the four legs (of Dharma). Three of them were broken by (forms of) unrighteousness, viz. pride, contact (with women) and intoxication (from liquor).

25. Oh Dharma, now-a-days (in this Age) your (remaining) leg, viz. truthfulness on which you subsist, exists (but

449. apare—Followess of the Sāṅkhya School—JG.
450. VJ. differs: "Some conclude that the stream of misery springs from Prakṛti which is beyond the range of comprehension or from some positive form of ignorance (or rather Nescience) whose nature (as being existent or non-existent) cannot be decided. Oh great king, consider which of these are supported by the Vedas and Smṛtis, and judge accordingly.
451. samāhita manasā—(The king who considered Dharma’s speech) with close attention.
452. deva-Māyā—The will of the Almighty (VJ., VR.). The Prakṛti of Lord Viṣṇu —SD.
453. nivartayeṣu etc.: Whereby the world will achieve you.
this non-righteousness in the form of Kali who is brought up on falsehood (untruthfulness) wishes to deprive you of that (leg) also.

26. And this earth (in the form of cow) whose great burden has been unloaded by the Lord (Krṣṇa) has been made auspicious on all sides by his splendid foot-prints.

27. Being renounced by him, unfortunate and pious as she (the Earth) is, she is shedding tears (being apprehensive) that Śūdras in the guise of Kings and inimical to Brāhmaṇas will enjoy her.

28. In this way having consoled Dharmā and the Earth, the great warrior took up (drew out) his sharpened sword against Kali the cause of inequities.

29. Knowing him (Parīkṣit) determined to kill him, he (Kali) being overwhelmed with fear, abandoned the emblems of royalty and bowed down his head at his (Parīkṣit's) feet.

30. The heroic (Parīkṣit) who was kind to the poor, fit for refuge and worthy to be praised, did not, out of compassion, kill him (Kali) who was lying prostrate at his feet and addressed him thus, with a smile.

The King said:

31. Verily there is absolutely no danger to you (who are a supplicant for mercy) with folded hands from (us) the upholders of the glory of Arjuna. But you are the friend of the unrighteous. You should not, under any circumstances, live in any part of my kingdom.

32. Whilst you were existing in the body of kings, a number of inequities (such as) avarice, untruthfulness, theft, vulgarity, renunciation of religion, misfortune, fraud, quarrel and pride have followed (commenced to spread their influence).

33. Oh friend of the iniquitous, you should not therefore stay in Brahmadvarta where persons expert in the performance of sacrifices adore the Lord of the sacrifices therewith (by sacrifices) and (which) is habitable by dharma (righteousness) and truth.

34. You should not live in that place where the glorious Hari in the form of Sacrifices, being adored, spreads over (confers upon) the performers of sacrifices happiness and objects of desire certainly. This (Supreme) Soul is present like air, both inside and outside the mobile and the immobile beings.

Sūta said:

35. Thus being ordered by Parīkṣit, Kali who was trembling, spoke to him who has raised his sword like the God of death (Holder of the rod).

Kali said:

36. “Oh Imperial Majesty, wherever I shall stay by your order, I visualize you ready with a bow and arrows.

37. Oh best of the righteous, it becomes you to appoint a place for me where I may dwell with a steady mind obeying your commands.”

Sūta said:

38. (Thus) solicited (by Kali), the King then gave Kali the following places used for gambling, drinking, bad women and slaughtering where four kinds of iniquities thrive.

39. When (Kali) supplicated again, the Lord gave him gold (to live in). Then (he gave Kali) five abodes viz. untruth, pride, passion, ignorance and the fifth—enmity.

40. As pointed out by him, Kali, the cause of unrighteousness, lived in these five places allotted to him by the son of Uttara (Parīkṣit).

41. Hence these should not be resorted to by persons who are anxious to be good—especially by the righteous king who is the preceptor and lord of men.

42. He joined the bull’s three legs—austerities, purity and compassion (which had been) maimed. And consoling the Earth (restored to her) the prosperity.

43. Now he occupies the throne worthy of kings only, and bequeathed to him by his grandfather (Yudhiṣthira who was) desirous of retiring to the forest.

44. Shining with the goddess of prosperity of the Kaurava Kings, the sage-like king (who is a) great fortunate (person), the Supreme authority and whose fame is extensive, is now ruling in Hastināpura.
45. In this way, this king, the son of Abhimanyu whose prowess is such, is (thus) ruling over the earth when you have engaged yourself for the performance of sacrifices.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

(Curse of the Brähmana)

Sūta said:

1. He (Parikṣit) who due to the grace of Lord Kṛṣṇa of miraculous deeds, did not die in the womb of his mother though he was severely burnt by the missile fired by Aśvatthāman (the son of Droṇa),

2. Who, having offered his heart to the Lord, was not disturbed in his mind by the great peril of death from Taksaka due to the wrath of the Brähmana.

3. Who, having abandoned attachment to all matters, comprehended thoroughly the real nature of God (the invincible) and became a disciple of Śuka (the son of Vyāsa), gave up his mortal coil in the Ganges.

4. Even at the time of death, there is no fear or infatuation in the case of persons, acquainted with the life of Kṛṣṇa (lit. one of excellent reputation), and drinking his nectarlike episodes (as) they remember his lotus-like feet.

5. As long as the great king, the son of Abhimanyu (Parikṣit), was the sole ruler of this earth, Kali could not prevail anywhere (even in places assigned to him) despite his advent here.

6. On the very day, and at the very moment the Lord left the earth, on that very day this Kali, the source of irreligiousness, (in this world), entered here.

7. The emperor did not hate Kali (till his—Parikṣit’s death). He enjoys the essence like the black-bee (which enjoys fragrance without destroying the flower). (For during the Kali age) good actions (even when merely intended) bear fruit quickly while other actions (sins) do not fructify till they are committed.
8. What (harm can be done) by Kali who is brave among the boys, (or powerful among foolish people) and a coward before the valiant and who like a wolf stays among the careless men?

9. What (you) have asked (me about) this sacred narrative of Parikṣit connected with the episode of Vāsudeva, has been related to you by me.

10. Whatever anecdotes about the qualities and deeds of the Lord whose great acts are worth narrating, (are there, they) deserve to be listened to by men who are anxious to be good.

The sages said:

11. Oh gentle-natured Sūta, may you live for a pretty long years—you who extol to us mortals the brilliant glory of Kṛṣṇa which is like nectar.

12. In this act (of long-term sacrifice) the fruit of which is uncertain, your honour is giving to drink the sweet honey of the lotus-like feet of Govinda to us whose bodies have changed colour due to the smoke of sacrifices.

13. We cannot compare the heaven and the Liberation (from the cycle of births) with the slightest period of time (spent) in the company of (devotees who are) associates of the Supreme Lord. What to say of the blessings (i.e. the desired objects like kingdom etc.) of ordinary mortals?

14. What man capable of appreciating the beauty or excellence will get satiated with the stories of him who is the absolute resort of the best men amongst the great people!

454. urka—That which covers or destroys righteousness, knowledge etc.—VJ.

455. bubhūṣubhiḥ—desirous of attaining Liberation—VJ.

456. madhu—intoxicating (making one forget the experience of pleasure and pain)—VG.

GD. explains ‘āśava’ as ‘the wine making one forget the unhappiness of the worldly existence, and ‘madhu’ as ‘sweet’.

457. dhūma-dhūmarāmanām—(i) Or whose minds are covered with (full of) ignorance (and are blindly following the karmas)—VR.

(ii) VJ. rather differs: In this series of sacrificial acts (performed for getting the knowledge of Hari), there being no breathing space (andātāse) for attachment to other things (and hence leisure for listening to Hari’s stories) you make us—whose bodies are sanctified by sacrificial smoke—drink the sweet honey of Hari’s lotus-like feet.
Lords of Yoga among whom Śiva and god Brahmā are prominent, did not reach the ends of the qualities of the Attributeless.

15. Therefore, Oh learned one, your honour who is the chief of the devotees of the Almighty, describe in details to us who are desirous of hearing the pure excellent life of Hari who is absolutely the refuge of the best among the great.

16. By means of the knowledge imparted to him by Śuka (the son of Vyāsa) verily, the great devotee of the Lord (Kṛṣṇa), Parīkṣit, of no mean intellect, resorted to the feet of Viṣṇu (lit. God having Garuḍa—the lord of birds—as the emblem on his flag) which is (also) called Final Beatitude.

17. Therefore narrate to us in plain language that extremely holy account told to Parīkṣit (viz. the Bhāgavata Purāṇa) leading to firm adherence to the most wonderful (bhakti—devotion) Yoga and containing the stories about the Eternal (Kṛṣṇa) (which are) liked by persons devoted to the Supreme Lord.

Śūta said:

18. Oh, what a happy surprise—that we who are born in a (lower) mixed caste, by our service of the seniors (in age and knowledge e.g. of Śuka), have achieved our object in life. The association, even in conversation with the greatest, removes the agony (inferiority complex) of being born in a lower family.

19. What to say again458 about the person who chants the name of the Eternal Lord Kṛṣṇa, that sole resort of the greatest, possessor of infinite powers and who is called Ananta, as the excellent attributes of the great souls are his own.

20. He is so much unequalled and unsurpassed in qualities by others459 that it is really enough if it is suggested that the Goddess of Wealth, discarding other suppliants, serves the dust of His feet who does not seek her favour.

24. Once upon a time, (king Parīkṣit) with his bow strung, went a-hunting to the jungle and (while) pursuing a deer, became exhausted and was extremely hungry and thirsty.

25. Not seeing any source of water, he entered that (famous) hermitage (of Aṅgirasa) and saw a sage seated in tranquillity, with his eyes closed.

28. Being unoffered (a mat of) grass or even (a place on) the ground (to sit on) and not getting (usual) respectful offerings and courteous words, he (Parikṣit) felt himself disregarded and grew angry.

29. Oh Brāhmaṇa (Śaunaka), there arose suddenly in the mind of the king who was distressed by hunger and thirst, an unprecedented hostility and wrath against that Brāhmaṇa sage.

30. While coming out (of the hermitage) in anger, he placed round the neck of the Brāhmaṇa sage a dead serpent with the fore-end of his bow and repaired to his capital.

31. (The king wanted to ascertain) whether he (the sage) had controlled all his sense organs and (consequently) closed his eyes (in real meditation) or whether he had pretended meditation (thinking) that he had nothing to do with vile Kṣatriyas.

32. Having heard that his father was subjected to ill-treatment, his (the sage’s) son (by name Śrāṅga) who was young (but) very brilliant and was playing with children, spoke there as follows.

demeanour perpetrated by door-keeping slaves, is like an evil act by dogs guarding the door?

34. For the mean Kṣatriyas have been assigned the duty of door-keepers by Brāhmaṇas. How can a door-keeper be fit to partake (food etc.) in the same vessel in that house?

35. When Lord Kṛṣṇa, the controller of those who go astray, has departed, I shall today punish the transgressors (of the path of righteousness). Behold my power.

36. Having spoken thus to his companions, the son of that sage with his eye red with anger, sipped (as ācamana) the water of the Kauśikī river, and discharged his thunderbolt-like word, i.e. curse.

37. “Takṣaka, urged by me, shall on the seventh day (from today) bite this transgressor of limits (of religion), the fire-brand (destroyer) of his (own) family, who has troubled my father.”

38. Then, having approached his hermitage and seeing his father with the dead body of the serpent around his neck, the boy was overwhelmed with grief and wept aloud.

39. Oh Brāhmaṇa, the decedent of the family of Aṅgiras (viz. Śamika), having heard the loud lament of his son, and having slowly opened his eyes, saw the dead serpent on his shoulders.

40. After throwing away (the dead serpent), he asked his son, “Oh child, why are you crying? Who has done you any harm?” When so enquired, the son reported (the details).

41. Having heard that the king was cursed undeservedly, the Brāhmaṇa did not give compliment to his son, (He said) “Alas! Oh ignorant child! What a great sin you have committed in inflicting heavy punishment for a minor fault.

Jamadagni’s mother Satyavati became converted into this river; sacred to Manes (Pitṛs)—PSK 637-39, Pi.1.475. It is surprising how a king of Hastinapura strayed a-hunting to such a long distance. Moreover, this contradicts verse 25 above which speaks of non-existence of water nearby. V.J. is probably correct when he explains, “holding Kuśa grass in his hand and performing Ācamana”.
Para (Vishnu) with ordinary men, as the subjects, being protected by his irresistible power, obtain (their) good without fear from any quarter.

43. Oh (child), with the disappearance of god Vishnu (the wielder of the discus) designated as king (god amongst men), the world, instantaneously being protectionless and infested with thieves, will be ruined like a flock of sheep.\(^{469}\)

44. Today the sin committed by robbers of wealth (of people who are) protectorless will be visited upon us (though we are) not concerned\(^{470}\) with it, for men, most of whom are robbers, kill and curse each other and rob one another of cattles, women and money.

45. Then (in the absence of the ruler), the noble and righteous\(^{471}\) path of life which consists of the code of conduct for different classes of society and stages of life, prescribed by the three Vedas\(^{472}\), disappears and there takes place promiscuous mixture of all classes of people as their minds are fixed on (acquisition of) wealth and gratification of the senses as amongst the dogs and the monkeys.

46. But that lord of men who was protector of righteousness, an emperor of great renown, manifestly a great votary of the Supreme Lord, a sage amongst Kings (and) a performer of the horse-sacrifice, being overwhelmed with hunger, thirst and exhaustion was helpless. Certainly, he did not in the least deserve our curse.

to the pairs such as pleasure and pain but they are neither distressed nor delighted as the Soul is not affected by the attributes\(^474\) such as happiness, misery etc.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

(Arrival of Śuka)

1. Thereupon, the Lord of the Earth, pondering over the iniquitous act committed by himself was deeply distressed in mind (and said to himself): ‘Alas! what a heinous offence has been perpetrated by me like a vile person, against an innocent Brāhmaṇa of hidden power.

2. Therefore it is certain that due to the insult of god (-like sage), an unsurmountable calamity is going to befall me in near future. Let that (misfortune) come in full force directly on me (and not on my sons etc.) for the expiation of sin so that I may never commit such act again.

3. Let the fire of the Brāhmaṇa race incensed (by my provocative act) consume\(^475\) even today the kingdom, army and

(ii) Their mind does not harbour the pairs such as love, hatred, which are the effects of guṇas (attributes)—VB.
(iii) Jīva (the individual Soul) is the abode of vices and virtues or merits and demerits.—VG

\(^475\) JG. gives a better interpretation: “Even today, the kingdom etc go away from me like a thing burnt” (Rājyadikam adyaiva me

Brāhmaṇas who are residing in the kingdom may get burnt.
rich treasury belonging to me—a wicked fellow, so that my intellect may not entertain an evil disposition to Brähmaṇas, gods and cows.

4. While he was thinking thus, he heard of (the cause of his) death named (i.e. which was to meet him in the shape of) Takṣaka impelled by (the curse of) the sage’s son. He regarded the fire (of the poison) of Takṣaka as a blessing, as it was the immediate cause of renunciation on the part of a person attached (to worldly objects).

5. Then having renounced this world and the next (the world of gods) which he had already decided as worth rejecting, he who thought the service of the feet of Kṛṣṇa as higher than all objectives in life, sat on the bank of the Ganges (the river of the immortals) with a vow to abstain from food till death.

6. What man about to die will not resort to the river (Ganges) which carries the waters highly sanctified by the dust of Kṛṣṇa’s feet mingled with the pollen of the Tulasi of resplendent beauty and which purifies here and hereafter the worlds along with the protectors of the quarters of the world including Īśa.

7. In this way, having decided to sit on the bank of the Ganges, abstaining from food (till death), the descendant of Pāṇḍu (i.e. Parīkṣit) with single-minded devotion to the feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa took the vows of sage’s way of life and freed himself from all attachments.

8. There arrived the great sages along with their disciples purifying the world. Verily, under the guise of going on a pilgrimage, the saints themselves purify the holy places.

9. Afterwards (then came) Atri, Vasiṣṭha, Cyavana, Ārādvana, Aṛiṣṭanemi, Bhrigu, Anāgaras, Parāśara, the son of Gādhi, (i.e. Viśvāmitra), Paraśurāma, Utathya, Indra-Pramada and Idhma-vāha.

476. abhadrasya—(i) of one devoid of light or (ii) ignorant. (iii) sleepy—VJ.

477. Tulasi—the holy basil held sacred by Vaiṣṇavites. VJ. derives it as follows: (i) That which is comparable to knowledge about Brahma. (ii) That which decorates Viṣṇu.
10. Medhātithi, Devala, Ārṣṭiṣeṇa, Bhāradvāja, Gautama, Pippalāda, Maitreyā, Arvā, Kavaśa, Agastya (the sage born in water jar), Dvaipāyana and the glorious Nārada.*

11. Also others (such as) prominent divine sages and Brāhmaṇa sages, eminent royal-sages and others like Aruṇa (who initiated rites and formed a distinct class by themselves).

Having worshipped the sages belonging to various patronymic groups who assembled there, the king made obeisance to them by bending his head.

12. When they were comfortably seated, the king, with his pure heart, having saluted them again with his hands folded, stood before them and explained to them what he intended to do (with a desire to elicit their opinion regarding the desirability of such a course).

King said:

13. Ah! We whose behaviour is worthy of the favour of the greatest ones (like you) are the blessed-most among the kings. Alas! the race of kings whose job (acts necessary) while governing, (e.g. inflicting punishment etc.) is blameworthy, is relegated to a position beyond a place where the water used for washing the feet of Brāhmaṇas goes.479

14. The Supreme Lord has assumed the form of the Brāhmaṇa’s curse (which became) the root-cause of complete

479. How regrettable is the lot of the race of kings who, due to the censurable nature of their actions, are deprived of the (holy) water with which feet of Brāhmaṇas are washed—VJ.

Other interpretations:
(i) May this (punishment in the form of) Brāhmaṇa’s curse (adversely) affecting my worldly life be the effective (lit. sufficient) cause of renunciation (of worldly objects) in my case whose mind is devoutly attached to the Supreme Lord. For a person attached to worldly objects (like houses etc.) has the danger of worldly existence while he who is attached to god attains fearlessness or liberation—VJ. *
indifference (to worldly objects) in the case of a sinner like me whose mind was firmly attached to houses (wealth etc.); for persons, deeply attached (to worldly affairs) immediately got terrified when so cursed.

15. May (all) Brāhmaṇas and the Gaṅgā know me as the seeker of refuge with the Lord and as one whose mind is fixed on him. Let the cunning Takṣaka deputed by the Brāhmaṇa bite me to his satisfaction. Please sing the songs of Viṣṇu.

16. In whatever birth (form of existence) I may be born again, may I be attached to the Eternal Lord and be associated with those great persons who resort to him for shelter. Let my friendship be with all (like you). I bow to Brāhmaṇas. *

17. The brave king, who had thus made up his mind and placed the responsibility of governing the kingdom on his son, sat on the southern bank of the Gaṅgā on a seat of Kuśa grass the ends of which were towards the eastern direction, himself facing the north.

18. When the king of kings took his seat with the determination of fasting unto death, assemblies of gods in heaven,

(ii) In my case who am born in the family favoured by the Lord but am deeply attached to worldly objects (e.g. houses, wealth) and who have committed a sin (by insulting that Brāhmaṇa Śamika), the Supreme Lord, taking into account my birth in the family blessed with his grace, has assumed the form of the Brāhmaṇa's curse, the cause of non-attachment, but by attachment to whom one immediately become free from fear (by attaining his lotus-like feet)—JG.

482. maitrī—Let my outlook be of equality.—JG.

*This verse expresses the following last 4 desires of Parikṣit:
(i) Devotion to the Lord in every birth.
(ii) Close association with the devotee of the Lord.
(iii) Friendship to all beings.
(iv) Respect to Brāhmaṇas.

483. VJ. states that Parikṣit sat in a mansion on the bank of the Ganges as mentioned in the Mbh. (Obviously he refers to the Mbh. I.42, 29-32).
praising him, showered flowers on the earth with joy and kettle-drums were sounded again and again.

19. Having praised and approved (of the king’s vow of fast-unto-death) as ‘well done’, the great sages who assembled there and who had the nature and ability to bestow favours on subjects spoke to him what was beautiful due to the attributes of Hari.

20. Oh the best of royal sages, amongst you (kings of Pāṇḍu’s race) who are the followers of Kṛṣṇa, it is no wonder that when you desire to attain vicinity to the Supreme Lord, you instantaneously vacate the imperial throne served by tributary princes wearing crowns.

21. We shall all stay on here now till this foremost devotee of the Supreme Lord, casting off this (mortal) body, goes to the highest world free from illusion and affliction (grief).

22. Hearing the speech of the congregation of sages which was true, impartial, dripping with nectar, pregnant with meaning, Parīkṣit, complimenting the sages of composed mind, addressed them with a desire to hear the deeds of Viṣṇu.

23. Just as the Vedas appear in bodily forms (in the Satyaloka) above these three worlds, all of you have assembled here from all quarters. Being by nature disposed to do good to others, you have no other objective in this or the next world.

24. Oh Brāhmaṇas, with full faith in you, I specifically enquire about this worth-considering problem as to what one should do in all (types of) circumstances. Oh learned ones, carefully consider (and advise me) what (course of) action is sinless (and hence recommended) for persons about to die.

484. VR. takes uttama...rāpan as qualifying the king and interprets; ‘The great sages...praised the king charming on account of his qualities worth-praising by the great’, while V.J. connects it with the sages’ speech: ‘which was agreeable (conducive) to the description of the glories of Hari.’

485. bhāgavata-pradhānāḥ—who feels that votaries should always be served—VR.

486. Will go to Hari who is beyond the three attributes (guṇas), perfect and eternally devoid of misery—V.J.

487. virajaska—Full of pure Sattva-attribute—VR.
25. By lucky chance, there came wandering over the earth venerable (Śuka), the son of Vyāsa, (who was) devoid of all desires, and (who) did not bear any external mark (indicating his caste or stage of life) and was satisfied with the realisation of the self, appearing like one discarded by the society and surrounded by children (and women).

26-28. Those sages recognised him (Śuka) by his special marks though his powers were latent, and rose from their seats to receive him. He appeared sixteen years of age with tender feet, hands, thighs, arms, shoulders, cheeks and body; his face (appeared attractive) with wide beautiful eyes, prominent nose, symmetrical ears and beautiful eye-brows; his neck (was) shapely like a conch, collar-bones covered (with flesh); his chest was broad and elevated; his navel was like an eddy and belly beautified by folds; his clothing (were) the (four) quarters of the world (i.e. he was nude); his curly hair were dishevelled and arms were long upto the knee; he was beautiful like Hari (the best of immortals); he was of dark complexion and captivating to women by the splendour of the permanent youthfulness of his person and enchanting smile.

29. Then Viṣṇurāta (king Parīkṣit) also bowing down his head offered worship to the guest (Śuka) who had just arrived. Ignorant people, women and children then retired. Thus worshipped he (Śuka) occupied a high seat (offered to him).

30.∗ Surrounded by multitudes of Brāhmaṇa sages, royal sages and divine sages, the venerable (Śuka), the greatest among the great, appeared there extremely brilliant like the glorious moon in the midst of planets, constellations and stars.

31. Approaching that (comfortably) seated sage of serene mind and keen intellect, the devout, attentive king, with folded hands and head bowed down, paid respects (to him) and asked him in sweet words.

Parīkṣit said:

32. Oh Brahman! What a luck that we mean Kṣatriyas

35. Most probably Lord Kṛṣṇa to whom Pāṇḍavas were dear and who for the happiness of the sons of his paternal aunt (i.e. Pāṇḍavas) is disposed to be friendly to their family-descendants, is gracious to me.

36. Otherwise how is it possible for us—men especially those who are about to die, to obtain ample sight of yours whose movements are unmanifest to worldly persons and who have attained final beatitude and are the most solicitous (to bestow your favour).

37. Hence I ask of you who are an eminent preceptor of Yogins, what a man about to die, definitely should do (which will lead to) Final Beatitude.

SECOND SKANDHA

CHAPTER ONE

(The Discourse of Śuka—Description of the Cosmic Form of the Lord)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Oh king! Out of the topics which deserve to be (carefully) heard (studied etc.) by people, the excellent question posed by you, is very important as it is conducive to the good (final beatitude) of the people, and is acceptable to those who have realized the Soul.

2. Oh best of kings, there are thousands of topics which deserve to be heard (studied etc.) by persons who have not visualized the soul, and who are attached to the householder’s life (involving five types of sins related to that life).

3. Oh king! Life is taken away at night by sleep, in sexual enjoyment, (and evil desires); and by day, for earning money or for maintaining one’s family.

491. para—(i) Within the range of senses (of hearing etc.)—VR. (ii) The Supreme Soul—VJ. (iii) Pertaining to Śrī-Kṛṣṇa or by hearing which the highest goal in life is achieved—JG.

492. varīyān—(i) Worth undertaking (discussion)—VJ. (ii) Very great as compared with topics related to other incarnations—JG.

493. ātmāvit-sammataḥ—(i) approved of mainly by self-knowers like god Brahmā and others—VJ. (ii) Not that you (Parikṣit) have not realized the soul, but you, who have known the soul, have asked this question for the benefit of the world—SD.

494. VR. states: Persons in worldly life wish to hear thousands of topics, but a man desirous of liberation wishes to listen to (and concentrate) on the Brahman only.

495. In a householder’s life, there are generally five articles in the house, whereby living beings are hurt or destroyed. SD. enumerates them as follows: a fire place, a grind-stone (for milling food-grains), a broom, a mortar and a water pot. These prevent a householder from going to heaven. Also vide ASD p. 560. SD. quotes the following verse:

Kaṇḍāni, petaṇi, cuḷi, udakumbhi ca mārjani
Paṇca-sūṇā gṛhaustasya tābhīḥ svargam na gacchati //
4. Being attached to his body, children, wife and other attendants, dependents etc., even though they are unreal, he does not discern their destruction, though he actually sees them die.

5. Oh descendant of Bharata! Therefore, the glorious Hari ( reliever of bondage, of samsāra) the Supreme Lord, the all-pervading soul, should be heard about, eulogised and remembered by a person desiring a state, completely free from fear (i.e. the Final Beatitude or mokṣa).

6. Nārāyaṇa is remembered at the end of life (time of death), is the highest achievement of human life. This (maybe) due to Sāṅkhya—Yoga, and through knowledge and performance of one's duties.

7. Oh king! It is well-known (sma) that generally, sages who have turned away (abstained) from abiding by religious injunctions and prohibitions, and are established (absorbed) in the attributeless (nirguṇa) Brahman take delight in discoursing upon the qualities of Hari.

496. Sāṅkhya—(i) Accurate comprehension of the Soul and the non-Soul—ŚR.

499. Munayah—Those who are completely devoted to the meditation of Hari—SD.

500. niṣṭha-vidhi-sedhataḥ—(i) Not observing Vedic injunctions and prohibitions (to perform rites, with a desire to obtain some particular object or fruit, and to abstain from some actions)—VR.

(ii) Free from contamination of the merit or sin arising from the Vedic prescriptions—GD.

501. nairguṇya-nastāḥ—(i) Who meditate upon Brahman of pure sattva attribute, unalloyed by rajas and tamas—VR.

(ii) Liberated (muktaḥ) as nairguṇya—the Liberation granted by the Supreme attributeless Lord (Hari)—JG.

(iii) Established in their own soul who is above the three attributes—VB.
8. At the end of the Dvāpara Age, I learnt this Purāṇa called the Bhāgavata (‘narrated by the Supreme Lord’) which is comparable to the Vedas (or, which succinctly describes the Brahman), from my father Vyāsa.

9. Oh king-sage! Though I was firmly established in (the meditation of) the attributeless (nirguṇa) Brahman, I studied this (legendary) work, as my mind was fascinated with the sports of the Supreme Lord.

10. I shall narrate that (Purāṇa) to you, as you are a great devotee of the glorious god Viṣṇu. By entertaining faith in this (scripture), pure motiveless devotion to Mukunda is immediately created (in the faithful listeners).

11. Oh King! This chanting of the name of Hari (and meditating upon him etc.) has been prescribed as the sure means of attaining liberation for those deserving emancipation, and wishing freedom from the fear (of the cycle of rebirths), and for yogins.

12. What is the use of a number of years to a careless man, if they are wasted in ignorance? In this world, it is better to have a short duration of life, (muhūrtā or a period of 48 minutes), if one utilizes it for trying for final beatitude.

13. Having known the balance of life-period due to him in this world, the famous king-sage Khaṭvāṅga renounced everything in a short time (muhūrtā), and resorted to Hari, the liberator from the fear (of the cycle of rebirths).

14. While in your case, Oh descendant of the Kuru family, the duration of life is seven days (from now). Utilise all that time for what will help the attainment of the next

24. This special body of the Lord is the biggest among the big. In this (body) is seen the past, present and future universe of gross effects.

* Verses 26 to 37 describe the details of the Cosmic Man who is to be contemplated. VR. explains that these are to be meditated as that particular part of his body, e.g. Pātāla is to be contemplated as the sole of his feet etc. but VJ. specifically points out that Pātāla etc. are Not identical with the actual parts of his body which is characterised by bliss, energy etc. Pātāla etc. are the parts of the universe which are created from and are supported by his limbs.

30. The sky forms his eyes, (and) the Sun, the sense of seeing, and the day and night are eyelids of the All-pervading God (viz. Viṣṇu). His eyelashes are the Brahma-loka; water is his palate, (while) taste is his tongue.

35. It is traditionally known that the mahat (the Sāṁkhya principle of intelligence) is his intellectual power, and that Śiva is the internal organ (made up of manas, citta, ahamkāra and buddhi) of the Lord who dwells in the hearts of all; the horses, mules, donkeys and elephants are his nails; all beasts and deer are at his hips.

His middle part of the body is the Soul creating Havya (things worthy of being sacrificed). He possesses the means to help all sacrifices like agnistoma, etc.
should concentrate one’s mind on this very huge body of the Cosmic Man, by one’s own intellect (intellectual efforts), as there is nothing beyond this (or there is nothing greater).

39. Just as one sees all one’s relatives in a dream, he, the Soul, experiences everything directly by his power of intelligence. One should resort (develop oneself) to him who is the real, and a reservoir of bliss. He should not be attached to anything else, otherwise there will be a fall of the Soul.

CHAPTER TWO

(Liberation by the Yogic Path: Instantaneous and Gradual Liberation)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. By the grace of Hari who was pleased with the contemplation (dīhāraṇā) as described in the previous Chapter, god Brahmā (the self-born)\(^{518}\) regained his memory\(^{519}\) which was lost at the time of the deluge\(^{520}\) (pralaya). Determined to create\(^{521}\) (the world again), he (god Brahmā), with unerring insight, created the world again as (it was) before the deluge.

2*. Such is the path of verbal Brahman (the Vedas) that (as a result of the fruits of karmas promised therein) the \(^{519}\) VR. raises the objection that the occupant of the post of Brahmā is changed after the period of a Kalpa. The word ‘memory’ (smṛti) should be interpreted here as ‘the knowledge of the procedure of creation (sarga-viśnuaka-jñānamātra-parāḥ). VR. endorses this interpretation. VR. explains that god Brahmā, by his penance, could see things in their formative stage and could thus create them again, in this world.

* Other commentators agree in general about the substance of this verse. They, however, interpret some words differently. For example, SD: mind (wishfully) contemplates over the meaningless words (lit. names like heaven—svarga—etc.). Like a person who sees (empty) dreams (of pleasure) due to the impressions (left in the sub-conscious or deep mind), he, believing that there is happiness in the path of Māyā (Illusion), wanders (in various lokas—heavens etc. without getting real happiness) but does not realize his objectives, viz. unalloyed bliss (of Liberation).

3. [He explains away the doubt or difficulty that the absolute renunciation of the fruits of karmas would lead to instantaneous death].

Hence a thoughtful person\textsuperscript{521a} should accept that much quantity of objects of enjoyment as is essential for his purpose (of sustaining his life). He should not be attached (even to those objects so accepted) and be convinced (that there is no real happiness in them). When his object is otherwise achieved, he should see (understand) the (wasteful) labour (for attaining them) and should not make attempt for them.

4. When the earth is there, what is the propriety of efforts for bed? There is no necessity of pillows when (one is naturally) equipped with arms. When the hollow of folded hands is available, various kinds of vessels for food are super-

\textsuperscript{521a} "The intellect or mind of the follower of \textit{karma-path} longingly broods over names and forms (viz. wife, children etc.) unconnected with (liberation, the highest) goal of life, wanders in this ordinary world of Māyā and gets his objects in life (pleasures of the world according to his karmas) but not the \textit{yogic attainment (Liberation)}.''

The substance of \textit{VJ.'s} explanation is as follows:

The main subject of voluminously worded \textit{Veda} is (the description etc.) of Hari. The individual Soul who, due to the result of his acts (karmas), wanders through this transmigration of births and deaths (in this \textit{samsāra} which is the creation of God's will), contemplates in mind on meaningless words like Indra. These names are meaningless as they do not have the unlimited power etc. connoted by them. Hence one does not get the objects coveted in life by adoring them. Due to the study etc. (of the \textit{karma-kāya} in the Vedas) the mind is filled with empty names like heaven (svarga) etc. But such a person is attached to the world which is created by Māyā and does not achieve the real \textit{Puruṣārtha}, i.e. \textit{mokṣa} or liberation.

\textit{521a. Kaviḥ} (i) Omniscient—\textit{VJ.}

fluous. The silken cloths are unnecessary when the directions (cardinal points), bark-garments etc. are there.

5. Are there no tattered cloths(lying) on the way? Do not trees which support others (with their fruits etc.) give alms? Are the rivers dried up (devoid of water)? Are caves (in mountains) closed? Does not the unconquered Lord (Hari) protect those who seek his refuge? Why should the wise serve persons blinded with the pride of their wealth?

6. In this way, having fully realized the truth, and become full of bliss, one should meditate on the Soul (ātman) who is automatically existent in the heart, and who (being one's own) is lovable and real and who is the eternal (deathless) glorious Lord. Herein lies the end of nescience which is the cause of the transmigration of the Soul (sāṃsāra) and (leads to blissful liberation.)

7. When one sees people fallen in the river Vaitaraṇī (of sāṃsāra—worldly existence) and undergoing different types of sufferings as consequences of their past deeds, who else but the beast (the most dullard person) will neglect concentration on the Supreme Soul and indulge in evil concentration of worldly objects.

8. After concentration, some meditate upon the (Supreme) Man, spanful in height, dwelling in the inner space of the heart in the interior of their own body, and who has four arms holding (in each) a lotus, a disc, a conch and a mace.

9. As long as the mind remains steady in concentration, one should gaze fixedly on this Supreme Lord who manifests himself in meditation.

* VJ.'s interpretation:
When (by means of the previously described Path) the mind becomes controlled and quiet by the grace of Hari, the self-dependent Lord, one (the devotee) should realize that the Supreme Soul is far more lovable than one’s own body, kinsmen and other things and should resort to him so intensely that one's hair would stand on their ends. This leads not only to the end of Nescience, the cause of Sāṃsāra but also to the blissful stage of mokṣa (liberation).

522. Vaitaraṇī: The river of hell which must be crossed before entering the infernal regions. It is supposed to be full of blood and all kinds of filth and to run with great impetuosity —DHM 332.
9. The Lord of gracious looks, whose eyes are large like a lotus, whose garments are tawny like the filaments of the kadamba flowers, who wears gold bracelets shining with precious jewels and whose diadem and ear-rings are set with radiant precious stones.

10. The Lord whose sprout-like (tender) feet are installed by great yogins in the receptacle, at the centre of the full-blown lotus in the form of their heart, who bears the special mark of the Goddess of Wealth (called Śrīvatsa, on his left breast) and who wears the jewel called Kaustubha in his neck and who is beautified by garland of forest flowers (vanamālā) of unfading charm.

11. (The Lord) who is adorned with very costly anklets, bracelets, girdle, rings and similar other ornaments (studded with precious jewels and whose countenance is lovely on account of glossy, clean bluish ringlets of hair, is beaming with captivating smile.

12. (The Lord) who suggests his unlimited grace (to his devotees) by the free, sportive smile, and by the movement of his eyebrows in casting glances askance.*

13. Step by step one should concentrate by his decisive intellect, the parts of the body of Lord Kṛṣṇa (lit. the wielder of the mace), from his feet to his smiling countenance. As one's intellect gets purified, he should proceed from the part of his body realized in meditation (lit. conquered), and concentrate on the part of His body above it, the previous part.

14. So long as intense devotion (characterised by love for the Lord) is not generated in the Lord of the Universe, to whom gods are inferior, one should devoutly concentrate on the huge form of the han, after the completion of his daily religious routine.

15. Oh beloved king, when the recluse (i.e. the follower of the Path of Bhakti) desires to leave this world, he should adopt steady, comfortable posture and having controlled his breath (vital airs) he should not be attached, (i.e. take into account) time or period (such as summer solstice Uttarāyana) or place (e.g. a holy place on the bank of the Ganges etc.).

16. Having controlled one’s mind by purified intellect, one should absorb it into kṣetrajñā and merge it (kṣetrajñā) into the Soul and having merged one’s Soul into the Supreme Soul or Brahman, the wise person should cease from all activity, and should stay in tranquillity or peace.

17. For, Time, which dominates gods, is powerless there (in the highest stage), much less are gods who control the world, are dominant there. There is absence of the attributes, viz. sattva, rajas and tamas (from which the world is created). There is neither self-sense (ahāmkāra) nor the principal called mahat nor prakṛti (the primordial substance).

18.* They, who, realizing that whatever is different from it (Supreme Soul), is not really existent, are desirous of abandoning it, and who, avoiding the misconception of the identification of the Soul with the body etc., hug closely every moment to the feet of venerable Lord, by their heart, and their affection to nobody else but to him, regard that the abode of Viṣṇu is the ultimate one (to be achieved).

19. The meditative sage who is convinced (of his complete identity with Brahman) and who has burnt up all his attachments, by the power of the insight derived from the knowledge of Śāstras, passes away thus. He should press his anus

* According to SD: One should cease from all activity, embracing closely by heart the feet, i.e. the form of the venerable Viṣṇu every moment, and set aside the myth of one’s independent existence apart from Brahman. For the Vedāntas, (i.e. the Upaniṣads) which deal with nothing else but Brahman, and which exhort that whatever is not Brahman is unreal, and should be abandoned, regard the form of Viṣṇu as the most sublime.

According to Vīj: That excellent world is the most exalted place of Viṣṇu on whom devotees seeking liberation from the worldly existence, (i.e. the cycle of births and deaths) meditate and know him to be different from the elements (e.g. the earth, the ether) etc., or the subtle causes of these elements or their presiding deities. Thus they free themselves from worldly miseries and are fixed in firm devotion unto him. They embrace Lord Viṣṇu in their heart every moment and finally attain to him.
and lift up his vital air from that to the six places (cakras) described in Yoga-Sāstra, and rise above fatigue.

20. He should carry up the vital air residing in the navel (the manīpūra cakra indicated thereby) and take it to the heart (i.e. the anāhata cakra). Then by the course of udāna (the vital air which rises up the throat and enters into the head), he should take it to the viśuddha cakra (located a little below the throat). The mind controlling yogin, with great concentration and restraint, should slowly take it (vital air) to the root of his palate.

21. From that place (cakra), he should lift up the vital air to the ājñā cakra located between the two eyebrows, and with the seven outlets of the breath (viz. 2 ears, 2 eyes, 2 nostrils and mouth) closed down, and being free from all desires, he should stay for half of a muhūrta (about 24 minutes) or so. With a fixed gaze, he should penetrate through the crown of the head (called brahma-randhra) and give up the body and merge with Brahman.

22. Oh king! If he desires to go to the place of god Brahmā, or to the sporting grounds or places of enjoyment of the heavenly beings, or for the mastery of the eight superhuman faculties, or anywhere in the universe, he should go along with his mind and subtle organs of senses.

23. They say that the masters of yoga who have placed their subtle body (liṅga-sarira) into vāyu (or mind), possess the power of going anywhere inside and outside the three worlds. Persons (who follow the path of karma) do not attain by their karmas to that power which is attained by those who are engaged in devotion, penance, yoga and meditation.

24. By passing through the sky, he first goes to the place

525. These superhuman faculties are eight in number. They are enumerated as follows: atomization (yogin becoming atomized); levitation (yogin becoming light); magnification, extension (the yogin can touch the moon with his finger), efficacy (non-obstruction of desire of the yogin); mastery over the elements; sovereignty over the working of the elements and their products; capacity of determining things according to desire—Vide for details YSP iii. 45, pp. 278-280.

526. VJ. states that he goes to satya-loka as well. He increases his knowledge and attains the eight powers. of the divine fire (vaiśvānara). By the path of susumna [this tubular path is extended beyond human body, according to ŚR.], he goes by the shining path of Brahman and becomes completely free from impurity or attachment. Above that is the asterial cakra pertaining to Hari. Oh king! the yogin then proceeds to that cakra called taśumāra [which will be described in detail in the V Skandha].

25. Having crossed the place of Viṣṇu called taśumāra cakra which is like the navel of the universe (supporting stars etc.), he proceeds alone with very pure atomic body (subtle liṅga-sarīra) to a place where persons who know Brahman stay, and where having the longevity of one kalpa, these wise men enjoy themselves.

26. Then (at the end of the kalpa), seeing the universe being burnt down by the fire proceeding out of the mouth of the serpent Śeṣa, he (i.e. yogin) proceeds to the abode of parameśthin where the great siddhas stay in their celestial vehicles for a period of two parārdhas.

27. There is neither sorrow nor old age nor death nor affliction or fear except their mental trouble, out of compassion, at the sight of the endless series of births and unending misery of those who do not know this (path of devotion).

28.* Then fearlessly the yogin steadily unites his liṅga-sarīra with the elements—the subtle prthūī, and then the subtle element

527. This form of fire is supposed to cover in a way the universe. It is present in living beings in the form of digestion. In the universe, it gives heat and light, and thirdly he is the medium whereby the sages go to the abodes of gods, manes and Brahman.

It is supposed that the sage who leaves this mortal body by the píngalā passage in the right side of the body goes to heaven and the Path is called devayāna. Those who depart through the īḍā passage in the left side of the body, go to the abode of the manes, and the yogins who give up the body by the susumna passage, reach the Brahman. (Abridged from VJ.)

528. Parārdha = 100,000,000,000,000,000.

*According to ŚR., this verse describes what is technically known as the procedure of ‘breaking through the Universe or Brahmāgaṇa’. The creation of the universe has taken place as follows: God→prakṛti→mahat→āhamkāra—the subtle form of the sound→the element ether→the tanmātrās (subtle elements) of touch→Vāyu element→subtle ‘form’→the element fire→the subtle taste→the element water→subtle smell→the element earth. This is the visṛṣṭ body. This is enveloped by seven ‘covers’: the of water, and assuming the resplendent form of fire, without any haste, he reaches Vāyu and assumes the Vāyu form; then he becomes one with Ākāśa, the prominent symbol of the Perfect Soul.

29. Having reached smell by the sense of smell, taste by the sense of taste, colour by the visual organ, and touch by the sense of touch, sound, the special property of the sky, by the sense of hearing, the yogin reaches the activities of sense organs by means of the vital air (called prāṇa).

30. At first, having reached the self-sense (ahāṃkāra)—called vikārya, because its functions are different, he thus reaches where the subtle elements (bhūtas) and (subtle) organs of senses are withdrawn, and which is the cause of the mental (rājasamanomaya) effects as well as of the presiding deities of the organs of senses—the sāttvic self-sense (ahāṃkāra), the Yogi proceeds to the principle called mahat (or vijñāna) along with ahāṃkāra and to pradhāna or prakṛti (primordial matter) into which all the three attributes are merged.

31. Oh beloved King! Ultimately the yogin who is serene, in perfect bliss and free from (limiting) conditions, reaches the changeless Paramātman who is bliss incarnate. He who has achieved this glorious divine goal, does not have any attachment to the world again.

32. Oh King! These two paths (viz. of instantaneous Liberation and gradual Liberation) which are described in the Vedas and about which you enquired, are eternal. These were taught by the venerable Lord Viṣṇu to God Brahmā when, in ancient days, he worshipped and delighted the Lord, and asked him about those paths.

33. To the entrant in the worldly existence (saṃsāra), there is no other blessed path than this, by practising which, intense devotion unto the Supreme Lord Vāsudeva is created.

34. Lord Brahmā, having thrice studied the entire Veda with concentration, conclusively decided the course whereby intense love to the soul (Hari) is (definitely) generated.

covers of the five elements (e.g. earth, water etc.) and that of ahāṃkāra and mahat. So the process of breaking these envelopes is the reverse of creation, viz. the earth—the water etc. up to mahat.
35. In all beings (or the creation consisting of elements) the Lord Hari is seen (as the inner dweller—controller—antaryāmin) by intellect and other organs of senses (which by themselves are inert and cannot function without the light of the self-luminous soul or Hari), and which are merely characteristics or useful, as tools of inference.

36. Hence, Oh King, in all places and at all times, Lord Kṛṣṇa is the only object worthy of being studied, sung and remembered by men, with all their heart.

37. Those who drink this nectar, i.e. the account of glorious Hari, the Lord of the pious people, with vessels, in the form of ears, get their minds purified of the contamination of the worldly objects, and attain to his lotus-like feet.

CHAPTER THREE

(Devotion to Hari—the only path of Liberation)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. In this way, I have described to you this course (of study etc. about Hari, as prescribed in the Śāstras)—the course about which your honour asked me for the sake of wise and thoughtful persons among men, especially for those who are about to die.

2. One desirous of the glory of Vedic studies should worship the god Brahmā. He who desires to have power and skill of his sense-organs should worship Indra. He who wishes to have progeny should worship Prajāpati (like Dakṣa).

3. He who longs to have prosperity should propitiate the goddess Māyā (Durgā). One who desires to have personal brilliance should worship the fire-god. One wishing for wealth should worship the eight Vasus. A vigorous person desiring for more strength should propitiate the Rudras.

4. He who wishes to have ample food and eatables should worship Aditi, while he who desires to attain heaven (svarga), should propitize the sons of Aditi, viz. the twelve Ādityas. One desiring to possess a kingdom, should worship the Viśvedevas. One aspiring to control his subjects, should worship the Sādhyas.
5. One desiring a long life, should propitiate the Aśvin gods (both the Aśvinikumāras). He who desires to have increase in physical strength should worship the earth. A man desiring permanent firmness in his acquired position, should worship the Sky and the Earth, the parents of this world.

6. One who desires to have beautiful form, should worship the Gandharvas. One desiring to have beautiful women should worship the heavenly damsel Ħurvaśī. One who desires overlordship on all people, should worship god Brahmā (Parameṣṭhin).

7. One who seeks reputation or success, should worship Yajña, i.e. Viṣṇu. One aspiring after treasures should worship god Varuṇa. One wishing to have learning, should worship god Śiva, and for conjugal love, one should propitiate goddess Pārvatī (chastity incarnate).

8. For the sake of righteousness, one should worship Viṣṇu (the god whose glory is excellent). For the continuity of one's race, one should propitiate the manes (pitrās). One desiring protection from danger, should worship the Yakṣas. One desiring to have strength, should worship the gods called Maruts.

9. One who aspires after kingship or sovereignty, should propitiate Manus, the presiding deities of the eras (manvantaras). He who longs for the destruction of the enemies, should worship Nirṛti (rākṣasas). One desiring all kinds of enjoyments, should worship god Soma. (But) he who desires freedom from attachment or desires, should devote himself unto the Perfect or the Supreme Man.

10. He who wishes to have no desire at all, or aspiring after all kinds of enjoyments or longing to have Liberation due to the exaltedness of his intelligence, should intensely propitiate, by the path of devotion, the Perfect Man beyond limitations.

11. The attainment of the highest good is this much, in the case of the worshippers (of Indra etc.) in this world, but it is in the association of the devotees of the Supreme Lord that unswerving devotion unto the Lord is generated (that leads to Final Beatitude).

12. Is there anybody who, having got the blissful satisfaction (of listening to the stories of Hari which is unavailable elsewhere), would not love those episodes, from which arises the knowledge, which completely subsides all whirling waves of passions (like love, hatred etc.), and creates tranquillity of mind and non-attachment to the objects of senses, leading ultimately to the path of devotion which is regarded as the state of liberation itself here and hereafter.

Sāunaka said:

13. After carefully listening to what has been explained to him thus, what other query was again made by the king, the prominent among the Bharata race, to the son of Vyāsa (Śuka) who was a seer of parabrahman and well versed in the Vedic lore?

14. Oh learned Sūta! You should narrate that to us who are desirous of hearing, for, discourses in the assembly of the devotees of Lord Kṛṣṇa, must definitely lead to the episodes of Hari.

15. Verily, that great warrior king of the Pāṇḍava family, was a great devotee of Kṛṣṇa, as he used to worship Kṛṣṇa as a play, while playing with his toys in the childhood (Or he used to imitate the sports of Kṛṣṇa as a child, in his own childhood).

16. The venerable son of Vyāsa was an ardent devotee of Vāsudeva. When there is a meeting of the pious devotees of Kṛṣṇa, there must be (the discussion about) the great episodes or excellent virtues of Hari (lit. the god who is greatly praised in the Vedas).

17. This rising and the setting sun verily takes away the life of men, except that period used in discussion etc. about Kṛṣṇa, (the god whose reputation lifts the devotee from darkness or tāmas).

18. Do not the trees live? Or do not the bellows breathe? Do not the domestic or other beasts eat and have sexual enjoyment?

19. The man, to whose ears the name of Kṛṣṇa (the elder brother of Gada) has not reached, is described as similar to (despicable animals like) dogs, swine, camels and donkeys.

20. The ears of the man, which do not hear the exploits of Kṛṣṇa, are verily like empty holes. Oh Sūta! the tongue which does not sing of Lord Kṛṣṇa, is evil like that of a frog's.

21. The head (though the best part of the body), even if adorned with turban or a crown, is a great burden, if it does not bow to Mukunda. Or hands, which are adorned with bright gold bangles, are like the hands of a dead body, if they do not worship Hari.

22. The eyes of men, which do not carefully see the images of Viṣṇu, are like the eyes (i.e. the big bright spots on the feathers) of peacocks. The feet of men which do not go on pilgrimage to the sacred places of Viṣṇu, are mere vegetations like trees.

23. A mortal, who does not get the dust of the feet of the devotees of the Lord, is as good as a carcass even though alive. The man who has not smelt the fragrance of the Tulasī leaves placed at the feet of Lord Viṣṇu, is only a breathing corpse.

24. The heart, which at the time of taking different names of Hari, is not moved, and the change in it is not indicated by tears in the eyes, and bristling of the hair on the body through excessive joy, is verily the hardest granite.

25. Oh beloved Sūta! whatever you speak is dear to our hearts. Please narrate to us what did the great Bhāgavata, the son of Vyāsa, who was well-versed in the knowledge of the Soul and who was well questioned, say to the king?

CHAPTER FOUR

(Creation of the Universe)

Prayers to Hari

Sūta said:

1. Having heard Śuka's speech, which led to the definite understanding of the real nature of the Soul, Parīkṣit (the son of Uttārā) set his virtuous and steady mind on Kṛṣṇa.
2. He renounced attachment which was always sticking (to his mind), to his body, wife, sons, palace, cattle, wealth, kinsmen and kingdom well equipped with the seven constituent elements of the state (enumerated in works on politics).

3. He, a man of noble mind and intense faith in listening to the great deeds of Kṛṣṇa, asked him (Śuka) the same topic which you, the greatest among good persons, ask me.

4. Having understood the approach of death and having renounced duties pertaining to the three Purusārthas, viz. dharma, artha and kāma, he with great love or devotion for the Lord, solely devoted himself to self-realization in Lord Vāsudeva.

5. Oh sinless Brāhmaṇa! The words of an omniscient person (like you) are quite good (correct). While you tell me the episodes of Hari, the darkness of my ignorance is dispelled.

6. I again wish to know how the Lord has created this universe by His Cosmic Power (Māyā)—the universe which is beyond the comprehension of great gods (such as Brahmā).

7. Also I wish to know by resorting to what powers the Supreme Man of infinite power, creates, protects and destroys (this universe again) and how he sports himself directly and indirectly (through Brahmā and other gods).

8. Oh Brāhmaṇa! Really the actions of Hari of mysterious and wonderful deeds, appear incomprehensible even to very wise people (what of a person like me!).

9. Whether it is simultaneously or one after another in succession, that he assumes the different attributes of Prakṛti, in order to do his work through many incarnations.

10. As your honour is verily well-versed in the Vedic lore and in the knowledge of Parabrahman, Your Worship may kindly explain this doubt to me.

Śūta said:

11. Śuka, who was thus solicited by the king, to describe the attributes of Hari, meditated on Kṛṣṇa and began to address.
Śrī Suka said:

12. Salute to the Perfect Man of infinite power, who by his sport of creating, sustaining and destroying this world, has assumed three powers, viz. Rajas (Brahmā) etc. [or 'will, wisdom and action which are eternally in him'].

13. I offer my salutations again and again to him who removes the afflictions of the good, who curbs down the growth of the irreligious, who orders all gods of Sāttvic body 529 to bestow fruits (upon the devotees, and who confers the knowledge of the self upon those who have established themselves in the order of Parama Hamsas.

14. I bow again and again to the protector of the Sāttvatas (or his devotees) who is beyond the reach of devotionless persons. Salutations to him, who being by nature unequalled and insurmountable, enjoys himself in his natural condition.

15. Salutation to him of auspicious fame; (as) to praise him, to remember him, to look at him, to bow to him, to hear about him and to adore him, immediately purifies sins of men.

16. I bow again and again to him of auspicious glory, by resorting to whose feet, the wise men shed off their heart's attachment here and hereafter, and without any trouble, attain to the state of Brahman.

17. I salute again and again to him, without offering whom (the fruit of one's actions), none can attain happiness (or peace), even though they perform penance, or are very charitable or have attained (high) reputation, or practised Yoga, or are knower of very auspicious mantras, or are of pure conduct.

18*. The Kirātas, the Hūnas, the Āndhras, Pulindas, Pulkasas, Ābhīras, Kakas (Śakas), Yavanas, Khāsas and other (sinful) tribes and other sinners are purged of their sins even by taking refuge in those who depend on him. To that Almighty Lord, we offer our greetings.

19*. May the Divine Lord be propitious unto me—the Lord who is (to be meditated as) the Soul, by the knowers of the Soul, as the Supreme God, by the devotees, as the three Vedas incarnate by the followers of Karma kāṇḍa, as the veritable dharma by the followers of dharma (religion), as Hūnas—The famous invading tribes from central Asia who established their dynasties in India.

Āndhras—According to the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, a non-Aryan tribe living on the southern fringe of Āryāvarta. Formerly they were in the Vindhya region. Their settlement to the south in the present Andhra Pradesh is a later development.

Pulindas—An aboriginal tribe mentioned along with the Āndhras in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa. They inhabited the Vindhya region upto 600 A.D.

Pulkasas or Pukkasa in Manu—An outcaste people.

Ābhiras—A foreign people who entered India at about the Śaka invasion and went on migrating from the Punjab till they settled in north-west Deccan. They are reported to have defeated Arjuna and carried away Yādava women.

Kankaśas—Śakas. The original home of these people was in the valley of the Oxus and Jaxartes.

Tawanas—The Indo-Greeks who ruled in the north-western part of India.

Khasas—Identified with modern Khakkas who live in Kashmir.

*VJ. interprets: May the Supreme Soul be gracious unto me—Soul who is the Supreme Lord to those who have directly realized Brahman (and have attained liberation), as the Lord is favourable to the followers of the Veda, dharma (path of duties prescribed by scripture) and penance and whose characteristics (e.g. creation of the world etc.) have been inferred by sincere devotees like Brahmā, Śiva etc.

530. ātmavatām—(i) Steadfast in pure Yoga—VR.
   (ii) Those who have directly realized Brahman or attained liberation—VJ.
   (iii) Those who have realized the non-difference from Brahman—GD.

531. trayi-mayah—(i) follower of the householder’s duties, e.g. agni-hotra prescribed in the Vedas—SD.
   (ii) the students of Veda to worship it in the form of three Vedas—GD.

532. dharma-mayah—(propitiated) by followers of the duties of celibates—SD.
the goal (to be achieved), by performers of penance, the Lord, whose form is observed with great amazement by sincere worshippers like gods Brahmā, Śaṅkara etc.

20. May the Lord—protector of the good, be gracious unto me—the Lord, who is the master of the goddess of Wealth, the Lord of Sacrifices of all beings, the controller of mental or intellectual faculties, the protector of the worlds, the Lord of the earth, the Lord and protector of Andhaka, Vṛṣṇi and Śāttvata clans.

21. May Lord Mukunda (Kṛṣṇa) be propitious unto me by constant meditation of whose [Kṛṣṇa’s] feet, the wise purify their intellect and realize the true nature of the soul, and whom the wise describe as attributeful or attributeless (according to their taste or capacity).

22. May the most Excellent Sage be gracious to me—the sage who formerly (at the beginning of the creation) existed, i.e. awakened, the memory regarding the (procedure of) creation (of the universe) in the heart of Brahmā, and who directed the goddess Sarasvatī (the verbal form of the Veda) along with its characteristic supplements (e.g. śikṣā, vyākaraṇa etc.) to issue from the mouth of Brahmā.

23. May the venerable Lord grace (beautify) my words—the Omnipresent Lord, having created these bodies with five gross elements (or with mahaḥ and other elements) lies (dwells) within them as antaryāmin and becomes (even etymologically) the real Puruṣa—one who lies in a town, i.e. body). He illumines and protects the sixteen qualities (i.e. the constituents) of the body (viz. 11 sense organs and 5 elements), by inspiring with life these sixteen.

(ii) performers of sacrifices should worship him as dharma—GD.

533. tapo-mayah—(worshipped) by the followers of vānaprastha and sannyāsa āśramas—SD.

Performers of penance should propitiate him as Taṇas.

534. bhunkte....ṣoḍaśātmakaḥ—VR. explains that the Lord possessing the sixteen constituents, viz. eleven sense organs and five elements, enjoys the sixteen ‘qualities’ viz. five objects of senses, e.g. sound, touch etc., five functions of organs, e.g. speech etc., five functions of Prāṇas or vital breaths and mind.
24. I bow to the venerable Vyāsa, the learned author of the Mahābhārata etc., from whose lotus-like mouth his gentle disciples drank the honey in the form of knowledge.

25. Oh King, the Self-born God (Brahmā), the source of the Vedas, explained this to the enquiring Nārada, which was directly narrated to him (Brahmā) by Hari.

CHAPTER FIVE

(Creation of the Universe)

Dialogue between Nārada and Brahmadeva

Nārada said:

1. Oh God of gods! Oh Creator of all creatures! Oh the ancestor of all beings [one who is born before all]! I bow to you. Please explain to me in detail the knowledge which leads to the thorough realization of the true nature of the Soul (ātman).

2. Oh Lord! Please tell me factually what it is that manifests itself in this form of the world. What is the support of it all? From what is it created? Into what is it merged or withdrawn? In whose power does it lie? Of what does it consist (whether of itself or as an effect of some cause)?

3. Verily Your Honour knows everything about this, as you are the master (lord) of the past, the present and the future. The whole universe is definitely and correctly known to you.

VB. gives in detail how the Lord divides himself in different 'enjoyer-enjoyed' pairs (e.g. man—woman) and sports himself in the enjoyment of the world.

535. Here the reading in the Nirmaya Sagara edition (Bombay 1905) is followed. The text before VJ. reads......Vāsudevāya vedhase—VJ. interprets this differently:

(i) Salute to the Lord Vāsudeva from whose lotus-like mouth Brahmā and others, who deserved to drink the Soma-juice of knowledge, drank the honey of knowledge.
Thus taking saumya as (i) Uddhava and others, (ii) Nārada and others (iii) Vyāsa and others, (iv) Vaiśampāyana and others, the salutes are offered to Kṛṣṇa, god Brahmā, Nārada and Vyāsa respectively.
like the āmalaka (Embic myrobalan) fruit on the palm of your hand.

4. What is the source of your special knowledge? What is your support (who supports you)? In whose power are you? What is your real nature? I think you alone create all these beings, with the elements, by your divine power (māyā).

5. You protect those (beings) depending on you, and there is no transformation in you, even though, without any fatigue you create (these beings) by your power, like a spider producing the fibre.

6. Oh Lord! I do now know anything else, whether it is of superior, equal or inferior status which is created with names (such as men etc.), with form (such as bipeds etc.), or with attributes (such as whiteness etc.), or whether it is gross or subtle—which has a source in anybody else but you.

7. But you (as described above) performed austere penance with perfect concentration. You, thereby, create a suspicion in us if there is any God superior to you.

8. Oh Omniscient Master of all! Please explain to me who am asking you this, so that I may understand the truth as explained by you.

Brahmā said:

9. Oh child! Your query is really praiseworthy. You are compassionate (to all beings). Oh gentle child! You have therefore made me describe in detail the glory of the Lord.

10. Oh child! What you (think and) say about me is not untrue as you do not know the Power higher than I, from which (I receive) this much power (as described by you).

11. I shed light on (i.e. manifest) the universe which has already been lightened by him by his lustre, just as the Sun, the fire, the Moon, constellations, planets and stars shine due to his splendour.

12. Salutations to the venerable Vāsudeva. We meditate on him deluded by whose invincible power—Māyā—people call me the cause of the universe.

13. Persons being beguiled by her (Māyā) who fights shy of standing in the range of his sight, get their knowledge covered by Nescience, and boast that "this is mine and I" (i.e.
I am an independent agent).

14. Oh Brahman, whether it is substance (e.g. five elements, the material cause of this world,) deed or karman (the cause of samsāra), Time, Nature, or individual Soul—there is nothing distinct and apart from Vāsudeva.

15. All the Vedas ultimately speak of Nārāyaṇa (implying the omniscience etc. mentioned in Śāstrayonitva of the Brahma-sūtra). Gods are born out of Nārāyaṇa's body (and hence inferior to him). The words such as heaven or svarga are Nārāyaṇa (or all beings regard Nārāyaṇa as supreme). All sacrificial acts are for the propitiation of Nārāayaṇa.

16*. Yoga (breath control, contemplation etc.) is meant for the realization of Nārāyaṇa. All penance is for the attainment of Nārāyaṇa. Nārāyaṇa is the highest object of knowledge.
The final beatitude depends on Nārāyaṇa. (Or Nārāyaṇa is the highest goal).

17. Being directed by the glance of the Almighty who is the soul of all, (who is the Antaryāmin), the Seer, the Control-er, the Changeless one, I who am created by him, create this universe which is his creative activity or creation.

18. Though he is attributeless, he, through his Māyā, has assumed the three attributes, namely, sattva, rajas and tamas, for the maintenance, creation and dissolution (of the universe).

19. These attributes which are at the basis of the five elements (i.e. mahābhūtas), knowledge (i.e. the gods) and activity (the senses and organs) always bind the individual Soul in effects, cause and agency (known as adhibhūta, adhyātma, adhi-daiyata respectively. Though he is really free, he is enveloped by Māyā.

536. Nārāyaṇa-para—Nārāyaṇa is the ultimate cause of the Vedas—
VR. (ii) Vedas propound or declare that Nārāyaṇa is the Supreme Being—VR. (iii) Vedas say that out of the topics described by them, Nārāyaṇa is the highest and the best—VJ.

*Cf. Bh.P. I.2.28-29, where Vāsudeva is used for Nārāyaṇa.

537. VJ. explains: Drāvyā (matter) is the body produced by tāmasa ahankaṇa. jñāna (knowledge) is the mind and other organs of senses
20. Oh Brahman! This is the glorious Lord Viṣṇu (adhokṣaja) whose movements are incomprehensible through these three attributes (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas). He is my lord as well as that of all others.

21. The lord of Māyā desiring to be many (i.e. assuming different forms) accepted as cause, time, action (the fate of jīva) and the innate disposition which accidentally (through his will) appeared in him through his Māyā.

22. It is due to the presence or direction of God that Time became the cause of the imbalance in the three attributes (guṇas), innate nature the cause of modifications or transformations, and karma as the cause of mahat.

23. Mahat which is magnified by or charged with rajas and sattva, undergoes modifications and evolves a thing in which tama is dominant, and the thing is constituted of substance or gross elements, organs of senses and deities presiding over the organs.

24. That evolute is known as ahamkāra (I-ness), which undergoing modifications, becomes of three kinds—(1) vaikārika (sāttvika), (2) taijasa (rūjasa), (3) tāmasa. It constitutes the power in substance or gross elements, power in activity, i.e. organs of senses and power in the presiding deities of the senses.

25. From the tāmasa ahamkāra, known as the source of elements (Bhūtādi) which underwent modifications, was evolved the ether (the sky). Its subtle form and special characteristic is sound (śabda) which leads to the knowledge of the seer and the seen.

created by Vaikārika ahamkāra. Kriyā (activity) is the speech and other functions of senses. These are produced by taijasa ahamkāra.

538. sva-laksita-gatiḥ—(i) Whose cause is comprehensible to his devotees only—ŚR., VJ.
(ii) Whose cause is perceptible to the liberated ones.—SD.

539. According to VJ. this describes the creation of mahat from the primeval Prakṛti. When Viṣṇu desired to create the universe, at that time the balance of the guṇas became disturbed, and by the favourable condition of the odṛṣṭa (karma) of Hiranyagarbha, and by the transformable nature of mūla prakṛti, and being presided over by Viṣṇu, the principle mahat was produced.
26. Out of the ether undergoing transformation emerged Vāyu (air), the characteristic quality of which was Touch. Being an evolute of the other, i.e. the sky, it possesses the quality Sound, and it is the cause of life, vigorousness of senses, mind and the body.\textsuperscript{540}

27. Due to (the pressure or force of) Time, Karma (the unseen i.e. adṛṣṭa) and innate disposition, Vāyu, i.e. air, underwent modifications, and tejas (fire or heat), possessing colour and form (and inheriting the characteristics of the previous elements, viz.) touch and sound, was evolved.

28. From tejas undergoing change, was produced water with taste as its special characteristic. Through inheritance from the previous elements, water possessed the characteristics viz., form, colour, touch and sound.

29. Out of water undergoing transformation came forth the earth or the viśesa, with smell as its special attribute, and inheriting from its previous causes, the attributes of taste, touch, sound and form or colour.

30. From the vaikārika or sāttvic ahamkāra (sāttvic ego)\textsuperscript{*} were born the Mind (and its presiding deity the Moon) and the ten gods, five presiding over the five sense organs, viz. Diś (deity of cardinal points), Vāyu, Sūrya, Varuṇa and Āśvins (presiding over the sense organs—ears, skin, eyes, tongue, nose) and the other five, viz. Vahni (fire-god), Indra, Upendra, Mitra (the sun) and Ka (i.e. Prajāpati) presiding over the conative organs (viz. speech, hands, feet, the anus and the organ of generation).

31. From the taijasa (rājasa) ahamkāra, undergoing change, were evolved the ten organs (five cognitive and five conative sense organs detailed above) viz. the ear (audition), the skin (touch), the nose (smell), the eye (seeing), the tongue (taste), speech, hands, feet, penis and anus. Intelligence or the power of cognition or knowledge and Prāṇa, the power of conation, were evolved out of the taijasa ahamkāra.

32. Oh knower of Brahman or Vedas! So long as these, viz. bhūtas (the elements), indriyas (sense-organs), the mind and the gunas were unamalgamated, they were not able to create the body.

33. Then directed by the will of God, they came together and were assimilated with one another as the main and the subsidiary (or the manifest and the unmanifested) constituents, and brought forth this (body of gross and subtle constituents or collective and distributive aggregates).

34. At the end of thousands of years (during the Deluge), with the help of kāla (time), karma (action and destiny) and svabhāva (innate disposition) the Supreme Soul (who enlivened these and hence was called jīva) brought life into the egg (of the universe) of unmanifested life.

35. This very Supreme Man possessing thousands of thighs, feet, arms, eyes and thousands of mouths and heads came out bursting open the egg (brahmāṇḍa).

36. The wise locate the different worlds in the body of the Supreme Man, as seven worlds below his loins and seven worlds above, commencing from his hip upwards.*

The Lord, by his Power, assimilated them into the cosmic egg (brahmāṇḍa) and later infused life into it. The viṛāṭ puruṣa with thousands of heads, feet etc. and with seven upper and seven lower regions located in his body came out and the creation, preservation and destruction of the universe followed.
37. The Brāhmaṇa class is the mouth of this Man. Kṣatriyas are his arms. From the thighs of the lord was created the Vaiśya class and the Śūdra came forth from his feet. 543
38. The Bhūr-loka was created from his feet, the Bhuvav-loka from his navel. From the heart of the Great Being was produced the Svar-loka, and from his chest, the Mahar-loka.
39. On his neck is based the Jana-loka, and the Tapo-loka* came from his lips. The Satya-loka is created from the heads. Brahma-loka is eternal (and therefore not created).
40. The nether region Atala is located in his loins. Vitala* depends on the thighs of the lord. On his knees rests the holy Sutala (holy due to the residence of the devotees of the Lord) and Talātala is based on his shanks.
41. His ankles support Mahātala, and the forepart of his feet, the Rasātala. The Pātāla is created from the soles. In this way the body of the Supreme Man consists of all the worlds.
42. Or this arrangement of worlds (is differently given): the Bhūr-loka has been created from his feet and the Bhuvav-loka from his navel and the Svar-loka from his head.

CHAPTER SIX

(Description of the Vīraṭ Puruṣa—exposition of the Puruṣa Sūkta—RV. 10.90)

1. The mouth of the Cosmic Man (Vīraṭ Puruṣa) is the place, i.e. the source of the speech organs and its presiding deity the Fire. The seven essential ingredients (dhatu) such as saliva, blood, flesh, fat, bones and others of his body are the 542. Cf. RV. X. 90.12.

*ŚR. alternatively interprets: Tapo-loka was created from his breasts. He adds that for contemplation there is no difficulty if the breasts which are downwards in position from the neck, are taken as the source of the Tapo-loka).

 This chapter presents the epic concept of the Cosmic Man which was first elaborated in RV. 10-90 (the Puruṣa-Sūkta). This is not exactly a commentary on the Puruṣa-Sūkta but it is an elaboration of the Vedic concept of the Cosmic Man. Naturally, as pointed out by B. Bhattacharya in the Philo. of the Śrīmad-Bhāgavata, Vol. I, 150-38, 305-306 etc., this epic concept is philosophically much more advanced than the Vedic concept.
bases of the seven Vedic metres, (viz., Gāyatrī, Uṣṇik, Anuṣṭubh, Brhati, Pankti, Triṣṭubh and Jagati). His tongue is the source of food, viz., Havā (the food oblated to gods), Kayā (the food given to the manes—Pitṛs), Amṛta (the food remaining after having offered to gods and manes), and all flavours (viz. sweet, sour, pungent, bitter, saline and astringent)—and Varuṇa, their presiding deity.

2. His nostrils are the best places or abodes of all vital airs and of (their presiding deity) Vāyu. His organ of smell is the abode of the two Aśvini-kumāras (the physicians of gods), medicinal herbs and plants, general and special smells.

3. His cognitive sense of sight is the source of forms, colours and lights manifesting them, while the sky and the sun are produced in the pupils of his eyes. His ears are the bases of directions and holy places, while his sense of hearing is the source of the ether (the sky) and (its guṇa) sound (śabda).

4. His body is the base of the essences of all things and their beauty. His skin or organ of touch is the source of touch, Vāyu and all kinds of sacrifices.

5. His hair (on the body) are at the root of all the trees, herbs and plants, supplying the material for sacrifices, while his hair, beard and nails produce rocks, iron, clouds and lightning.

6. His arms are the support of the presiding deities of the cardinal points whose duty is to protect the world. His paces—footsteps—are the support of the three worlds—Bhūr, Bhuvah, Swar and of security (protection of the possession) and refuge (protection from danger).

7-8. The feet of Hari are the abode of the seekers of all desired objects. His penis is the source of waters, seminal fluid, creation, rain and Prajāpati. His organ of generation is the source of the gratification (satisfaction) culminating in the joy of the offspring. His anus is the base of Yama, of Mitra (the Sun) and the act of discharging (the faeces), oh Nārada.

9. His rectum is stated to be the source of violence or harm, goddess of misfortune (Alakṣmi), of death and hell. His back-side is the source of defeat, irreligion and Tamas (ignorance).

10-11. His arteries and veins (blood vessels) are the source of rivers, big and small. And his skeleton of bones, that of mountains and hills. His belly is known to be the source or place of the unmanifested primordial matter (pradhāna), the essence in food, oceans and the destruction of all beings. His heart is the source of the mind, i.e. of the subtle body (Līṅga Śarīra). The ātman, i.e. citta (reason) of the Supreme Man is the ultimate source of religion, of myself, of yourself, of the four boy-(celibate) sages (Sanaka, Sanandana etc.), Śiva, of knowledge and of Sattva (the quality of goodness).

12-17.* Myself, yourself, Rudra, the elders (Sanaka, Sanandana etc.) and sages (e.g. Marici and others), Gods, demons, men, Nāgas (elephants), birds, deer and reptiles, demigods like Gandharvas, Yakṣas, Apsaras (celestial damsels), Rākṣasas, goblins, serpents, beasts, manes (Pitrīs), Siddhas, Vidyādharas, Cāraṇas and trees and other various kinds of beings living in water, on land and in the air, planets, stars, comets, lightning and thundering, clouds—all are nothing but the manifestation of this Supreme Man. The universe of the past, present and future has been encompassed (encompassed) by him, and he still stands in the span-ful portion in the heart. Just as Prāṇa, i.e. Āditya, the Sun-god, illuminates his own sphere as well as outside (the world beyond it.) so the Supreme Man enlightens (the inside and outside of) the universe (the Virat Śarīra). He is the ruler of Lord of mokṣa—liberation or immortality which is free from fear, and hence he renounced (i.e. he is above) the mortal (and hence momentary) enjoyment of the fruits of action. He is not only within all but is a lord of immortality and his own bliss.

18.-19. Oh Brahman! The greatness and power of the Cosmic Man are boundless. They (the knowers) understand that all beings are abiding in the three worlds—Bhūḥ, Bhuvah, Svar—which are the feet, i.e. the feet-like amśas of the Cosmic Man who is (hence called) sthiti-pād. He has placed amṛta (deathlessness), kṣema (absence of troubles) and abhaya

Vv. 17*, 18*, 19*, 20*. The SK. text is an echo of RV. X. 90. 2-4.

543. VJ. explains amṛta as anantāsana (the seat formed by Śeṣa), Kṣema (that which annihilates the trouble of death, i.e., Vaikunṭha) while abhaya is Cosmic Waters of Nārāyaṇa, i.e. Nārāyaṇa himself or Śvetadvipa. Hari has supported these regions on his three heads. He(VJ) offers another (state of freedom from fear, mokṣa) respectively in the three worlds, viz. Jana, Tapas and Satya which are situated above the Maharloka. The three āstrams (states of life) which do not procreate children, i.e. Brahmacarya, Vānaprastha and Sannyāsa are his three feet which are outside the three worlds (viz. Bhūḥ, Bhujāḥ, Svar), while the other state of life, viz. that of householders who do not observe strict celibacy are within the three worlds (viz. Bhūḥ, etc.).

20. The Supreme Man as kṣetrajña (individual Soul) crossed both the paths, viz. the one characterised by avidyā or ignorance and karma leading to worldly enjoyments, and the other, by vidyā or knowledge and its means, viz., upāsanā (religious meditation). But the Cosmic Man is the support of both the paths.

21*. God is transcendental to the matter from which the Cosmic egg (Brahmāṇḍa) and the Virāṭ consisting of bhūtas (gross elements like the earth etc. or created beings), indriyas (sense organs) and guṇas (objects of sense organs) are born, just as the Sun, which warms and illumines the universe, is distinct from it.

22. When I was born out of the lotus in the navel of this Supreme Man, I did not know the materials needed for performing the sacrifices except the limbs of this Man.

23-26. These materials for the sacrifice were collected by me as they were procured from his limbs: sacrificial animals along with the trees required for sacrificial posts, the kusa grass, specific piece of land for sacrifice, the most auspicious time (e.g. the Spring), things (utensils, spoons, etc. required for sacrifice), herbs and other vegetable products (e.g. rice), ghee, honey and other sweet liquids, metals such as gold etc., (differ-

*Explanation: Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Maheśvara are His three heads which support the regions called Satya, Vaikuṇṭha and Kailāsa wherein are placed āmsa etc. These are outside the three worlds, viz. the earth (bhū) and others and are abodes of god Brahmā who has not begotten any son. VR. however briefly sums up that the three outer regions (feet) are for the liberated ones who are beyond the jurisdiction of Prakṛti, while the fourth foot is inside the three worlds and is meant for householders.

*According to Vī., Hari originally created the Cosmic Egg, from which Virāṭ, viz. Brahmā, was born. He was the support of bhūtas, indriyas and guṇas.
ent kinds of) earths, water, the texts of the Rgveda, the Tājurveda and the Sāmaveda, Vedic ceremony called cāturhotra, names of sacrifices like the Jyotiṣṭoma, the Mantras from Rgveda etc.
(followed by suāhā), ākṣīnā (gifts to Brähmaṇas at the end of sacrifice), orātas (special observances), the specific order and special invocation of deities, kalpa (procedure of performing sacrificial acts), saṅkalpa (the formal statement of undertaking the sacrifice etc.) and the technique of performing sacrifice, movements such as Viṣṇukrama at the end of sacrifice, contemplations of deities, expiatory ceremony for mistakes of omission and commission, and offering everything to God as his own.

27-28. In this way, I who collected materials for sacrifice, from the limbs of the Puruṣa, worshipped the great God, a personification of Yajña, by performing sacrifice to propitiate him. Then your brothers, these nine progenitors of subjects (prajāpatis) worshipped, with perfect concentration of mind, the Puruṣa, (though himself unmanifested, but) manifested as Indra etc.

29. Then Manus and other sages, manes (Pitr̥), gods, demons, and men, in their own times, propitiated the Omnipresent God, by performing sacrifices.

30. This universe is placed, i.e. rested on the glorious Nārāyaṇa who, though attributeless, assumes by his Māyā qualities at the beginning of the creation.

31. Under his direction, I create (the universe); Hara or Śiva who is under his power, dissolves it, and he, in the form of Puruṣa i.e. Viṣṇu, protects it by means of his Māyā.

32. Oh child! In this way, I have narrated to you whatever you have asked me. In creation, which is of a causal nature (or which is manifest and unmanifest) there is nothing wherein he does not exist.

33. As I have meditated upon the lord with intensely devoted heart, my speech is never observed to be untrue, nor my mind goes to paths other than the truth, nor my sense organs leave the proper path (go to the path of untruth).

34. Though I am regarded as Veda incarnate (full of Vedic knowledge), and full of penance (tapas), and I am greatly respected as the chief of Prajāpatis, and though following yogic practice, I am perfect in meditation, I have not understood from whom I am born.

35. I bow to his feet which destroy the samsāra of those who resort to them (feet)—the feet which bring happiness and are very auspicious. He has not thoroughly comprehended the power or capacity of his own Māyā, just as the sky does not know its end. How can others comprehend?

36. Neither I, nor you, nor God Śiva or Vāmadeva could understand his real nature. How can other celestial beings know it? We, whose intellects are stupefied by his Māyā, think that we comprehend the universe created (by Māyā)
according to our capacity of knowledge.

37. I bow to the glorious lord whose incarnations and deeds we and others sing, but we do not know his essential or real nature.

38.* This is the first Puruṣa, the unborn, who in every Kalpa creates himself with himself as the substratum, and the instrument (lit. he creates ātmān within the receptacle of himself through himself) and protects it and destroys it.

39. His real nature is absolute, real knowledge which is pure (unrelated to viṣaya or object), underlying the interior of all, accurate (and hence above doubt), changeless and attrib-uteless. Being the Truth, it is perfect, full, beginningless and endless (with no changes like birth, death, increase, decrease etc.), eternal and alone (without a second).

40. Oh sage! Sages realize him, when their minds, senses and reason become serene and pure. But the Truth disappears from their sight when it is attacked by the reasoning of non-believers.

41-43. Puruṣa (the inspirer of Prakṛti, described as ‘thousand-headed etc. in the Puruṣa Śūkta) is the first incarnation of the Supreme Spirit.

* According to VJ., it is this same Puruṣa who is ātmān, i.e. Nārāyanā, the first of all and has no birth like other beings. According to his own will, he incarnates as Māitya, Kūrma from age to age. He protects gods and men devoted to him on his own support and he destroys the daityas.

 VJ. explains: The knowledge is pure (defectless), absolute (not depending upon others), within all and facing all, well-established, i.e.
above doubts, eternally blissful, perfect from the point of space, time and attributes, beginningless and endless, free from sattvā and other qualities, eternal (hence devoid of change) and non-dual.
*Time, nature, (Prakṛti's form) of causal relation, the mind (mahat), self-sense (ahamkāra), attributes, the body, five gross elements, moveables and immovable, Myself, Śiva, Viśnū, the progenitors (Prajāpatis) like Dakṣa and others, yourself and others, the rulers of the heaven (Svarloka), and the protectors of the world of birds, Garuḍa and others, the rulers of the human world and those of the subterranean regions, Rulers of demigods like Gandharvas, Vidyādharas, Cāraṇas and those of Yakṣas, Rākṣasas and Uragas (reptiles) and Nāgas, the leaders of Sages, Manes (Pīrs), Daityas, Siddhas and Dānavas and others, who rule over ghosts, Piśacas, Kūśmāṇḍas, aquatic animals, beasts and birds.

44. In this world whatever is endowed with great authority (or six powers of Bhagavān), energy, mental power and capacity of senses, dexterity and strength, endurance, personal charm, modesty, prosperity, intellectual faculty, fascinating colour (or complexion), whether with form or without form, (all are nothing but God, the ultimate reality).

45. Oh sage! Give ear unto my narration of the blessed incarnations of the Great Puruṣa (especially of) those which are regarded as his chief incarnation-sports (līlāvatāras). As I narrate to you these in a series, let these fascinating accounts which are like nectar and which remove the defects of (i.e. sins committed by) ears, be drunk by you.

*ŚR. says that though the list of avatāras is indiscriminately arranged, it can be thus classified: (i) From time to mind (mahat) etc. are the effects (ii) Brahmā and others are the guṇāvatāras and (iii) Dakṣa and others are Viśvētu.

544. Cf. BG. (Bhagavad-Gītā) X. 41.
CHAPTER SEVEN
(Some Līlāvatāras and their work*)

Brahmā said:

1. When the Infinite God assumed the Boar-form which was completely composed of sacrifices (yajñas), he determined to lift up the earth (which was sinking in the ocean). He, like Indra breaking down the mountains, tore down by his tusk the first demon (dāitya Hiranyākṣa) who came upon him at the bottom of the sea.

2. Then he was born as a son of Ruci and Ākūti (and was) named Suyajña. He procreated from Dakṣinā, gods called Suyama. As he removed the troubles of the three worlds, he was called Hari (the remover) by (his maternal grandfather) Svāyambhuva Manu.

3. Oh Brāhmaṇa! And, along with nine sisters, he was born in the family of Prajāpati Kardama from him and (his wife) Devahūti. He explained to his mother the knowledge of Ātman (Brahman) whereby she, in this very birth, washed off her impurities caused by the mud of association with Guṇas and reached liberation—the goal preached by Kapila or Sāmkhya Philosophy.

4. To Atri who solicited an offspring (son), the glorious lord, being pleased, said, “I have offered myself (as a son) to you” and hence he was called Datta (one who is given). It is by the dust of his lotus-like feet that Yadus, Haihayas and others got their bodies (themselves) purified and attained excellence in Yoga, leading to prosperity here and hereafter.545

5. In the beginning (of the creation) when I performed penance with a desire to create various worlds and beings, He incarnated as the four sages whose names begin with Sana

545. ubhayīm—Leading to enjoyments in this world and liberation hereafter.

VB. explains that the two-fold yogic accomplishment is (1) gradual liberation by possessing Siddhis (supernatural powers) like Agimāl (power of atomization) etc. and (2) instantaneous liberation.

VB. derives Atri as "sonless" or "one who desires three sons."
(Sanatkumāra, Sanaka, Sanandana, Sanātana), by my offering of my penance. He accurately explained the real nature of Ātman or Brahma which was lost in the deluge of the previous Kalpa.
Sages instantaneously realized the soul (Ātman) as soon as it (his explanation of the nature of the soul) was heard by them.

6. From Dharma and Mūrti the daughter of Dakṣa, he incarnated as Nārāyaṇa and Nara. He was distinguished for his penance. The celestial damsels, the army of Kāma, the god of Love, having seen Urvasī and other lovelier beauties created by him, were unable to disturb his austerities.

7. The great gods verily burn down Kāma, the god of Love, by their angry looks. But they cannot burn down the unbearable anger which consumes them. Such anger is afraid of even entering his pure heart. How can Kāma dare to enter his mind again?

8. The young Dhrurya wounded by the arrow-like words uttered by his step-mother in the presence of (his father) King Uttanapāda, took to forest, for performing penance, even as a child. He, who was gracious unto him who praised him, gave an immovable place (dhrurya sthāna) to him—a situation which is praised by celestial sages who stay above and below him.
[Śrī. explains that ‘sages in heaven’ implies the Great Bear or Bṛṛgu and other sages].

9. He, on being praised, saved king Vena who had gone astray and whose might and fortunes were destroyed by the thunderlike curses of Brāhmaṇas and who was falling in the bell. He became his son. In this incarnation he milked the earth of all kinds of wealth.

10. He was born from king Nābhi and Sudevi (another name—Merudevi). He visualised Brahman everywhere and was unperturbed in self-realization with his mind and senses serene and controlled. Being free from attachment, he practised Yoga of undisturbed meditation (and so he appeared as inanimate object)—a state called by sages as the state of a paramahamsa.

11. That glorious lord incarnated in my sacrifice as Hayagriva (horse-necked God), of complexion like gold. He is the Yājña Purusā (presiding deity of all sacrifices). He is the main object of worship in the Vedas (or Veda incarnate), the sacrifice incarnate (or for whose grace sacrifices are performed) and who is the soul of all the deities. From the breath of his nostrils beautiful words (i.e. Vedic hymns) came forth.

12. At the end of a Yuga, he was found by Vaivasvata Manu as a Fish who was the support of the earth (or who held the earth which was like a boat), and hence a refuge of all kinds of living beings. He collected the Vedas which fell down from my mouth in the waters, and joyfully sported in the terrible waters (of the deluge).

13. The first divinity in the form of Tortoise supported on his back, the mount Mandara which was the churning-rod, when the Gods and Demons (daityas) churned Kṣirasāgara (the sea of milk). The movements of the mountain while churning were like scratching to him, in consequence of which he enjoyed a pleasant nap.\footnote{548}

14. He who removes the great terror of Gods\footnote{549}, assumed the form of a Man-Lion of terrific appearance with rolling eyebrows and gnashing tusks. He seized and placed on his lap and tore down, in a moment, with his claws, the king of Daityas (Hiranyakasīpu) who with rage attacked him with a mace.\footnote{550}

15. The king of elephants which became distressed by his leg being caught by an extremely powerful crocodile, in a lake, held out a lotus in its trunk (to offer to the Lord), appealed to him thus: "Oh Primeval Man (the cause of the universe), the lord of all the worlds and beings, one of holy fame, whose name is very auspicious to the ears".\footnote{551}

16. Hari of incomprehensible nature, hearing the appeal, took his weapon, viz. the disc Sudartana, mounted on the shoulder of Garuḍa (the lord of birds), cut asunder the jaw of the crocodile by the disc, and holding the elephant by his trunk dragged him out, by his grace.\footnote{551}

17. Although the youngest born son of Aditi, he (Viṣṇu) was the eldest (superior to them) in virtues and lord of Sacrifices. He covered the three worlds in his (three) strides, and in the form of Vāmana (a dwarf), he took over the earth under the pretext of requesting a land three feet in measure (because) kings who are going by the path of righteousness, are not to be removed except (under the pretext of) begging.

18. Bali, who sprinkled his head with the pure water of washing the feet of Vāmana, had no aspiration for sovereignty over gods. Oh beloved Nārada! He did not desire to do anything else but to fulfil his promise to the Lord and he offered himself by his head to Hari.\textsuperscript{552}

19. Oh Nārada! The Lord, being pleased with your intense devotion, expounded to you the complete details of (bhakti) yoga and Bhāgavata which is the means to the knowledge (of ātman) which is like a lamp (light) to the truth about soul, which devotees who take refuge to Vāsudeva understand with ease.

20. At the time of the changes of Manvantaras (period of Manu) for maintaining the continuity of Manu’s race, he maintains his unchallenged rule in ten quarters like the unobstructed Sudarśana Cakra. He brings discipline among wicked kings and by his deeds his enchanting fame reaches Satya-loka which is above the three worlds.

21. And the venerable Lord incarnated as Dhanvantari who is glory itself. By means of uttering his name (i.e. by the incantation of his nāma-mantra—Om Śrī Dhanvantaraye namaḥ—he immediately cures diseases of persons afflicted with many ailments. He, who blesses (his devotees) with immortality, recovered his share in sacrifices which was denied to him (by Daityas). Having come down in this world, he taught it the science of medicine (Āyurveda—the Science of life).

22.* The great-souled one of terrific valour (Pāraśurāma) twentyone times massacred with his axe of long sharp edge, the Kṣatriya-class which was like a thorn unto the world, and the destruction of which was ordained by fate and which (as if) being desirous of suffering pain in the hell, had left the Vedic way (of life), and hated Brāhmaṇas.

23. The Lord of Māyā who is favourably disposed to us, incarnated in the race of Ikṣvākus along with his parts (aḥfas like Bharata etc.). Abiding by his father’s order, he, along with his wife and younger brother, entered (stayed) in the forest where the ten-headed (Rāvaṇa) opposing him came to grief (met his death).

24. To him, who like Śiva, wanted to burn down the city of the enemy, the sea whose limbs of the body were trembling with fear, immediately gave passage (to cross it) when Rāma, by his fiery eyes reddened with rage, exploded on account of his distant sweet-heart, scorched the entire world of aquatic animals like crocodiles, serpents etc.*

25. While prominently moving between the two armies (his and Rāvaṇa’s), he (Rāma) will quickly end the life and the boastful laughter of Rāvaṇa, the abductor of his wife, and who governed various nations in all directions which were resplendent as the tusks of Indra’s elephant (Airāvata) which were broken (and were stuck in Rāvaṇa’s chest, when he dashed against his chest).

26. In order to remove the distress of the earth which was pounded by the armies of Daityas, he, of white and black hair, will be born (as Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa) by his own

* Vide infra IX. Chs 10 & 11.

553. The epic-writer presumes that this dialogue between Brahma-deva and Nārada took place before the incarnation of Rāma, hence the use of future tense.

554. ŚR. gives the v.l. kṣubjuṣa gṛhahāsam—It means: the boastful laugh of Rāvaṇa, who ruled over various countries in various directions which appeared brilliant with the pieces of tusks of Indra’s elephant, which had been scattered in all directions, when Indra’s elephant dashed against Rāvaṇa’s chest. Rāvaṇa, boastfully laughed and remarked whether the tusks so scattered have imitated his (white) glory of the conquest of directions.

 For details vide infra III. Chs 2 & 3 and Skandhas X & XI.

555. That God Viṣṇu sent His two hairs down to the earth as the incarnation of Kṛṣṇa and Balabāma is repeated in the M. Bh. I. 196. 32-33, and VP. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa) 5.1.59.

ŚR. explains that the white hair of the lord is not due to his old age as he is immutable. They show his personal charm only. Quoting M. Bh. (given above), he states that the white hair was born as Balarāma and aha (part or portion). He whose ways are incomprehensible to men, will perform deeds which will establish his greatness, i.e. supreme nature.

27. That as a child he sucked away the life of Pūtanā (Ulūkikā), and as a child of three months he upturned (and pounded to pieces) the cart (Śakaṭāśura) by his kick, and that while crawling on his knees between two Arjuna trees which were scraping the skies, he uprooted them—this would not have been possible on any other presumption (except that the child was the Almighty).

28. In Gokula, He will bring back to life the cattle of the Vraja and their cowherds who have drunk water mixed with poison, by showering gracious looks at them. He will sport in the river Yamunā for its purification and will drive out the serpent whose tongue always rolls about on account of the power of fierce poison.

29. It must be a miraculous deed, indeed, when in the forest of Muñja grass (on the night of Kāliyādamana) the summer-dry forest caught fire on all sides by forest-conflagration at night. He, of incomprehensible power will, along with Balarāma, save the whole Vraja which remained awake expecting total annihilation, by calling upon them all to shut their eyes.

30. Whatever length of rope or material of binding him will be taken by his mother, it will not be sufficient to bind Him. Yaśodā, the cowherdess, would be astounded to see fourteen worlds in his yawning mouth and (thus) awakened to or made aware of his greatness.

the dark hair as Kṛṣṇa. These symbolic hair indicate the fair and dark complexions of the two brothers. The hair do not undervalue this incarnation as Kṛṣṇa as the perfect incarnation Kṛṣṇas tu Bhagavān suyam BH.P. 1.3.28. Viṣṇu wanted to show that the task of removing the distress of the earth by destroying the demonic forces is as easy as could be done by his hair.

VJ. explains that hari was born by his aha called Sita-Kṛṣṇa-Kesi (white-black-hair). In Nyśṭhā Purāṇa these are stated to be the two powers of the Lord (VD.).

556. nityādīna: VR. explains that Vraja was fast asleep at night and they awoke after their rescue. This is not supported by Bh.p. X.19.7-12, where the cowherds are stated to have appealed to Kṛṣṇa for saving them from the fire.
31. He will rescue Nanda from the fear of Varuṇa's noose. He will bring back the cowherds which were concealed in caves by Vyomāsura, the son of Maya. He will take to his world, viz. Vaikuṇṭha, the whole of Gokula, which spends the day in their daily work and which sleeps at night through utter exhaustion, (thus can spare no time for penance etc.).

32. When the cowherds will obstruct the sacrifice (dedicated to Indra) and when in order to drown the whole of Vraja, God Indra will pour down (torrential) rains, he, out of grace, with a desire to save the cattle, will sportively hold mount Govardhana for seven days, on his single hand, without any fatigue, as if it were some mushroom—even though he was a child of seven.

33. While playing in the forest at night which was bright on account of the rays of the moon, and while he is about to start the Rāsa dance, he will cut off the head of Śaṅkhacūḍa, the servant of Kubera who wanted to carry away the young damsel of Vraja in whom passion of love for Kṛṣṇa was aroused by songs with long drawn out musical notes, expressing sweet words.

34-35. And other evil persons such as Pralamba, Khara Dhenuka, Dardura, Kesi, Arīṣṭa, the mallas (athletes) like Cāṇūra, the elephant Kuvalayāpiḍa, Kaṁsa, Kālayavana, Narakāsura and Paunḍraka (a pretender of Vāsudeva) and others of whom Śālva, Kapi, Balvala, Dantavakra and the Daityas in the form of seven bulls (of Nagnajit), Śambarāsura, Vidūratha, Rukmi and those kings who boastfully take up bows on the battlefield such as Kāmboja, Matsya, Kuru, Kaikaya, Śṛṅjaya and others, would be killed by Hari in the form and names of Balarāma, Arjuna and Bhīma, and will go to his holy abode (Vaikuṇṭha), which is beyond the sight of men.

36. Considering that the Veda produced by him cannot be studied completely (from the beginning to the end) by men who, in course of time, will become of limited intellectual capacity, and of short span of life, he will take birth from Satyavatī, and will divide the tree in the form of Veda into different branches, in every age (yuga).

37. Seeing that asuras (enemies of gods) who follow the path of Veda, will harass the world, travelling in cities moving with invisible velocity constructed by Māyā, he will assume the disguise of heretics, deluding the mind and attracting the hearts of asuras, he will extensively explain to them heretic doctrines.

38. At the end of the yuga, the Lord will incarnate and punish Kali when there will be no discussion about the deeds of Hari in the houses of the good ones, and when persons of the Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya and Vaiśya classes will be heretics, and Śūdras will be kings, and the words ‘Śvāhā’, ‘Śvadhā’ and ‘Vaśat’ will not be uttered at all (when Vedic rituals will not be performed).

39. At the beginning of creation, Tapas (penance), my-selves, sages and nine Prajāpatis; at the time of maintenance (of the universe), Dharma, sacrifice, Manu, gods and kings;
at the time of destruction adharma (non-righteousness), Śiva, serpents characterised by wrath and vengeance and powerful asuras—these are the forms assumed by God of infinite powers, by his Māyā.

40*. Can any wise or learned man who might have calculated all the particles of dust in the world, count the glorious or heroic deeds of Viṣṇu who stabilised with his support, the terribly tottering Satyaloka, on account of the irresistible ve-cocity (while raising his leg in his Trivikrama incarnation) which shook the universe to its outermost envelop of Pradhāna where there is equilibrium of the guṇas (sattva, rajas, and tamas.)

41. Neither I nor these sages (like Marīci etc.) and your elder brothers (like Sanatkumāra etc.) know the extent of the power and the greatness of the Māyā of the Supreme Man. How can other people do? The first god Śeṣa, of one thousand mouths (and two thousand tongues) has not yet reached the ends of his excellent qualities of which he has been singing (from times immemorial).

42. Only those can go beyond and understand the real nature of God’s māyā—power which is very difficult to cross, if the infinite Lord is gracious unto them, and these devotees, with all their heart and soul, sincerely resort to his feet. Such persons are free from the idea or notion of "I and mine" (even in respect of their bodies), which are the eatables or food of dogs and jackals.

(Many persons, despite the absence of inner knowledge, know Māyā through Hari's grace. For example).

43. Oh child, (through his grace) I know (the nature etc. of) the Yoga-māyā of the Supreme Lord. So do you (Sanaka, Sanandana etc.), God Śiva and Prahlāda, the chief of the Daityas, Svāyambhuva Manu and his wife Satarūpā and their children, viz., Priyavrata, Uttānapāda and three daughters, Prācinabarhis, Rbhu, and Dhruva.

44. Ikṣvāku, Aila, Mucukunda, Videha (king Janaka), Gādhī, Raghu, Ambariṣa, Sagara, Gaya, 557. Prācinabarhis—Son of Harivardhana and Dhiṣanā: a Prajāpati: married Sāmudrī (Savarṇā); had ten sons named Prācetasas. He knew the power of Viṣṇu's Yoga—PI. 2.438.

558. Rbhu—A son of Brahmap: a Siddha who knows Hari; a resident of Tapoloka; initiated nidadga in the mysteries of advaita—PI. 1.268.

559. Ikṣvāku—Son of Vaivasvata Manu; founder of Solar race of kings; reigned at Ayodhyā. Max Müller thinks this to be the name of a people in the RV.—DHM. 123.

561. Mucukunda—Son of Māndhātṛ; helped gods against Asuras and got a boon of long uninterrupted sleep. Kālayavana who was lured into his cave by Kṛṣṇa, woke the sleeper who burnt him down by his fiery glance. Kṛṣṇa gave Mucukunda the power to go anywhere for enjoyment, but he went to Gandhamādana for penance. DHM. 210.

562. Gādhī—A king of the Kuśika race and father of Viśvāmitra—DHM. 103.

563. Raghu—a king of the Solar race; reigned at Ayodhya; a famous ancestor of Dāśarathī Rāma—DHM. 252.

564. Ambariṣa—The son of Nābhāga; a devotee of Hari; The curse of Dvārakā proved ineffective; though Lord of seven continents, he devoted himself to the service of Hari and knew the power of his yoga—PI. 1.88-89.

565. Sagara—a king of Ayodhya of the Solar race; the horse let loose by him for Ṡvamedha was carried off to Pātāla; his sixty thousand sons dug their way to Pātāla where they found the horse grazing near the sage Kapila who was engaged in meditation; thinking him to be the chief, they disturbed his meditation and were reduced to ashes by his fiery glance; he was noted for his generosity and the chasm dug by his sons and filled by the waters of the Ganges is called Sāgara (sea) after him.—DHM. 271-72.

566. Gaya—A sage who knew the power of Viṣṇu's yoga; PI. 1,514.
Yayāti and others; Māndhāṭr, Alarka, Šatadhanvan, Anu, Rantideva, Devavrata (Bhiṣma), Bali, Amūtaraya, and Dilipa;

45. Saubhari, Uttāṅka, Śibi, Devala, Pippalāda, great men Sārasvata, Uddhava, Parāśara,

567. Yayāti—the fifth king of the Lunar Race, Son of Nahuṣa; married Devayānī and Šarmiṣṭhā; from the former was born Yadu, the founder of the Yādava clan, and from the latter Puru; the founder of the Paurava race. He became prematurely old by Śukra's curse; he borrowed the youth from his son Puru, but later repenting, returned it to Puru and retired to forest for penance—DHM. 376-77.

568. Māndhāṭr—A king, son of Yuvanāśva, of the Ikṣvāku race; father of Mucukunda, Ambariṣa and Purukutsa (sons) and fifty daughters. He gave them all to the sage Saubhari. He was killed while fighting with Lavaṇāśuра—BPK. 244.

569. Alarka—A pupil of Dattātreya; a sage who realised the force of Hari's māyā—PI. 1.115

570. Šatadhanvan.—A royal sage devoted to Viṣṇu—BPK 306.

571. Anu—A son of Svāyambhuva Manu; knew the power of the yoga of Hari—PI. 1.56.

572. Rantideva—A pious and benevolent king of the Lunar race; sixth in descent from Bharata; he was enormously rich, very religious, charitable and profuse in his sacrifices—DHM. 263.

573. Amūtaraya—A sage who had transcended the force of māyā—PI. 1.85.

574. Dilipa—Son of Amśumat and father of Bhagīratha; ancestor of Rāma; by serving the Nandini cow at the cost of his life, he was freed from the curse of Surabhi and a son, Raghu, was born to him—DHM. 92.

575. Saubhari—A devout sage; married 50 daughters of king Māndhāṭr and had 150 sons; finding the vanity of samsāra he retired with his wives to the forest for penance—DHM. 289-90.

576. Uttāṅka—A Brahmārṣi residing on the Meru slope; at his request king Bṛhadāśva of Ikṣvāku line vanquished the demon Dhundhu—PI. 1.215.

577. Śibi—A king famous for the offering of his own body to a hawk to save the life of a dove which had come to his refuge—ASD. 918.

578. Devala—A sage who visited Parikṣit at the time of the latter's fast unto death.

579. Pippalāda—a pupil of Devadarśa; the sage who communicated the Aṅgāra-vata to Yudhiṣṭhira; came to see Parikṣit practising prāyobavesa; knew the yoga-power of Viṣṇu—PI. 2.333.

580. Sārasvata—a sage represented to be the son of the river Sarasvati; he protected the Vedas during a great famine. He taught the Vedas to sixty thousand Brahmins who approached him for instruction—DHM. 283-84.
Bhūriśeṇa; 581 and many others viz. Vibhīṣaṇa, Hanūmān, Śuka, Arjuna, Ārṣṭiśeṇa, 582 Vidura, Śrutadeva and others;

46. Verily they comprehend and cross over the māyā of God. And women, Śūdras, Hūṇas, Śabaras and even sinful souls (jīvas) like non-human beings, if they have got the training with regard to the virtuous character of the devotees of Hari of wonderful strides (in covering each world in a step as Trivikrama), can understand and go beyond the māyā. What to say about those (i.e. Brāhmaṇas and others eligible to study the Vedas) who can concentrate their minds on the form of the Lord (described) in the Vedas 583 ?

47-48. That indeed is the essential form (nature) of the glorious Supreme Man which the learned ones call Brahman, which is eternally blissful and untouched by sorrow. It is eternal, serene, free from fear, of the nature of pure knowledge, untouched by impurities, sama (i.e. one without a second), beyond the pale of sat and asat (i.e. not related to the objects of senses and non-senses), which is the real principle of the Supreme Soul, beyond the reach of the words, i.e. the Vedas, wherein causative circumstances produce no fruit, and in whose presence māyā comes back (vanishes as if) blushed. Recluses, having concentrated their minds on him, give up their tools (means) of destroying their idea of difference, just as Indra, the god of rains, would ignore a spade for digging a well 584 (i.e. Indra himself being a god of rains, has no need of a spade for digging a well. Similarly those who visualise the Brahman in medita-

581. Bhūriśeṇa—A sage who knew the Yoga power of Hari; son of Brahmāśaṅkara P.I. 2.578.

582. Ārṣṭiśeṇa—A chief Gandharva who sings Rāma’s glory in Kimpurūsa; came to see Parīkṣit practising prāyopaveśa; knew the Yoga-power of Hari.

583. Śruta-dhāraṇāḥ (1) Who can contemplate on the described object (Hari)—VR.

(a) Men who can immediately concentrate upon the name and form learnt from the preceptor—VG.

(3) Those who can concentrate their minds upon the reality of the Soul as heard from the spiritual preceptor.

—SD.

584. sauvā́g...Indraḥ—SR.’s alternative explanation:

Just as a poverty-stricken person, after becoming a rich man, does not care for the spade (with which he formerly earned his livelihood).
tion, automatically rise above the notion of difference, and have no need to resort to other means to wipe out that notion.

49. He is the all-pervading lord who is a dispenser of all blessings on men. It is from him that the results of good actions which are done with the natural qualifications or duties (like sama, dama) of Brāhmaṇas and others accrue. (Or, from him comes forth the whole world—the effect produced by transformations which are the natural and specific characteristics of mahat and other principles, i.e. he is the dispenser of heaven etc). When the constituents of the body are disintegrated, the body is shattered, but not the internal element the ether. Similarly individual soul in the body is also not destroyed, for he has no birth nor death.

50. In this way, oh child, the glorious lord, the creator has been described to you in brief. Whatever is Sat or Asat (i.e. cause and effect or the manifest and the unmanifest) is not something different from Hari (everything proceeds from Hari)

51. This Bhāgavata which is narrated to me by the lord is only an epitome of the powers and glorious deeds of the lord. You extol them in details (to others).

52. After determining in your mind to make men devoted to the glorious Lord Hari who is the antaryāmin, (soul residing in all) and the support of all, describe Hari and his glories (with special emphasis on Hari’s sports).

53. The mind (Soul) of the person who describes the māyā of the Almighty or who gives his approbation to this or who always devoutly listens to this, is not bewildered by the māyā.

CHAPTER EIGHT

(Queries regarding the relation between the body, Soul and God, etc.)

The king said:

1-2. Oh Brahman! Nārada of godly vision (or who makes his followers to visualise God) who was directed by Brahmadeva, to describe in detail the qualities of the Lord, who is free from Sattva and other attributes, expounded to various persons, the real nature of God. Oh prominent one among the knowers of Veda. I would like to know (what is the truth). The episodes of Hari of miraculous powers, are very auspicious to people.

585. Deva-darśana—One who shows the Supreme Soul (to his followers).

3. Expound to me (those discourses) in such a way that I shall, after fixing my unattached mind on Kṛṣṇa, the antar-yāmin (the Soul within all), give up my body.

4. The lord enters the heart, within a short time, of those who always hear with faith his deeds and extol the same.

5. Kṛṣṇa who enters the lotus of his devotee's heart by way of the ear, cleanses all the sins, just as the season called Śarad (autumnal season) does unto waters (of rivers etc.).

6. A person whose sins are washed away and who becomes free from all troubles (resulting from love, hatred etc.), does not leave the feet of Kṛṣṇa, just as a traveller (who has returned home after a long sojourn) does not leave his home.

7.* Oh Brahman! You know really whether it is causeless or with a cause like Karma that the soul, which is not constituted of elements, (still) comes to possess a body made up of elements. Please explain to me the truth about it.

8. He, (God) from whose navel sprouted forth the lotus which represented the configuration of the worlds, is described as possessing the same form and the same number of limbs as a human being, with the difference that He has limbs of separate and of his own dimensions. (If that be the case) what is the difference between the two (God and his miniature (man)?)

9. The unborn god Brahmā creates beings and controls them through his grace. It is due to his favour that Brahmā (though) born from the lotus (grown) out of his navel could get a glimpse of his form.686

* Whether it is due only to the will of God or any other cause like Karman, there happens at the beginning the possession of the body consisting of dhātus (elements), its material cause, the produce of the Prakṛti, in the case of the Soul which is essentially unrelated to dhātus like Prakṛti—VJ.

586. VJ. explains verses 8 and 9: At the beginning, during the great deluge (Mahā-pralaya), when Nārāyaṇa wished to create the
10. In what place does the Supreme Man who dwells in the hearts of all, who creates, protects and destroys the universe, and who is the Lord of māyā, stay when he lays aside his māyā?

11. We heard (from you) that the worlds with their protecting deities were created first from the limbs of the Man, and that with these worlds and their presiding deities, the limbs of his body are formed. Please explain this.

12. What is the duration of Kalpa (Brahma-kalpa)? What is the extent of Vikalpa (Manvādi-kalpa)? How is Time measured? What is the significance of the past, present and the future? What is the span of life of men, manes (pitrā), gods etc.?

13. What is the nature of Time which, though very long, appears to be very short? What are the places where Karma leads to beings? Of what nature are they, oh the best of Brāhmaṇas?

14.* Please tell me about the individual Souls (lit. possessors of attributes) who wish to become gods etc. as a result of the modifications or changes in the attributes, like satvā, rajas etc.? In what stage does the cumulative effect of good and bad actions take place? By what combinations of actions universe, he became the Supreme Man (Parama-puruṣa) and created the Cosmic Egg. He, along with the principles (which led to the creation of the universe) entered the watery portion of the Egg and lay on the bed of Śeṣa. From His navel sprang up the lotus containing fourteen worlds. He came to be called Vairāja within that Egg. ayam puruṣa (this Man) in verse 8 signifies this Cosmic Egg (apḍakoṣa) and is called puruṣa (man) due to God's presence in the puruṣa form. This Vairāja called Viṣṇu is different from the Egg. But it is due to his presence in the Egg, that the parts of the Egg are represented as his limbs.

587. v.1. sarva gumāṇāyaḥ—VR : Possessing six excellent qualities fully. VJ : The support of God Brahmā etc. representing Guṇas in the beginning of creation, Or, possessing all excellent qualities such as knowledge, bliss etc.

588. ātma-māyāṁ muktaḥ VR. : transcending prakṛti; VJ. : Suspending the binding force of prakṛti under his control.

* Explain to me the place where the effect of Karma takes place. Through what agency (of gods etc.) and of what nature is it? Tell us in detail the modifications taking place in attributes and individual Souls and the cause of their attaining the bodies of Gods etc.
and by what procedure of doing them is one qualified to get Godhood and such other status.

15. What is the origin of the earth, the nether-world (pātāla), directions, the sky, the planets, the constellations of stars, mountains, rivers, seas and islands? What is the origin of the inhabitants thereof?

16. What are the dimensions of the Cosmic Egg, separately from within and without? What are the lives and deeds of the great in them? Please tell me definite knowledge about the classes of society and the stages of life (varga and āśrama).

17. What are (the different) Yugas, and what is the extent of each Yuga (age)? What is (the nature of) religion in each Yuga? What are the most miraculous incarnations of Hari and his deeds?

18. What is the course of duties common to men? What are the special duties of guilds of workers and the royal sages?
What is the course of conduct to men, who have to live under emergency (āpad-dharma)?

19. What is the number of tattvas or fundamental principles? What is their characteristic? What is their nature for distinguishing them from their effects? What is the method of worshipping the Supreme Man? And what is the method of practising Yoga consisting of eight stages?

20. What is the way (like arcir-marga) of the past masters of Yoga possessing eight miraculous powers? How is the liṅga-sarīra (the subtle body) destroyed? What is the nature of the Vedas (like Rgveda, Yajurveda etc.) Upavedas (like Āyur-veda, Gandharva-Veda etc.), Dharma (course of conduct) for different classes of society, different stages of life etc., Itihāsa like Mahābhārata) and Purāṇas (18 Mahāpurāṇas and 18 Upapurāṇas)?

21. What is the nature of the interim deluge or the creation, sustenance and destruction of all the beings? What is the correct method of performing Īṣṭa (maintenance of sacrificial fire, penance, vaiśvadeva etc.) and pūrta (such as construction of temples, lakes etc.) and attaining the triad. viz., dharma, artha and kāma?

22. How are the jīvas (individual souls) who fall from heaven etc., along with the balance of their karmās, born in this world? How did the heretic doctrine come into existence? What is the nature of the so-called bondage and liberation of the Soul? How does the Soul attain to his real essential nature?

23. How does the self-dependent Lord sport with the help of māyā? How does the all-pervading Lord, at the time of the deluge, cast off the māyā and remain aloof as a witness?

24. Oh venerable great sage! You should kindly explain to me who suppliantly approached you for knowledge, the reality about all these (and other points as well) in the serial order of inquiring.

25. Oh revered one! You are the authority on these just like the great God Brahmā, born of the Supreme Spirit, for other people in this world (blindly) follow what was done by the forefathers of their forefathers.

26. Oh Brāhmana! My life (vital airs) will not depart by fasting so long as I drink the nectar (in the form of the stories) of Acyuta, though they may pass away soon due to the wrath of Brāhmaṇa (i.e. the bite by Takṣaka due to the curse).

27. Brahmārāta (i.e. Śuka) was highly pleased, when in that assembly, Viṣṇurāta (i.e. Parīkṣit) respectfully requested him, to narrate the episodes of Hari, the Lord of the good (or god Brahīnadeva etc.).

28. He expounded him the purāṇa called Bhāgavata which is equivalent to Veda, and which was narrated to god Brahmā by the Lord, at the advent of Brahma-kalpa.

29. Whatever Parīkṣit, the foremost in the Pāṇḍava race, asked, (Śuka) began to narrate in all, in the order of questions.
CHAPTER NINE

(Śuka’s discourse—Cuṭahāsloki Bhāgavata)*

Śrī Śuka said:

1* Oh king! No relation is logically (correctly) possible between perceptible object (e.g. the body) and the Soul whose essential nature is knowledge (and hence different from that of the body), except through his own māyā, as (it is not possible) in the case of one who sees visions in a dream.

2. In association with māyā which assumes various forms, he appears to have many forms (viz. that of a child or youth or a god or a man etc.). Amusing himself in her qualities (like the body etc.), he (seeing thus conditioned) thinks (supposes) ‘(This is) mine, (This is) I.’

3 Only when he will enjoy himself in his own glory which is beyond Time and māyā (or Puruṣa and Prakṛti), and being free from delusion, he gives up both of them, and the false notion ‘I and mine’ and stands out in his full form unconcerned (with anything).

4. The Supreme Lord who was propitiated by sincere devotion (penance), revealed his own real form to Brahmā, spoke to him in order to enlighten him on the truth about Supreme Soul (as distinct from the jīva—individual Soul).

5. That first and foremost of gods, the supreme preceptor of the worlds (Brahmā) seated himself in his lotus and with a desire to create, began to look (consider) the procedure of creating the world. But he could not get the insight (the vision) into the faultless method of world-creation.

6. Once upon a time, while thinking over the methodology of world-creation the great god Brahmā heard twice a word of two syllables (Tāpa) uttered near him from under the

* With VR., as usual, māyā is the prakṛti controlled by the Supreme Soul. With VJ. it is Hari’s will which controls the prakṛti characterised by the attributes like sattva etc. God’s will is fundamental. Nothing can take place without it.

According to VR. it is in the stage of liberation (mukti) that the individual Soul (Jīva) becomes free from illusions, and realises his own innate nature and finds delight in the glorious nature of the lord which is beyond influence of Time and Prakṛti.
water. It consisted of the sixteenth (ta-) and twenty-first (pa—) letters of the five classes of consonants. Oh king! that word is the wealth of those who have renounced (material) wealth.

7. On hearing the word (tapa) and eager to see the speaker, he looked in all directions. Seeing nobody anywhere, there, he resumed his seat and coming to the conclusion (considering) that (penance) is for his good, he determined to perform penance, as if he was advised by some preceptor.

8. Brahmā whose insight (in grasping the significance of the uttered syllables) was correct, and who is the greatest of the performers of penance (sage of the sages), controlled his breath and mind, and restrained his both types (cognitive and conative) of sense-organs, and in undisturbed meditation, performed for a period of one thousand celestial years penance which threw light on (the procedure of creation etc. of) the worlds.

9. The Lord, who was (thus) propitiated by penance, showed to him (god Brahmā) his region, i.e. Vaikūṇṭha, where afflictions, delusion and fear do not exist, and which is eulogised by gods and men of abundant merits (or men who have realised the Self), and to which there is no higher place.

10. Where (i.e. in the Vaikūṇṭha) there is neither rajās and tamas nor sattva attribute which is mixed up with them. (There is only the pure sattva attribute). The Time has no power there. Nor does māyā exist there. What of others! There attendants (devotees) of Hari are worshipped by gods and asuras (demons).

11. In complexion these attendants are like shining emeralds. They have eyes like a lotus of hundred petals, and have put on yellowish garments (pitāmbaras). They are excellent in personal charm, and of very soft delicate bodies. All of them have four arms and wear ornaments of gold, studded with brilliant precious stones. They are of extremely brilliant splendour. Their complexions are varied like the coral, the lapis lazuli and the lotus-stalk, and they wear shining earrings, crowns and garlands.

12. Just as the sky appears when the clouds therein are illumined by lightning, the Vaikūṇṭha region appears shining by the greatly beautiful and effulgent aerial cars of the great-souled ones surrounded by young women of lustrous complexion.
13. There the goddess of wealth incarnate pays respects to the feet of the highly praised Hari, in various ways, and with various forms of magnificence (or splendour) seating herself on a swing and singing the deeds of her beloved lord, herself being praised in songs by bees, the followers of the spring.

14. There he (Brahmadeva) saw the Lord of the goddess of wealth (Śri), the Protector of His devotees, the presiding deity of sacrifices—the all-pervading Lord who is waited upon by his chief attendants, viz. Sunanda, Nanda, Prabala, Arhaṇa and others.

15. He saw God who was eager to bless his devotees (servants) whose looks were (like nectar) gladdening the heart of his devotees, whose face was beaming with gracious smiles and brilliant reddish eyes, who had four arms, and who wore crown and ear-ring, and had put on yellow-garment (pitāmbara) and had got a distinguishing mark called Śrīvatsa on his chest.

16. (He saw) God seated on an invaluable throne surrounded by the four (Prakṛti, Puruṣa, Mahat and Ahanākāra), the sixteen (mind, the ten cognitive and conative sense-organs and five elements) and five (i.e. tanmātras) [in all 25 tattvas or powers] as part of his nature. Supernatural powers which are temporary elsewhere (in yogins) were inherent in him. He was the Master as he was enjoying his own powers and bliss.

17. The creator of the Universe (God Brahmā) whose heart was overflowing with joy at his sight, which can be attained by the path of knowledge (followed by great recluses-Parama-haṁsas), whose hair stood erect (with rapture), and whose eyes were full of tears of intense love to him, bowed to his lotus-like feet.

18. The Lord, the beloved of all, was pleased with his dear (Brahmadeva) who loved him intensely, and was standing near him. He touched with his hand Brahmā who deserved his guidance (orders) in the creation of the worlds. 'Then he spoke to him with words brilliant by his gentle smile.

The venerable lord said:

19. Oh Brahman (in whom all the Vedas exist) I who am impossible to be pleased by hypocritical yogins, am delighted by your long penance performed with the desire of creating the universe.
20. Oh Brahman! Prosperity to you (good betide you). I can confer any boon. Ask me whatever is desired by you. My vision is the culmination of all human efforts.

21. It is due to my desire (to show you) that you had a view of my region (Vaikuṇṭha). You have performed excellent penance in solitude, after hearing my utterance (containing the instruction to perform penance).

22. Oh sinless one! When you were at a loss to know what to do, I guided you (to perform penance). As Tapas (penance) is my heart, and I am the Soul of tapas (penance) [I am tapas itself].

23. It is by penance that I create the universe. I eat it up (keep it within me) by penance. I maintain it by means of penance. My strength lies in austere penance which is difficult to perform.

Brahmā said:

24. Oh lord! You are the ruler of all created beings. You, who dwell in the heart (lit. cave) of all beings, know by your unimpeded unlimited knowledge what one desires to do.

25. Oh Lord! grant to me, a seeker, however, what I pray, so that I can know the subtle as well as the gross\textsuperscript{589} forms of yours who are really formless.

26-27. Oh Mādhava (Lord of Lakṣmī)! Just as a spider weaves a web round itself, so you, of efficacious will-power, indulge of your own accord in your sports, by assuming with the help of your māyā various forms (such as Brahmā etc.) for creating, preserving and destroying the universe which is developed with various powers. Please develop (lit. put) in me the intelligence (necessary) to understand this.

28. I shall really carry out the instructions of the lord without any slackness or idleness on my part. It is through your grace that I, who desire to procreate the world, will not be subjected to the bondage of karma.

29. Oh lord! (by your friendly action of touching me with hand etc.) I have been done (treated) by you like a friend.

\textsuperscript{589} According to VJ, \textit{para} is the Vairāja Puruṣa (the Cosmic Man embracing fourteen worlds) and \textit{apara} is the Cosmic Egg with its nine sheaths.
Still I shall stick to carry out your service of creating the worlds untiringly. May there be no pride in me of thinking myself to be unborn, while I am creating the world with all its differences.

The lord said:

30. Receive from me the knowledge (as detailed in the Śāstras) coupled with experience and along with its mystic doctrine (esoteric teaching), with all the accessories to it, as explained by me, though it is a topmost secret.

31. By my grace, may you have a thorough comprehension of the reality as to my dimensions, my real nature, my attributes and actions as actually they are.

32* In the beginning, before the creation, I alone was in existence. There was nothing else—neither the subtle nor the gross (creation) nor their cause Pradhāna or Prakṛti (the primordial nature) [These were then completely absorbed in me—only I simply existed then]. After the creation of the universe what exists, is I. I am the universe. What remains after the Pralaya is myself.

33. That should be known as my māyā on account of which there appears existence, despite the non-existence of the

* The four verses beginning from this are said to contain the essence of the Philosophy of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa and are hence known as Catuḥsloli Bhāgavata.

590. sadasatparam—Reality which is distinct from the sentient (spirit or jīva) and non-sentient (jāda matter)—VR.

JG. and VC. have given sermons on the basis of this verse.

591. According to VJ., māyā is chiefly the power of Viṣṇu (mukhya Viṣṇu-saktirhi Māyā-sabdena bhagyate). It is also applied to Jiva and Prakṛti. It is not an unreality like magic tricks (indrojāla). To briefly state VJ.: Whatever is recognised or known from the Vedas and other means of knowledge, (though of no use or value to God who has all his wishes fulfilled) and whatever is not contradictory (bādhaka) to God, such things, i.e. Jivas and Prakṛti are to be regarded as the māyā of the Supreme Soul.

In a long commentary on this verse JG. explains his concept of māyā. Briefly stated: Māyā is that which appears outside Brahman (the ultimate reality), and ceases to appear with the realization of Brahman. Without the support of Brahman, it cannot manifest itself. It is associated with Brahman in two forms, viz., Jīva-māyā and Guṇa-māyā. The analogy of ābhāsa is the reflection of the solar light from outside basic reality, as in the case of false appearance (of two moons even though the other moon, has no existence), and there appears the non-existence of the really existents, as in the case of the planet Rāhu (which is never perceived in spite of its existence in the planetary system)—the Soul is the object of such misapprehension.

34. Just as the great elements (the earth, water etc.) which may be said to have entered into created things, great or small, may (also) be said not to have entered into them (due to their pre-existence as the material cause of the universe), similarly, I am in the elements as well as the creation from the elements, and also not in them\(^\text{592}\) (as I existed before them and created them all).

35. This much should be understood by him who desires to know the reality about the Soul (ātman), the existence of which everywhere and at all times is proved by logical concomitance and discontinuance [i.e. ātman exists at all times, everywhere, as the cause of the effected things, and being different from them in the causal state (kāraṇavasthā), as being a witness, in the states of wakefulness, dreaming and sleep, and as detached or unconnected from everything in the state of Samādhi etc.].

36. Correctly follow this doctrine with perfect concentration. Your goodself will never be infatuated and become proud of being a creator in the different creations of the Kalpas.

Śrī Śuka said:

37. Having thus instructed Brahmā who occupies the solar orb. The solar light cannot exist unless it is supported by the Sun’s orb, yet the solar light can have an independent function outside the orb. It may dazzle the eye and blind men to its real nature, or it may manifest itself in various colours. JG. interprets Tamas as “darkness” and not Rāhu. Though darkness cannot exist where there is light, it cannot itself be perceived without the light of the eyes. In short, the Prākṛti and its development are appearances brought into being outside the Brahman by māyā. But the movement of māyā is possible due to the essential power of God. Thus māyā and its appearances derive their essence from God and hence cannot affect in any way God or His essential power.

highest place in all created beings, the unborn God Viṣṇu withdrew that visible form even while Brahmā was looking on.

38. (God Brahmā) who embodies all creation (by being its head), and who has folded his hands to Hari whose visible form has disappeared, created this universe as it was before (in the previous ḫalpa).

39. Once Brahmā, the Lord of the created beings and the protector of righteousness, practised the prescribed yamas and nīyamas for attaining the good of the creation which was as if his own objective as well.

40-41. Nārada who was the most beloved of his inheritors (sons), was devoted to his father, and rendered service to him. Oh king, the great sage, being a great devotee of the lord, desired to know from him the Māyā-power of Viṣṇu, the Lord of Māyā, and so pleased his father by his praiseworthy character, modesty and self-control.

42. Finding that his father, the grandfather of all the worlds, was pleased with him, the celestial sage (Nārada) respectfully asked him the very thing you enquire of me.

43. Brahmā, being pleased with him, expounded to him this Bhāgavata Purāṇa of ten characteristics, as it was revealed to him by the lord.

44. Nārada narrated it to Vyāsa of immeasurable brilliance, while he was meditating on the Supreme Brahman, on the bank of the Sarasvatī.

45. In recounting the same to you, I shall be satisfying your queries as to how all this world came to be produced from the Virāṭ Puruṣa and all other questions.

CHAPTER TEN

(The Ten Characteristics of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Here (in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa) the (constituent) topics detailed are: (1) Subtle creation (sarga), (2) gross creation (visarga), (3) law and order (ensured by God) (sthāna), (4) protection—welfare of all (pūṣaṇa), (5) material lust from Karmas (ūti), (6) the period of Manu and history thereof (manvantara), (7) accounts of God’s deeds (tīmukathā), (8) physical annihilation (niruddhā), (9) liberation (muktī) and (10) the last resort of the universe, the ultimate Reality (āsraya).

2. For arriving at the accurate and real knowledge of the tenth characteristic (viz. the last resort of the universe or ultimate Reality) the great-souled persons describe the first nine topics by direct expression⁵⁹⁴ (from the Vedas in eulogies etc.) and by way of purport (by episodes containing it).

3. Due to the disturbance in the equilibrium of attributes, the production of the five elements (bhūtas), the objects of senses, the sense-organs and the intelligence (i.e. mahat, ahamkāra) is called the subtle creation. The gross creation produced by the Virāt Puruṣa is called Visarga.

* The Śūta literature which, in the sacrificial milieu of the Brāhmaṇa period, became encyclopaedic, was classified under five topics which were later regarded as the characteristics of the compilations called the Purāṇas. Every Purāṇa thus consists of the following topics:

(1) Creation (sarga), (2) recreation after dissolution (prati-sarga), (3) Genealogy of Gods and sages (Vanīśa), (4) History of dynasties (vamśānucarita), (5) Manu-periods of time (Manvantara). Purāṇas themselves, acknowledged these topics as forming their essential characteristics. Vide Agni P.1.14, Garuḍa P.1.2.27, Kūra P.I, 1,12, Mātaya P. 5.9.64, Śīra P.—Vāyavya Sanhītā 1.41, Vāyu P.—Prakriyā Pāda 4,10.11; Viṣṇu P. 3.6.25. Under the influence of Vaiṣṇava theologies, these five topics were elaborated into ten topics enumerated in the above verses and later Bh.P. 12.7.9-22 with a slight change in the nomenclature. As Baladeva Upādhyāya (Purāṇa-Vimarṣa IV, pp. 125-139) shows there is not much difference between the contents of the five characteristics of Purāṇas in general and ten characteristics of the Bh. P.

⁵⁹⁴ śrutenaṛthaṇa—VR. combines these words and explains ‘as actually described in authoritative books or Vedas’.
4. Sthiti is the triumph of the Lord in the maintenance of (the divine) law and order (in everything), while the protection and welfare of all by his grace is Poṣaṇa. Manvantara consists of the account of the righteous path followed by Manu who observes his duty of protecting his subjects, while āti is the desire for action (directed by) tendencies resulting from Karma.

5. Isānukathā is the description of the incarnations of Hari, and stories of the lives of his devotees with detailed stories.

6. Nirodha is the withdrawal of the Jīva, along with all his powers and limitation in Hari when he enters his Yogic sleep. Mokṣa or liberation consists of abandoning the unreal form, and to stay in the essential nature of Brahman.

7. That from which creation and destruction are definitely known to emerge, is the resort which is called the Supreme Brahma, Supreme Soul, etc.

8.* He who regards organs of senses, such as eyes etc., as referring to himself is the seer or witness, the ādhyātmika Jīva. He is the same in the form of presiding deities of the sense-organs and is the ādhidaivika Jīva. He is the ādhibhautika (presiding over physical body) Jīva who is conditioned to see a distinction between the above two. (After the formation of the physical body, the two, viz. ādhyātmika and ādhidaivika, are separated.)

9. As we do not find (know) one in the absence of the other (i.e. if anyone of the three, viz. ādhyātmika, e.g. the eye and other organs, ādhidaivika (the presiding deity of the organ, e.g. the Sun or light), and the ādhibhautika, the physical sense organ, is absent, we cannot get any knowledge. These are thus

*VJ.: Viṣṇu is the man who directs the organs of senses pertaining to the body (ādhyātmika). He is present also in the presiding deities of the sense organ (such as the Sun, the deity of perception or seeing). He is present in physical objects of perception, e.g. the jar etc. and the determiner between the ādhyātmika and ādhidaivika (e.g. the eye and the light seen by it). [This Viṣṇu is the āṣṭaya (shelter) and controller of Jivas.]

According to SD. ādhyātmika is the set of cognitive and conative sense organs. Ādhidaivika is the group of presiding deities of the above organs. Physical body which is different from the above two is the ādhibhautika Puruṣa.
interdependent), he who knows all these three is the Soul who is not dependent on others, but is the support (shelter) of all.

10.* When this Virāṭ Puruṣa (Brahmā), bursting open the Cosmic Egg, came out and stood apart from the Brahmānda, he pondered over a place for himself. He himself being pure, created pure water (called garbhadaka).

11. On those waters created by Him, he lay for a period of a thousand years. Waters were created by the Man (nara) [and hence came to be called nārā] He is called Nārāyaṇa (as nārā or waters were his ayana ‘place of abode’).

12.* It is by His grace that Matter, Action, Time, Innate nature and individual Soul (Jīva) function. They cease to do so when he becomes indifferent to them.

13. Getting up from his yogic bed of meditation, he desired to be many. Through his Māyā power, he divided his golden power (lit. gold-semen) in three parts—adhyātma adhīdaiva and adhibhūta.

14. Listen how the Lord differentiated one and the same energy (semen) of the (Cosmic) Man in three parts as adhīdaiva, adhyātma and adhibhūta.

15. From the ether (ākāśa) within the body of the Puruṣa who was making movements, were produced the powers of the senses, the mind and the body, and from these was produced (the subtle power of Prāṇa called Śūtra the chief Prāṇa (vital Power) of all.895

16. All the organs of senses in living beings make movements when the chief Prāṇa is active. They stop their activities when he ceases to do so, like servants of a king following him.

* VJ : Having created principles (tattvas), the Puruṣa entered the Cosmic Egg along with them. Having broken it open, he manifested himself as the same Puruṣa. He wished to have place for sleeping on the bed of Śeṣa (another transformation of his Self). Being himself eternally pure, he created pure water suitable to be a material worthy of use in his worship.

* cf. supra II. 5.14 and 22.

895. VR. thinks that from the Prāṇa (vital energy) of god Brahmā, the Prāṇas of all beings were produced while VJ. states that it is from Hari who was active within the interior cavity of the Virāṭ Puruṣa (or Brahmā) that the powers of Hari were produced, and these were the real source of the chief vital energy (Prāṇa), the possessor of the Powers called—sahas, ofas and bala.
17. By the activities of Prāṇa, hunger and thirst were aroused in the Lord (Virāṭ Puruṣa). When He desired to eat and drink, the mouth (face) first became separate (was formed) as a distinct organ of the body.

18. From the mouth, the palate became a separate member, and the tongue also was produced then. Then different kinds of tastes which are obtained (appreciated) by the tongue were produced.

19. From the mouth of this great Being who desired to speak, were created the Fire (God, agni, the presiding deity), the organ of speech and the speech which is under the control of the two (viz. the organ of speech and the presiding deity). Certainly, his breath was controlled in water for a long time (which led to the creation of nose for breathing).

20. The two nostrils were formed, when the vital air began to move forcibly. When he (the Virāṭ Puruṣa) wished to have smell, the sense of smell was produced with Vāyu, the bearer of smell, as the presiding deity.

21. Being desirous of seeing himself in the darkness within the body of the Virāṭ Puruṣa a pair of eyes was created along with light (tejas) and the organ of seeing, and the power of seeing (the light, forms, colours).

22. When the Soul wished to hear the eulogies of the sages, two ears as well as the cardinal points (as presiding deities) and the auditory sense-organ were created. Hence the power of audition.

23. When he wished to feel softness, hardness, lightness, heaviness, warmth and coldness (of things), the sense of touch (tvac) was created. On it grow the hairs (the sense-organ) and trees (the presiding deities). The vital air having obtained the quality of touch by means of the skin, covers it internally and externally.

24. Through his desire to do various activities, hands

* In this description of the members of the body of the Cosmic Man (Virāṭ Puruṣa), the group of four, viz. the place, (adhiṣṭhāna), the sense-organ, the object of the sense and the presiding deity, though not stated, are to be understood in these verses. For example, this verse indicates that the palate is the position or place, the tongue is the sense organ, different tastes are the objects of the sense, and Varuṇa is the presiding deity of this organ.
grew to him, i.e. he developed hands). In them, the power (to work) as sense, and Indra (as the presiding deity) were produced. The action of receiving depends on them both.

25. When he wished to go to a desired destination, two legs (feet) grew out (from his body). Along with them, Viṣṇu the sacrifice incarnate became the presiding deity. The collection of materials for sacrifice was made by men by the action of going [The organ of motion whereby men can go for collection of sacrificial material was produced].

26. When he wanted progeny, pleasure and heaven (or immortality by one's continuation of race through offspring), the place of generative organ, the organ of generation (along with Prajāpati as the presiding deity) appeared. Sexual pleasure depends on them both (the deity and the sense-organ).

27. When he wanted to discharge the impurities of the food etc. (eaten by him), the anus appeared along with the organ discharging excrement, and with Mitra as the presiding deity. On these two depends the function of discharging the excrement.

28. When he desired to move out (completely) from one body to another, the outlet—the navel—was formed with āpāna (as the sense organ) and mṛtyu (the goddess of death as the presiding deity) was formed. On these two depends the separation (departing) from the body.

29. To him who became desirous for the intake of food and drink, stomach, intestines and veins (blood vessels) appeared with rivers and seas (as presiding deities). The satisfaction and the nourishment (of body) depend on them both (the organs and the deities).

30. When he wished to meditate on the Māyā of the Soul (ātman), the heart was produced. Then the mind (as the inner sense organ), the Moon (as the deity) and the functions of thinking and desiring (were produced). [597]

396. śiṣṇa here stands for both male and female organs.

597. This is obviously based on the Aitareya Upaniṣad: Khandas 1 and 2. The mutual relations of the physical member of the sense organ, the organ of the sense, and the presiding deity as given in the Ait. Up. are tabulated below, which may be compared with the above description in the Bh.P.
31. The seven essential ingredients of the body\textsuperscript{598} are the inner skin and the outer skin, flesh, blood, fat, marrow and bones which were created respectively from the earth, water, fire, prāṇa, ether, water and the air.

32. The organs of the senses have for their soul (i.e. are essentially related to) their objects (such as sound, touch etc.). Guṇas proceed from ahaṃkāra (ego). The mind consists of all vikāras (emotions, perturbations etc.). And Intelligence is characterised by the knowledge of the things as they are\textsuperscript{599}.

33. I have expounded to you the gross form of the Lord. It is covered from outside, with eight sheaths, of which the earth is the first.\textsuperscript{600}

34.* Beyond this (gross—Virāṭ form of the Lord) is the subtest, unmanifest, attributeless, (form) which has no beginning, middle or end (i.e. not subject to creation, subsistence and destruction). It is eternal and beyond the reach of words and mind.

\textsuperscript{600} The remaining are of water, fire, air, ether, Mahat, ahaṃkāra and Prakṛti.

According to ŚR., here ends the description of the gross body (Virāṭ Šarira) of the Lord.

* According to ŚR., SD. and VB, this is description of the subtle body (samaśṭi-liṅga Šarira) of God, but VR. interprets this as referring to mukta-jivas, i.e. the individual souls in liberated condition, while VJ. takes it as applying to the transcendental form of the Supreme Lord Hari.
35. I have described to you these two forms of the Lord. But sages⁶０¹ (learned men) do not take (accept) either of them as they are created by Māyā.

36. The Lord assumes the form of Brahmā and takes names, forms and actions, himself being both the things designated and the word denoting it. He is both the doer of actions, (through Māyā, but really) non-doer⁶０². He is different and beyond the both.

37-39. He assumes (the names, forms and actions of) Prajāpatis, Manus, gods, sages, manes (Pīrs), siddhas, semi-divine beings like Cāraṇas, Gandharvas, Vidyādharas; Asuras, Yakṣas, Kinnaras, celestial damsels, Nāgas, serpents, Kimpuruṣas (the same as Kinnaras), men, Mātrs (such as Brāhmī, Māheśvarī etc.), evil beings like demons, Pretas,⁶０³ Piśācas, Bhūtas (goblins), Vināyakas, imps like Kūśmāṇḍa, Unmāda (like Kālakarṇa), Vetāla, Yātudhāna (a kind of demon), planets, birds, deer, beasts, trees, mountains and reptiles.

40. He creates all beings which fall into two categories (moving and stationary), and those divided into four classes according to their process of birth (viz. born out of the egg, the womb, sweat and seeds): and those classified in three as per their habitat (viz. those which live on the land, in the water and in the air). These are the fruits of the actions—merit, demerit and a mixture of the two.⁶０⁴

41. The consequences of the actions are three according to the three attributes, sattva, rajas and tanas, and (according to the predominance of the attribute) beings become residents in the heaven, this world and the hell. Oh king, when one out of these attributes is dominated by the other two, each of these courses are then subdivided in three varieties.

43. Then in due course, he, assuming the form of the Time of the world-destruction, the world-consuming Fire and Rudra\textsuperscript{605}, like a wind dispersing a host of clouds, destroys the world that is created by him.

44. The divine lord of unimaginable power, glory etc. has been thus described (in his capacity of creator, protector and destroyer). But wise men should not think him to be of this much description.

45. Para Brahman is not a doer in the activity pertaining to creation (protection or destruction of the universe). It is for the sake of refuting his relation as agent that the description is given. It is imposed on him by Māyā.

46. Oh king! this kalpa-period of god Brahmā along with its subdivisions (vikālpa) has been described to you. SKANDHA THIRD

CHAPTER ONE

(Meeting of Vidura and Uddhava)

Śrī Sūka said:

* 1-2.

It is reported that formerly, venerable Maitreya⁶⁰⁷ was asked this very question, in the same manner by Vidura who took to forest, after leaving his affluent house—the house, wherein Lord Kṛṣṇa, the ruler of all, (but as) the ambassador (of Pāṇḍavas) entered (and stayed) as if it were his own, after leaving the palace of the Paurava King (Duryodhana).

The King said:

3. Oh Lord! Tell us in details, at what place did the meeting of Vidura with venerable Maitreya take place? and when (or what topic) did they discuss?

4. For, the question posed by Vidura, of pure Soul, to the great (sage) cannot be of less importance—especially so when it was praised as a good question by Maitreya (herself).

Śūta said:

5. When the great sage, master (lit. knower) of different branches of learning, was thus asked by king Parikṣit, he, being very pleased, replied, "Listen (I shall narrate to you)."

* VR. interprets: Formerly the venerable Vidura who was the advisor of Pāṇḍavas and was an añīta of Yamadharma, the controller of all beings, left the house of Dhṛtarāṣṭra which he considered as his own and took to forest. It is reported that when Vidura left his own magnificent house and went to the jungle, he asked the venerable sage Maitreya the same question, in the same way.

VR. adds that leaving his own house as well as that of the Paurava King shows the physical and mental renunciation of Vidura.

⁶⁰⁷ Maitreya or Kauśārama A son of Kuśārama and Mitrā and disciple of Parāśara; met Kṛṣṇa on the eve of his departure to Heaven and was ordered to be the preceptor of Vidura.—DHM. 95, Pl. 2.739-40.
6. When the blind king Dhṛtarāśtra supported in an unrighteous manner, his wicked sons, and deceitfully made the relative-less (fatherless) children of his younger brother, to live (lit. enter) the house of lac and set it on fire.

7. When king Dhṛtarāśtra did not prevent his son from censurable act of dragging (lit. touching) the hair of the queen of Kuru king (Yudhiṣṭhira), his daughter-in-law, whose tears washed away the saffron on her breasts [Or, which was the cause of subsequent washing away of the saffron on breasts of the wives of the enemies.]

8. As he succumbed to infatuation (or thoughtlessness, or serving his son), he did not return, as per terms of agreement, his due patrimony to the pious Yudhiṣṭhira who always followed the path of truth, and was fraudulently defeated in gambling, though he (Yudhiṣṭhira) respectfully requested for it (his share), after his return from the forest.

9. When the king whose (remaining small) portion of merit was spent up, did not regard as important the speeches of Kṛṣṇa, the Master of the world, (when) deputed by Pāṇḍavas,—speeches delivered in the (royal) assembly, and which were as if nectar-oozing to men (like Bhīṣma).

10. When Vidura was invited by his elder brother for consultation, he went to the palace. What he (Vidura), prominent amongst counsellors, proffered as an advice came later to be called ‘Vidura’s Advice’ (Vidura-Nītī) by (political) advisors.

11. “Return the hereditary share (of kingdom) to Yudhiṣṭhira who has suffered unbearable wrongs from you. It is against these that the serpent in the form of Bhima of whom you are so much afraid, is hissing in rage along with his brothers.

12. The God, Lord Kṛṣṇa, along with Brāhmaṇas and gods, has taken (the side of) Pāṇḍavas. The Lord of the Yadus who has subdued all kings of kings, stays in his own city.

13. You, who have lost prosperity due to your aversion to Kṛṣṇa, are nourishing Duryodhana with the idea that he is your child. But he, the hater of the Supreme Man, is an evil incarnate which has entered your house and is staying. For the good of the family (at least) remove that inauspicious person."

14. (When) Vidura whose character was praiseworthy to the righteous, spoke thus in that assembly, he was insulted by Suyodhana whose lower lip was throbbing through great rage, and also by Karṇa, his younger brother (Duḥśāsana) and Śakuni.

15. (Duryodhana said): "Who asked this crooked slave-born to be here? He is treacherous to his master with whose food he grew fat, and espouses the cause of the enemy. Let him be immediately driven out of the town alive\textsuperscript{608} (confiscating his property.)"

16. Though, in the very presence of his brother Dhṛta-rāṣṭra, he (Vidura) was cut to the quick by such sharp words which pierced the ears like arrows, he was unafflicted, as he well understood (and respected) the power of māyā (as the cause of this insult). Of his own accord, he left the assembly hall, leaving his bow at the door (indicating his neutrality in the ensuing struggle).

17. He, whom Kauravas got by their good luck, departed from Hastināpura (along with good fortunes of the Kauravas). With a desire to accumulate merit, he visited, one after another, holy places sanctified by the sacred feet of Hari—holy places where God has manifested himself in thousand forms (like Śiva, Brahmā etc.).

18. Unaccompanied by anyone, he travelled to towns, holy groves, mountains, bowers, rivers and lakes of translucent waters, and holy places and temples which were richly adorned with the symbols of the Infinite Lord.

19. While wandering over the earth, he practised observances (vows) pleasing to Hari. He lived on pure consecrated food, performing ablutions in every sacred place, sleeping on the bare ground. Wearing bark garments, he was careless about his person, and became unrecognizable to his friends and relatives.

20. In this way, while wandering in the Bhārata-varṣa, he went to Prabhāsa in due course. At that time, with the help of Kṛṣṇa, Yudhiṣṭhira, the son of Pṛthā, was ruling over the whole earth which was (controlled) by the army of one king only (i.e. of Yudhiṣṭhira), and was under (the protection of) one royal umbrella.

21. Then, at that place, he heard (the report of) the annihilation of his friends (relatives) who were burnt down like a forest of dry bamboos consumed by conflagration. Then being deeply grieved, he returned to the Sarasvatī.

22. In the Sarasvatī, he resorted to places sacred to Trita, Uśanas, Manu, Pṛthu, Agni, Asita, Vāyu, Sudās, cows, Guha and Śrāddhadeva.

23. In this region, he visited various temples of Viṣṇu constructed by sages and gods—temples which were especially distinguished by the most important of Viṣṇu’s weapons, viz., the disc Sudarśana (carved in the gold tops of the temples) the sight of which reminds people of Kṛṣṇa.

24. Passing through the rich countries of the Surāśṭras, the Sauvīras, the Matsyas, the Kurujāṅgalas, he reached the Yamunā where he met Uddhava, the great devotee of the lord Kṛṣṇa.

25. With great affection, he closely embraced Uddhava that famous follower of Vāsudeva and a former pupil of Brhaspati (in politics), and who was perfectly serene in mind. He enquired of him about the welfare of his relatives who were under the protection of the Supreme Lord Kṛṣṇa.

26. “Are the two ancient Puruṣas (Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma) well in the house of Śūrasena—the Puruṣas who incarnated on the earth due to the request of Brahmā born from the lotus in his (Viṣṇu’s) navel and who have enjoyed the joy of achieving the welfare of the world.

27. Is the intimate friend of the Kuru, the respected Vasudeva, happy ?—The liberal Vasudeva who like a father, gives sumptuous gifts to his sisters, in addition to the rich gifts given to the satisfaction of their husbands.

28. Dear friend ! Is Pradyumna, the brave commander-in-chief of the Yādava forces, hale and hearty? By propitiating Brāhmaṇas, Rukmini, begot him (Pradyumna), the God of Love in his previous birth, as a son from Lord Kṛṣṇa.

29. Is Ugrasena, the king of Sāttvatas, Viṣṇis, Bhojas and Dāśārha was happy?—Ugrasena whom the lotus-eyed (Kṛṣṇa) installed as a king when he (through fear of his life) gave up the hopes about kingship.

30. Oh gentle Uddhava! Is Sāmba, the son of Kṛṣṇa, and similar to him, the chief of warriors who ride chariots in battles, happy? Is the god Kārttikeya whom Pārvatī bore in the former birth and whom Jāmbavatī gave birth (as a son) after performing many severe observances, happy?

31. Is Śātyaki who learnt the secret technique of archery from Arjuna happy?—Śātyaki who by his intensely devoted service of Lord Kṛṣṇa attained the path leading to the Lord immediately,—a path which is difficult even for recluses to attain.

32. Is the wise, pious (sinless) Akrūra (the son of Śvaphalaka) always devoted to the glorious Lord, happy?—Akrūra, who lost himself due to his love (for God) and rolled himself in the dust on the road which was adorned with the foot-prints of Kṛṣṇa.

33. Is Devaki, the princess of Devaka of Bhoja clan, happy?—Devaki, who like the mother of gods (Aditi) of whom Viṣṇu was born, verily bore the Lord in her womb like the Veda triad (Ṛg, Ṛgveda and Sāma Vedas) which contains the meaning which expands into a sacrifice.

34. Is the revered Aniruddha happy?—(Aniruddha) who fulfills the desires of the sāttvatas and who is regarded as the source of Śāstras by the Vedas, as the director of the mind, for he is the fourth principle presiding over sattra or antah-karaṇa (the inner organ)\(^609\).

35. Oh gentle Uddhava! Are also Hṛḍīka, Śātyaki, Cārudeśṇa, Gada and others, well?—those who in their absolute devotion to Kṛṣṇa worship him as the Lord of their Soul which is different from their bodies (etc.)

36. Is Dhārma (Yudhiṣṭhira), with two arms, viz. Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa, protecting according to the duties of kings the established (socio-religious) institutions?—(Yudhishthira) in whose assembly, Duryodhana boiled (with rage and jealousy) at the sight of Arjuna’s services and the imperial fortune gained (by him) through victories.

37. Or has Bhima who is highly intolerant with the wrongdoers and nurtured rage (revenge) like a serpent, given it up (or visited it on the offenders—Kauravas)?—(Bhima) whose (heavy) steps the earth could not bear, while he moved about in various ways, brandishing his mace (gadā).

38. Is Arjuna, the celebrated warrior among the leaders of armies of chariots, the wielder of the Gāndiva bow, enemyless (after destroying them all)?—(Arjuna) with whom was pleased god Śiva who assumed the form of a Kirāta, at his (Arjuna) covering him thickly with volleys of arrows.

39. Are the twins (who were brought up as) sons of Pṛthā (Kuntī), who are protected (lit. surrounded) by Kunti’s sons like eyes by the eyelids, enjoying themselves after wrestling their share of ancestral kingdom from the enemies in the war, like Garuḍa taking (the share of) nectar from the army of gods?

40. How wonderful, that though bereaved of a great royal sage (like Pāṇḍu), a matchless warrior, who seated in his chariot with only his bow as a helpmate, conquered all the four cardinal points, Kuntī stayed alive for the sake of children!

41. Oh mild-natured Uddhava! I feel sorry for the downfalling Dhṛtarāṣṭra who showed enmity to his departed brother (Pāṇḍu). I (his living brother and), a friend and well-wisher was expelled from his capital by him who followed his sons.

42. (Though thus maltreated), I felt no wonder as I could see the greatness of Hari who confuses the working of the human mind by his assumption of human form; and, being in disguise, I could leisurely perform pilgrimage on the earth.

43. Though the venerable Lord is powerful enough to

610. This refers to the test of Arjuna’s heroism taken by god Śiva before granting him the Pāśupata missile (Vide MBH., II.39-32-64.)

611. vajri-vaktra—From the mouth of Indra (ŚR., VR., VJ.) But VD. objects that a thing taken from the mouth of another is unacceptable. Hence he dissolves the compound: Vajri vakiram (pradhānam) yasya / ‘That of which Indra is the leader!’
remove the miseries of his devotees, by destroying the kings who were proud of their triple superiority (viz. in learning, riches and heredity), and who constantly made the earth tremble by their armies, he was indifferent to the sinful conduct of the Kauravas.

44. The incarnation of the unborn god is for the destruction of those who go astray. Though unconcerned with actions, his deeds are reclaiming the errants to the proper path. If (that be) not (the case) who, (being) above guṇas, would verily like the assumption of the body and the course of activities.

45. Oh friend! Extol to me the news (episodes) of the unborn Lord of Holy Fame, who was born in the Yadu race for the good of the kings of the world who have submitted themselves to him (his protection) and for the welfare of those who abide by his orders.

CHAPTER TWO

(The Dialogue between Uddhava and Vidura)

Sri Śuka said:

1. The great devotee of the Lord (Uddhava) who was thus asked by Vidura about the welfare pertaining to the dear one (i.e. of Lord Kṛṣṇa), could not reply as he was painfully reminded of the Lord and was overcome with sorrow at his bereavement.

2-3. How could he (Uddhava) who, as a child of five years, when invited by his mother for breakfast, did not wish to partake of it while worshipping Kṛṣṇa as a part of his sports in childhood, break the news in reply, when he had spent the whole lifetime in his service, and attained old age, and was reminded (sorrowfully) of the feet of the master.

4. For the period of a muhūrta he remained silent (in meditation) highly satisfied by the nectar-like feet of Kṛṣṇa and deeply immersed in intense devotion of the Lord.

5. He, on whose body hair was standing on ends, and who was shedding tears from his closed eyes, and who was drowned in the flood of love for Kṛṣṇa, was seen (as if) his highest purpose was achieved.

6. Gradually, he returned from the abode of the Lord to the world of men. He wiped out his eyes. Uddhava who was wonderstruck (with the deeds of the Lord) replied to Vidura. Uddhava said:

7. What good news can I give to you when the Sun in the form of Kṛṣṇa has set, and our homes, bereft of splendour, have been swallowed up by the boa-constriction (of Time)?

8. Alas! it is the misfortune of this world, and especially of the Yādavas who lived with him intimately and yet did not know him, just as the fish living in the sea along with the moon before the churning of the sea did not recognize the Moon (as such but regarded him as an aquatic animal).

9*. All the Sāttvatas, though capable of knowing intentions of others, and possessing deep understanding, and of singleness of devotion, regarded the Lord of all created beings as the leader of the Sāttvatas only.

10. Those who have sown (i.e. completely fixed) their intellect in Hari, are not deluded by the words of those who are haunted by the Māyā of the Almighty (e.g. the Yādavas) or by those who entertained evil intention to him (like Śiśupāla and others).

11. He had exhibited his form to men who had not performed proper penance and who had not seen it to their satisfaction. He disappeared from the world taking with him his splendid form which was the centre (of attraction) to the eyes of the world.

12. It was a form which was useful for activities in imitation of human beings which he assumed, showing the power of his Yoga-māyā. It was the highest peak of perfect beauty

---

*According to SD, this verse praises the Yādavas and Pauravas who knew the real Lord. "The leaders of the Puru-clan (like Yudhiṣṭhira) and Sāttvatas (like Vasudeva) realised the chief of Sāttvatas, namely, Śrī Kṛṣṇa as being the Brahman, the support of all created beings (bhūtas) and resting completely on the Lord, were happy thereby."

612. bhūtāvāsam: i) A jīva, resident in a physical and inner (kāraṇa) body—VB.

ii) A leader of a few men—VJ.
and sublimity, parts of which beautified even the ornaments and a wonder to him also.

13. Seeing his form which gave great delight to the three worlds in the Rājasūya sacrifice of Yudhiṣṭhira, they (people of the three worlds) thought that in creating beautiful human form, the whole of creator's skill is exhausted today.

14. The women of Vraja who got the honour of his smiles overflowing with love, sportive dances and longing looks, followed him with their eyes and minds, leaving their work unfinished.

15. The Lord of all, [Brahman with attributes and beyond attributes] with compassion for his own gentle forms being troubled by other (wicked) ones, and accompanied with Prakṛti of which Mahat is but a fraction, (or with Balarāma as his great part), though unborn, took birth like fire (which though ever present in the wood, sparks out after friction).

16. The apparent birth of the birthless Lord in the house of Vasudeva, (his) stay in a settlement of cowherds (Vraja) as if out of fear of the enemy (Kāṁsa), and the flight of the Lord of infinite power, from his own city—this (behaviour like ordinary human beings) distresses me.

17. It pains my heart to remember how he, bowing down to the feet of his parents, beseeched, “Oh father, mother kindly be gracious unto us who being in great fear of Kāṁsa, could not render you any service.”

18. What man who having smelt (experienced the great joy in) even a particle of pollen in the lotus-like feet of the Lord, can forget him—the Lord, who with the movement of his creeper-like eyebrow, a veritable god of destruction, removed the load (of the wicked) from the earth.

19. Verily, you have witnessed how, during the Rājasūya Sacrifice, Śiṣupāla, the arch-enemy of Kṛṣṇa, attained Liberation after which even yogins aspire by observing carefully yogic practices. How can one endure separation from (such a gracious Lord like) him?

20. Similarly, other warriors who, on the field of battle, drank with their eyes the beautiful lotus-like face of Kṛṣṇa, and attained to his feet after purification (death) from the missiles of Arjuna.
21-22. The Lord, who himself is unsurpassed in excellence (lit. without an equal or superior), and is a ruler of the three (worlds or attributes—gunas), and who due to his intrinsic highest blissfulness, is in enjoyment of all (types of) happiness, whose footstool is (as if) eulogised by (the sound on the footstool made by) the crests of the crowns of the eternal guardians of the world who bring tributes to him—Such a Lord should stand before Ugrasena who is occupying a high seat (on the throne), and should request him, “Your Majesty, kindly pay attention (to us).” Oh Vidura, the servantlike behaviour of the Lord greatly troubles us, his servants.

23. What mercifulness! The wicked Pūtanā who with a desire to kill him, made him suck her breast smeared with deadly poison, (and for this she) attained the place worthy for his nurse (Yaśodā). Is there any other god so merciful like this, to whom we should resort (for salvation or protection)?

24. I regard asuras as the devotees of the Supreme Lord as their minds are fixed on the Lord of the three worlds, through anger and who on the battlefield visualized him armed with the Sudarśana disc and seated on the shoulder of Garuḍa, attacking them.

25. The Lord took birth from Vasudeva and Devaki, in the prison of Kaṁsa, the chief of the Bhojas, as he was so requested by god Brahmā and desired to restore happiness to the earth.

26. Then, by his father who was afraid of Kaṁsa, he was taken to the settlement of cowherds headed by Nanda. He stayed there with Balarāma with his power unmanifested, for eleven years.

27. Surrounded by cowboys and himself tending the calves, the All-pervading Lord sported on the (banks of the) Yamunā in parks, dense with trees full of warbling birds.

28. He who looked like an innocent young one of a lion, displayed his boyish pranks of (apparent) laughing and crying, to the residents of Vraja.

29. The same Lord tended their wealth in the form of cattle with white bulls (prominent in them) and which was
(as if), the abode of the goddess of wealth. He entertained the cowherds accompanying him, by playing upon the flute.

30. Like a boy breaking down his toys, he sportively killed those wily conjuring demons who could assume any form at will and who were deputed by Kaṁsa (to kill him).

31. He brought back to life the cowherds and cows who died of poisonous water of the Yamunā. Subduing (and expelling) Kāliya, the king of serpents, he made them drink the water again which was restored to its original condition of purity.

32. The omnipresent Lord made the chief of cowherds (Nanda) to perform a sacrifice in honour of cows (in which cows were worshipped) with the help of the best of Bāhmanas, as he wished to spend the great wealth in a good way. (In this way, he subdued the pride of Indra).

33. Oh Vidura! When Indra, incensed at the discontinuation of his own (traditional) worship, showered heavily, the settlement of the cowherds which became extremely distressed (by the downpour of rain), was protected (by the Lord) with the umbrella in the form of the hill (Govardhana) which he sportively wielded and showed thereby his grace.

34. Respecting (as it were) the evenings bright with autumnal moon, he enjoyed himself singing sweet songs and became an ornament of the circle of ladies (performing Rāsa dance).

CHAPTER THREE

(The Dialogue between Vidura and Uddhava)
—Glorious deeds of Kṛṣṇa

Uddhava said:

1. Then, with a desire to make his parents happy, he (Kṛṣṇa) accompanied by Balarāma came to the city (Mathurā) and forcibly pulled down Kaṁsa, the head of the enemy-force, from his royal seat, and after killing him, dragged him along the ground (though dead).
2. He learnt from Sāndipani the Veda with all its details (the six accessories of the Veda) which was recited to him but once. He restored his dead son to him (Sāndipani) from the belly of Pañcajana.

3. Just as Garuḍa snatched away his share (of nectar), Kṛṣṇa, in the very presence of kings invited on behalf of the Princess of Bhīṣmaka, carried away Rukmini—his own share (as she was an incarnation of Lakṣmī)—with a view to marry her by the Gāndharva form of marriage, thus setting his foot on the heads of the kings.

4. In another svayaṇivara, he tamed the bulls whose noses had not been bored and married the Princess (Satyabhāmā) of Nagnajit. He discomfited the foolish kings who, despite their humiliation (by Kṛṣṇa's fulfilment of the marriage condition) still entertained a desire for her and came to fight him with their weapons, though he could not be injured by them.

5. Like an ordinary man (under the thumb of his wife) the Lord took away the celestial tree Pārijāta to grant the desire of his beloved (Satyabhāmā). At this, Indra (who was incited by Śaci) like a pet deer of women, got blind with rage and pursued him with his army (of gods).

6. Seeing her son (Naraka) who was (as if) swallowing the sky with his body, cut down by the Sudarśana disc, he

613. Sāndipani—Teacher of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma (DHM 279).
614. Pañcajana—Name of a demon who assumed the form of a conch-shell and was slain by Kṛṣṇa to recover Sāndipani's son. But as he was not found in Pañcajana's belly, Kṛṣṇa brought him back from Yama. For details—infra X Ch. 45.
615. ŚR accepts the v.l. samāhita i.e. who were attracted by her (Rukmini's) beauty etc.
616. Modern 'love-marriage'. So called due to its supposed prevalence among the Gandharvas. ASD 398 is wrong when it states that it is performed 'without ceremonies'. Smṛti Candrikā and other digests state that homa and saṃtapaḍī are necessary. For details Kane Hist. of Dharma Śāstra Vol. II—i. Ch. IX. P. 521-24.
617. Kings who were invited by her brother Rukmi whose name had two syllables common with the name 'Rukmiṇī'—(ŚR).
618. Indra's ingratitude is obvious, as it was he who invited Kṛṣṇa to get back the ear-rings of his mother Aditi from Bhaumāśura. Kṛṣṇa went to Svarga with Satyabhāmā and restored the ear-rings (Vide infra X. Ch. 59).
(Kṛṣṇa) was prayed by the goddess of the Earth (Naraka’s mother). Having given the remaining (unannexed) kingdom to Naraka’s son, Kṛṣṇa entered the harem.

7. Seeing Hari, the friend of the afflicted person, the princesses who were abducted by Nāraka, immediately rose to receive him with their glances full of rapture, bashfulness and love.

8. Assuming suitable forms by his māyā powers, he simultaneously married them all, with proper formalities, in different apartments.

9. With a desire to expand his prakṛti (or to become many for the sake of prakṛti), he got from each of them ten children equal to him in all respects.

10. He commissioned his great prowess and glory in his men (devotees like Mucukunda, Bhima), and through them he got killed Kālayavana, Jarāsandha, Śālva and others who, with their armies, laid siege to his town.

11. He caused the death of some like Śambara, Dvīvida, Bāṇa, Mura and Balvala (through others), while he killed others like Dantavaktra (personally).

12. He then caused the destruction of kings who espoused the cause of your brothers’ sons (Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas).

619. For details vide infra X. 59.

620. Śambara: A demon who stole away Kṛṣṇa’s son Pradyumna soon after his birth, and threw him into the sea. Providentially Pradyumna was saved and he killed Śambara—BPK 197.

621. Dvīvida—A monkey friend of Nāraka; to avenge Nāraka’s death he went on destroying the towns in Kṛṣṇa’s kingdom. At Rai-vata hill, he offended Balarāma insulting his fair companions. In the ensuing fight Balarāma killed him—PI. 2.150.

622. Bāṇa—Eldest son of Bali; a devotee of Śiva; arrested Kṛṣṇa’s grandson Aniruddha who courted his daughter Uṣā. In the battle that followed for the rescue of Aniruddha, god Śiva and Skanda assisted Bāṇa but were finally overpowered by Kṛṣṇa. At Śiva’s request Kṛṣṇa spared Bāṇa’s life and returned with Uṣā and Aniruddha—DHM. 42.

623. Mura—A demon ally of Nāraka; defended Nāraka’s capital Prāg-jiotīṣa with his seven thousand sons. But he along with his sons was killed by Kṛṣṇa with his disc Sudarśana—DHM. 212.

624. Balvala—A demon who ruined the sacrifices at Naimiṣa; was killed by Balarāma at the request of the sages.

625. Danta-vaktra—King of Kuru; took side against Kṛṣṇa on behalf of Jarāsandha, Śālva and was killed by Kṛṣṇa—DHM. 80.
By the marching of their armies to Kurukṣetra, the earth was as if made to tremble.

13. He was not satisfied when he saw Suyodhana, along with his followers, lying prostrate on the ground with thighs broken and with his royal splendour and life cut short by the evil advice tendered by Karna, Duḥśāsana and Śakuni.

14. (He thought to himself): What an insignificant portion of the heavy burden of the earth is relieved, though an army of eighteen Akṣauhinīs is annihilated through (the medium of) Bhīma, Droṇa, Arjuna and Bhīma! For there exists an irresistible army of Yādavas headed by (Pradyumna and others who are) my parts (aṁśas).

15. There is no other strategem to kill them (Yādavas) except when there will be a quarrel among themselves, with their eyes reddish with intoxication. When I prepare to leave this world, they will automatically disappear.

16. After planning thus, the Lord, establishing the son of Dharma (Yudhiṣṭhira) in his own kingdom, gave delight to his friends and showed thereby the path of the righteous people.

17. The continuity of the Puru family, which was properly secured by Abhimanyu in Uttarā, but which was verily destroyed by the missiles of Aśvatthāman, was again restored and protected by the Lord.

18. The Omnipresent Lord caused the son of Dharma (Yudhiṣṭhira) to perform the horse-sacrifice thrice. He (Yudhiṣṭhira) who was devoted to Kṛṣṇa, enjoyed himself protecting the earth with the help of his younger brothers.

19. The glorious Lord also, the Soul of the universe and a follower of the path prescribed in Śrutis and Smṛtis enjoyed all worldly pleasures at Dvārakā. But as he was firmly fixed in the Sāṅkhya Philosophy, he remained non-attached (due to his realization of the distinction between Prakṛti and Puruṣa).

20-21. With his lovely smiling looks and words sweet as nectar, with spotless character and with his body as an abode of Śri (Goddess Lakṣmi) he gave delight to this world as well as to the next, especially so to the Yadus. At night, he showed momentary friendship to women who obtained the pleasure of his companionship.

626. V.J. construes it with Bhīma, Droṇa etc.
22. While he was enjoying himself thus for pretty long years, He became unattached to the householder’s life and the pleasures therein.

23*. The objects of enjoyment are in the power of the Fate. Man himself is at the mercy of the Fate. What person devoted to the Lord of Yoga (Kṛṣṇa) by yogic process, will put faith in these (objects etc.)?

24. Once upon a time, in the city of Dvārakā (some) sages were offended by Yādava and Bhoja lads while at play. The sages who knew the intention of the Lord, cursed them.

25. Then after some months, Vṛṣṇis, Bhojas, Andhakas and others, being deluded by God, rode in their chariots to Pra-bhāsa, in great delight.

26. Thereafter, performing ablutions and offering libations to Manes, gods and sages they, with that water, gave cows of many good qualities, to Brāhmaṇas.

27-28. They donated to Brāhmaṇas gold and silver, clothes and beds, skins and woollen blankets, horses and chariots, elephants, girls and land sufficient for maintenance, sumptuous food with a view to pleasing the Lord. Those brave warriors whose life was dedicated to the service of cows and Brāhmaṇas bowed to them (Brāhmaṇas) with their heads touching the ground.

CHAPTER FOUR

(The Dialogue between Vidura and Uddhava)
—Destruction of the Yādavas and Kṛṣṇa’s Message.

Uddhava said :—

1. Then, having been permitted by them (Brāhmaṇas), they (Yādavas etc.) drank (the flour-made) liquor. They lost

*SR differs: When the Lord himself who had everything in his power, felt non-attachment, who would love or entertain faith in things in the power of the fate? A person devoted to Lord Kṛṣṇa would never do so. their knowledge (sobriety), and cut each other to the quick by bitter words.

2. When their minds became unbalanced and vehement by the evil effect of the wine, the destruction (as a result of fight) among them, after sunset, was like that of bamboos (friction between which creates forest conflagration consuming the forest of bamboos).

3. Seeing that course of events brought about by his māyā, the Lord sipped water of the Sarasvatī, and sat down at the foot of a tree.

4. And (while we were already at Dvārakā), I was asked to go to Badarī by the Lord who removes afflictions of his devotees, (but) who desired to destroy his own clan.

5. Oh conquerer of the enemies! Though I understood his intention, I followed him, as I could not bear the separation from the feet of the Master.

6. Searching for the most beloved Master (who protects by granting the knowledge of the Soul), I found him, the abode of the goddess Lakṣmī, sitting alone on the bank of the Sarasvatī, without any shelter (as he is the shelter of all).

7. (I saw the Lord) of beautiful blue complexion, composed of pure sattva, with calm, reddish eyes, recognisable by his four arms and by yellow silken garments.

8. He was sitting with his lotus-like right foot on the left thigh, leaning against a young Aśvattha tree, with all pleasures of the senses renounced, (yet) in perfect bliss.

9. In the course of his wandering over the world, there came by chance a siddha (Maitreyā), the great devotee of the Lord, and a friend and well wisher of Dvaipāyana (Vyāsa).

10. While the devoted sage, with his neck (head) bending with joy and devotion, was listening, Mukunda (Krṣṇa) removing my fatigue with a long smiling look full of love (compassion), said to me:

The Lord said:

11. Being an antaryāmin (dweller in the hearts of all) I know what you wish. What I give to you is difficult for others to obtain; (for) in days gone by, in the long sacrificial session performed by Prajāpatis and Vasus, Oh (former) Vasu, you performed the sacrifice with a desire to attaining me.
12. Oh virtuous one! This is the last of your births, as my grace has been secured by you in the present birth. How glad I am! that you have come with singleminded devotion to see me when I am about to leave this mortal world (to go to Vaikuṇṭha), in this solitary place.

13. Formerly (in Pādma Kalpa), at the beginning of creation, the highest knowledge throwing light on my greatness (majesty)—which the learned ones designated as the Bhāgavata—was imparted by me to the unborn god (Brāhma) seated in the lotus sprouting forth from my navel.

14. I, who was thus respectfully addressed, and who was the recipient of the favour of a long look of the Supreme Man, with my hair standing on their ends due to my affection (to him), with flowing tears, and bowing with folded hands, addressed to him in faltering words.

15. "Oh Lord! Out of the four goals of life (viz. dharma, artha, kāma and Mokṣa), which goal is difficult to be achieved by those who resort to your lotus-like feet? But, Oh Almighty, I do not request you for any one of them, as I am eager to serve your lotus-like feet.

16. That you performed actions, though you are devoid of actions and desire to do them, that you have taken a birth though you are birthless, that you resorted to a castle or fled away through the fear of the enemy, even though the god of Death is your form, that you married with ten thousand young women despite your enjoyment of your self-blissfulness—by these the intellect of the learned ones gets confused and fatigued.

17. Or, Oh Almighty Lord! It throws our mind in confusion that you, whose power of self-knowledge is unobstructed and continuous, should invite me for consultations like an ignorant person, though you are never ignorant or careless.

18. You have completely disclosed to Brahma, the supreme knowledge throwing light on your own (essential) mysterious nature. Oh Lord, if it be within our capacity to receive it, explain it, to us so that we may easily cross the misery (of the worldly existence)."

19. To me who have thus expressed the cherished desire

627. kālīmanah—You are the destroyer of all—Vf.
of my heart, the Supreme Lord of lotus-like eyes instructed me (gave me insight) into his Supreme Nature.

20. I, who have thus learnt the path of the special knowledge of the real Soul from Lord Kṛṣṇa, whose holy feet have been worshipped by me, bowed to his feet, circumambulated the Lord and have come here with my heart afflicted with separation (from him).

21-22. I, who am full of delight at the sight of the Lord, and distressed at my separation from him, shall go to the site of the Badarī—hermitage which was liked by him, and where Lord Nārāyana and venerable sage Nara, both of whom confer blessings on the world, perform a mild (non-troubling) but severe penance for a long period (up to the end of Kalpa).

Śrī Śuka said:

23. Having thus heard from Uddhava, the unbearable (report of the) death of his friends and relatives, the learned Vidura controlled the explosion of grief by his knowledge.

24. The prominent Kaurava (Vidura), due to his confidence in (Uddhava), the great devotee of Lord Kṛṣṇa, prominent among Kṛṣṇa’s circle of friends and kinsmen, spoke thus to him while he was about to depart.

Vidura said:

25. Your honour deserves to convey to me the supreme knowledge shedding light on the mysterious nature of the Lord—the knowledge which the Lord of Yoga, the ruler (of the universe) imparted to you. For, the servants of Viṣṇu move about to serve the needs of their devotees.

Uddhava said:

26. The sage Maitreya is to be propitiated by you for this knowledge, as it was in my presence that the Lord himself directed him to do so (i.e. to instruct you) at the time of his departure from the world of mortals.

Śrī Śuka said:

27. In this way, in the company of Vidura, Uddhava got his anguish (at the separation of Hari) subsided by the nectarlike conversation about the excellent qualities of the Omnipresent Lord, and spent like a moment the night, on the bank of the Yamunā, and then left (for Badarikāśrama).

The King said:

28. How did Uddhava remain (safe from the Brāhmaṇa’s curse) when Hari who was the chief of the Vṛṣṇis and Bhojas, leaders of the commanders of warriors joined the majority, and who (Hari) was the Lord of the three (gods, e. g. Brahma and others) gave up his mortal coil?

Sri Śuka said:

29-30. The Lord whose will is always supreme (lit. never futile), began to think when he annihilated his own race by the Time (god of death) in the form of a Brāhmaṇa’s curse, and was about to cast off his body.

"Now when I am no more in this world, only Uddhava, the best among those who have realised the soul, deserves to receive the knowledge that is within me (or which relates to me).

31. Uddhava is not a jot inferior to me. He is the master (of himself) unperturbed by worldly objects (gunaś). Hence let him remain (after the annihilation of the Yādavas) to make people receive knowledge about me.

32. Thus directed by the lord of the three worlds, the source of the Vedas, (Uddhava) went to the Badari hermitage and worshipped Hari by deep meditation.

33-35. Having heard from Uddhava praiseworthy acts of Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Soul, who out of sport assumed the human body, and of his laying down the body (death) which increased the courage of the wise, and which is more difficult to understand on the part of beasts (beastlike persons) of unsteady minds and of his being seen mentally by Kṛṣṇa, Oh great Kuru, Vidura meditated upon him, but after the departure of Uddhava, became overcome with feelings of love and wept.

36. From the bank of the Yamunā, Vidura, the Siddha, reached the heavenly river (the Gaṅgā) after some (several days, where Maitreya (the son of Mitrā) was met by him.
CHAPTER FIVE

(Dialogue between Vidura and Maitreya)
Tattvas and their Deities.

Śri Śuka said:

1. At Haridvāra, Vidura, the most excellent among the Kurus, purified due to his devotion to Acyuta (Krṣṇa), fully satisfied with Maitreya’s straightforwardness, humility and compassion, approached Maitreya of unfathomable knowledge, who was seated there (unoccupied with any work) and asked him.

Vidura said:

2. May your Honour please explain to us what is proper to be done (i.e. the proper course of conduct) in this world, as (we find that) people do some (prescribed) acts for the sake of happiness, but they do neither get happiness nor the pacification or cessation of the other thing (i.e. misery) and are, on the contrary, subjected to misery again and again.

3. It is a fact that really auspicious devotees of Lord Krṣṇa (like you) move about in this world with a view to be gracious to people who by their misfortune have become averse to Krṣṇa, and (consequently) unrighteous and extremely miserable.

4. Hence, Oh great saint, please advise us the course (of conduct leading) to happiness whereby the glorious Lord, installed in the hearts of men purified by devotion, imparts the ancient lore (based on the authority of the eternal Vedās) leading to the direct realisation of the true nature of the Soul.

5-9. Oh best among Brāhmaṇas! Please describe (explain) to us: What deeds the Lord, the controller of the māyā consisting of three guṇas (or the Lord of the three worlds the self-dependent, performs after taking incarnation; how he, though devoid of activity (or free from desires) created this (universe), in the beginning; how he, having stabilised it (in its existence) arranges for its maintenance; how he abstains

628. v.i. sauśīlya-gumdbhītptam—Adj. qualifying Maitreya: Maitreya was satisfied with humility and other qualities of Vidura.
from worldly activities by withdrawing it (the universe) into the vacuum (ākāśa) in his bosom and sleeps in the cave, viz., his yoga-māyā; how this Lord of Yoga, of unimaginable powers, though he is one, entered this (universe) and became many (in the form of Brahmā and others); the actions he does for the well-being of Brāhmaṇas, cows and gods as part of his sports in different incarnations; for in spite of hearing the nectar like (sweet) deeds of the Lord, who is at the head of persons of auspicious fame, (persons whose name is auspicious to utter); (Describe to me) with what first principles (Tattvas like mahat etc.) the master of the protectors of this world (like Indra etc.), created and regulated the different regions along with their guardians, and those regions beyond the Lokāloka mountains—regions in which all the different classes of beings are distinguished from each other (as god, man etc.) according to the function of their Karmas. (Explain to me) how Nārāyaṇa, the self-created creator of the universe, created differences among beings, according to their inborn nature, deeds (karma), form and name.

10. Oh respected sage! I have often heard from Vyāsa, duties prescribed for the twice-born (higher) castes and lower castes. But with the exception of the ambrosial flood of the episodes of Kṛṣṇa, we are satiated with hearing matters which result in insignificant pleasure.

11. Who would feel fed up with the (description of the) episodes of Kṛṣṇa of holy feet—episodes which are glorified by learned persons (like Nārada) in your assemblies. For as soon as he (Kṛṣṇa) enters a man’s ears (i.e. Kṛṣṇa’s stories are (heard), he cuts asunder (man’s) attachment to the house (worldly life) which involves him in mundane existence.

12. Even your friend, the venerable dark sage (Vyāsa) composed the Bhārata (the Mahābhārata) with a desire to describe the excellences of the Lord. In it (the Mahābhārata), the mind of men is certainly attracted to the stories of Hari through repetition of the lower types of pleasures.

13. The ever-increasing inclination to listen (to the stories of Kṛṣṇa) engenders (a sense of) aversion to other objects of pleasure, in the faithful. It quickly destroys all the miseries of a man who finds happiness in constantly meditating over the feet of Hari.

14. I feel pity for those ignorant people (who do not understand the teaching of the Mahābhārata) who due to their sins, feel aversion to the stories of Hari and (hence) are the pitiable of the pitiables. The vigilant (blinkless) god Time diminishes (destroys) the life of those who waste their time in wasteful verbal, physical and mental activities. 680

15. Oh Kauśārava! Just as the essence (honey) is picked up from flowers, so you extract (the select) narratives from the stories of Hari who bestows happiness. Oh friend of the afflicted! Please recite to us, for our good, the story of Hari of hallowed fame.

16. Please describe to me the superhuman acts performed by the Almighty who, with the power of Māyā under his control, for the creation, sustenance and destruction of the universe, has taken (different) incarnations.

Śrī Śuka said:

17. The revered sage Kauśārava who was thus requested by Vidura for the final beatitude of men, replied to him with great respect.

Maitreya said:

18. Oh virtuous one! For rendering great favour to people, you have made an excellent query. You, whose heart is set on Hari, will hereby spread your fame in the world.

19. Oh Vidura! There is nothing surprising in this about you who are born of Vyāsa, you who have resorted to Lord Hari with devotion, fixed on him only.

20. You are god Yama, the controller of all subjects who, due to the curse of Māṇḍavya, were born from Vyāsa of the female servant who served as his brother's (Vicitravīrya's) wife.

630. The winkless god Time condemns as useless their advocacy etc. for the establishment of their particular philosophical stance (sva-svama-sātā-sthāpana)—VG.
21. Your honour was always esteemed (loved) by the Lord (Kṛṣṇa) and his followers. When he was about to depart (from this world), he instructed me to impart knowledge to you.

22. Now I shall describe to you in serial order the sportive actions of the Lord which were exhibited by his Yoga-māyā, and which comprise within them the preservation, origination and destruction of the universe.

23. The Lord, the supreme soul of all the souls (jīvas) and their master, was all alone before (the creation of) this (universe). When the will of the Supreme Lord viz. Māyā disappears (or when he wills to be alone), existent as he is as a cause, he is not perceived separately as a seer or anything to be seen, (though) he was comprehended by various conjectures (while the gross existence existed).

24. Verily (though) he was then this (only) Seer and the only illuminator* he saw nothing (due to non-existence of the universe). He whose powers (such as Māyā etc.) are asleep (unmanifested) but whose sight was wakeful (not asleep) regarded himself as if he were not-existent.

25.  Oh highly virtuous (Vidura)! That is verily the

631. āmanāṁ ātmā—The Master who enters into individual souls to sustain them—VR. (ii) He who is like the orb of the Sun to the individual souls who are like the solar rays (emanating from the orb)—JG.

632. ātmechānugatam—(i) When there was the manifestation of his Will to create the universe—VR. (ii) When he willed to create the universe.—VJ.

633. nānā-matyupalakṣitah—(i) He is implied by the ideas like Vaikuṇṭha (Viṣṇu's region)—JG. (ii) He is cognised by various thoughts about actions (effects) and objects—SD.

* eka-rāṣṭ—(i) Of uninterrupted uniform light—VR.

(ii) The Almighty possessing all powers—JG.

634. supra-saktih—(i) Whose power in the form of sentience and non-sentience is in a subtle state—VR. According to VJ., this power is Māyā. (ii) Whose powers like Prakṛti and others lie dormant—SD.

 Of the Lord, the Seer of entities possessing existence, Māyā is the power (sakti), as it is an attribute of the Lord (not distinct from him). It is Prakṛti having the nature of both sentience and non-sentience (etatād—et tamātād). It existed in a subtle form in his person. It is by this power (as the cause) that he created this sentient and non-sentient universe as the effect and remained untouched by the deficiencies of the world—VR. For the convenience of translation the terms cit and acit potency of this Seer (God) which is of the nature of both cause and effect (or which is essentially the very soul of the visible and invisible). It is called Māyā (the principle of phenomenality). It is by this power, that the all-pervading Lord created the universe.

26. (When) the commotion of Guṇas (attributes) is caused into Māyā through the power or effect of Time, Viṣṇu, the possessor of perfect intellectual power, inseminates into her his own image or the individual soul through Puruṣa who is his own part (āṁśa) controlling prakṛti.

27. Then under the impelling force of Time, the mahat-tattva was generated from anyākta (i.e. Māyā). It is of the nature of vijnāna which dispels the darkness of ignorance and manifests the universe lying within the body of the self.

28. And it (the mahat-tattva) being under the power of his āṁśa or (the resemblance of the Supreme Spirit as the efficient cause) the three attributes (guṇas as the material cause) and Time (as the driving force) and within the range of sight of the Lord, manifested itself into another form (called ‘Aham-kāra’—self-sense or ego-hood) with a desire to create this universe.

are rendered as ‘sentient’ and ‘non-sentient’. In Rāmānuja’s philosophy acit as miśrotattva and sattrāsūnya is inert (jaḍa) while as suddha sattra it is ajāda (non-inert, immaterial) but is different from the Soul and God who are also ajādas (For details vide A. Senagupta—Philosophy of Rāmānuja, pp. 78 ff.

635. kālaśṛitya—The fate (adṛśta) of individual souls necessary for the fruition of their kārems—VJ.

636. As usual VJ. puts forth his usual theory of creation that Viṣṇu in the form of Puruṣa, manifested out of his (Viṣṇu’s) original form (mūla-rūpa), impregnated both the kinds of māyā making the intelligent māyā to guide the creation while the non-intelligent māyā to change in form.

637. VJ. explains: From māyā (a synonym of anyākta) which was infused with power by the Lord, was produced Mahat-tattva (viz. the body of the four-faced Brahmā). Being impelled by Time (Kāla)—the Puruṣa who knows the destiny of every being and who urges on the creation of the universe—Brahmā who is the vijnānaṁ who (through the grace of Nārāyaṇa) dispels the darkness of ignorance and exhibits the universe in the body of Soul and thinks that it is his body.
29. From the mahat-tattva undergoing modifications was born ahaṅkāra (ego-hood) which is the substratum of the effect (viz. adhibhūta), the cause (viz. adhyātma) and the doer (viz. adhidaiva)638, and which consists of the elements (bhūtas) sense-organs (indriyas) and the mind (manas) which also implies gods.

30. The ego-hood (ahaṅkāra) is of three types—Vaikārika (characterised primarily by the guṇa, sattva), taittīra characterised by the guṇa, rajas) and tāmasa (characterised by the guṇa, tamaś). From the principle of ego-hood undergoing modifications, the mind was produced from the vaikārika type of I-ness (ahaṅkāra). Deities (presiding over sense-organs) are the products of the sāttvika type of ego-hood. The perception of the objects of senses is due to these (deities)*

31. The cognitive and conative sense organs are the products of the taittīrika type of ego-hood639. From the tāmasa ego-hood was evolved the subtle element (tanmātrā) viz. sound wherefrom was produced the sky (ākāśa) which is the body of the ātman (or the means of knowing Ātman).

32. When due to its union with Time (Kāla), the Māyā-

638. 1. 29.b: (Ahaṅkāra) which is the cause of the effect (viz. the body,) the cause (viz. the organs of senses) and kartātmā (the doer of the above two), and these result in the form of elements (bhūta), organs of senses etc.—VR.

* The term deva literally means ‘that which reveals’. They reveal the objects of senses; therefore they are called devas. The Bh.P. adopted the Vedic doctrine of spiritism and extended Godhood to cover all principles of creation from mahat to the subtle elements (tanmātrās). So there were as many gods as there were principles of creation. Vide below 3.5.38—For details Bhattacharya PSB I.290-93.

639. VR. states that taittīra ego-hood does not produce anything per se unless it is in union with the sāttvika or tāmasa ego-hood. VB. explains that knowledge is predominantly Sāttvika and action is tāmasa. Hence both types of organs are produced by rājasa ego-hood with their help. VB. adds buddhi and prāṇa to the list of sense organs, stating this to be implied by ca the last word in 31.a.

 The Bh.P. has adopted the doctrine of causation (at-kāryavāda) to explain evolutionary process. Accordingly, the effect can have no quality which is not already in existence in the material cause. Hence it presupposes a subtle form of each element with a potential quality serving as the intermediary of the causal relation between one element and another. This subtle element is technically called tanmātrā (unit-potential). For details—B. Bhattacharya PSB. I. 295-97.
power and his part (or intelligent image—amśa), Ākāśa (space) was viewed by the Lord, the subtle element (tanmātrā) of touch was produced from the space (ākāśa). It (touch) underwent modifications and produced Air (vāyu).

33. Vāyu though possessing great force, underwent modifications in combination with space (ākāśa) and created the subtle element of rūpa (wherenfrom was produced) light, the eye (illuminator) of the world.

34. When viewed by the Lord, the light, in conjunction with Vāyu and due to the influence of Time, Māyā and Amśa (his part or intelligent form) created water with taste (as its main characteristic).

35. And water in combination with light was seen by Brahmā and underwent modification and through the influence of kāla, māyā and amśa developed into the earth with smell as its characteristic.

36. Oh excellent one (Vidura)! They (the learned ones) know that among the elements (bhūtas) beginning with space (ākāśa), every later evolute possesses the attributes of the previous ones according to its rank (in the evolutionary process), due to its connection with previous bhūtas.640

37.* These gods (presiding over mahat and other principles) who show the indexes of time, māyā and amśa641 and who

640. Thus Vāyu possesses the attribute sound of Ākāśa as well as its own special attribute Touch. The Earth (Pṛthvī) possesses its own attribute smell, as well as the special attributes of its previous evolutes, viz. sound (of ākāśa), touch (of Vāyu), etc.

* VJ. explains: Brahmā and other gods presiding over Mahat and other principles, were created by Viṣṇu. They possess their bodies due to Kāla, Māyā and Amśa and were parts (kalā or amśa) of Viṣṇu, and were in a way distinct from him. Due to their mutual unrelatedness, they could not lay the egg of the universe. (Hence) with their hands folded (to their heads) they prayed the Lord.

SD. explains: (The presiding deities of the principles called) mahat and others, (though) parts (kalā) of Viṣṇu and conditioned by the agitator Time (creating commotion by its influence), Māyā as the material cause, amśa (the individual soul) and form, were unable on their own to create the universe due to their unrelatedness. Hence they (deities) praised the Lord.

641. According to ŚR, capacity of transformation (vikṛti), fickleness (vikṛṣa) and sentience (cetanā) are the marks of Kāla, Māyā and Amśa.
are but parts (kalās = amītas) of Viṣṇu were unable to create (the universe) due to separateness (unrelatedness), they with folded hands, spoke to the Omnipresent Lord.

_Gods said:_

38. Oh Lord! We bow to your lotus-like feet which are like an umbrella cooling down the heat of those who resort to it. Recluses, taking shelter under them, instantly ward off the great misery of this worldly existence (samsāra) even from a distance.

39. Oh Supreme Lord! The Creator and controller of the universe! In this worldly existence, beings, affected by three types of miseries, do not get happiness. Hence, Oh Supreme Soul! we are resorting to the shade of your feet which impart knowledge.

40. We take shelter of your sanctifying feet which are the source of the (Gaṅgā) holiest of all the rivers, the waters of which remove sins—the feet which the sages in their detached minds, seek with the help of birds in the form of the Vedas whose nests (dwelling places) are in your lotus-like face.

41. We come for shelter to the place (lit. foot-stool) of your lotus-like feet, concentrating on them in our hearts purified by faith and devotion (with unattached _karma-yoga_ and become self-controlled by knowledge which is reinforced by non-attachment.

42. Oh Lord! You have taken re-incarnation for the creation, sustenance and destruction of the universe. All of us have come to resort to your lotus-like feet, the contemplation of which gives Liberation (state of fearlessness) to your men (devotees).

43. Oh Supreme Lord! We adore your lotus-like feet which in spite of your residence in their bodies (as _antar-yāmin_), are far distant (and hence not accessible) to those men who have a foolishly obstinate attachment to the contemptible body as ‘I’, and to their houses and property as ‘mine’.

642. _v.l. rū—_No happiness is possible without resorting to your feet (ŚR).

643. _yatrānāṁ...geha—_Relatives like wife, sons etc. and property or belongings are the ties of the body and house etc. which are the product or effects of the inert matter—VR.
44. Oh Lord of Lords who are praised by the greatest! It is well-known that those whose minds are carried away by sense-organs which are attracted by external objects, do not therefore, see those devotees who have taken resort to the glory of your gracious foot-steps.

45. Oh God! Those whose minds are purified by deep devotion generated by drinking the nectar of your stories, get knowledge, the strength of which lies in non-attachment (to the world) and easily attain to Vaikuntha.

46. So also other wise persons, having conquered the most powerful Prakṛti by their power of Samādhi-Yoga (Yoga in which mind is to be concentrated on the soul—ātman) enter into you—the Puruṣa. Theirs is (a path of) hardships. But there is no (such) (harsh) exertion in your service.

47. Therefore, Oh Primitive Being, all of us who have been created serially by you, for the creation of the world, and who possess the three separate guṇas (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas) as our characteristic, are not able (to coordinate our activities) to present to you your instrument of sports, viz. the universe.

48. Oh unborn Lord! (Manage thus) that we may offer you your entire oblations at the proper time, and we shall be able to eat our food (i.e. enjoyments as our enjoyment is really your enjoyment) and that these beings (worlds) staying in their own places, may present offerings to us both, and may certainly enjoy their own food without difficulty.

49. Oh God! You are the primary cause of (us) gods along with our descendants (or along with effects); you are the changeless, primeval Puruṣa presiding over all. You who are unborn, have deposited your semen, viz. the all-knowing principle called mahat, in your beginningless power called

50. Oh Supreme Soul! What should we, mahat and others, do for you to achieve the object for which we are born? Oh God! For the execution of work assigned to us, grant unto us, who are dependant on your grace, your own eye (the power of knowledge) along with your power (of action).

CHAPTER SIX
(Cosmology : Creation of the Universe)

The Sage said:

1-2. Having seen the state of his existing potencies that they were disparate and that their power of creating the universe lay dormant, the Supreme Lord of miraculous deeds bearing with him his divine power called time (which has no separate existence from him) entered simultaneously the group of twenty-three principles (viz. mahat + egohood + 5 subtle elements + 5 gross elements + 10 organs of senses both conative and cognitive + mind).

3. The Lord who entered the group (of 23 principles) made the separate principles to work together by his power of action (kriyā-sakti) rousing up their dormant working capacity.

4. The group of twenty-three principles, the potency of which to work is thus roused by the Lord, and which were thus impelled by him, created the Virāṭ Puruṣa by contributing their individual parts.

648. You have deposited your power of creating the universe and god Brahmā, (the somaṣṭi-Puruṣa) in Prakṛti, which is your own power (an attribute with no separate existence outside God)—the Power which is the cause of the organs / senses, both conative and cognitive—VR.

649. kāla-saṃjñān : (i) The divine power which creates commotion to produce the effects; or Prakṛti roused to action by Time—SR.
   (ii) (Lord Viṣṇu entered along with) Lakṣmī, the intelligent prakṛti, designated as Kāla.

650. Karma—The actions or fate in store (acṣṭa) of jīvas.
5. The group of the creative principles of the universe, due to the entry of only a part (ahita) of the Supreme Lord in them, became assimilated with each other and were in common motion leading to the creation (of the Virat Purusa) in which are the moveables and immovables.

6. That Virat Purusa of gold (of the complexion of gold) containing all the beings (in invisible forms) stayed in the egg (called Brahmanada) on cosmic waters for one thousand years.\textsuperscript{651}

7. Verily he (the Virat Purusa), the offspring (the product) of the principles of the universe, the possessor of the divine potency of knowledge, action and spirit,\textsuperscript{652} divided\textsuperscript{653} himself as one (in the form of the spirit residing in the heart), as ten (in the from of the vital airs — Pranavas — viz. Prana, apana, vyana, udana, samana, naga, kurma, kikala, devadatta and dhanaunjaya), and as three (viz. forms related to adhibhuta, adhidaiva and adhyatma).

8. This\textsuperscript{654} (Virat purusa) is the individual soul within all beings. He himself is a part of the Supreme Soul (paramatman). He is the first incarnation (avatara) in whom is supported the multitude of all beings.\textsuperscript{655}

9. The Virat Purusa (God Brahma) has three forms, viz. those related with adhyatma, adhidaiva and adhibhuta\textsuperscript{656}, ten forms \textsuperscript{651} Cf. Bh.P. 2.5.34; 2.10.11.

\textsuperscript{652} devo-karmanata-lakimman—According to VR. these powers are: Jiva sakti or avidya, the karma of jivas and the spirit or intelligent power (citi sakti) useful in the creation of the body and other conditions of jiva. VJ. reads ‘daiva’ for ‘deva’ and interpreting garbha as the Inner controller (antaryamin) of the principles e.g. mukta and others, enumerates the potencies as (1) Power superior to gods like Brahman, (2) the fate (odisha) of jivas and (3) Prakriti the medium of enjoying pleasure, pain etc.

\textsuperscript{654} esa—VR. thinks that this refers to god Brahman who is the support of all individual beings, and who is an incarnation (avatara) of the ‘possession’ (devta) type. VJ. states that word esa refers to Hari in the Purusa incarnation. On the support of the Purusa depends the creation and preservation of all beings.

\textsuperscript{655} It is in the body of the Virat (Puruja) that the whole of the universe consisting of mobiles and immobiles is seen—GD.

\textsuperscript{656} According to VR. sadhyatma—with jiva (indweller of the body). Sadhidaiva—with the senses in the sematti stage as in the Sun etc. Sadhibhuta—with sounds etc. which are the characteristics of elements (bhutas).
viz. the ten vital airs (prānas) and one form, viz. that connected with the heart.

10*. Lord Viṣṇu (adhoksaja), remembering the prayer (vide supra 3.5.48) of (the presiding deities of) the Principles of creating the universe, planned (the person of) the Virāt (or Hiranyagarbha) by his power of knowledge (or spiritual light), for enabling them to perform their functions.

11. Now, hear from me, how many places of residence of gods (Presiding deities of sense-organs) were created in the body of Virāt by his penance, viz. the power of his knowledge.

12 (When) his mouth was differentiated (formed) Fire, the protector of the world, entered it along with his power called speech. Hence jīvas (people) get the power of speech.

13. Palate was evolved in Hari (the Virāt Puruṣa). The protector of the world, called Varuṇa, entered it along with part (anāsa) called tongue (the conative sense-organ of taste) whereby the jīva attains the power of taste.

14. (When) the nostrils of Viṣṇu (the Virāt Puruṣa) were formed, the two Aśvinikumāras occupied (entered) them by their power, viz. the sense of smell, whereby the jīva attained the capacity to smell.

15. (Then) the two eyes (of the Virāt Puruṣa) were formed. The Sun, a protector of the world, entered them with his power, viz., the sense of sight. Hence the jīvas get the perception of forms and colours by the eyes.

16. (Then the Virāt Puruṣa had) his skins developed. The protector of the world called Vāyu entered it along with his power of breath (Prāṇa) whereby the jīva gets the sense of touch.

17. (When) his two ears were evolved, the (presiding deities of) quarters along with their power of audition, entered them as their place, whereby he (the jīva) can hear the sound.

* Lord Viṣṇu entered the person of Virāt (God Brahmā) as an antaryāmin (controller from within). He enlarged the body of Virāj (god Brahmā) to provide accommodation to the deities (such as Fire etc.) —VJ.

 Cf. supra II.10. 17-30.
18*. (When) the skin was evolved (of the \textit{Virāt Puruṣa}), the presiding deities of herbs (and plants) occupied it as their place, by their parts called hair, whereby the \textit{jīva} can feel the itching-sensation.

19. Then his penis was evolved. God Ka (i.e. Prajāpati) along with his power—semen—entered it as his residence. (It is) by this (organ) that the \textit{jīva} (or the world) gets (sexual) pleasure.

20. Then the anus of the \textit{Virāt Puruṣa} was evolved. Mitra, the controller (protector) of the world, along with his part (known as) \textit{Pāyu} (anus), entered it. (It is) by this that the \textit{jīva} has the organ of excretion.

21. His hands were (then) developed. Indra, the lord of the Heaven (\textit{Svarga}), along with his power of making sales and purchases, entered them, whereby a man can earn his livelihood.

22. Then his feet were evolved. Viṣṇu, the Lord of the world, entered them along with his power of locomotion, by which man can reach his desired place.

23. And intellect was evolved in him. God Brahmā, with his power of accurate perception, entered it as his place. (It is) by this faculty that the object of knowledge is comprehended.

24. And his heart was evolved. The moon, along with his faculty called mind, entered it as his abode. Hence the \textit{jīva} (or the world) understands changes (in the state of mind, thoughts etc.).

25. God Rudra (\textit{abhimāna}) along with his capacity of action (or principle of activity) entered as his place, the evolved egohood (\textit{ātman}) of \textit{Virāt Puruṣa}. It is by this (ego-hood) that \textit{jīva} executes his work (as his own).

* SH, is conscious of the duplication of \textit{tvac} and \textit{carmān} (in verses 16 and 18) and explains it as the difference of place and difference in functions, viz. touch and itch. VD, explains that the outer part of the skin is \textit{carmān} and \textit{tvac} is related both to its inside and outside.

 VJ, follows a different text as shown by his interpretation: Then the special \textit{nāgī} called \textit{ātmanāgī} was evolved. Brhaspati with his faculty of intelligence entered it. Hereby god Brahmā arrives at correct conclusion.
26. And his sattva (mind and intellect was evolved). Mahat (god Brahmā) occupied this abode along with citta whereby he (the jīva) arrives at comprehension (understanding).

27. From his (Virāṭ Puruṣa's) head was produced the svar-loka. The earth came forth from his feet, and the sky from his navel. The products (effects) of guṇas (like sattva) such as gods and others are seen in these (regions).

28. Gods attained the Heaven by their excellence of sattva attribute. Due to their nature predominated by sattva, Paṇis (i.e. men who deal with gods by performance of sacrifices) and their belongings (like cows etc.) remained on the earth.

29. Due to their nature characterised by the third (guṇa viz. tāmas), the mass of the followers of Rudra resorted to the Lord's navel, viz. the space between the two regions mentioned above.

30* Oh leader of Kurus! From the mouth of the Puruṣa came forth Brahman (the Veda) and the Brähmana class like syllables coming out from the mouth (head). Hence the Brähmana Vāraṇa became the foremost among the Vāraṇas.

31. From his arms emanated the power of protection and the Kṣatriya class who follows that vow, viz. the duty of protecting the world. This class born from Puruṣa (Lord Viṣṇu) protects the classes of people from wounds (i.e. injuries or troubles) caused by thorns (in the form of miscreants).

32. From the thighs of that All-pervading Lord were born the vocations like agriculture which maintain the livelihood of the public. The Vaiśya class, born from the same part of the

33. From the feet of the Lord was born service for the achievement of religion. Formerly the Śūdra class was born for the sake of service, whereby Hari is pleased.

34. These classes (Brāhmaṇas etc.) who are born along with their means of livelihood (and duties) from Hari, worship with faith their creator and master Hari for self-purification, by following the path of their duties.

35. Oh Vidura! Who can even dare to wish (confidently) to describe fully in details this (universe) which has been created by the yoga-māyā of the Almighty Lord who assumes the forms of kāla (time), karma (action) and svabhāva (nature).

36. It is for purifying my tongue of the impurities caused by uttering things unrelated with Hari that I, however, describe the glory of Hari to the best of my intellect, according as I have heard of it.

37. They say that the description of the excellent qualities of him who is the best amongst personages of holy fame, brings the highest benefit to the power of speech of men, and listening to the nectarlike stories (of Hari) as described by the learned is the greatest benefit of the power of hearing.

38. Oh child! Was the greatness of Lord Hari thoroughly comprehended by the First Sage (Brahmā) with his intelligence matured by yoga after (performing penance for) one thousand years?

39. The Māyā of the Lord deludes even the possessor of Māyā so much that the Lord himself does not know the course of his Māyā. What of others?

40. Salutations to the Almighty Lord without reaching whom (without realizing whose glory) the Vedas (or the powers of speech), mind (though purified by yoga), Rudra (ego-hood) and other deities presiding over organs of senses, have returned.
CHAPTER SEVEN

(Vidura's Queries)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. To Maitreya who was speaking thus, Vidura, the learned son of Vyāsa, addressed (the following), as if to please him with his request.

Vidura said:

2. Oh Brahman! How is it possible that attributes (like sattva, rajas) and activity can be predicated of the Supreme Lord who is pure consciousness, devoid of attributes and changeless, even by way of sport (the lilā-theory)?

3. It is the desire in the case of a child which propels it to play, and that desire to play comes from something else (e.g. a toy or invitation to play), but how (is it applicable to God) who is self-satisfied and who is ever without a second.

4-5. (It is argued that) the Supreme Lord created the universe by his Māyā consisting of guṇas and (which deludes the Soul to feel that he is the doer and enjoyer). It is by Māyā that he protects it and withdraws it. The Soul is essentially of the nature of knowledge or consciousness and unaffected by place, time or condition either internally (through himself) or externally (through other agency). How can such Soul be united with the unborn (Māyā)?

6. Only this Supreme Lord alone is present in all bodies. How can he be subjected to misfortune or pain by karmas? (i.e. saṁsāra does not exist in the case of jīva as he is the same as Brahman).

7. Oh learned one! My mind feels depressed in this calamity of ignorance. Oh Lord! Please remove this great mental delusion from our mind.

Śrī Śuka said:

8. The sage who was thus prompted by Vidura who was desirous of knowing the truth, smilingly replied, with his mind concentrated on the Lord, and free from pride.

9. It is the Māvā of the Almighty Lord that is against all logic (supra-logical). Hence (the experience of) affliction and bondage to (the soul who is essentially) free from bondage (and misery).

10. Just as a man witnessing a dream gets an inconsistent experience of being beheaded etc., though it is not a reality.

11. Just as trembling and other disturbances caused by the water appear to be the attribute of the moon (reflected) in the water, even though it is not attributable to the (real) Moon (in the sky), similarly attributes of the non-Soul (the physical body etc.) seem to belong to the Soul (jīva), a seer (who identifies himself with the body).

12. Verily it is by the path of niṣṭtī (abstinence from work—by giving up desire for its fruit), through the grace of Vāsudeva, and by devotion to the Almighty Lord, that this (mistaken identification of the Soul with the body) slowly disappears here.

13. Now, when the organs of the senses (instead of pursuing outer objects) become steadfast on Hari, the Seer, the internal controller (antarāyāmin), the Supreme Lord, all the afflictions completely subside (disappear) as in the case of a man who is fast asleep.

14. Repetition (of the description of) and listening to

660. JG. in his long com. raises the point why the Soul (jīva) who is a form of God suffers the bondage of affliction, and explains that it is due to the supra-logical nature of the māyā-sakti of God. The power of God is both internal (antarāṅga) and external (bahirāṅga). Hence what happens in the region of the external of God cannot affect his own internal nature. Thus though God in the form of jīvas may experience bondage or suffering, he is internally unaffected. It is this supra-logical conception which explains how God can be within the power of the Māyā as well as its controller.

661. Just as in the case of jīva, in the stage when he has not realised the Soul (ātmā), he wrongly identifies himself with the body which is in reality different from him, and experiences beheading etc. But after self-realization, knowing his separateness from the body, and his being a part of God, he is not thus affected.—VR.

662. VR. points to the distinction between the Soul (ātmā) or jīva and Supreme Soul (paramātmā). Sorrow, delusion etc. are caused, as jīva mistakenly thinks himself to be the body. The Supreme Soul who is not influenced (lit. covered) by Avidyā and who is the controller of Prakṛti and Puruṣa is unaffected by the effects or working of avidyā.
the attributes of Hari, cause the complete subsidence (disappearance) of miseries. What again (need be spoken of the effect of) the love felt in the heart, for worshipping the pollen-dust of His lotus-like feet.

Vidura said:

15. Oh Lord! my doubt has been cut off by the sword of your happy exposition. My mind can properly grasp both the absolute independence of the Supreme Lord and the dependence of jīva on him.

16.* Oh learned one, you have well explained that all these unreal, rootless, miseries appear due to the basis of the ātma-māyā (māyā deluding the Soul or jīva). The root-cause of the universe is not outside (the māyā).

17. Only those two, viz. one who is the stupidmost (and attached to physical body etc.) and one who has reached beyond Buddhī (i.e. Prakṛti and realized God live happily in the world. But the person who is between these (extremes), undergoes sufferings (as he desires to leave the worldly life but cannot do so, for want of experience of the inner bliss.

(2) My mind is attracted both to the listening and repetition of his attributes as well as to the service of his feet—VR.

'3) By 'both' VJ. takes (i) attachment to the body and its belonging and (ii) God, Hari.

(4) JG. understands (i) the Supreme Lord and (ii) jīva or (i) knowledge and (ii) devotion which is a means to it.

(5) VB. follows ŚR above.

* VR. differs: You have explained it well that ātman (individual Soul) and māyā (prakṛti) are Hari’s place of residence. The source of the universe (i.e. Brahman) is outside it and has not created it. Therefore the universe being rootless appears purposeless, a delusion.

(ii) VJ. explains. Oh possessor of the proper knowledge for realization of Brahman, your explanation that all this is due to Hari’s own power called māyā is convincing enough to clear up all doubts. The idea of delusion in the māyā concept is dispelled. But all this appears to me purposeless and baseless except on the presumption of adṛśta.
18. Having determined the unreality of the world despite its apparent existence, I shall dispel even that sense by serving your feet.

19. It is by service (of persons like you) that ardent intensity of love for the feet of the changeless Lord Hari (the enemy of the demon Madhu), is created leading to the destruction of miseries (samsāra).

20. The service of those who are on the pathway to Vaikuṇṭha, and amongst whom the deeds of Janārdana, the God of gods are always eulogised, is very difficult to be obtained (for rendering) by people (who have little penance to their credit).

21. (You said that) having created in the beginning, the principles like mahat and others with their modifications in due course, and having raised the Virāj (the Egg of the universe) out of them, the All-pervading Lord entered into it.

22. (The Virāj) who is called the First Man (ādya Puruṣa) possessing thousands of feet, thighs and arms, and in whom all the worlds along with their modifications are accommodated.

23. As explained by you, in him are the vital-airs (prānas) of ten kinds, and also in the three forms viz. the sense-organs, the objects and the presiding deities of the sense-organs (also called indriyas—sense-organs—here), and the castes (varṇas) came forth (were formed) from him. Please describe to us his powers.

24. (Virāṭ) wherein lived beings of different forms, with their sons, grandsons, daughter's sons and other descendants of their gotra (clan) who have filled the world.

25. Who were the lords of the created beings (prajāpatis) created by lord of Prajāpatis (Brahmadeva)? What are (god Brahmā's) creations, subcreations? Who were the Manus and kings in the manvantaras (periods of Manus) created by him?

26. Oh Maitreya, describe to me their dynasties, and the deeds of those born in their families; and the situation and the area, dimensions of this world and of the worlds that are above and below this.

27. Tell us about the creation and classification of beasts, human beings, gods, reptiles and birds and those born of womb, sweat, eggs (or twice-born) and vegetables.

28. Expound to us the great exploits of Viṣṇu, the creator, the support of the (process of) creation, sustenance and destruction of the world through his guṇāvalāras (incarnations characterised by guṇas, viz. sattva, rajas and tamas, such as Brahmā etc.)

29-30. Oh Lord (Maitreya), explain the classification of Varnas (castes) and stages of life (ādramas) according to their external characteristics, courses of conduct and nature, the births and deeds of sages, the division of the Vedas, the details of sacrifices, the paths of Yoga, Sāṅkhya characterised by renunciation of the fruit of Karmas, and the Tantra as enjoined by the Supreme Lord.

31. Oh sinless one, explain to me in details:

The crookedness of the path of the non-believers in Veda, the place etc. of the progeny of the reverse (pratiloma) type of marriages, and the several courses of jīva as a result of their attributes (guṇas) and deeds (karmas).

32. The ways of accomplishing the purusārthas (objects of life such as dharma, artha, kāma and mokṣa) without mutual conflict, the different methods of commerce and agriculture, the duties of kings (or politics), and the courses of study.

33. The prescribed way of performing śrāddha, the creation of the manes (piṭṭs) and the arrangement of planets, constellations and stars in the division of Time.

34. The fruits of charitable gifts, of penance, of meritorious acts (such as performance of sacrifices, constructions of amenities like tanks etc.), the religious duties of men on travel, and of men in adverse circumstances.

35. The course (of action) whereby Janārdana, the source of Dharma will be propitiated, and favours one with his grace.

36. Oh best among the twice-born persons! Teachers who are kindly disposed to the distressed, explain to obedient disciples and sons, even without being enquired about it.

37. Oh revered one! In how many ways is the withdrawal (destruction) of the principles takes effect? At that time who will resort to him and who will follow him in his yogic sleep?

38. (Tell us) what the real nature of jīva is, and the essential state of the Supreme Soul and the knowledge pertaining to Upaniṣads, and the purpose of the pupil-teacher relationship.

39. Oh sinless Maitreya, explain the means prescribed by the wise ones, for the acquisition of that knowledge here. Otherwise how can that knowledge, devotion or non-attachment develop in men automatically (if there be no grace of the spiritual guide)?

40. As a friend, please tell me who am making these queries with a desire to know the deeds of Hari, and who am ignorant due to the loss of the vision of knowledge through (the influence of) māyā.

41. Oh sinless, one all Vedas, sacrifices, penances and charitable donations will not amount even to a fraction of the act of offering shelter to a Soul (by imparting the knowledge of the Truth).

Śrī Suka said:

42. The prominent sage who was thus asked by a prominent person among the Kurus, about matters explained in the Purāṇas was overjoyed at being urged to narrate the episodes of the Lord, and spoke to him smilingly.

CHAPTER EIGHT

(Creation of Brahmā—His Vision of Nārāyaṇa)

Maitreya said:

1. The lineage of Pūru is really worthy of being served by the good, as-you, who (as an incarnation of Yama) are one of the Protectors of the world, and who regard the Lord as the chief object, are born in it. At every step and at every moment, you bring freshness to the garland of the glory of the invincible Lord (Hari).
2. It is for removing the great misery of people who get into it for the sake of petty pleasures, that I commence the Bhāgavata Purāṇa which the venerable Lord narrated to sages.

3. With a desire to know the real nature of the God, higher than Lord Saṅkarṣaṇa, sages, of whom (Sanat-) Kumāra was prominent, asked the respectable Saṅkarṣaṇa, the first of gods, whose ken of knowledge was unobstructed, and who was seated on the ground.

4. (Saṅkarṣaṇa) who was highly worshipful of his support whom (they) call Vāsudeva, and who had turned unto himself his eyes which were closed like a lotus-bud (while in meditation), and who slightly opened them for favouring wise sages (like Sanaka and others).

5. Sages (like Sanatkumāra) touched with their matted hair dripping with the sacred waters of the heavenly Ganges (Mandākini) the lotus-foot stool of Saṅkarṣaṇa—the foot-stool which the daughters of the king of Snakes worship by offering various gifts with love for getting (good) husbands.

6. (The sages) who knew Saṅkarṣaṇa and (hence) constantly eulogised his deeds in words pronounced faltering due to intense love, (asked) Saṅkarṣaṇa whose thousand raised hoods were brightened by excellent precious stones studded in a thousand crowns.

7. It is traditionally reported that the most venerable Saṅkarṣaṇa taught this to Sanatkumāra who was devoted to the duties of the path of renunciation; and that he (Sanatkumāra), when requested, taught it to Śaṅkhyāyana, the observer of vows.

8. With a desire to extol the powers and glories of the Lord, Śaṅkhyāyana, the foremost among the Parama-harīsas, narrated it first to his disciple and our preceptor Parāśara and then to Bṛhaspati.

9. The merciful sage, blessed by Pulastya, expounded

665. Śaṅkhyāyana—A sage of the Vasiṣṭha family, probably the same as the author of the Śaṅkhyāyana Brāhmaṇa of the Rgveda and other Śrautasūtras known by his name BPK 341, DHM 280.

666. ŚR. records a traditional story: When Parāśara's father was eaten up by a Rākṣasa, Parāśara wanted to destroy the Rākṣasa race. But Vasiṣṭha dissuaded him. Pulastya finding that his progeny was thus spared, blessed Parāśara that he would be a narrator of Purāṇas.
to me the first (i.e. the most important) Purāṇa (viz. the Bhāgavata). Oh child (Vidura), I narrate this to you who are faithful, and always devoted (to the Lord).

10. When Viṣṇu delighted in the blissful stage of his own self, inactive and alone, lay on the bed of the king of Snakes (Śeṣa) and closed his eyes in sleep without any interruption of his vision (power of intelligence), this whole universe was immersed in water.

11. Having conserved the subtle elements within his body, and arousing his power called Time, he stayed in the water which was his abode, just like the fire which resides in the wood, without exhibiting his power (of burning).

12. Sleeping over the waters for a period of one thousand aggregates of four yugas, he who had obtained the whole system of doing actions through his power called Time, which was vigilant, visualized all the worlds lying dormant in his own body.

13. Then the (aggregate of) subtle elements lying within him which he viewed intently, got agitated by the attribute called rajas, (which was) impelled by Time. It sprouted forth from the region of his navel, in the process of evolution.

14. By (the propelling force of) Time which awakens the adṛṣṭa (fatē) of beings, the Self-born lotus-bred sprouted forth suddenly, illuminating like the Sun, the vast expanse of water with its splendour.

15. Oh Vidura, that very Viṣṇu entered (as an antaryāmin) the world-lotus which shows all the guṇas (objects) essential for the enjoyment of jīvas. Within the lotus was born the creator of the world, the Veda incarnate, whom they call self-born (svayambhu).

16. Occupying the stalk of that lotus, and not seeing the worlds, the self-born god Brahmā cast his glances on all sides in the sky, and thus got four faces corresponding to the four directions (of world).

17. The first god Brahmā, seated upon the lotus which sprang up from the unending high billows of waters, tossed heavily by world-annihilating stormy winds, did not understand with certainty, the real nature of the lotus which contained the world, and even of his own self.

18. "Who am I seated on this lotus? Whence has this solitary lotus grown on the waters? There must be something beneath on which this lotus rests supported. That must be surely some positive existence."

19. Thinking thus, the unborn god (Brahmā) entered through the hollow passage in the stalk of the lotus, into the waters. Going deep down in search of the support of the rough stalk of that lotus, he did not reach it.

20. Oh Vidura! A very long time with three tyres (divisions, viz. the past, the present, the future) elapsed while he (Brahmadeva) was searching the source of the lotus (the cause of his creation) in the fathomless darkness—Time which is a weapon in God's hand which creates terror in beings and reduces (their) life.

21. Then the God (Brahmā) who did not achieve his objective, returned thence. Having resumed his seat, he gradually restrained his mind by controlling his breath, and sat down resorting to samādhi-yoga (the path of deep meditation).

22. The unborn God (Brahmā) in whom knowledge arose by the practice of yoga for a period of man's life-span (100 years), visualized that unforeseen Brahman manifested of its own accord in his heart.

23. He saw a Man (Puruṣa) lying on the bed of the spacious body of Śeṣa white like lotus fibres, on the waters of the deluge, the darkness of which was dispelled by the lustre of gems on the myriad heads of the umbrella-like hoods (of Śeṣa).

24. Who excelled in beauty a mountain of emeralds, with (golden) evening clouds overhanging its slopes like garments (which is surpassed by his Pītiṁbara—yellow silken garment), with a number of gold peaks (which are outdone in their splendour by his crown), with its Vanamālā—garland of forest flowers—abounding in precious stones, springs, herbs and flowers (excelled in beauty by his Vanamālā), and with bamboos resembling its arms, and trees as its feet (surpassed his arms and feet).

25. Who, by the dimensions of his beautiful and incomparable body, accommodated the three worlds (viz. Svarga, Mrtyu and Pātāla), and who (with his body) decorated by a variety of heavenly ornaments and silken garments beautified the ornaments and garments themselves, by his beautiful person.

26. To men who, for attaining their desired objects, worship him in the pure ways, prescribed in the Vedas, he shows, out of grace, his lotus-like feet with toes beautiful like petals and shining in the rays of his moon-like nails.

27. Who (reciprocally) honours his devotees by his face with a smile that removes the afflictions of the world, (with ears) beautified by resplendent earrings, (face) appearing reddish on account of his lower lip like bimba fruit, and shapely with its beautiful nose and eyebrows.

28. Oh child (Vidura), (he saw the Puruṣa) who appeared beautiful and adorned with a garment, golden in colour, like the pollen of the Kadamba flowers, and with a girdle round his waist, and his chest adorned with an invaluable necklace, and with (his) favourite decoration called Śrīvatsa.

29. Who was (like) a great tree of the universe with thousand branches in the forms of arms resplendent with priceless precious stones, and the armlets (keyūra), with its root invisible (in Brahman), and whose arms are coiled round by the body of great snake (or Śeṣa).

30. Who was like a great mountain, the support of the movables and immovables, a dear friend of the best of snakes (Śeṣa), who is surrounded by waters, whose thousand crowns are like golden peaks, and the gem Kaustubha (adorning) his chest (was like a mine of precious stones).

31. (Brahmā saw) Hari who wore a Vanamālā (garland of Tulasī leaves, etc.) in the form of his glory, (Vanamālā) which beautified by the Veda singing sweetly his glory like humming bees and who is unapproachable to (gods like) the Sun, the Moon, the Wind and the Fire, and who is unassailable due to the weapons with range throughout the three worlds, circling round him.

32. At that very instant (when Brahmā saw Hari), he obtained the knowledge necessary for the creation of the world. He saw the lotus sprouting out of the (Lord's) pond-like navel, himself, the (cosmic) waters, the Wind (blowing tempestuously during the deluge) and the sky. He saw nothing more (than these).

33. When he (Brahmā), being associated with the attribute rajas, became desirous of creating beings, and having seen only these (the abovementioned five objects such as the lotus, the cosmic water, the wind, etc.) as the causes of the world, fixed his heart on God and, began to praise the Lord who deserved it.

CHAPTER NINE

(Brahmā’s Prayer and Viṣṇu’s Boon)

Brahmā said:

1. Oh Lord! It is after a penance for a very long time that you have been (luckily) realized by me today. It is indeed the defect of beings conditioned by body that your real essential nature is not understood by them. Nothing other than you, exists. (Anything else that appears to be) is not pure (is false) because it is you who appear to be many due to the intermixture of the guṇas of Māyā.668

668. According to VR. : This verse expresses the self satisfaction of Brahmā’s God-realization, viz. the whole of this universe consisting of cit and acit is the body of God, and it explains that there is nothing which is outside Brahman.

Oh Lord! Really it is after the acquisition (accumulation) of penance for a pretty long period that you have been now seen by me in your real form. The Kṣetrajñas (individual Souls) conditioned by physical body as a result of their karmas, do not know your real nature which fully possesses the six attributes of Bhagavān. Oh Lord, there is no such thing as is other than you. (You are its soul When you are realised everything is realized), Gods and other things which appear independent of (other than) you are not the objects of correct perception, due to the effect of the attribute of Māyā or Prakṛti. Though you are one, you shine (manifest yourself) as many.

nanu ... avadyam etc.—VJ. explains: That the real nature of the Lord is not realized by beings is erroneous, as the Lord, though invisible in form, is realized by devotion. It is due to sin
2. This is your form from which, due to eternal manifestation of the power of intelligence, ignorance or tamas disappears,—form which, from the beginning, you have assumed for conferring (your) grace on the good; and which is the seed (source) of hundreds of incarnations. And from His region of the navel-lotus, I came into existence (lit. was manifested).

3. Most excellent Lord! I do not see any form of yours other than this beautiful one of manifest light, beyond (i.e. destitute of) differences, and full of bliss. Hence I resort to this one form of yours which creates the world but itself is different from it, and which is the source of the bhūtas (elements) and sense-organs. 669.

4. Oh auspiciousness incarnate (i.e. God who is auspicious to the universe), you have really manifested this very (form) to your devotees in their meditation for their good (or prosperity), we offer obeisance to you (a gracious) Lord who is spurned by the atheists (like Māṁsākásas, Sāṅkhyaśas etc.) and believers in false logic and who therefore deserve (stay in) Hell.

5. Oh Lord, you do not go away from the lotus-like hearts of your men (devotees) who enjoy by the passage of their ears the fragrance of your lotus-bud-like feet which is carried (to them) by wind (in the form) of the Vedas and who clasped your feet with intense (and unswerving) devotion.

6. So long as the people do not resort to your feet which offer freedom from fear of samsāra, they face the fear that God is not realized by beings. Not that there is non-existence of things other than the Lord, but they do not exist independently, but owe their existence to him. But things other than you are impure, and you are absolutely pure. You are present by your incarnations in māha-t and other principles. It is due to the guna of Prakṛti that things other than you are defective.

JG.: Though you are pure in your internal capacity of infinite glory, you appear many in the form of the world as a result of the intermixture of the attributes of your external power called Māyā.

669. Oh Supreme One, I do not see your essential form other than this form which is full of bliss (dispelling all miseries), devoid of the differences of jātis and guna, whose knowledge (or will—sāṅkhyā is unobstructed; which is different from the universe, yet it is the cause consisting of bhūtas and sense organs. I take shelter of this form—VR.
pertaining to wealth, house and friends (and caused by) sorrow, desire, dishonour, covetousness and false sense of attachment to possessions (lit. ‘this is mine’) which is the cause of sorrow.

7. Those are verily deprived of their senses by their fate, whose senses (minds) are averse to (listening and eulogising) your deeds which remove all inauspiciousness (misery etc.). Those wretched ones, with minds overpowered with avarice, continuously perform misdeeds for a very slight pleasure for gratifying their low desires.

3. Oh Acyuta, Lord of wide strides (as Trivikrama), my heart is deeply pained to see these (people) constantly afflicted by hunger, thirst and the disturbance of three bodily humours (viz. kapha, pitta and vāta), by heat and cold, by wind and rain and by other (ādhibhautika) factors and by unbearable fire of desires and anger.

9. Oh Lord, while (so long as) people will see (regard) this body (and other things) as different from the Soul (or God), due to the dominant influence of the Lord’s Māyā, appearing as the organs of senses and their objects, this worldly existence (samsāra), unreal as it is, will not disappear, but will bring a host of troubles (and miseries) as a result of karmas.

10. Oh God, even sages revolve in the course of worldly existence (samsāra) in this world, if they are averse to eulogizing your deeds (and such forms of devotion). They who by day, have their senses absorbed in doing actions (for getting worldly objects), and go to sleep with minds full of different desires, get their sleep disturbed every moment, and their endeavours after their objects are frustrated by Fate.

11. Oh Lord, you, path to whom is perceived by the (type of devotion called) śravaṇa (listening to the glories of the Lord)\textsuperscript{670}, really dwell in the lotus-like hearts of men (devotees).

\textsuperscript{670} Vṛ. takes śruta as ‘knowledge derived from Sāstras and īkṣita as ‘knowledge derived from deep thought about what is permanent and what is perishable’.

Vṛ. takes īkṣita as ‘knowledge derived from meditation’ and interprets, ‘Those to whom the path of devotion to Viṣṇu is shown by study of Sāstras under a pious and devout preceptor.’
purified by Bhakti-yoga. Oh Lord of unbounded glory, in order to confer your grace on the devotees, you manifest yourself in whatever form they meditate upon you.

12*. The Lords dwells in all things. He is the only friend and ruler from within. He becomes extremely pleased by compassion to all beings which is impossible to be found in non-devotees. He is not so much pleased even though he is propitiated with rich articles of worship, (even) by gods who cherish some desires in their hearts. (God is easily attainable only to desireless devotees).

13. The righteous acts which are offered to you never perish. Hence your propitiation, Oh Lord, is the best fruit of all religious acts, such as various righteous deeds, performance of sacrifices, religious gifts, austere penance and observance of religious vows.

14. Salutations to (you) the Supreme Lord, who are eternally free from the illusion of difference,\textsuperscript{671} by your own essential light of intelligence, and whose \textit{vidyā-sakti} is know-

\textbf{* VR.:} You are not so much pleased (so as to favour the bliss of Liberation) with your devotees (\textit{suragenaiḥ}) who cherish desire into their hearts and propitiate you with various articles (etc.) of worship, as you are pleased by that type of unselfish compassion, which is based on the knowledge that ill feeling towards any being is ill feeling against you—a compassion impossible to be found in people who identify body with the Soul (\textit{asaḍ-alabhyaya}). Though present within all, you are not affected by their defects, as you support and control them as an \textit{antarāmā}.

\textbf{GD.:} Just as God becomes extremely pleased by compassion to all beings (without any ulterior selfish motive), he is not pleased by the rich worship even of gods who cherish some desire in their hearts, i.e. though the Lord grants the desired objects to his \textit{sakāma} devotees, he does not bless them with self-realization. The Lord being present in all, the ill feeling of \textit{sakēṇā} devotees against some persons is an ill feeling against the Lord whom they try to propitiate. Hence he is not much pleased with them as with desireless devotees.

16. Salutations to the Lord who is the universe-Tree which is the only one, but has three feet (branches) viz. Brahmā, I (Viṣṇu) and Śiva, each of which has numerous branches (e.g. the seven sages etc.)—the tree which has its roots in the Supreme Soul and has differentiated itself by three attributes (guna under the names of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra) who are the cause of the creation, sustenance and destruction of the universe.

17. Salutation to the all-powerful, ever-vigilant (unwinking god in the form of) Time who instantaneously cuts asunder the hope of life of this world as long as the people shirk\textsuperscript{673} the performance of your worship which is conducive to their own good, and which has been directly ordained by you, and are engaged in the prohibited path of Karma.

desire to attain you, I practised penance for many years and performed many sacrifices. My salutations to you, the Almighty

19. Salutations to Lord Puruṣottama who, with a view to observing the laws ordained by him, assumed of his own accord the bodies (avatāras or incarnations) in the various forms of living beings, such as sub-human beings (e.g. birds, beasts), human beings, gods etc. and enjoyed himself, though he is (absolutely) unattached to worldly pleasures.

20. Though he is never affected by the five varieties of Avidyā⁶⁷⁶, he, who has conserved the universe in his belly with a view to increasing the pleasure of rest (for people who are exhausted by their activities in the previous kalpa—period, the lotus-mansion of your navel, and who became, through your favour, an instrument for the creation of the three worlds, bow to you in whose stomach lies the whole world, and who has opened his lotus-like eyes at the completion of your yogic sleep.

sacrifices of whom I am afraid, though I occupy the post (Bhāmāhood) residence) which is honoured (bowed to) by all people, I performed penance for many long years.

⁶⁷⁵. Bh. P. III. 12.2 enumerates the following rāttis (powers) of Avidyā: viz. mahā-moha, moha, tāmīśra, andha-tāmīśra and tāmas. As PYP (Pāṭalijala-Yoga-Pradīpa) points out, the hindrances (kieśas) in YS. II.3, viz. avidyā (śāsed), asmitā (moha) rāga (mahā-moha), dveṣa (tāmīśra) and abhiniveśa (andha-tāmīśra) are known in the Sāṅkhya system by the names given in the brackets above (Classical Sāṅkhya, p. 295).

Iṣvara Kṛṣṇa further classifies them as follows: "There are eight varieties of obscurity (tāmas) and delusion (moha); ten kinds of extreme delusion (mahā-moha); both gloom (tāmīśra) and utter darkness (andha-tāmīśra) are 18 fold. G. J. Larson's Classical Sāṅkhya, p. 275. that I may be able to create this (universe) as it was in the previous kalpa—the Lord who is the friend of all the worlds, and dwells within them as the antaryāmin, is gracious (dear) to his devotees.

23. This (Lord) grants boons to those (devotees) who resort to him. He takes incarnations retaining (his original) qualities (like omnipotence, omniscience), along with his own (or soul-) power called Lakṣmī (and not his Māyā power). May he direct my mind to whatever he does while I create, by his order, this universe which is also his own glory, so that I can renounce my attachment to actions, and the consequent sin.

24. I am born here as the vijñāna-sakti (the presiding deity over citta or the principle called mahat) from the deep lake-like navel of the Man of infinite powers, lying on the (cosmic) waters. May there be no loss of the utterance of the Vedas, while I am detailing the wonderful form of this Man viz., the universe.

25. May this Lord, the most Primitive Man, of infinite grace, get up, opening his lotus-like eyes, and with profusely affectionate smiles. May he remove our dejection by his sweet words for the successful creation of the universe.

Maitreya said:

26. Thus having seen his own creator by his power of penance, knowledge and meditation, and having praised him to the best of the abilities of his mind and speech, the god
Brahmā remained silent as if exhausted.

676. vijñāna-sakti—(i) The competence to utter the Veda—(VD.)
(ii) my knowledge-form—(VR.) (iii) my knowledge of Vedas—(VJ.)
(iv) myself being the vijñāna; my being the presiding deity of the principle of intelligence (VC.)

677. visarga—(i) Contact of teaching and studying (the Vedas) —VD.
(ii) utterance—ŚR., VR., ŚR. explains that as per the famous adage “The plough is the end of Vedic lore”, Brahmā was afraid that he would be out of touch with the Vedas while engaged in creation. Hence this prayer to retain his Vedic lore.
(iii) The definite conclusion (viz. Viṣṇu is the most supreme)
—VJ
27-28. Then noting the difficulty of Brahmā who got nervous at (the lack of) his knowledge regarding (prospective) construction of the universe, and whose mind was dejected at the sight of the tumultuous deluvian waters, Madhusūdana (Viṣṇu) spoke to him in deep emphatic voice, as if to remove his dejection (lit. sin).

The Lord said:

29. Oh Vedagarbha (i.e. Brahmin), do not get lax (due to despair). Exert yourself for the creation (of the universe). What you pray of me, has been already obtained for you.

30. Oh Brahman, perform penance again and practise the (yogic) lore of concentrating on me. You will find in your heart, the unfolding of (the plan of the creation of) the worlds, by both of these (tāpas and samādhi).

31. Oh Brahman, when you are full of devotion and properly poised in meditation, you will see me pervading you and the world, and yourself and the world reposing in me.

32. When the people will realize me as dwelling within all beings like fire dormant in the wood, they will immediately shed off sins or misery.

33. When a person sees that his Self is free from bhūtas (elements), indriyas (sense-organs), guṇas (attributes) and antahkāraṇa (the mind), and is essentially one with me, he attains identification with Brahman.

34. It is my great blessing that your mind will never get despaired of this creation of the universe, while you desire to create innumerable subjects with various details of actions.

35. As your mind is firmly fixed on me, the evil attribute of rajas shall not bind you, the first-born sage, even while you indulge in procreating the beings.

36. Inasmuch as you realize me as unconnected with bhūtas, sense-organs, attributes and egohood (ahamkāra), I have been known by you today, though I am very difficult to be known by corporate beings (or beings attached to body).

37. When through the lotus-stalk you tried to find out the root of the lotus under water, and when a doubt as to my existence arose in your mind, my true self was revealed to you within you.

38. It was indeed my grace that you made the prayer composed of my glorious deeds, or that you had firm adherence to penance.

39. I am pleased with you. May you be prosperous, as you, desiring success (in the creation) of worlds, have praised my describing me as attributeless (though I appear to be full of attributes).

40. I, who am the Supreme God, the bestower of all desired boons, will immediately be pleased with a person who will always worship me, and pray to me with this prayer (which you have composed).

41. It is the considered opinion of the knowers of the Reality, that my grace is the sumnum bonum to be achieved by pūrta (acts for public welfare), penance, sacrifices, gifts and yogic meditation.

42. Oh Brahmā, I am the (Supreme) Soul of all beings, the most beloved of all the beloved objects. Hence one should concentrate his love in me, as body and its other belongings are loved for my sake.

43. By means of yourself who is the Veda incarnate, and is created by me, you create again as before (in the previous kalpa) the beings that are lying within me.

Maitreya said:

44. Having explained this (the process of creating the universe) to the creator of the world (Brahmā), the Controller of Prakṛti and Puruṣa, with lotus-like navel disappeared in his own form (as Nārāyaṇa).
CHAPTER TEN

(Brahmā’s Penance and Ten-fold Creation)

Vidura said:

1. How many types of beings did Brahmā, the grandfather of the world and master of his senses procreate, both from his body and his mind, after the disappearance of the Lord Almighty?

2. Oh Lord, the foremost among the learned, please explain to me, one by one, whatever points I asked you, and solve all our doubts.

Sūta said:

3. Oh Bhārgava (Śaunaka), the sage Kauśārava, being thus urged by Vidura, was pleased with him, and began to reply those questions which were raised in Vidura’s mind.

Maitreya said:

4. Concentrating his mind on the Supreme Soul (Nārāyaṇa, as desired by the unborn Lord, Brahmā accordingly performed penance for period of hundred divine years.

5. God Brahmā, born of the lotus, found that both the lotus occupied by him, and the cosmic waters, were rocked by Wind due to the force acquired by it during the period of the deluge.

6. As his knowledge and power were specially developed by his increasing penance and knowledge pertaining to the Supreme Soul, he swallowed the Wind along with the waters.

7. Having seen that the lotus, which was his seat, pervaded the whole of the space, he thought he should, by this lotus, create again the worlds which were formerly (at the time of the deluge) withdrawn.

8. Being prompted by the Almighty to perform (the act of creation to be done by him), Brahmā entered the calyx of the lotus, and divided the one (lotus) into three divisions though it could have been broken into fourteen (worlds), and many more parts.

9. Thus is explained the arrangement of the world of living beings. The region of god Brahmā is the result of religious duties performed, without desiring their fruit.
Vidura said:

10. Oh Brahman, you have described the form called Time of Hari who has many forms and whose actions are miraculous. Please describe to me that form as it is (actually).

Maitreya said:*

11. Time is that which has for its form the modification of guṇas (like sattva etc.). Of itself, it has no special property, but is beginningless and endless. Puruṣa (God) sportively procreated himself in the form of the universe by using Time, as the instrumental cause.

* Maitreya here discusses the concept of Time. According to the Bh.P., Time as the power of motivation, does not simply break the equilibrium of tri-partite matter (guṇamayi ātma-māyā), but pursues the creative process at every stage. If God is the agent-cause of creation, Time is the efficient cause. Through the operation of Time, ten kinds of creation consisting in material (prākrta), elemental (vaikṛta) and mixed (prākrta-vaikṛta) were brought into existence as represented below:

 VR. explains : Time has for its form Pradhāna which is a result of (the disturbance of the equilibrium of) the guṇas. It is devoid of special characteristics like the Earth (and other elements). He is not dependent on another cause i.e. he exists of his own accord. Hence he is endless. The Supreme Man, with Pradhāna as the efficient cause, created himself in the form of the world.

GD. explains : The form of Time is known by the perturbation of the equality in the balance of guṇas. It is the cause of this inequality in guṇas. It is to be known from its effects. It is not characterised by any peculiarity, and hence it is beginningless and endless. With Time as the instrumental cause, God sportively re-created himself in the form of the universe.
12* Verily this universe is the subtle Brahman which was covered (withdrawn) by Viṣṇu's Māyā. It is manifested by God with the help of Time, of invisible form.

13. Just as it (Time) was now, so it was in the past and shall remain so in the future. His creation is nine-fold (both material and elemental) due to Prakṛti and viṅgro. (The tenth creation is prākṛta-vaiṅgro).

14. The destruction of the universe is of three types—(1) brought about by Time, (nitya), (ii) done by substance viz. Saṅkarṣanāgni (naimittika), (iii) due to guṇas (prākṛti). The production of mahat is the first creation, which is caused by God (ātman) by disturbing the equilibrium of the guṇas.

15. The second is the creation of ahaṅkāra wherein rises the knowledge of substance and action. The third is that of tanmātras (subtle elements) which possess the potential for the creation of gross elements (bhūtas).

16. The fourth creation is that of organs of senses, both of knowledge and of action. The fifth is that of gods (presiding over organs of senses) from vaṅgrika ahaṅkāra whence is evolved the mind.

17. Oh Vidura, the sixth is that of ignorance (tamas)

* VR. explains: The universe is the effect—a gross form of Brahman with the attributes of cit and acit developed. Time is regarded as possessing controlling capacity as the creation or destruction of the universe takes place through Time which is an invisible form of God. The existent universe during prakṛtya, returns to its subtle form of Brahman along with its attributes of cit and acit.

VJ. : For the sake of creation etc. of the universe, the Puruṣa assumed three forms : Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Iśvara. Creating Brahmā and entering into him as four-faced god Brahmā, he created the world. Similarly he protects the world as Viṣṇu. He created Rudra called Kāla who was of invisible form, entered into it, and destroyed universe. But it is his power of destruction as Iśvara.

VB. : The gross universe is the effect, the subtle Brahman is the cause. Brahmā is the subtle and earlier stage of the universe. The universe subsists or meets destructions by the Māyā of God (Viṣṇu). Time (Kāla) which is endowed with controlling capacity of God and is formless, helps to bring about this process.

VJ. explains that all creation outside the Egg of the universe is called prākṛta and inludes in it all the principles from avyakta to Prthivī. And creation within the Egg is Vaṅgro.
whereby rises abuddhi (which obscures the correct understanding of jīva and deludes him from the correct perception of God). These six creations pertain to Prakṛti. Now listen to those arising from Viśṇi (vaikārika ahaṅkāra).

18. This creation is the sport of the Lord Viṣṇu who assumes the rajo-guṇa (the attribute rajas), and meditation (lit. retentive memory) about whom liberates from Samsāra. The seventh is the prominent creation of six types of immovables.

19. Vanaspatis (Trees like the holy fig tree which bear fruit without blossom), Osadhis (plants which die immediately after fruit-bearing), latās (creepers), tvaksāra (trees of strong bark, e.g. bamboos), Virudhs (strong creepers like canes not requiring support for them), drumas (trees bearing fruits after blossoming)—all these draw up their nourishment from below, are full of tamas (of unmanifested feelings), have an internal sense of touch, and many other peculiarities.

20. The eighth creation is of animals and birds. It is said to have twentyeight varieties. (They are) devoid of knowledge (of tomorrow etc.), full of ignorance (except the knowledge of gratifying their appetite). They know by scent only and are of minds incapable of retaining knowledge for long.

21. Oh extremely pious Vidura, the cloven-hoofed beasts are the cow, the goat, the buffalo, the black-antelope, the pig, the bison, the ruru (a kind of deer), the sheep, the camel.

22. Oh Vidura, the one (uncloven)-hoofed beasts are: the donkey, the horse, the mule, the guara (a cross of a horse and a female mule), the sarabha (a fictitious eight-legged animal who can kill lions) and the camara (from whose hair chowries are made). Please listen to beasts with five nails.

23. (They are) the dog, the jackal, the tiger, the cat,

678. abuddhi: Concentration or knowledge about Viṣṇu (a=Viṣṇu)—VJ.
679. Hari-medhasah etc.—Alternatively: This creation is of Lord Hiraṇyagarbha (Brahmā) who is characterised by rajas and whose thoughts are concentrated on Hari (VD.)
the hare, the hedge-hog, the lion, the monkey, the elephant, the tortoise, the alligator, the shark and others.

24. The birds are: the heron, the vulture, the bat, the hawk, the bhāsa (a vulture, a cock), the bhallūka (a kind of owl or bear), the peacock, the swan, the crane (baka), the ruddy goose, the crow, the owl and others.

25. Oh Vidura, the nineth creation which takes its nutriment from above down the body, is of one type, viz. that of men. They have in them rajo-guṇa dominant, are full of activities and take pleasure in things leading to miseries.

26. Oh foremost among the saintly persons, these three creations are vaikārika. The creation of gods also, comes under the vaikārika category. But the creation of Sanatkumāra (Sanaka etc.) comes under both (prākṛta-cum-vaikārika category).

27-28. The creation of gods is of eight categories: Gods proper, Manes (pitṛs), asuras, gandharvas and apasrās (the divine musicians and dancing girls), Yakṣas and Rākṣasas, Siddhas and Cāraṇas, Bhūtas (gnomes) Pṛetas and Piśacās; Vidyādhars, the Kinnaras, and Kimpuruṣa, a horse-faced tribe etc.). Oh Vidura, I have described to you these ten categories created by Brahmā.

29. After this I shall describe to you the dynasties, manvantarās (epochs of different Manus). In this way, at the beginning of every kalpa, the self-born Viṣṇu becomes the creator due to the dominance of rajo-guṇa. The Supreme Soul of unfailing will-power creates himself out of himself at will*

30. As there are modifications of guṇas in the creation, they (the learned ones) do not expect a particular serial order, just as in a whirlpool in a river (no part of a whirlpool can be considered to be the first). This is due to the Māyā power of the Supreme Lord.

31. Oh Vidura! Whatever gods, Asuras and others of this kalpa, have been described to you by name and form, had the same name and form in the last period of Manu.

*These two verses are probably interpolations in the post-Śrīdhara period for they are neither recorded by the Bengal School of Vaiṣṇavism i.e. JG., VC., nor by the followers of Nimbārka i.e. SD. nor by VB., GD. etc.).
CHAPTER ELEVEN

(The concept of time: manvantaras and life-spans of men and gods.)

Maitreya said:

1. The ultimate irreducible particle of the parts of a gross effect (substance), which is ever separate (i.e. has not reached the stage of being an effect), and which is not combined with another in an aggregate, is called an atom (para-māṇu)\(^\text{680}\). It is from the aggregation of atoms that men get the illusion of whole substance.

2. When the idea of peculiarity or of differences is separated (not considered), the entire substance in its essence which remains unaltered (with no change of dimensions) is called para-mahān (maximum dimension)\(^\text{681}\).

3. Oh Vidura, Time is also inferred as subtle (medium), and the longest according as it pervades the atomic, medium, and the grossest (para-mahān) matter. It is God’s power which itself remains unmanifest, but occupies and encompasses the manifested substance and is competent to manage creation etc. of the universe.

4. That much period of time which is required to occupy an atom is the atomic period. That which is required to enjoy the matter in its entirety, is called para-mahān (the largest general—required to cross the totality of twelve Rāsīs or Bhuvanakoṭa i.e. a period of a year and a period up to two parārdhas by the recurrence of the years.

5-8* Two parāmnus make one aṇu. Three aṇus make one trasareṇu. It is the smallest particle which is visible and is noticed to be going up in the ray of the Sun coming through a window. The time which is required to occupy by three

680. It may be noted that the Bh. P. and the Vedāṇṭa (vide Brahma Sūtra II. 2.12-17) do not subscribe to the atomic theory of the Vaiśeṣikas.

681. Having the duration of two para-rdhas—JG.

2 para-māṇus = 1 aṇu; 3 aṇus = 1 trasareṇu; 3 trasareṇus = 1 truṣi; 100 truṣis = 1 vedha; 3 vedhas = 1 lata; 3 lataṣśas = 1 nimiṣa; 3 nimiṣas = 1 kṣaṇa; 5 kṣaṇas = 1 kāsthā; 15 kāsthās = 1 laghu; 15 laghus = 1 nādiṣṭa; 2 nādiṣṭas = 1 mukūrta; 6/7 nādiṣṭas = 1 yama or prakara.
trasareṇus is called a truti. Hundred trutiṣ make up one vedha. Three vedhas is regarded as a lava. A nimiṣa is known to consist of three lavas. Three nimiṣas make up a kṣaṇa. Five kṣanas are said to form one kāṣṭhā. Fifteen kāṣṭhās make one laghu. Fifteen laghus are said to constitute one nādikā (or ghāṭikā). Two nādikās make one muhūrtā. Six or seven nādikās make one prakara of men. It is also called yāma.

9. A copper vessel of six palas in weight and with sides sixteen angulas in height, and with a capacity to contain a prastha of water, and with a hole (of the dimension) of a gold wire four angulas in length and four māsas (=1/3rd Tola) in weight—the time required to submerge (in water) such a vessel is called nādikā (ghāṭikā).

10. Oh respectful Vidura! Four and four yāmas make a day and a night of human beings. Fifteen days make one pakṣa. It is bright and dark.

11. The aggregate of two pakṣas makes one month which is a day and a night of the pitṛs (departed forefathers). Two months make a ṛtu (season). Six months make one ayana. It is northern (when the Sun apparently moves to the north) and the southern (when the Sun appears to move to the south of the equator).

12. The ayunas are called the day and the night of the Svarga. A year is made up of twelve months. One hundred years is said to be the maximum life of human beings.*

13. The ever-vigilant controlling god (the Sun) occupies the sphere consisting of the planets, the nakṣatras (e.g. Aśvini, Bharaṇi and other constellations) and other stars and revolves round the world beginning with atomic division of time and ending with one year (the period required to cross the bhuvana-kosa).

14. Oh Vidura, the period of a year is thus called saṁvatsara (the Solar year), parivatsara (related to Jupiter) Idāvatsara (of 360 days—savana) anuvatsara (the lunar year) and vatsara (related to nakṣatras).

15. Offer your worship to the God Sun who made the

*VR. adds that the maximum life of Pitṛs and gods is one hundred years according to their respective measures of time.

VJ. takes this verse as applicable to god Viṣṇu: Perform your sacrifices to Hari the antaryāmin, of the five kinds of the year, etc.
five kinds of the year and who by his own power (in the form of kālā) urges the powers of things to develop into effects (gross forms) in different ways, and who is a part of the element called tejas. He runs through the sky for removing the delusion of men (as if by dissuading them from waste of life in pleasures) and extending the fruits of guṇas by performance of sacrifices.

Vidura said:

16. The maximum span of life of the pītras (manes), gods and men has been stated, (as hundred years according to the measure of time of these). Please tell me the state (life-span) of those learned ones who stay beyond the three worlds.

17. Verily, you the revered one know the course of Time which is capable of destroying everything. The wise ones can visualize the universe by their yogic vision.

Maitreya said:

18. It is said that the cycle of four yugas, viz. kṛta, tretā, dvāpara and kali along with their sandhis (transitional periods at the beginning of a yuga) and anāṣas (the transitional period at the end of a yuga), consist of twelve thousand years of gods.

19-20* The period of yugas respectively (of kṛta etc.) is four thousand, three thousand, two thousand and one thousand (divine) years. The sandhyā period at the beginning and the anāṣa period at the end (of each yuga) is respectively eight hundred, six hundred, four hundred and two hundred years (of gods). The learned ones designate the period between sandhyā and anāṣa as yuga, and the (special) laws of conduct (dharma) have been ordained with reference to the (particular) yuga.

*The classification of the Yugas in terms of divine (gods') years is as follows:

<th>kṛta</th>
<th>tretā</th>
<th>dvāpara</th>
<th>kali</th>
<th>Total Divine years</th>

21. In the kṛta age, dharma accompanied men on (all his) four legs (viz. penance, purity, compassion and truth). With the increase of irreligion (adharma), religion became diminished by one leg, in each of the other yugas.

22. Oh Vidura, beyond the three worlds (from maha loka) to Brahma loka, a day consists of one thousand cycles of four yugas. The night is also of the same duration when the Creator of the universe goes to sleep.

23. At the end of the night, the creation of the world starts and proceeds so long as it is god Brahma’s day which covers the period of fourteen Manus.

24. Every Manu rules during his own period which is somewhat longer than seventyone catur-yugas (cycles of four yugas\textsuperscript{682}) in the eras of Manus, kings in the lineage of the Manu are born in succession. Hermits, gods, king of gods and his attendants are born simultaneously.

25. This is Brahmā’s daily creation whereby the three worlds are made to function and in which the birds, beasts, men, pītris and gods are born according to their karmas.

26. In the Manu-eras, the Supreme Lord retains his sattvaguna and protects the universe by incarnating as Manus and manifesting himself in other human forms.

27. At the end of (Brahmā’s) day, assuming a bit of the tamo-guna, he restrains his prowess, and with everything else withdrawn in him due to the force of kāla, he keeps quiet.

28. When it is the nightfall without any moon or the sun (in existence), the three worlds bhūḥ, bhuvah, svah lie concealed in him.

29. When the three worlds get consumed by the fire from the mouth of Sañkarṣaṇa (Śeṣa) who is his power, Bṛghu and others, being distressed by the heat go to Jana-loka from Mahāloka.

30. In the meanwhile, due to Pralaya (world-end),

\textsuperscript{682} This line indicating the vagueness implied in ‘longer than’ (sādhikā) is repeated in other Purāṇas also (e.g. Viṣṇu P. 1.3.18). Baldev Upadhyaya on the strength of Vāyu P. (57.35) suggests that it should be emended as ‘sandhikā’ (vide Purāṇa Vimarśa, pp. 291-93). The Bh. P. seems to have adopted the reading from the Viṣṇu P. which is generally accepted as earlier than the Bh. P. vide Purāṇa Vimarśa, pp. 542-45.
oceans, with huge billows whipped up by extremely terrible and powerful, winds,overflow and inundate the three worlds.

31. On that water, on the bed of the serpent Śeṣa, lies Hari with his eyes closed in yogic sleep, while sages in the Janaloka sing his praise.

32. In due course of time, with such types of days and nights as described above, even the long span of life of hundred years of this (god Brahmā), comes to an end.

33. Half of the life (of god Brahmā) is called parārdha. The first parārdha (of his life) has passed. Now the other half is running.

34. At the beginning of the previous parārdha, there was the great kalpa called Brahma kalpa, as Brahmā was then born. They knew him as Sabda-Brahma.

35. At the end of that kalpa, there was another kalpa called Padma kalpa, as there sprouted up the world-lotus from the lake-like navel of Hari.

36. Oh Vidura, the present kalpa of the second parārdha is known as Varāha (pertaining to the boar), as Hari assumed the boar-form in this (kalpa).

37. The period called dvi-parārdha is regarded as (a negligible period like) a wink of the unmanifested, infinite beginningless Soul of the Universe.

38. This kāla beginning from paramānu (its lowest unit) upto the end dvi-parārdha (duration of Brahmadeva’s life) can control those who have attachment to house etc. He has no power over the Almighty God, the bhūman.

39. This egg of the universe consisting of sixteen vikāras (modifications) and eight prakṛtis which is covered from outside by the (seven) sheaths of the earth etc., is fifty crores (of yojanas) in breadth.

683. viz.. mind, ten organs of knowledge and action and five elements (mahābhūtas).

684. viz., Prakṛti, mahat, ahaṅkāra and five characteristics of elements (e.g. sound, touch etc.).
40-41. Each of these sheaths (covering the universe) is ten times greater (than its previous one). This universe appears as an atom when merged (in him). Crores of such universes lie in him. That is the highest essential form of Viṣṇu, the great Puruṣa. It is called the imperishable Brahmāṇ, the cause of all causes.

CHAPTER TWELVE

(creation of Rudra, the mind-born sons and of Manu and Śatarūpā)

Maitreya said:

1. Oh Vidura, the greatness of the Kāla-form of the Supreme Lord is thus described to you. Now know from me how Vedagarbha (god Brahmā) proceeded with the creation.

2. The creator, at first, created the varieties of ignorance (or avidyā) viz. mahāmoha, moha, tāmisra, andha-tāmisra and moha.885

3. Seeing the sinful creation, Brahmā did not think highly of himself. With his mind purified by meditation on the Lord, he brought forth another creation.

4. The self-born god (Brahmā) then created the sages Sanaka, Sananda, Sanātana and Sanatkumāra who were not interested in actions (for dharma, artha or kāma) and lived in perpetual celibacy.886

5. The self-born god spoke to them, “Oh sons, procreate children”. But they being absolutely devoted to Vāsudeva and followers of the path of liberation, were not so inclined (to create).

885. For details vide supra 3.10, 11 and onwards the Sāṅkhya influence is evident. This list is repeated in LP. 2.9.30 and 34-35. This is the tāmasa creation.

886. ŚR. adds: These Kumāras are not created in every Kalpa but only in the Brāhma Kalpa. This is the description of the Brāhma Kalpa, hence the mention of their creation.
6. He was thus disobeyed by his sons who refused to comply with his order. He tried to control his unbearable rage aroused (due to this defiance).

7. Though he tried to control the rage by his mental power, the rage was immediately born as a son of dark-blue complexion from the middle of the brows of Brahmā.

8. The illustrious god Bhava who was born before (other) gods verily cried out, “Oh creator, the father of the world, give me names and fix (some) places for me”.

9. The lotus-born god (Brahmā), with a view to granting his request, spoke with sweet words, “Please do not cry, I shall give it to you.

10. Oh great god, as you cried like an excited child, people will call you by the name ‘Rudra’.

11. Your places have been already arranged by me as follows: The mind, the sense-organs, the vital breath, the Sky, the Wind, the Fire, the Water, the Earth, the Sun, the Moon and the penance.

12. (The following are your names): Manyu, Manu, Mahinasa, Mahān, Śiva, Rūdhvaja, Ugra-retas, Bhava, Kāla, Vāmadeva and Dhṛtavrata.

13. Oh Rudra, you will have the following wives, namely: Dhī, Vṛtti, Uṣanā, Umā, Niyutsarpī, Ilā, Ambikā, Iravati, Sudhā, Dīkṣā, Rudrāṇī.

14. As you are a Prajāpati accept these names, places along with these wives, and procreate abundant progeny.”

15. Being thus ordered by his father, Lord Nīla-lohita (Rudra) brought forth children who were like him in prowess, form, (complexion) and nature.

16. Seeing the innumerable hordes of Rudras created by (the original) Rudra, devouring the world on all side, god Brahmā got afraid.

17. (He said to Rudra): “Oh great god, enough of the creation of all such beings who with their terrible eyes are burning all the directions along with me.

18. Perform penance which is conducive to the happiness of all beings. May you be blest. It is by penance that you (lit. Your honour) will create again this universe as it was before.
19. It is only by (performance of) penance that a man can easily attain to the Lord Adhōksaja, the Supreme light, dwelling in the hearts of all beings."

Maitreya said:

20. Being thus ordered by the self-born god (Brahmā), (Rudra) circumambulated from left to right the Lord of Speech (Brahmā). Complying with his request, he bade goodbye to him and entered the forest for penance.

21. Then while he was musing over the problem of creation and became possessed of the power of the Lord (for creation), ten sons who became the progenitors of the population of the world, were born to him.

22.* (They were): Marīci, Atri, Aṅgiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Bhṛgu, Vasiṣṭha, Dakṣa and the tenth (son) was Nārada.*

23-24. Nārada was born from Brahmā’s lap; Dakṣa from his thumb; Vasiṣṭha from his vital breath, Bhṛgu from the skin and Kratu from his hand; Pulaha was born from his navel, the sage Pulastya from his ears, Aṅgiras from his mouth, Atri from his eyes, and Marīci, was created from (Brahmā’s) mind.

25. Dharma was born from his right breast wherein abides Nārāyaṇa himself. From his back (was born) Adharma which begets the Death, a terror to the world.

26. Desire (Kāma) was born in his heart; Anger (krodha) from his brow; Avarice (Lobha) from his lower lip; Speech was born from (his) mouth; the rivers from his penis and Nirṛti, the shelter of all sins, from his anus.

27. (The powerful sage) Kardama, the husband of Devahūti, was born from his shadow; this (whole) world was created from the mind and the body of the creator of the universe.

28. Oh Vidura, it is reported to us that self-born god became passionate and desired his own beautiful daughter, the goddess of Speech who, though herself above passions, captivated his mind. 687

*For the symbolism of the ten mind-born sons as Vīrāj vide V.S. Agrawal—MP.—A Study, p. 38.

29. His sons, the sages, of whom Marici was the foremost, saw that their father had set his heart on unrighteousness. Out of familiar confidence, they pleaded with (lit. awakened) him.

30. "That you do not control your passion despite your capacity to do so, and that you are bent on approaching your daughter, has never been done by the ancestors nor will it be done by others after you in future.

31. Oh father of the world, this is not glorifying (credible) even to the possessors of divine lustre (power). By following this (course of conduct) the people shall never attain any good."

32. (Finding Brahmā bent on the heinous act the sages prayed to God) "We bow to the glorious Lord who manifested this world that was within him. He alone is capable of protecting righteousness."

33. Then the father of the Prajāpatis, seeing his sons, the Prajāpatis speaking this in his presence, became ashamed and gave up his body.

34. The cardinal points accepted that terrible body. The wise people know it as mist or darkness. While he was meditating how he should create the well-planned worlds as before, the Vedas came out from the four mouths of the creator.

35. The duties of the four sacrificial priests⁶⁸⁸ (hotā, adhvaryu, udgātā, brahmā) along with the upavedas and the disciplines of Logic etc., the extensive course of sacrificial sessions, the four legs of Dharma and the duties of the four Āśramas were also produced thence."

Vidura said:

36. "Oh sage (lit. one who regards penance as his wealth) you told that the Lord of the progenitors of the world produced Vedas etc. from his mouths. Please tell me by what particular (organ) he produced the specific things."

⁶⁸⁸. These Priests are the experts in the Rg and other Vedas serially.

VJ. however maintains that sāk is 'the deity presiding over human speech' and not Sarasvatī who is the natural consort of Brahmā, the Veda incarnate.
Maitreya said:

37. “From his mouths facing the east (the west etc.), he produced the Vedas—Rg, Yajus, Sāman and Atharvan and Šastra (simple recitation of mantras in praise of gods entrusted to riṣij), ijjā (oblations, worship etc. to be done by adhvaryu), stutiṣtoma (singing of the mantras in praise of gods, the duty of udgātā) and Prāyaścitta (expiatory rites in case of some lapses in sacrifices to be performed by brahmā).

38. Again through the same faces, and in the same serial order, he produced Āyurveda (the science of medicine), Dhanurveda (science of Warfare), Gandharva Veda (the science of Music) and Sthūpatya Veda (the science of Architecture, Sculpture etc.).

39. The Omniscient Lord produced the fifth Veda, viz. Itihāsa and Purāṇas from all his mouths.

40. From his mouth facing the east (came forth the sacrificial acts viz.) Śoḍaṣi and Uktha (and serially from other mouths) Purīṣi and Āgniṣṭut, Āptoryāma and Atirātra, Vājapeya along with Gosava.

41. He created the four feet of Dharma viz. Vidyā (knowledge and purity), dāna (donations), tapas (penance) and satya (Truth). He also produced the (four) āśramas (stages in life) along with their types of duties.

42. (Brahmacarya āśrama)—celibate stage—the 1st stage in life—is of four types viz. Sāvitṛ (observance of celibacy and study of Sāvitrī for three nights from the upanayana (thread-bearing) ceremony), Prājāpatya (observance of celibacy for one year), brāhma (observance of celibacy till the completion of the study of Vedas) and ṛhat (celibacy throughout life). (The 2nd stage in life) The gṛhastha āśrama—the married stage—is of four kinds according to the way of maintenance of family: Vāśā (earning livelihood by agriculture and such other non-prohibited vocations), Saṅcaya (maintenance of money earned by performing sacrifices), Śālīna (to live on whatever one gets

689. Vaikhānasa Grhya Śūtra classifies gṛhasthas as (1) Vāśā vr̥tini (maintaining on agriculture, trade), (a) Śālīna vr̥tini (stay in houses performing sacrifices etc.), (3) Tāyēsvana (performing saṅkārmas) (4) Ghora cānika—corresponding to Śiloṣeccha. For details vide Kane—HDS, Vol. II. I. pp. 641-43.
without requesting or begging), Śīlōśccha—(maintenance by gleaning grains, grain-gathering).

43. In (the third stage of life called) the vānaprastha āśrama, (there are four categories viz.) Vaikhānasas (who live upon food-grains which grow naturally without agricultural efforts), Vālakhilyas (who subsist on fresh food, giving away hoarded food), Audumbaras (who eat fruits etc. gathered from the direction to which they happen to look at first in the morning) and Phenaṇa (who live on fruits, leaves etc. automatically dropped from trees). In (the last stage of life) the Samnyāsa āśrama, (the four kinds are :) Kuṭicaka (who chiefly abide by all the duties prescribed for the āśrama), Bahvoda (who perform the most essential duties of this āśrama but emphasize on the path of knowledge), Haṃsa (who concentrate on knowledge), Niśkriya (who have realized the Soul). 890

69c. VJ. and VD. differ: (1) Vaikhānasas—Those who subsist on upon fruits. (iv) Phenaṇa—Who subsist on the milk-foam falling out from the mouth of calves while sucking.

This classification is supported by Brhat Parāśara Smṛti XII. 158 for Vānaprasthas and XII. 164 for Samnyāsins.

Kinds of Samnyāsins :

Kuṭicaka : (i) The Ascetic who lives in his own house and is satisfied on whatever food is given to him—VJ.

(ii) The ascetic who due to weakness etc. does not wander from one holy place to another but stays at one holy place in a hut and lives upon begging after practising japa of 12000 Praṇavas—VD.

Bahvoda : (i) He who, in addition to his three baths per day, performs ablution in every new tirtha he sees and has three dandaś—VJ.

(ii) Who wanders from one holy place to another not living beyond a prescribed period at each place (e.g. 1 night at a village, 3 nights in a city etc.)

Haṃsa : (i) Who carries one danda and the sacred thread—Yajño-pavita—VJ. (ii) Who is nude, beyond dvandvas, lost in deep meditation of Brahman—VD.

Niśkriya or Parama-haṃsa—(i) Who has abandoned all acts, completely observing ahiṃsā.

(ii) One who is absorbed in the meditation of the Brahma, careless about his body etc. and has crossed the seven stages of knowledge (Sopta-Jñāna-Bhūmikās).
44. (So also were serially produced) the science of the knowledge of Soul and non-Soul, the three Vedas, the science of agriculture and the science of politics (leading to the attainment of Mokṣa, dharma, kāma and artha) and also the vyāhṛtis (mystic words following Om or prāṇava) viz. bhūḥ, bhūvah, suvaḥ and bhūr-bhūvah-suvaḥ (or mahas). From his heart came forth Om.

45-46. (The Vedic metres) Uṣṇik, Gāyatrī, Trīṣṭubh, Anuṣṭubh and Jagati, Paṅkti and Brhati were produced respectively from the hair, skin, flesh, muscles and bones, marrow and prāṇa or vital airs of the all-pervading Prajāpati (Brahmā). His life (jīva) is said to consist of the occlusives or the consonants of five classes (e.g. velar, palatal etc.) from k to m, and his body, of vowels (a, i, u etc.).

47. The sibilants (ūṣma varṇas like ś, s, s) are called the sense organs of the Soul, i.e. Brahmā, and the semi-vowels (y, r, l, v) his strength. And the gamut of music (viz. Ṣadja, Rṣabha, Gandhāra, Madhyama, Pañcama, Dhaivata and Niṣāda) are created out of the sport of Prajāpati.

48*. Brahmā whose body is sabda-brahman is of both manifest (as vaikhari) and unmanifest (as Omkāra) forms. As unmanifest the Supreme Spirit clearly appears to him as the highest omnipresent Brahman. As a manifest form, it appears as Indra and other forms possessing different powers.

49-52. Then assuming another (body), he set his mind on creation (of the world). Finding the limited creation (of VR. and VC. follow ŚR. VD. claims his acceptance of ŚR's interpretation.

691. ānuśāsikī—The Tantrism in consonance with the Vedas—VJ.
692. VJ. states: The occlusives from k to m were produced from his jīva and the vowels from his body.

*Though I have followed ŚR., this verse is differently interpreted. Thus VR. emphasizes the literary or sabda aspect of Brahmā, and explains the different sukīs as functions of words, such as abhidhā, laksanā. I may add one more interpretation.

God Brahmā is of the form of sabda-brahma. He is manifest as the spoken word (Vaikhari) and unmanifest as Prāṇava. But the real Supreme Spirit that is beyond him appears to be all-pervading and possessed of various powers.
progeny) even by sages possessing great power, he again began to ponder, Oh Kaurava (Vidura).

"Oh! It is really strange that although I am all the while engaged in creating (the world) the beings do not multiply. In this, the Fate must be obstructing."

Thus while Brahmā was doing his duties properly and thinking over the Providence, his body was split into two and it was called Kāya. And from the bifurcated forms of the body was produced a pair of a male and a female.

53. There the male part was the emperor Svāyambhuva Manu and that the female part was called Śatarūpā and was the queen of the great person.

54. Indeed, the subjects (created beings) began to multiply in their relationship as husband and wife. He brought forth five children from Śatarūpā.

55. Oh Vidura, (They were) Priyavrata, Uttānapāda and three daughters, Ākūti, Devahūti and Prasūti.

56. He gave Ākūti (in marriage) to Ruci, the middle-daughter (Devahūti) to Kardama and Prasūti to Dakṣa. From these the world was filled (with population).

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

(The Boar (Varāha) Incarnation)

Śrī Suka said:

1. Oh king, hearing the holiest discourse of the sage, Vidura (a descendant of Kuru) who cherished high respects for narratives of Hari, again asked (Maitreya).

Vidura said:

2. The emperor Svāyambhuva was verily the favourite son of god Brahmā. Oh sage, what did he do after obtaining a loving wife?

3. Oh foremost among the good, narrate to me, who am full of faith, the life of the king-sage, the first ruler of the world, because he also resorted to Vāsudeva (Viṣvaksena).
4. (The act of) listening to the virtuous deeds of those who cherish in their hearts the lotus-like feet of Mukunda, is eulogised by the wise, as the main fruit (result) of men’s study of the Śāstras with long efforts.

5. The sage (Maitreya) who was thus urged to narrate the episodes of the Lord had his hair standing on ends (due to intense devotion), and narrated to Vidura who was modest and was (as if) a pillow to the feet of Śrī Kṛṣṇa (lit. the thousand-headed god) requested him (Maitreya) thus.

Maitreya said:

6. When Svāyambhuva Manu was born along with his wife, he folded his hands and bowing to Brahmā (Vedagarbha) he said:

7. “You are the sole progenitor and nourisher and protector of all beings. But how (in what way) are we, your creatures, to render you service?

8. Oh praiseworthy one, I bow to you. Tell me what action, out of those within our capacity, I should do whereby my fame will spread everywhere (here) and lead to Heaven hereafter.”

Brahmā said:

9. “Oh child, I am pleased with you. Oh king, blessed be you both. You have offered yourself to me with a guileless (sincere) heart for guidance.

10. Oh warrior, this much worship should be rendered by children to their father that they should abide by his order respectfully, to the best of their capacity without jealousy or negligence.

11. Have from her children who are like you in qualities. Protect the earth according to law. Worship the Puruṣa (the Supreme Man) with sacrifices.

12. Oh king, the highest service (rendered) to me will

* VB. Even though the virtuous deeds of the Lord are heard with great exertions, they are not properly fixed in the heart and hence do not bear fruit. They are properly fixed by listening to the deeds of those who are his devotees. Hence the propriety of listening to Manu’s life.

693. As Śrī Kṛṣṇa used to rest his feet on Vidura’s lap—ŚR. be the protection of the subjects. Lord Hṛṣīkeśa (Viṣṇu) will be ever pleased with you for your being the protector of the subjects.

13. Fruitless are the efforts of those with whom Lord Kṛṣṇa (Janardana) whose form is sacrifice, is not pleased; for, thereby, the Soul (ātman) itself is disrespected.''

Manu said:

14. “Oh destroyer of sins, I shall abide by the order of your lordship. But fix up a place for me and for my progeny here.

15. The earth which is the place for all beings is submerged in the great ocean. Oh god, make some efforts to lift up this goddess (earth) (from the ocean).”

Maitreya said:

16. Seeing that the earth is submerged that way in waters, god Brahmā pondered over for a long time, “How can I lift her (the earth) up?"

17. While I was engaged in creation, the earth was engulfed by waters and it sank down to Rasātala. What can we, who are entrusted with the duty of creation, do now here? Let the Lord from whose heart I came into existence, do it for me.”

18. Oh sinless one, while he was reflecting thus, a thumb-size small boar suddenly dropped down from his nostril.

19. Oh Vidura (of Bharata clan), while he (Brahmā) was looking on, a great miracle took place: The small boar in the sky shot up to the size of an elephant in a moment.

20. Along with Brāhmaṇas with Marici as their chief, with Kumāras (Sanaka, Sanandana etc.) and with Manu, he saw the boar form and began to think in various ways.

21. “Is it the transcendental Being appearing in the form of a boar? What a miracle that it should come out of my nose!

694. JG. This indicates that this is the introduction to the Varāha incarnation at the beginning of the present Kalpa.

695. SR. explains: At the beginning of creation Brahmā drank up the ocean and restored the earth to its place. He did not understand how suddenly it was immersed in water again.
22. It appeared like the tip of a thumb and in a moment it became as big as a great boulder. Can this be the Divine Sacrifice (i.e. Lord Viṣṇu) himself who is trying my mind to exhaustion (by concealing his real form)?

23. While Brahmā was deeply thinking over it along with his sons, the glorious Supreme Sacrifice-Man (Yajña-Puruṣa) who was like a mountain thundered forth.

24. The all-pervading Hari thrilled with rapture, god Brahmā and the excellent Brahmins, by his roar which reverberated the directions.

25. Having heard the grief-removing roar of the (Being who had assumed the) Boar form by his Māyā, the sages who were residents of the same Tapas and Satya lokas (worlds) praised him with the holy trinity (of the Vedas).

26. Knowing that it is the Veda extolling his attributes that is chanted by the great (god Brahmā and the sages), he whose personality is described in the Vedas again roared and for the prosperity of gods, rushed into the water like a big sporting elephant.

27. He moved through the sky with his tail held aloft. With his shaking mane and kicking hoofs he dispersed the clouds. His body was hard with tough hide bristled with sharp, erect hair. The Lord, the saviour of the earth, appeared brilliant with his white tusk and shining eyes.

28. Though he was sacrifice itself in person, He assumed the form of a boar and was scenting the track of the earth. Though his tusks were sharp, he gently looked at the Brāhmaṇas who were praising him and dashed into water.

29. The roaring ocean whose side was shattered by the velocity of the falling of his body which was like a mountain of adamantine peaks, spread out his arms in the form of swelling surges and as if out of affliction, yelled out, 'Oh Lord of Sacrifices, protect me'.

30. Then cutting down the unfathomable waters to the bottom with his sharp arrow-like hoofs, the Lord who was sacrifice incarnate (lit. who had three joints in the form of savanas or sacrificial acts), saw the earth in rasātala where at the time

696. Veda-vitāna-mūrtiḥ—(i) One whose body is sacrifice (VR.)
   (ii) Whose form was entire Veda itself (VC.)
of Deluge (Pralaya) he desired to sleep, placing the earth along with the beings, in his stomach.

31-32. He appeared extremely resplendent when he rose up pulling out by his tusks the submerged earth from the rasātala. Even there (in the sea), he whose intensified rage was like the Sudarśana Cakra\(^{697}\), saw a demon (Daitya) of irresistible prowess attacking him with a mace and (thus) obstructing him. He killed him easily as a lion kills an elephant. With his cheeks red with the (mudlike) clotted blood of the demon, he appeared like a big elephant who had turned up (red chalk from) the earth.

33.* On Vidura, (sages and gods) of whom Brahmā was the leader recognised the Lord (Varāha) of tamāla like blue complexion, who was sportively lifting up the earth by the tip of his tusks like an elephant. They folded their hands and prayed him with words like Vedic sūktas.

Sages said:

34. "Victory to you, Oh unconquerable Lord! Oh creator of sacrifices!\(^{698}\) We bow to you who are shaking your body composed of three Vedas. We salute to you who have assumed this boar form (to lift up the earth), in the pores of whose hair sacrifices lie hidden.

35. Oh Lord, the sacrificial form of your body is really very difficult to look at by the sinful people. The Vedic \(^{697}\) 'Whose rage was intensified by Sudarśana'—VB.

VB. explains: When the mace and weapons of Viṣṇu proved ineffective to kill the demon, the Sudarśana disc had to remind Viṣṇu of the misdeeds of the demon and intensified his anger to finish with the demon.

* VG. and UD. quoting Bhāgavatamśta kārikā maintain that Maitreya has mixed up two Boar incarnations—the white one in Svayambhūva Age and the blue one in the Cākṣuṭa Manvantara.

\(^{698}\) yajña-bhāvana : (i) Who is invoked by sacrifices—ŚR. (ii) The creator or cause of all sacrifices—VD., VR, VC, VB. (iii) Who manifests himself by sacrifices—RR. (iv) Who is worshipped as Yajña with its different parts—VR. (v) Who is propitiated by sacrifices—GD.

 The conception of Yajña-Varāha was formulated first in Va P. 6.16.23. It was adopted later by MP.248.67-73, VP. 1.4.32-33, BRP. 213.33.7, PP. Śrīti-kānda 16.55.61, Hari-Vaṁśa P. 1.41.29-33. The concept was so popular that in addition to literary reference in Viṣṇu Smṛti metres are found in your skin, the kusa grass in your hair, the sacred clarified butter in your eyes, and the fourfold duties of the sacrificial priests in your feet.

36. Oh Lord, sruck is in your mouth, sruvas are in your nostrils, Idâ in your stomach, and camasas in your ears; prāṣṭra (the vessel for Brahmâ's share) in your mouth, grahas (a kind of cup for soma) in your throat. Agnihotra in your chewing.

37. Your frequency of incarnation is the iṣṭi (sacrificial act) called dikṣā. The three iṣṭis called upasads form your neck. Prâyanîya (iṣṭi after dikṣā) and udayaniya (iṣṭi after completion of sacrifice) are your two tusks. The Pravargya Mahâvîra* ceremony preliminary to Soma sacrifice) is your tongue. The two fires sabhya and ãvasathya form your head. You are the sacrifice. The arrangement of bricks for sacrifice is your vital breath.

38. Your semen is the soma juice. The three savanas (morning, noon and evening) form your seat. The seven sacrifices (Agni-Śoma, Atyagnisoma, Ukhya, Śodashi, Vâjapeya, Atirâtra and Āptoryâma) are your dhâtuṣ (constituents of the body). All kinds of satras (sacrificial sessions) are the joints of your body. You are both kratus (sacrifices in which soma juice was extracted) and yajñas (sacrifices without the extraction of soma juice). Iṣṭis in sacrifices are your tendons.

39. We bow again and again to you who are all the mantras, deities, sacrificial materials, sacrificial acts and the performance of all acts. We repeatedly salute to you who are knowledge realised by nonattachment, devotion and self-control, and who are the preceptor of that knowledge.

40. Oh Supreme Lord, the support of the earth, the earth along with the mountains which you have borne upon the tip of your tusk, appears beautiful like a lotus plant with leaves resting on the tusk of a big elephant.

1.3-9. Vīṣṇudharmottata 1.2.3-8 we have Yajña-Varāha images (e.g. that at Vihāra in N. Gujarat). The two aspects of this concept viz.,(i) its significance as the symbol of Vedic cosmogony and (ii) the correspondence between the elements of sacrifices and the parts of Varāha's body are discussed by V.S. Agrawala MP—A Study, pp.313ff.

* Apte's PSD 668. Mahôvîra is a sacrificial vessel. When it is red hot, ghee and milk is to be put in it(VD). This is performed before every upasad (SR).
41. This your boar form consisting of three Vedas, with the sphere of the earth supported by your tusk, appears shining like a great enchantingly beautiful Kula Parvata⁶⁹⁹ with a cloud resting on its peak.

42. Establish firmly your consort, this earth, the mother of the world of the moveables and immovables, for the residence of the people; for you are the father or the Protector. We offer our salutations to her along with you. You have deposited your vital power in her as the Fire is dormant in arañi—(a piece of Śami wood used for creating sacrificial fire by friction with another piece).

43. Oh Supreme ruler, who else can aspire or determine to lift up the earth which sank down to the nethermost region (rasātala)? In your case, this is not a miracle as you have created this extremely wonderful world by your Māyā power.

44. Oh Almighty, we, the residents of the Jana, Tapas and Satya regions have been thoroughly purified by the sanctifying drops of water sprayed from the ends of your bristle like hair while you shake your body which is composed of the Vedas.

45. He who aspires to reach to the end of (i.e. to know thoroughly) all your deeds which are endless, must really have lost his senses. The whole universe is deluded by the association of the attributes of your yoga māyā. Oh Supreme Lord, bless (us) with happiness."

Maitreya said:

46. While the Protector (Varāha) was thus praised by the sages, the knowers of Brahmā, he stabilised the waters by his hoofs and placed the earth on them.

47. The Supreme Lord Hari, the Viṣvaksena and the protector of the world, placed on waters the earth which he easily lifted up from rasātala and disappeared (lit. departed).

48. Janārdana (Hari) will be immediately pleased in his heart on him who will thus devotedly hear or make others hear this extremely auspicious and enchanting tale of Hari whose miraculous deeds are worth describing and knowledge about whom destroys all miseries.

49. What is there difficult to be achieved when the Lord of all blessings is pleased? Enough with those (pleasures) of insignificant value. The Supreme Lord, the Dweller in the hearts of all, of his own accord, confers summum bonum on those who are devoted to him without any ulterior motive.

50. Out of the stories of yore, the nectar-like narratives of the Lord put an end to Samsāra. Having drunk these through the ears (comparable to the cavity of folded hands) what person who has understood the essential purpose of life, can get satiated (with them). (If such there be), he must be other than a human being.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

(Diti's Conception)

Sri Śuka said:

1. Having listened to the story of Hari in his Boar-incarnation (for the purpose of the lift-up of the earth) as narrated by Maitreya, Vidura who had taken the vow (of hearing the episodes of Hari) was not much satisfied. Folding up his hands (in bowing), he asked again.

Vidura said:

2. "Oh great sage, we have heard it reported that the first dāitya (demon) Hiranyākṣa was killed by the same Hari who (in the boar-form) was the embodiment of sacrifice (Yajña).

3. Oh Brahman, for what purpose was there a confrontation between the demon-king (Hiranyākṣa) and him (Hari) who was lifting the earth up with the tip of his tusk."
Maitreya said:

4. Oh warrior (Vidura), yours is a good query, as the story about Hari's incarnation that you ask, cuts asunder the noose of death in the case of mortal beings.

5. By (hearing) which (story) as sung by the sage (Nārada), the male child of Uttānapāda (Dhruva) set his foot on the head of the god of Death and ascended to the place of Hari.

6. Even in this case (of the fight with Hīraṇyākṣa) I have heard this account related in ancient times by Brahma-deva, the god of gods, to the gods who enquired him (about it).

7-8. Oh Vidura, Diti, the daughter of Dakṣa, was desirous of a child and with her heart overcome with passion on one evening, desired (the company of) her husband Kaśyapa, the son of Marici, who was seated in meditation in his fire-worship hall after offering oblations of milk to the Supreme Man, the protector of sacrifices, in the evening.

Diti said:

9. "Oh learned, this god of love with a bow in his hand torments me, a poor thing, for your sake just as an elephant attacking a plantain tree crushes it.

10. May you be prosperous! Please confer your favour on me who am burning at the (sight of the) prosperity of my co-wives who are blest with children.

11. The fame of women who are greatly respected by husbands, spreads over the world, and of those to whom the husband like you, is really born as a son.

12. Formerly our father, venerable Dakṣa, who was affectionate to us his daughters, asked us separately, "Oh daughters, whom do you select as your husband?"

13. Having understood the inclination of us, his daughters, he, the progenitor of the race, gave you thirteen daughters who liked your nature.

14. Oh lotus-eyed auspicious sage, now satisfy my desire. Oh plentiful one, an entreaty of the distressed to the great one is never fruitless."

15. Oh valiant one, Kaśyapa replied in consolatory words to her who, being over-whelmed with passion, has become pitiable and was persuading him with many arguments (words).

16. "Oh timid one, here I am ready to comply with whatever you desire. Who would not fulfil the desire of her who helps accomplishment of the three purusārthas (goals) in life?

17. Just as the people cross the sea in ships, a married person giving shelter to persons of other āśramas, crosses the sea of misery.

18. Oh proud lady, they (the learned ones) call her (the wife) as the equal partner (lit. half the part) of the man who aspires after happiness. After entrusting the responsibility of his work to her, man can move about free from the fever of anxiety.

19. Depending on whom (the wife), we easily overcome the enemies in the form of senses which are difficult to be conquered by men of other (non-ghṛastha) āśramas, just as the lord of a fort (subdues) the enemies (due to his fortified position).

20. Oh mistress of the house, it is not possible for us to become so completely (obliging) like you, even (if we try) throughout our life (and in the next birth as well). Nor others who appreciate (your) virtues (can do so).

21. I shall, however, try to comply with your request (desire) for offspring. But please wait for a muhūrta so that they (the people) will not reproach me.

22. This is the most terrible of times when everything looks awful, as at this time goblins, the followers of Rudra wander about.

23. Oh pious lady it is in the evening that Lord Śiva, the creator of beings and the king of ghosts, moves about riding his bull and surrounded by his goblin-attendants.

24. Your brother-in-law god Rudra whose shining mass of hair (on head) became scattered and tawny by the dust raised by the whirl-wind in śmaśāna (the crematory ground) and whose pure gold-like body is smeared with ashes, witnesses (everything) with his three eyes (viz. the Sun, the Moon and the fire.) Hence there is no secrecy anywhere.

700. Kaśyapa’s wife Diti and Śiva’s wife Satī were the daughters of Dakṣa. Hence Kaśyapa and Śiva were brothers-in-law, and Śiva was also Diti’s brother-in-law.
25. In this world there is no one who is his relative or non-relative. Nobody is specially respectable or censurable to him. By performance of various vows, we desire to have the (prosperity and greatness of) Māyā which he has enjoyed and spurned (lit. kicked).

26. Thoughtful people who wish to tear off the veil of Māyā²⁰¹ praise his life which is spotless or unattached (to sensual pleasures). He has none equal or superior to him. He is the ultimate goal of the saintly people; yet he himself followed the vow of piśāca type of life.²⁰²

27. The unfortunate sinners decorate with garments, garlands, ornaments and pigments their body, (which is nothing but) the food of dogs, as if it (the body) were their Soul. They do not understand the motive behind his (Rudra’s) behaviour and laugh at him who is absorbed in (the meditation of) the Soul²⁰³.

28. God Brahmā and others obey the limits (laws) set by him. He is the cause of this universe. Māyā is his obedient servant. His behaviour is like a Piśāca. Oh (how) incomprehensible are the ways of the Almighty²⁰⁴.

Maitreya said:

29. Though she was thus admonished by the husband, she whose senses were thoroughly overwhelmed with passion, caught hold of the garment of the Brāhmaṇa Sage like a shameless prostitute.

²⁰¹ avidyā pājala: nescience, the film or coating over the eye (of knowledge)—VJ., VD.

²⁰³ VD. VJ. construes differently: without understanding the purpose of Rudra who is absorbed in Hari, that the garments etc. are to be offered to Lord Hari and hence I do not enjoy them.

²⁰⁴ VJ. interprets the verse as the glorification of Hari and not Rudra. Thus Rudra’s behaviour as piśāca is in obedience to Hari’s command. Incomprehensible are the ways of Hari the Perfect Being who makes gods like Rudra, the objects of worship by the world, obey him.
30. Knowing his wife’s importunity to that prohibited act, he then bowed down to the dictates (of the providence) and sat down with her in a secluded place.

31. He then took bath, controlled his breath and meditating silently over the pure, eternal Light, repeated internally the Gāyatrī (or the syllable Om).

32. Oh Vidura, even Diti, feeling ashamed of that sinful act, approached the Brāhmaṇa-Sage and with her face cast down, addressed him.

Diti said:

33. ‘Oh Brahman! May not the Lord of goblins (bhūtas) kill the child in my womb. I have committed a fault against Rudra, the Lord of bhūtas (beings).

34. Obeisance to the great god Śiva who is the remover of miseries (Rudra), who is irresistible, giver of blessings (to those who cherish desire and the highest bliss to the desireless devotees). He, though weaponless, takes up arms against the wicked, and is anger incarnate (at the time of destruction or pralaya).

35. May the Lord of Satī, my sister’s husband, the great god with abundance of grace, be gracious unto us women who are treated as worthy of compassion even by ruthless hunters.

Maitreya said:

36. Prajāpati (Kaśyapa) who has completed his evening rituals spoke to his wife who was trembling (greatly with fear) and who was desirous of securing the good of her progeny both here and hereafter.

Kaśyapa said:

37-38. On account of your impure mind, inauspiciousness of the (evening) time, disobedience to my order and complete disrespect for gods (attending Śiva), Oh evil woman, you will beget two wicked sons the worst ever born from wombs. Oh wrathful woman, they will frequently make the worlds and the protectors of the worlds, cry out (by their atrocious acts).

39-40. When the poor and innocent beings will be massacred and women are seized per force and the great souled ones are incensed, the venerable Lord of the universe, the creator of the world, will be enraged. He will come down as an incarnation and will kill them as Indra (the wielder of the Vajra) destroyed the mountains.

Diti said:

41. Oh Lord, I desire that both of my sons should meet death directly at the hands of the glorious Lord whose noble arms appear splendid by the disc (sudarśana). May not they be a victim of Brāhmaṇa wrath.

42. Not even the denizens of hell show favour to a person burnt by Brahma-daṇḍa (curse of a Brāhmaṇa) and the tormentor of beings, in whatever class of creatures he be born.

Katyāpā said:

43-44. On account of the sorrow and repentance for your misdeed, and your present consideration of what is proper and improper, and due to your great respect to Lord Viṣṇu and regard for Śiva and myself one son out of your son's son will be respected by saintly persons. They will sing of his pure fame which would be comparable to the glory of the venerable Lord.

45. In order to emulate his pious nature, good persons will purify their hearts (by imbibing virtues) like non-enmity (friendliness to all) and others, just as they purify gold of inferior carat by purificatory processes.

46. By his intellect (or devotion) not directed to anyone else except the Lord, the venerable self-perceiving Lord by whose grace this universe becomes propitious, and who is the indweller of the universe, will be pleased with him.

47. Verily, he would be the greatest devotee of unlimited vision and of great prowess and the greatest of the great. For, by his deep devotion, he will establish Lord Viṣṇu in his heart, purified by devotion, and give up the ego about his body etc.

48. He will be devoid of desire for worldly pleasures, of good nature, a mine of excellent qualities, delighted at the prosperity of others and pained at the sufferings of the afflicted. With no enemy in the world, he will relieve the sorrows of the world, just as the Moon removes the summer heat.

49. Your grandson will see both in his mind and outside before him, Hari of excellent virtues, of lotus-like eyes, who assumes the form according to the desire of his votaries, and who is a grace to his consort Lakṣmī and his face adorned with refulgent ear-rings.”

Maitreya said:

50. Hearing that her grandson would be a votary of the Lord, Diti was greatly delighted. Knowing that both of her sons would meet death at the hands of Kṛṣṇa, her heart was elated.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

(Sanaka and Others curse Jaya and Vijaya)

Maitreya said:

1. Being afraid of the destruction of her sons by Hari Diti bore (in her womb) the luster (sperm) of Prajāpati Kaśyapa for a hundred years—the lustre that subdued the lustre of others.

2. When by the power of the foetus, the world became void of light (due to the diminished light of the Sun etc.) and the gods in charge of protection of quarters were devoid of their power, they reported to Brahmā (the creator of the universe, the trouble due to) the spread of darkness in all directions.

Gods said:

3. Oh Lord, you know this darkness whereby we have been deeply agitated, because there is nothing unmanifested to you whose path (range of knowledge) is unaffected by Time.

4. Oh God of gods, the creator of the world, the crest-jewel of the protectors of the world, you know the mind of beings both superior and inferior to us.

---

705 Šurārdanaṁ: (i) The distress that would be caused to gods by her (prospective) sons—ŚR.

(ii) Being anxious lest Indra and gods should harm her sons—VR.

706 ātreśam etc.: Beings of the past and the future—VR., VD.
5*. We salute to you whose power is his special knowledge and who has assumed the body (as Brahman) through Mayâ and accepted rajas as a special attribute. We bow to you, the cause of the manifest-world (whose cause—the Supreme Soul—is unmanifested).

6-7. There is no defeat from anyone to those whose yuga is quite perfect (ripe) and who have conquered their breath, sense-organs and the mind and have been favoured by your grace and who, with unswerving devotion meditate upon you, the highest (God), the creator of all beings, whose form is composed of the causal relation, i.e. of cause and effect, and in whom the world is woven.

8. We bow to you the chief controller (or the chief vital breath) to whom all beings offer worship. Just as cows are bound down by cords, they (people) are restricted by his (your) word (i.e. Vedic injunctions).

9. Oh mighty one you who are of this nature, bring about good to us whose (routine) performance of activities is stopped due to darkness. You should look with extreme mercy upon us who are distressed.

10. Oh god, this is the semen of Kâśyapa which is deposited in Diti’s womb as embryo which grows enveloping all directions in darkness, like fire consuming fuel.

Maitraya said:

11. Oh long-armed Vidura, the venerable son of the Supreme Soul (Brahmâ) who was the object of the words of entreaty by gods, laughed loudly and replied to gods in sweet words.

Brahmâ said:

12. Sanaka and others, my mind-born sons before your creation are free from all worldly desires and they wander over the worlds through the sky.

* We pay obeisance to you whose knowledge is uninterrupted, who know the whole of this universe by Mayâ (the power of intelligence bestowed as a favour on you by Nârâyana) and who have assumed rajo-guna (the attribute rajas) by Nârâyana’s command (and still it does not come in the way of your knowledge), who are the cause of the manifest (universe) but whose cause, viz., the Brahman is unmanifest)—VJ.
13. Once upon a time, they went to Vaikuṇṭha, the region of Lord Viśṇu of pure Soul, Vaikuṇṭha which is respected by all.

14. All persons who dwell there have the form like Viśṇu. They propitiate Hari by the righteous path without any ulterior motive to accomplish.

15. There dwells the venerable First Puruṣa who can be known only through word (i.e. Vedānta). He assumes pure Śattvic form. The foremost one showers his grace on us, his devotees, to make us happy.

16. There is a park called the Final Beatitude which by its wish-yielding trees and by its beautiful blossoms of flowers etc. throughout all seasons, shines like veritable Mokṣa (Final Liberation) itself.

17. Where (in the Vaikuṇṭha region) devotees of Viṣṇu along with their beautiful wives in the aerial cars, disregard the fragrant wind even though their minds are distracted by the fragrance of the blossoming, honey-dripping flowers of creepers in the spring near water and sing of the deeds of the Lord which purify the sins of the world.

18. There the loud confusing cries of birds like pigeons, cuckoos, cranes, cakravāka, (the ruddy goose), cātakas, swans, parrots, tittiris and peacocks stop for a while when the chief black-bee (in Viṣṇu’s vanamālā) hums loudly as if singing the story of Hari.\(^707\)

19. There when the fragrance of Tulasī is appreciated by Viṣṇu by wearing (as an ornament) the garland of Tulasī, even flowering plants like the Mandara, the Kunda, the Kurava, the night-lotus, the Arṇa, the Punnāga, the Nāga-kesara, the Bakula, the lotus and the Pārijāta, in their goodness of heart, paid respects to the penance of Tulasī.

20. It (the Vaikuṇṭha) is crowded with aerial cars (made of) jewels like Vaidūrya (Lapis lazuli), emerald (and of) gold which can be seen only by those that bow to Hari’s feet. Here, damsels of big hips and beautifully smiling faces cannot, \(^707\). VD. explains that the chief bee’s humming which sounds like ‘Hari, Hari’ is regarded as ‘Hari Kathā’. This verse emphasizes that even birds in Vaikuṇṭha-Park are also Viṣṇu’s devotees.

with their beguiling smiles and other allurements, excite passion in those devotees whose minds are fixed on Kṛṣṇa.

21. The goddess of Wealth (Lakṣmi) of beautiful form, for whose favour others are striving, stays (permanently) in Hari’s residence giving up her noxious quality (of fickleness). With her lotuslike feet jingling with anklets and arms freely dangling with a lotus in hand in a sportive manner, she (i.e. her reflection) in the crystal walls chased with gold, appears as if dusting (the house with lotus).

22. Oh gods, where (in Vaikuṇṭha), in her own garden, the goddess Lakṣmi attended upon by her maid-servants, was worshipping the Lord with Tulasī petals, saw her face with beautiful locks of hair and prominent nose reflected in the ponds of pure nectarlike waters and with sloping bank (ghāṣ) of corals, felt that it was kissed by her Supreme Lord.

23. To which (Vaikuṇṭha) do not reach those who listen to the mind-spoiling evil stories pertaining to topics other than the deeds of creation etc. of Hari, the destroyer of sins. Alas! These stories (on subjects concerning Artha and Kāma) when heard by unfortunate people, deprive (the hearers) of all good merits and throw them in dark hells from which there is no relief.

24. Birth in the human species is aspired after even by us (as) it is possible to gain the knowledge (i.e. realization of Brahman or the Truth along with the performance of Dharma, in it. Those who (having thus got birth as a man) do not propitiate the venerable Lord, are alas, deluded by your Māyā of very wide expanse.

25. There (to Vaikuṇṭha, above our region) go these (men) who by the service of the greatest among gods, have kept off Yama, the god of death, (or who are above the discipline of Yama, Niyama etc.)\(^\text{708}\) and who being of enviable character are (spiritually) above us. While mutually discussing about the supremely glorious Lord, their mind, being overwhelmed with intense love and devotion, the hair stand on end on their bodies and tears flow from their eyes.

26. The sages were greatly overjoyed when, by their power of eightfold Yoga, they reached Vaikuṇṭha which they had not seen before, and which, being presided over by the Lord of the universe, was adorable to all the worlds, and which was shining with the lustre of various heavenly cars of great gods.

27. Having crossed the six enclosures without being prevented or attracted by the wonderful sights thereof, the sages saw, at the seventh, a pair of gods of the same age, each armed with a mace gorgeously dressed and wearing extremely valuable armlets, ear-rings and diadems. 709

28. Each of them wore around his neck and between their four bluish arms, a garland of forest-flowers (Vanamāla) about which swarmed the intoxicated bees, and whose face with best brows, wide nostrils and red eyes, appeared excited (angry).

29. While these two were looking on, the sages entered without asking for permission, the (seventh) gate as (they did) through the (previous) gates the panels of which were made of diamonds chased with gold. They go everywhere without any obstruction as they are free from fear due to their equality of outlook to all (or due to their sight being fixed on the Soul or the Lord).

30. The two (gods) whose nature was contrary to that of the Lord, looked at those four nude boy-sages who, despite their age, looked five years old and had realized the real nature of the Soul. Laughing (disrespectfully) at their prowess, they prevented (the sages) both by their cane (and command) even though the sages should not have been treated so.

31. When the most venerable sages were disallowed by Hari’s door-keepers, while the gods were looking on, they (sages) whose eyes were suddenly overwhelmed with some anger due to their disappointment of seeing their most beloved God, spoke (as follows):

709. This poetic description is an amalgamation of all earlier pada concepts of the RV. 1.12.20; 10.90.3 and those of Brāhmaṇa and Upaniṣadic concepts regarding the 'highest place'. For the evolution of this Vaikuṇṭha concept see B.Bhattacharya—Philosophy of Bh. P., Vol.1, pp. 154-164.
The sages said:

32. "What a partial nature of you both who dwell here among persons who attain to this region by rendering the highest service to God and who possess the same qualities (e.g. impartiality) as of the Lord! Is there any suspicious character here resembling you in crookedness of mind (and hence worth apprehending) by you, when the Supreme Man is so very tranquil and free from all hostilities.

33.* For learned men do not see any difference here in the Lord (Viṣṇu) in whose belly lies the whole (universe). They see the (individual) Soul in the Supreme Soul like the space (in a pot) in (the bigger space of) the sky. You possess the characteristics of gods.\[710\] What (cause) has arisen which makes you suspect such a stomach-tearing fear to Hari?

34. So we consider what can be done for the great welfare of you two stupid servants of the Supreme Lord of Vaikuṇṭha for this impropriety of making differences and discriminations even here. You go from this place (Vaikuṇṭha) to those sinful worlds where the three enemies (Lust, Anger and Avarice) dominate."

35. Having understood the terrible (implication of their) utterance and realizing the impossibility of protection from the Brähmaṇa's punishment with the help of missiles, the two servants of Hari immediately prostrated themselves before them touching their feet as (they knew that even) Hari entertains great awe for them (Brähmaṇas).

36. "May the punishment inflicted upon us, sinners, by your Venerable Selves be implemented. It will absolve us completely of our violence of even God's order. But we pray by the slight repentance awakened in us by your favour, may not the delusion erasing the memory of the Lord affect us who may go down to lower births for this offence."

* VR. explains: The Lord contains the whole universe in his belly and difference regarding credentials of anyone entering it does not exist. Have you checked the universe from entry into the Lord's stomach? The yogins see the Individual Soul in (i.e. inseparably dependent on) the Supreme Soul as the space (ākāśa) in a pot (ghaṭa) is inseparably connected with the limitless space (or the sky).

710. sura-liṅgainah—You are really daityas, though your outward appearance is like gods.
37. At that time, knowing the offence given to the saints this way by his servants, Lord Padmanābha (Viṣṇu), the delight of the noble ones, along with Lakṣmī went there on foot which are sought after by Paramahamsas and great sages.

38. They saw him who was the ultimate object—the Brahman—to be realized in meditation, coming within the range of their sight. His men (attendants) promptly brought to him the usual articles (e.g. the umbrella, Chowries, at the time of going). From the pearl-fringes of his moonlike white umbrella were dripping drops of water as they (the hanging pearl-laces) were gently moving in the enjoyable breeze caused by the two Chowries (cāmaras) which were beautiful like swans.

39. (They saw him) whose extremely beautiful face was showing grace to all (the sages and the door-keepers); who is the home of (all) desirable qualities; who was (as if) touching the interior of hearts by his affectionate glances and who with the resplendent Lakṣmī on his blue broad chest was heightening the beauty of his abode (Vaikuṇṭha) situated above the heavens like a crest-jewel.

40. (They saw him) wearing a shining girdle round the yellow garment covering his big hips, and with his Vanamālā (hovered round) by humming black-bees, and who wore beautiful bracelets on his wrists, and who rested one hand on Gāruḍa's shoulder and who was sportively waving a lotus with another hand.

41. (They saw him) whose face was beautiful due to his prominent nose, and cheeks suitable to grace the ear-rings shaped like Makaras, surpassing the lightning in brilliance; whose diadem was set with jewels and who was wearing round his neck the Kaustubha jewel and an attractive and precious necklace hanging between his big arms.

42. His devotees, with their intelligence, judged that the pride of Lakṣmī about her being possessed of the highest beauty was subdued in the presence of the Lord. Having seen the Supreme Lord assuming bodily form for me, Śiva and you (Sanatkumāras), they bowed to him with their heads but their eyes were never satisfied by gazing at him.

43. When they breathed, the air fragrant with the Tulasi and the filaments of the lotus of the feet of the lotus-eyed Lord entered through their nostrils, and caused excitement in the minds and bodies of the sages who have experienced the permanent—everlasting—bliss (of Brahman).

44. Seeing his face charming like the interior of a blue lotus and his Kunda-flower-like smile on his very beautiful lips, they felt that their desires were fulfilled. Again, when they saw his pair of feet with ruby-like nails, they meditated upon him.

45. They eulogised Viṣṇu who is the object of meditation for men who seek liberation by the Yoga-process in this world, and who showed the most venerable Purusa-form giving delight to the eyes and who is possessed of his inherent eight siddhis which are not accessible to others.

Kumāras said:

46. Oh Infinite One, you, though present in hearts of the sinners (non-devotees), are unmanifested to them, but not so to us. But it is just today that you are visible to our eyes. You entered our hearts by the way of the ears when your mystery was explained to us by our father who is born of you.

47. Oh venerable Lord, we recognize you to be that Supreme Paramātman who every moment generate (inspire) love in these devotees by means of the attribute Sattva—Paramātman whom passionless sages, whose knot of I-ness (āhaṁkāra) is severed, know in their hearts by intense Bhakti-yoga (and who are) understood by them through your grace.

48. Oh Lord! Those blessed ones who have resorted to your feet and have tasted the flavour of episodes about you whose glory is highly praiseworthy and purifying, do not count (attach much value to) Mokṣa, your maximum grace. Will they attach any value to other attainments (such as Indra-hood) which are affected with terror at the bent of your brows?

49. May we at will be born even in hells by our sins, if our hearts sincerely rejoice at your feet like black bees (in lotus), and if our words, like Tulasi, get their charm (beauty) from your feet, and if our ears (passage in the ear) is filled with (the description) of your (host of innumerable) attributes.

50. Oh Lord of immense glory! Our eyes have to our best satisfaction obtained the bliss of looking at this form which you manifested. You who are never visible to persons with uncontrolled senses have appeared to us this way. Oh glorious Lord, we pay obeisance to you (who are of this nature.)

CHAPTER SIXTEEN
(The Fall of Jaya and Vijaya)

Brahmā said

1. While the sages who were by nature Bhakti-yogis were singing his eulogy, the All-powerful Lord whose abode was in Vaikuṇṭha, received them cheerfully and spoke as follows:

The Lord said:

2-3. Oh sages, as these two servants of mine, Jaya and Vijaya, disregarding me, have gravely insulted you and slighted gods, I have approved of the punishment meted out to them by you who perform penance for me.

4. I, therefore, apologize to you today, for Brāhmaṇa is my highest deity. I regard that the offence given to you by my servants is as good as done by me.

5. When a servant has committed an offence, the world takes the name of the master. That blame spoils the reputation of the master as white leprosy dispigments the skin.

6. I am that Vaikuṇṭha by hearing whose nectarlike, pure glory, the world down to Cāndāla is instantly sanctified. I who have obtained such excellent purifying reputation from honourable persons like you, would sever even my own arms if they be of a hostile nature to you.

7. By serving whom (Brāhmaṇas) I have got even the dust on my lotus-like feet so sanctifying as to purge the whole world of all impurities and have got such a good nature established in me that the goddess Lakṣmī, for the favour of whose passing glance others (i.e. gods like Brahmā etc.) observe rules (of penance), does not leave me even though I am not attached to her.
8. I do not enjoy with that much relish the sacrificial oblations offered by a performer of sacrifice as I do the ghee-dripping food through the mouth of a Brāhmaṇa who has offered all the fruits of his actions to me and who eats every morsel of that food with satisfaction.

9*. Who will not tolerate the Brāhmaṇas the dust of whose holy feet I bear on my crowns (in all my incarnations) though I am endowed with the power of the infinite and un-restrained yoga-māyā and though the water used for washing my feet in worship instantly sanctifies the world including god Śiva (who bears the Moon as an ornament on the forehead).

10. Brāhmaṇas, milk-yielding cows and protection-less beings are my own person (body). Those who look upon them as different from me, get themselves torn with rage by the bills of vulture-like servants of Yama who is appointed for dispensation of punishment—servants whose anger is like serpents.

11. I am won over by them who, looking upon even harsh-speaking Brāhmaṇas as me (Hari) address and honour them with a joyous heart, and with their lotus-like faces beaming over (lit. sprinkled) with nectar-like (sweet) smiles, praise them in affectionate terms like a (loving) son unto (his angry) father (or an affectionate father to his excited son) or as I have done (to Bhṛgu or to you).

12. It will be a favour to me if these two servants who did not understand the intention of their Lord (me) should again return to my presence after immediately undergoing the lower stage for insulting you. May the banishment of the servants terminate before long.711

*VC construes differently: 'It is due to my bearing the dust of the holy feet of Brāhmaṇas that I became possessed of the excellence of the Yoga-māyā, etc.

711. Yat . . . vivāraḥ: (i) May their special residence with me (as master and servant) be restored soon—Śr., VC.

(ii) VR.: It is my grace due to which these servants, undergoing the punishment for their misdemeanour will return to me within a short period.

(iii) Had it not been my grace, they would never escape the Asura-yoni due to Brahmaical curse. Their early return after completion of their term in Asura-life is due to my favour. The word hi denotes the consent of Sanaka and other sages for this way out of the curse.
Brahmā said:

13. At that time, the mind of those sages which was over-whelmed with (the poisonous snake bite in the from of) rage was not satisfied even though they tasted (i.e. heard the sweetness of) the Lord’s attractive and brilliant speech composed of a stream of Mantras—speech similar to river Sarasvatī which is lovely, heavenly, suitable to the assembly of sages.

14. Giving ear with close attention to the true but beautiful speech which was brief yet difficult to comprehend due to its weighty import, unfathomable intention and deep significance, they did not understand what he wished to do, despite their consideration.

15. The highly delighted Brāhmaṇas with hair standing on their ends (on their skin) folded their hands and addressed to him who had manifested the highest glory of his supreme authority by his yoga-māya.

The sages said:

16. Oh god, we do not understand your implication when you, the Supreme Lord say (to us), ‘You have done me a favour! (lit. favour has been done to me by you).

17. It is reported that to you, the protector of Brāhmaṇas, Brāhmaṇas are the supreme deity. But you, the supreme Lord, are both the soul and the God unto the Brāhmaṇas who are adorable to gods.

18. You are the source of eternal Dharma. It is protected by your forms. You are regarded as the highest fruit (of Dharma and hence) deserve to be kept secret (—a fruit not perishable like the attainment of heaven) and you are changeless and imperishable.

19. How is it conceivable that Your honour is to be favoured by others—Your Honour by whose grace the Yogins become unattached (to the world) and easily transgress (the samsāra—cycle of birth and) death.

20* The Goddess Lakṣmi, the dust on whose feet is applied to their heads by others desirous of attaining different Purusārthas, appears to crave for the place of the black-bee chief whose dwelling is in fresh Tulasī garland offered (in worship) to your feet by the blessed ones. Hence verily she serves you everywhere and then.

21. You who are highly attached to your great devotees, do not show much regard to goddess Lakṣmi who waits upon you by her pious acts of worship (which nobody else can perform. You are the receptacle of all excellences\textsuperscript{711a}. Such as you are, are you purified by the dust on the road sanctified by the feet of the Brāhmaṇas and by the mark of Śri Vatsa? Do these add to your adornments?

22. Oh Triyuga!\textsuperscript{712} It is really for the sake of Brāhmaṇas and gods that you, the Supreme Lord, Dharma incarnate, have protected this world of movables and immovables by your three feet (viz. Tapas—penance, Śauca—purity, and Dayā—mercy). By means of Sattva, your body which favours us with blessings,\textsuperscript{713} you have done away with the attributes rajas and tamas which obstruct Dharma.

23. Oh God, if you do not protect by sweet words and proper honour, the race of the best of Brāhmaṇas who deserve specially your protection, then your own auspicious path (of Vedas) will be lost. For people will regard that behaviour of the most excellent (person like you) as the standard (to follow).

24. That (loss of Vedic path) is not at all desired by you. You are an ocean of the attribute of Sattva. You who have destroyed your adversaries by your powers, desire to achieve the good of the world. You are the ruler of the three worlds and protector of the universe. By such bowing (to the Brāhmaṇas) your splendour does not diminish. It is for the guidance of the world.

25. Oh Supreme Lord, we shall sincerely approve of \textsuperscript{711a} You are absolutely pure as you are the receptacle of all attributes worth possessing. Do the dust on streets traversed by Brāhmaṇas and the Śri Vatsa mark (left by the kick of Bhrigu) sanctify you? Or do you regard them as ornaments?—ŚR.

\textsuperscript{712} tri-yuga—(i) He who manifests himself as avatāra in three-yuga period.

(ii) One who possesses six excellences viz., knowledge, power etc. —the characteristics of bhagavān—ŚR., VR., VC., etc.

\textsuperscript{713} varadāyā—By your body (avatāra) called Kapila—VJ.
whatever punishment or respectful treatment your honour will mete out to both of these. Or you may inflict suitable punishment on us who have pronounced the curse on those innocent door-keepers.

The Lord said:

26. "Oh Brähmanas, please note that this curse of yours was ordained by me. These two will immediately take birth as non-heavenly beings (Daityas). Having developed their yoga by concentration intensified by wrath, both these will soon return to me."

Brahmā said:

27-28. "Then the sages, having seen Viṣṇu, the receptacle of delight to the eyes, and his abode, the self-illuminating Vaikuṇṭha, circumambulated the Lord, bowed down to him. Taking leave of him, they returned, full of joy, praising the glory of Viṣṇu.

29. Lord Viṣṇu said to his servants, "You go (now). Do not be afraid. May you be happy. Though I am competent to do so, I do not wish to counteract the power of Brähmanas, as it is my will.

30. Formerly this has been ordained by enraged Lakṣmi whom you prevented at the door from entering as I was then absorbed in Yogic sleep.

31. Within a short period of time, you will return to my presence after undergoing the curse of Brahmancial insult by means of your concentration in me due to anger."

32. Having ordered the door-keepers thus, Lord Viṣṇu entered into his abode which appeared beautiful by a row of heavenly cars and which was endowed with splendour excelling all.²¹⁴

33. Those two prominent gods (Jaya and Vijaya) whose glory and pride deserted them due to the irrevocable Brahmancial curse, fell down from Vaikuṇṭha (Hari's abode).

²¹⁴. Which surpassed everything else in beauty as it was meant for goddess Lakṣmī—VB.

Or, He entered his mansion along with Lakṣmī who excelled all—VR.
34. Oh children (Gods), while they were thus falling down from the region of Vaikuṇṭha, there was a loud cry expressing grief (Alas! Alas!) from great persons in heavenly cars.

35. And those very prominent attendants of Hari have now entered the powerful lustre (semen) of Kāśyapa deposited in the womb of Diti.

36. It is by the lustre of the twin-Asuras that your glory has been eclipsed. And Lord Viṣṇu himself wills it.

37. The Lord (Viṣṇu), the supreme ruler of the three worlds, the First Being, the cause of the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe, whose Yoga-māyā cannot be transgressed by masters of Yoga, will do what is good to us. Of what use (effect) is our thought (brooding) in that matter?

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

(The Birth of Hiranyakṣa and Hiranyakasipu—Hiranyakṣa’s Victories)

Maitreya said:

1. Having heard the cause as explained by the Self-born god (Brahmā), all the gods, with their fear dispelled, returned to Svarga.

2. On account of her husband’s prediction, Diti was apprehensive of the troubles (to be caused) by her progeny. At the end of hundred years she gave birth to male-twins.

3. At the time of their birth, there were many evil portents boding terrible calamities to the world, appearing in the heavens, on the earth, and in the sky.

4. The earth, along with mountains, quaked violently everywhere. All the directions were ablaze. Meteors and thunders showered down. Comets foreboding distress appeared (in the sky).

715. apāya-pariṣankīṁ—Afraid of harm to her children by Hari—VJ.
5. An extremely biting stormy wind frequently roaring (through the sky) blew with its army of whirlwinds, uprooting big trees, and raising its banner of dust (aloft).

6. When stars (and luminaries) in the sky disappeared, being covered by dark clouds roaring with laughter in the form of lightnings, not a single spot could be seen, due to surging darkness.

7. The ocean with its tidal waves and its interior agitated (by aquatic animals), roared as if depressed in spirits. Rivers as well as wells and tanks with lotuses withering there-in, were perturbed.

8. There were frequent misty halos round the Sun and the Moon eclipsed by Rāhu. There were roars of thunders without clouds—deep sound like rattling of chariots came out from the mountain caves.

9. In villages female jackals vomited terrible fire from their mouths, and howled out ominously, along with cries of he-jackals and hooting of owls.

10. Here and there dogs gave out different types of barking sounds with their neck raised, as if in singing or crying.

11. Oh Vidura, herds of maddened donkeys ran about kicking the surface of the earth with their hard hoofs and brayings vehemently.

12. Birds being terrified by the donkeys, screamed out and flew out of their nests. Beasts which were in the jungle and in their pens, excreted dung and urine.

13. Cows were frightened and blood issued from their udders. The clouds showered pus. The idols of gods shed tears. Trees were uprooted though there was no wind.

14. Evil planets (like the Mars) crossed and passed over auspicious planets, and the constellations or stars, and reverting in a crooked course, they fought with each other.

15. Seeing such other terrible omens, people, with the exception of Brahmā’s sons (like Sanat Kumāra), being ignorant of the real implication of these portents, were terrified, and thought that the (time of the) destruction of the universe had come.

16. Those two primitive Daityas, with their bodies hard as rock, grew up fast like big mountains, exhibiting their inborn prowess.

17. They stood touching the heavens with the crest of their gold crowns, embracing all the directions by their arms adorned with brilliant armlets, shaking the earth at every step, surpassing the Sun’s lustre by the brilliance of the girdle round their waist.

18. The Prajāpati (Kāśyapa) gave them names. Of the twins who was first born of his body was known as Hiraṇyakaśipu and people call (the other) Hiraṇyākṣa, whom she (Diti) gave birth first*.

19. Hiraṇyakaśipu had no fear of death by the boon of Brahmā. He became arrogant. He subdued by the power of his arms, the worlds along with their protectors.

20. He loved his younger brother Hiraṇyākṣa who wished to please him (Hiraṇyakaśipu). Spoiling for fight every day, he took a mace in his hand, and went to heaven seeking war.

21-22. When gods saw him advancing with irresistible speed, making the tinkling sound of his gold anklets, and wearing the Vaijayanti garland\(^{716}\), shouldering his big mace, proudly confident of his physical and mental powers, and of the boons (conferred by Brahmā), uncontestable and undeterred, they concealed themselves like serpents afraid of Garuḍa.

23. When the king of Daityas saw that Indra along with all the gods had verily hid himself at the sight of his terrible might, and was not excited\(^{717}\), he roared loudly.

24. Returning thence (from Svarga) and with a desire to sport, (Hiraṇyākṣa) of immense might, dived into the unfaathomable, terribly roaring ocean, like an intoxicated elephant.

25. When he entered the ocean, the soldiers of Varuṇa, viz. all the aquatic animals, lost their morale. Though they

* When twins are born, the first child that is born is regarded as the younger, for the elder child gets a position behind it in the womb. This concept underlies the above verse.

716. \textit{Vaijayanti}—(i) A long necklace or garland of eight kinds of pearls—VD.
(ii) A four-fold garland of flowers—VJ.
717. v.l. \textit{kliṅga}—the effeminate Indra and the gods etc.
were not (physically) struck down (by him), they got terrified, and overwhelmed by his splendour, they ran away to a long distance.

26. Oh child, for many years he (Hiraṇyākṣa) of monstrous strength, wandered through the ocean often beating down with his mace of black iron, huge waves which were frequently swelled by his heavy breath. (Finally) he arrived at Viśbhāvarī, the capital of Varuṇa.

27. Seeing there Varuṇa, the protector of the Asura region, and the lord of aquatic animals, he smiled, and ridiculing him with a bow like a mean person, he spoke, 'Your imperial majesty, be pleased to give me a fight'.

28. 'Oh Lord, you are the protector of the world, a great sovereign of wide reputation. You are the subduer of the valour of warriors who consider themselves haughty and valiant. You have formerly performed the Rājasūya sacrifice after conquering all the Daityas and Dānavas in the world.'

29. The glorious lord of waters who was thus bitterly derided by the enemy who was puffed up with excessive arrogance, controlled, by force of his reason, his anger which was thus provoked. He spoke out, 'Oh (valiant warrior), we have now grown tranquil.

30. Oh leader of Asuras, I do not see any other person except the Primeval Man who can satisfy in fight a pastmaster in the science of war like you. Go to him whom high-minded warriors like you eulogize.

31. He takes incarnations for putting down wicked persons like you, and for favouring the good, with his grace. You approach that warrior. You will (then) be rid of your pride and will lie (slain) in the bed of warriors (battlefield) surrounded by dogs.'

718. Or the mace which was firmly tied down with the rope of mūrūd grass—ŚR.
CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

(Hiranyaksha's Fight with Varaha)

Maitreya said:

1. Having thus heard the speech of the Lord of Waters (Varuna), the haughty and ferocious (Hiranyaksha) just ignored it. Having learnt from Narada the arrival of Hari, Oh Vidura, he hurriedly rushed into Rasatala.\(^{719}\)

2. He saw there Hari (conqueror of all) who was holding the earth, and was lifting it up with the tip of his tusks, and surpassing his (Hiranyaksha's) splendour by his reddish eyes. He laughed out saying, "Oh this is an amphibious beast."\(^{720}\)

3. He spoke to him, "Come here, Oh fool; leave the earth. This has been given to us, the dwellers of Rasatala by the creator of the universe (otherwise it would not have come down to us). Oh you meanest of gods who have assumed the form of a boar, you cannot get away with the earth safely in my presence."\(^{721}\)

4. Are you employed by our enemies for destroying us? You kill Asuras by Mâyâ and thus conquer them by fraudulent means. Oh dunce, I shall wipe out the sorrows of my friends by killing you, whose strength lies in \textit{yoga-mâyā}, but have little personal bravery.\(^{722}\)

\(^{719}\) saṃviviośā—dived forth for Rasatala with his eyes closed —VJ.

\(^{720}\) ŚR. states that this apparently provocative speech is the praise of Nārāyaṇa as Hiranyaksha was his attendant in his previous birth. Hence \textit{Vana . . . mṛghāḥ}. He is the Nārāyaṇa who sleeps on waters, and who is sought after by Yogis or who hunts after the wicked for killing—ŚR.

\(^{721}\) Eulogistic interpretation: Oh omniscient one (\textit{ājña}) to whom all gods are inferior, while I am witnessing you setting me at naught, carry away the earth. There is no doubt that you will acquire our prosperous kingdom. But as a favour to us, kindly leave it. You have assumed this boar form as a pastime (\textit{līlā})—ŚR., VR.

\(^{722}\) Eulogistic interpretation: (i) For the sake of Liberation, you are resorted to by our halfbrothers (gods and sages). By your Māyā—power you kill the Asuras and thus kill them from afar (yourself standing aloof). You are the maintainer of the ignorant. You are so powerful by your \textit{yoga-mâyā} that the prowess of others is insignificant before you. I shall establish you in my heart (like a \\textit{Yogin}) and put an end to the miseries of my friends.—ŚR.
5. When you lie dead with your head shattered by the mace (gadā) hurled by my arms, the gods and sages who worship you with offerings, being uprooted, will be no more.\textsuperscript{723}

6. Though afflicted by the Tomara—(a javelin) like piercing (sharp) words of the enemy, he put up with that (mental) torment,\textsuperscript{724} when he found that the earth on the tip of his tusk was frightened, and he came out of water like a big he-elephant along with the she-elephant when it is attacked by a crocodile.

7. Just as a crocodile pursues an elephant getting out of water, the Demon with hair of gold, of terrible tusks and of thundering voice, followed him who was rising out of water and roared, "Is there anything reproachful to the shameless wicked?"\textsuperscript{725}

8. He (Varāha) placed the earth on the water within the range of perception, and infused in it his power of supporting (mountains etc.). Despite the watching of the enemy (Hiranyākṣa), he was praised by Brahmā and was showered over with flowers by gods.\textsuperscript{726}

(ii) Are you resorted to by our enemies, viz. Sanaka etc. and gods for Mokṣa (as one attains Mokṣa by worshipping the Lord in this world)? No. They cannot, as they are inimical to us, your devotees. I am not your enemy. That you kill Asuras is just to deceive the people. As a matter of fact you give them sānyāsa Mukti, for Asura means Yogi. You kill only the sensual ones. You indirectly vanquish the Asuras. I shall establish you in my heart—you who give knowledge to the ignorant. And by concentrating on you, I along with my family will get liberated—VB.

723. When you will be standing at ease with your head unhurt even by the mace struck by our arms, your new devotees who will worship you with offerings and your old devotees, viz. gods and sages, will not be without roots, i.e. will stay firmly established—SR.

724. (i) Seeing the torment caused to Brahmā and others who put a superficial interpretation on the speech of Hiranyākṣa—SR.

(ii) He tolerated the apparent hatred in the sharp words piercing like a Tomara (a javelin) as he appreciated Hiranyākṣa's inner devotion. —VJ.

725. (i) Out of compassion for the frightened earth some flight is not reproachful.—SR.

(ii) Fie on us (wicked ones) who pursue the Varāha who lifts the earth for the good of the world. What shameful act would shamelessly selfish persons like me not do?—SR.

726. v.1. pīśvarjām prastānaḥ—(i) He was praised by gods and sons of Brahmā—SR. (ii) He was eulogised by gods who were the flower-like progeny of Brahmā—VD.
9. He (the Varāha), feigning extreme wrathfulness, and with a (derisive) laughter, spoke to him (the demon) who was pursuing him with a big mace, and had put on gold ornaments and a wonderful armour of gold, and was constantly wounding him to the quick with harsh words.

_The Lord said:_

10. Oh Hīranyākṣa, it is true that we are wild beasts in the jungle. I am in search of domestic lions (dogs) like you. Oh evil fellow, warriors do not care for the bragging of yours who are bound down by the cords (noose) of death.

11*. Here we are, the usurpers of the deposit of the denizens of Rasātala. We are shameless and are made to run away by your mace. (Though unable), we have to take a stand with great difficulty on the battlefield, as stay we must. Where can we go after provoking enmity with the powerful?

12. You are verily the chief of the leaders of foot-soldiers. Quickly and without hesitation try to defeat us. Wipe out the tears of your relatives by defeating us. He who does not fulfill his vow is not fit for society.

_Maitreya said:_

13. He who was thus censured and ridiculed by the Lord in anger, grew extremely angry like a big serpent forced to play.

14. Being enraged, breathing heavily and with senses agitating in wrath, the Dāitya rushing vehemently at Hari, struck him with his mace.

15. Just as a Yogi evades the god of death, the Lord, moving aside, parried the blow of the mace aimed at his chest by the enemy.

* VR. takes these statements as interrogatives implying negative replies: We take away the earth on which you place your foot (i.e. is your support). But is it the property of the dwellers of Rasātala? (No, it is not their personal property). Are we the shameless who are put to flight by you with a mace? (No. We shall make you flee), etc.

VB. interprets differently: We take away the deposit (the earth), as masters do not steal it away like thieves. Those who fly away without putting up a fight and simply boast are shameless. But a person with a sense of shame will not fight with a servant (like you in previous birth) etc.
16. Being enraged, Hari rushed at him who had taken his mace again and was brandishing it, constantly biting his lower lip in anger.

17. Oh gentle Vidura, the Lord then struck the enemy on his right brow with his mace. But he, a pastmaster in mace fight, returned the blow.

18. In this way, the extremely enraged Hari and Hiraṇyākṣa began to strike each other with their heavy maces for defeating the other.

19. When the combatants competed with each other, exchanging heavy blows with their massive maces, and their rage went ablazing at the smell of the blood flowing from their bodies, and began to move in wonderful ways with an ambition for victory, their fight appeared like that of two powerful bulls fighting for a cow, on the earth.

20. Oh Vidura, Brahmā surrounded by sages arrived there to see the fight of the combatants aspiring for the earth-combat of the Dāitya (Hiraṇyākṣa) and the great (Supreme) Soul who by his Māyā assumed the boar form, the limbs of which are sacrifices.

21. Seeing that the Dāitya who had possessed valour and pride and had lost all fear, offered resistance, and was of irresistible prowess, Lord Brahmā, the leader of thousands of sages, spoke to the Primitive Boar, Nārāyaṇa.

Brahmā said:

22-23. Oh God, this is (the demon) who does wrong, inspires fear and does evil to gods, Brāhmaṇas, Kāmadhenus (wish-yielding cows), and innocent beings who resort to your feet. This Asura has obtained boons from me. He is in search of a competent fighter but has found none. He roams over the world troubling the people.

24. Oh God, do not play with him as a child does with an enraged serpent—him who is master of Māyā, haughty, uncontrolled and the wicked-most.

25. Oh Acyuta, so long as this terrible (Hiraṇyākṣa) does not grow terrible and unconquerable by resorting to his (Āsuri) Māyā at his favourable time, kill him.

26. Oh Lord, this most terrible even-tide (evening-time) which is destructive of the world, is approaching. Oh the Soul of all, bring victory to gods before that time.

27. Now this auspicious period, called Abhijit, which lasts for two mukūrtas has arrived. At least for the good of your friends, the gods, quickly finish with this unconquerable Daitya.

28. Fortunately this (Hiranyakṣa), of his own accord has come to meet death ordained for him. Heroically kill him in the battle, and place (establish) the people in happiness.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

(Varāha kills Hiranyakṣa)

Maitreya said:

1. Having heard Brahmadeva’s sincere and nectarlike speech, and having laughed (at Brahmā’s naivete to advise astrologically favourable moment to the Lord himself whose form is time, he accepted his (prayer) with a side-glance implying affection.

2. Then that Ādi-Varāha who was born from Brahmā’s nostrils, jumped at the enemy who was fearlessly moving in front of him, and struck the Asura on his chin by his mace.

3. A miracle happened. That (Lord’s) mace struck down by his (Asura’s) mace fell down rolling from the Lord’s hand and the Asura’s valour appeared splendid.

4. Then although he (the Asura) got an opportunity, he did not strike the Lord who was weaponless. He respected the prescribed code of conduct, in the battle enraging Hari.

5. When there was a loud uproar at that snatching away of the mace, the All-pervading Lord appreciated the (Asura’s) righteous conduct, and remembered (mentally commissioned) his Sudarśana-disc (cakra).

6. ‘May you be prosperous,’ ‘kill him’. Such were the various shouts (utterances) all around in the sky from the celestial beings who were ignorant of his prowess, when he with his eager Sudarśana was attacked in close quarters by his chief attendant (now born as) the vile son of Diti.

7. Observing the lotus-eyed Lord standing before him with the Sudarśana-disc (ready for discharge) in his hand, he (the Asura) with his senses throbbing with rage, and breathing heavily, bit his lip in rage.

8. He (the Asura) of fearful tusks, stared at him with glaring eyes as if to burn him down, and springing upon him, assaulted him with his mace, shouting, 'You are killed'.

9. Oh pious Vidura! while the enemy was just looking agape, the Lord, as the sacrifice in the Boar form, easily kicked with his left foot the mace which came with the velocity of a stormy wind.

10. And (the Varāha) said, "Take up the weapon. As you wish to conquer, try (again)". When addressed thus, he (the Asura) struck again, and roared lustily.

11. Seeing the mace coming towards him, the Lord stood firm and easily caught hold of the weapon like Garuḍa catching a female serpent.

12. When his personal valour failed, the great Asura, being humiliated, and splendourless, did not wish to take the mace (though) offered by Hari.

13. He took up a trident spear, eager to envelop (eat up) everything like a flaming fire, and aimed it at the chest of Viśṇu who had assumed the form of sacrifice like the use of black magic against a pious Brāhmaṇa.

14. Just as Indra cut down the feather thrown out by Garuḍa\(^{727}\), he (Varāha), with his disc of sharp edge cut as-under the trident, forcibly hurled by the great Daitya warrior—the trident of extreme refulgence which shone through the sky (as it darted towards Hari).

\[727\] The comparison is between the shining Triśula darting through the sky and the refulgent feather of Garuḍa falling through the sky illuminating it on its way down. This refers to the incident when Garuḍa was carrying away Amṛta (nectar), Indra came in the way and hurled his Vajra (thunderbolt) at him. To respect the bones of the sage Dadhica of which Vajra was made, Garuḍa dropped a feather and told Indra that he was not affected by the impact of Vajra but he dropped the feather out of respect for sage Dadhica—MBH.I-33. 18-23.
15. When his trident was shattered to pieces by Hari’s disc (Sudarśana-cakra), the Asura got extremely enraged. Shouting lustily he confronted Hari and dealt a punch with his hard fist on his broad magnificent chest and disappeared.

16. Oh Vidura, Lord Ādi-Varāha who was thus struck, did not move even slightly like an elephant struck by a garland.

17. Then he created and used different forms of his black magic against Hari, the Lord of Yoga Māyā. Seeing it (Asura’s māyā) all creatures got panicky and thought that the end of the world (pralaya) was imminent.

18. Terrible stormy winds began to blow and spread darkness of dust. Volleys of stones as if discharged from slings, fell from all quarters.

19. The sky, being covered with clouds accompanied by lightning-flashes and thundering and pouring frequently pus, hair, blood, excretion, urine and bones, seemed devoid of luminaries.

20. Oh sinless Vidura, the mountains appeared to shower various weapons and naked female Rākṣasas with their hair let loose, appeared with spears.

21. Very harsh and murderous cries (such as ‘cut down, break down, etc.’) were shouted out by a host of blood-thirsty Yakṣas, Rākṣasas, foot-soldiers, (riders on) horses, chariots and elephants.

22. Lord (Varāha) of three feet discharged his favourite missile Sudarśana destroying the Asura type of black magic manifested (there).

23. Simultaneously there was a sudden trembling in the heart of Diti who remembered her husband’s words and blood oozed out of her breast.

729. VC. takes this as qualifying Rākṣasa women—‘Naked Rākṣasa women discharging various kinds of weapon’.
730. This is the incarnation of Tajña-Varāha or Boar which was sacrifice incarnate. The three savanas are regarded as the three feet of Tajña. Hence this attribute is applied to Viṣṇu as Varāha.—ŚR., VB.

VJ. states: ‘Āmṛta, Kṣema and Abhaya’ are the three feet of Lord. In Puruṣasūkta Puruṣa is tripād.
24. When his magical forces were totally destroyed, he again approached Keśava (Viṣṇu), and tried angrily to crush him in the clasp of his arms, but found him outside his clasp.

25. While he was dealing blows with his adamantine (hard) fists to Viṣṇu, he hit the Asura at the root of his ear by his hand (i.e. foreleg) as Indra, Lord of Maruts, did to Vṛtra.

26. By the casual blow of the conqueror of the universe (Viṣṇu), the Asura fell like a giant tree uprooted by a stormy wind. His body was rolling about. His eye-balls fell out. His arms, feet and hair lay shattered.

27. Brahmā and others (sages) who came there saw the Asura of terrific tusks and lips bitten, lying on the ground, but with undiminished lustre. They exclaimed in praise, 'Oh who could attain to such (type of) death!'

28. This wicked Daitya kicked by Viṣṇu's fore-leg, gave up his body while looking at the face of Viṣṇu on whom the yogins meditate by samādhi-yoga in solitude with a desire to get liberation from this Liṅga-svarūpa,\textsuperscript{731} enveloping the Soul.

29. These two Viṣṇu's attendants who have come down to evil births due to a curse, will again be reinstated to their (former) status, after some births in this world.

\textbf{Gods said:}

You who are the cause of extension of Yajña\textsuperscript{732} assumed the form of pure Sattva attribute for the maintenance (and protection) of the world. It is a matter of joy that this Daitya who was a scourge (lit. afflictor) of the world is killed. We are quite happy in the devotion of your feet."

and other gods, retired to his region (Vaikuṇṭha) of uninterrupted bliss.

32. Oh good friend, Hiraṇyākṣa of great valour was disposed of (killed) like a toy in a big battle. This exploit of Hari who assumed the boar incarnation has been narrated to you by me as described to me by my teacher.

Sūta said:

33. Oh Brāhmaṇa (Śaunaka), on hearing this episode of the Lord from Maitreya, Vidura, the great devotee of the Lord was highly delighted.

34. How much more shall we be delighted to hear the deeds of Lord Viṣṇu when we feel such a joy at hearing the deeds of the pious persons of sanctifying reputation and highly glorious fame?

35. He (Viṣṇu) instantaneously rescued from danger the big elephant which being caught by a crocodile, meditated of his lotuslike feet while the she-elephants (his companions) were trumpeting.

36. What grateful person will not serve him who is easily propitiated by straightforward persons completely depending on him but difficult for propitiation to the wicked.

37. Oh Brāhmaṇas, a person becomes free from the sin of killing a Brāhmaṇa, if he (the sinner) hears, sings or takes delight in the episode of his miraculous action of killing Hiraṇyākṣa—a sport of Hari who assumed the boar form for the purpose (of lifting up the earth).

38. This (episode of Hari) is highly meritorious, extremely sanctifying, conferring wealth, fame, longevity, blessings; in battles it protects life and organs of senses and inspires heroic spirit. The listeners of this ultimately attain to Nārāyaṇa as the final resort.
CHAPTER TWENTY

(Various Creations of Brahmā)

Śaunaka said:

1. Oh son of Sūta Romaharsaṇa, having established himself on the earth, what did Svāyambhuva Manu do to create openings (ways) for the creation of beings of later birth (as they were absorbed within God)?

2. The great devotee (of Kṛṣṇa) viz., Vidura, was absolutely devoted to Kṛṣṇa. He abandoned his elder brother (Dhṛtarāṣṭra) along with his sons, as he was wicked to Kṛṣṇa.

3. Vidura who was born of Dvaipāyana, was in no way inferior to him in greatness. He was devoted to Kṛṣṇa with all his heart. He was also attached to the devotees (of the Lord).

4. Vidura cleansed his sins by resorting to sacred places. What did he ask of Maitreya who was the foremost one among the knowers of the truth after approaching him while he was sitting at Kuśāvarta?

5. Oh Sūta, while they were conversing, sacred stories relating to the lotuslike feet of Hari, must have issued—stories which were sanctifying like the waters of the Gaṅgā which resort to his lotuslike feet.

6. Please extol to us the deeds (of Hari) which are sublime and worth describing. God may bless you. But what man of taste will feel satiated while drinking the nectar in the form of Hari's līlās?

7. Ugraśravas who was thus asked by the sages dwelling in the Naimiṣa forest fixed his mind on the Lord and spoke to them, ‘Please hear’.

Śūta said:

8. Having heard the lifting up of the earth from the Rasātala by Hari assuming the body of a boar through his Māyā, and Hari’s līlā of easily slaying Hīranyākṣa, Vidura felt rejoiced and asked the sage (Maitreya).

Vidura said:

9. Oh Brāhmaṇa, God Brahmā knows the course of the unmanifested Lord. What did the Lord of Prajāpati begin to do for the creation of beings after procreating Prajāpati (progenitors like Marīci etc.)?

10. How did Brāhmaṇas like Marīci and Svāyambhuva Manu create this world at the behest of Brahmā?

11. Did they create this world with their wives? Or did they do so independently (without wives?) Or was this world produced jointly by them all?

Maitreya said:

12. The principle called Mahat was evolved out of Prakṛti composed of three guṇas (viz. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas) which got agitated by (the will of) the unperturbable Lord due to the incomprehensible destiny (adṛśta) of jīvas, by the will power of the Supreme Being (the controller of Prakṛti) and through the force of unwinking (ever alert) Time.

13. Ahaṅkāra (bhūtādi) was created out of Mahat which was predominantly full of rajas. It (ahaṅkāra) was of three forms (namely Vaikārika, Rājasa and Tāmasa) and it was urged by adṛśta (destiny of jīvas). It (ahaṅkāra) created the groups of five each: of subtle elements (tāmātrās), five gross elements.
such as the sky etc., five conative organs of senses and five cognitive organs of senses and their presiding deities.

14. The above things as separate ones were unable to create this Brahmanḍa of five bhūtas. When they came together by the inscrutable power of the Lord, they created the golden Egg.

15. That Egg being devoid of Ātman or Intelligent Being to preside over it, lay for one thousand years in the waters of the ocean. (At the end of that period) Īśvara (the controlling Almighty) entered into it.

16. From his navel sprouted forth a lotus with the great splendour of one thousand sons. It was the abode of all living beings. Therein was manifested God Brahmā.

17. God Brahmā who was guided by the Supreme Being who was lying on the ocean, created the well-arranged universe as before, with its own arrangement of names and forms.

18. Out of his ignorance or Tamoguṇa, Brahmā created avidyā of five forms, viz., tāmisra, andha-tāmisra, tamas, moha, and mahātamas.737

19. Not being pleased with his body which was composed of tamas, he cast it off. Yakṣas and Rākṣasas accepted that body which was in the form of night and which was the cause of hunger and thirst.

20. Being overcome with hunger and thirst, they ran at him to eat him up. Being afflicted with hunger and thirst they cried out, “Don’t protect him, devour him”.

21. God Brahmā being frightened, requested them, “Oh don’t devour me, protect me. You Yakṣas and Rākṣasas are born of me”.

22. Shining with brilliant light he chiefly produced these deities who playing with the light, i.e. day time, thus shed by him, claimed the day as theirs.

23. God Brahmā created sexually over-passionate Asuras from the lower part of his body. Out of lust, they approached him for copulation.

24. Thereupon god Brahmā laughed. But when he was pursued by the shameless Asuras, he got enraged, afraid and fled away in great haste.

737. For these avidyās vide supra III.10,17; III.12.2.
25. He approached Hari who removes the distress of the afflicted and confers boons on them, and who with a view to bestowing his grace, manifests himself to his devotees in the form desired by them.

26. (Brahmā prayed): ‘Oh Supreme Soul, protect me. It is at your command that I created (these) beings. Oh Lord, these wicked beings fall upon me to satiate their lust.

27. You are the only one who can certainly remove the distress of the afflicted persons. You are the only one who can give trouble to those who do not resort to your feet’.

28. (Hari) who vividly reads the minds of others understood Brahmā’s pitiable condition and told him, “Give up your terrible body”. Being thus commanded, Brahmā abandoned it.\footnote{738}

29*-31. Oh Vidura, all the Asuras thought (the evening to be a woman) and were foolishly infatuated of her—a woman whose lotuslike feet were jingling with anklets, whose eyes were overcome with intoxication, whose loins (middle) were covered with shining silken sāri (fixed up) with a girdle of small tinkling bells, whose big high breasts closely brushing each other left no space on her bosom (i.e. completely occupied it), whose nose was shapely, rows of teeth beautiful, smiles fascinating and glances sportive. The mass of hair (on whose head) were dark blue. She (as it were) concealed herself (from their glances) out of shyness.

32. (The Asuras appreciated in wonder): “Oh what a beautiful form! What boldness! What a fascinating prime of youth! Without a touch of passion she moves amongst us who are full of lust.”

33. Entertaining different ideas about the Evening in the form of a young woman, the wicked-minded Asuras, out of lust, asked her courteously:

\footnote{738. ŚR. explains that all such references to abandon the body mean eschewing the particular state of mind and assumption of body implies assumption of a particular state of mind.}

\footnote{ŚR. and VR. state that the body thus given up by Brahmā became the evening time when sexual passions are normally aroused. This explanation introduces the following description of the evening as a beautiful lady.}
34. "Oh lady of beautiful thighs, who are you? Whose daughter are you? Oh beautiful girl, what is your object here? Why do you torment us, the unfortunate ones by exhibiting the invaluable commodity of your beauty?

35. You may be anybody. But we have the good fortune of having a look at you. You agitate the hearts of the onlookers by your play with the ball.

36. Oh beautiful lady, while you are frequently beating down the falling ball with the palm of your hand, your lotus-like feet are not steady at any place. Your middle (waist) being afraid of the heavy burden of your big breasts, feels fatigued. Your clear eyes appear serene and the braided hair beautiful."

37. In this way, the dull-witted Asuras, thinking the evening time to be a woman as it appeared to them as such, and attracted their hearts, accepted her.

38. With a laugh of deep erotic significance god Brahmā created the tribes called Gandharvas (heavenly musicians) and Apsarās (celestial damsels) by his self-appreciating personal charm.

39. He verily gave up that splendid lovable body of moonlight which Gandharvas headed by Viśvāvasu accepted with joy.

40. Creating ghosts and goblins out of his lassitude, he closed his eyes when he saw their nudity and dishevelled hair.

41. They took over god Brahmā’s body called ‘yawning’ which was abandoned by him. By that body is created that complete sluggishness of senses called ‘sleep’ among living beings. They (goblins) possess the impure beings in that stage (of relaxation). It is called madness (unmāda).

42. Feeling himself possessing procreative power, venerable Brahmā created the class of celestial beings called Sādhyas and Pitrīs (manes) while he kept himself invisible.

43. Pitrīs took possession of the body from which they were created and on account of that, experts in Karma-path give to Sādhyas and manes (the offerings called havya and kavya due to them).

739. v.I. acala—steady.
740. The bodies of bhūtas are fourfold: (1) Tandrā (lassitude), (2) Jrmbhā (yawning), (3) Nidrā (sleep), (4) Unmāda (madness) ŠR.
44. By his power of remaining invisible, he created Siddhas and Vidyādharas (demigods) and passed on to them his miraculous body called antardhāna (disappearance).

45. Decorating his body (with sandle-paste, flowers etc.) and appreciating his reflection (in the mirror) Brahmā created from his image Kinnaras and Kimpuruṣas.

46. They accepted the form (characterised by Narcissism) abandoned by Brahmā. Hence they get together with their wives at dawn and sing in praise of his deeds.

47. Lying with the extremities of his body fully extended and full of deep anxiety at the insufficient growth of the creation, he angrily cast off that body (which became characterised by anger, extension etc.).

48. Oh Vidura, the hair dropped from that body became serpents. From the body which was moving here and there were born cruel cobras with big hoods and broad necks.

49. When the self-born god (Brahmā) felt that he had achieved his purpose, he created from his mind Manus, progenitors of prolific population on the world.

50. The self-possessed Brahmā gave up his body in human form to the Manus. Seeing the Manus, Beings who were previously created highly praised the Lord of Prajās (Brahmā).

51. “Oh creator of the world, what you have done is verily well-done. In this (Manu-creation) all the religious courses are well-established. (Herein) all of us eat food together.”

52. The sage Brahmā who possesses (the power of) penance, knowledge, devotion, Yoga along with the power of profound meditation and perfect control over sense-organs, created the sage-world (ṛṣi-sarga) so dear to him.

53. To each one of the sages, god Brahmā gave a portion of his body characterised by complete meditation, yoga, miraculous powers, penance, knowledge and non-attachment.
CHAPTER TWENTY-FIRST

(Kardama's Penance—Viṣṇu's Boon)

Vidura said:

1. Oh venerable sage, (I pray you) to please describe to me the greatly respected dynasty of Svāyambhuva Manu in which descendants multiplied in marital relations.

2. Svāyambhuva Manu had two sons, Priyavrata and Uttānapāda, who protected the earth consisting of seven insular-continents\(^1\) according to religion.

3. He had a daughter well known as Devahūti. Oh sinless one, you told that she was the wife of Prajāpati Kardama.

4. Please tell me who am desirous of hearing, how many children had the great Yogi Kardama got from her who possessed sama, dama and other qualities of Yoga.

5. How did respectable Ruci or Dakṣa, the sons of God Brahmā get the daughters of Manu as wives (Ruci marrying Äkūti and Dakṣa marrying Prasūti) and procreated children, Oh Brahmaṇa?

Maitreya said:

6. When the venerable sage Kardama was commanded by God Brahmā to create beings, he performed penance for ten thousand years on the bank of the Sarasvati.

\(^1\) According to Purāṇic geography the earth consists of seven insular continents, viz., Jambū, Plakṣa, Śālmali, Kuśa, Krauṇḍa, Śāka and Puṣkara (N.L. De—GDAMI p. 178). V.S. Agrawala and D.G. Sircar point out that the Purāṇic concept of seven concentric island-continents is a later development. The original concept was of caturdoṣa Vasumati, i.e. the earth was like a lotus with Mt. Meru as itsKarṇīkā (pericarp) and the following island-continents as its petals in the four directions of Meru: (1) Kuru or Uttara Kuru in the north, (2) Jambū or Bhārata in the south, (3) Bhadrāśva in the east and (4) Ketumāla in the west. These have been tentatively identified with (1) northern portion of Asia, north of the Altai mountain, (2) India, (3) China and east Asia and (4) the valley of the Oxus and west Asia. Ancient Buddhist texts support the concept of caturdoṣa Vasumati. —For details see V.S. Agrawala—MP—A Study, pp.184-188. Sircar—SGAMI, pp. 17-26. Baldeva Upadhyaya Purāṇa Vimarsha, pp.317-330.
7. Then Kardama with great devotion, intense meditation and worship, rendered service to Hari who gives boons to those who resort to him.

8. Then the lotus-eyed God Viṣṇu became pleased with him. Oh Vidura, in the Kṛta age, he manifested himself in an auspicious form, though he is known (to the world) by the verbal description in the Vedas.

9-11. In the sky, he saw the Lord who was free from all impurities and was resplendent like the Sun. He wore a garland of white lotuses that blossom by day and night. His lotus-like face was beautiful with smooth blue-black locks of hair. He was clad in pure silk garment. The Lord wore a crown and ear-rings and held in his hands a conch, a disc, a mace and a white lotus for sport. His captivating smiles and looks delighted the heart. His lotus-like feet were placed on the shoulders of Garuḍa. He had Laksṇī (Śrī-Vatsa) on his bosom and the Kaustubha gem round His neck.

12. Overjoyed at the fulfilment of his desired object, Kardama prostrated himself on the ground. He, who was intensely devoted by nature, folded his hands and praised the Lord (in the following words).

The sage said:

13. Oh praiseworthy Lord, what a joy it is! Real usefulness of our eyes has been achieved today by visualising you whose entire personality consists of perfectly pure Sattva—a sight coveted by Yogins who have been developing their Yoga through many progressively pious births.

14. Your lotus-like feet are like a boat to cross the ocean of Samsāra. But those whose intelligence is deadened by your

15. I am of such a nature (as described above). I wish to marry a girl similar to me in disposition and useful like a cow to a householder’s life (in yielding three objectives in life, namely, dharma, artha and kāma). With this unbecoming motive, I approached your feet which are like a wish-yielding tree and which are the source of all (four puruṣārthas).

16. Oh Supreme Lord, this world₇₄₆ is overwhelmed with desire. It is really bound down by the cord in the form of words (Vedic injunctions) expressed by you₇₄₆, the lord of Prajās. Oh embodiment of pure Dharma, I am verily a follower of the world. I carry offerings to you (i.e. abide by your order of performing the prescribed kārmic duties for repaying the three traditional debts (ṛna) of man for which wife is essential)—you are the soul of Time.

17. Having abandoned worldly men and their followers like beasts₇₄₈, (your devotees) resort to the umbrella in the form of your feet. They forget the conditions, i.e. the needs of their bodies (such as hunger, thirst, etc.) in the discussion of Your attributes—a discussion which is intoxicating like wine (making them forget their worldly ties) and sweet like nectar.

of days in the year). It has six tythes (i.e. seasons), innumerable blades (such as small units of time like ksana, nimsa etc.), three supports, namely, three periods of four months—caturmdsa each.

19. Oh Lord, you are only one, i.e. there is none other except you. With the desire of creating the world and by the powers such as Sattva etc., assumed by you through your Yoga-May, you create, protect and destroy this world like a spider (doing with his web).

20. Oh Supreme Lord, although you extend (offer) by means of your May, worldly pleasures in the form of objects of senses to us, your devotees, this is not really your desired object. Still, let it be offered out of your grace towards us; for you have manifested yourself as a person decorated with resplendent Tulas (and hence have Time-Space limitation) through May. (This manifestation will lead to worldly pleasures here and Liberation hereafter)749.

21. I bow to you again and again. By your Supreme knowledge, you are free from the experience of the fruit of Karmas. You manage the working of the universe by your May. Hence your lotus-like feet are worthy of being bowed (by devotees, whether they cherish desire or not). You shower desired objects upon a devotee who is motivated (even) by trivial desires.

The sage said:

22. Being thus praised sincerely, Lord Viṣṇu, the God with a lotus in His navel, who appeared lustrous (in his seat)

749. Most of the commentators follow ŚR. A few different interpretations are noted below:

(i) Oh Lord, by your May you create ahimkara, subtle elements and their special characteristics. Or you create ego whereby we cease to aspire after your place (jeda). But I feel that despite my nonliking for your place, you will bless me with it out of your grace. As you have manifested yourself in your miraculous person with Tulas garland, I believe it is for the grace of attaining your place. — VR.

(ii) Oh Lord, you have adopted the Brahmāṇda or Bhūtasūkṣma by your own will (May) without being impelled by any one else. But this is not your essential form described in the Upaniṣads. The Lord is visualised by me as decorated with Tulas garland, ear-rings etc. This is for showing grace to the devotees.—VJ.
above the wings of Garuḍa and whose eyebrows moved gracefully by his gracious looks and his affectionate smile, spoke to Kardama in nectarlike sweet words.

_The Lord said:_

23. Having known your intention, I have already arranged for that very object for which I have been properly worshipped by you, with self-imposed religious observations.

24. Oh Kardama (Lord of Prajāś)! My worship performed by persons with their minds concentrated in me is never futile. In case of persons like you, it is not all fruitless.

25. Manu, king of kings, the son of Prajāpati (Brahmā) is well known for his prosperity and righteous conduct. He lives in Brahmāvarta, but rules the whole earth surrounded by seven oceans*.

Maitreya said:

33. Having addressed thus, the Lord who manifests himself to senses which are turned inwards, then departed from Bindusaras surrounded by Sarasvati.

34. While Kardama was looking on, he (Viṣṇu) who had been praised by all prominent Siddhas and was sought after by (all) Siddhas went away, hearing the collection of Stoma hymns sung in Sāma notes, as a result of (the flutterings of) Garuḍa’s wings.

35. On the departure of the pure lustrous God Viṣṇu, the venerable sage Kardama stayed at Bindusaras waiting for the time (of Manu’s arrival).

36. Manu got into his chariot decorated with plates of gold. Along with his wife and daughter he drove over the world.

37. Oh good archer Vidura, on the day which was appointed by Lord Viṣṇu, he arrived at the hermitage of the sage who had completed the vow of celibacy.

38-39. The place where drops of tears fell from the eyes of the Supreme Lord who was overcome with compassion for Kardama who sought him so intensely, that is verily the Bindusara surrounded by the Sarasvati whose waters are sanctifying, pure, sweet as nectar and resorted to by multitudes of great sages.

750. Siddha-mārga—Alternatively: the path to Vaikuṇṭha—ŚR. RR. doubts whether Siddha means Vaikuṇṭha. VR., VB. derive it: Path that is self-established. SD.: The path of knowledge and devotion that has been established.

751. N.L. De identifies this near Sitpur (Siddhapura in Gujrat) about 64 miles to the north-west of Ahmedabad—GDAM, pp. 38 and 158.
40. It is surrounded by holy trees and mass of creepers. It is inhabited by sacred animals and sweetly singing birds. It is beautified by a charming forest rich in fruits and flowers of all seasons.

41. It is vocal with warbling of crowds of joyous birds; is roamed about by (intoxicated) black-bees. It is full of noise by the dancing (and crying) of proud peacocks and the cooing of the joyful cuckoos.

42. It is beautified with trees such as Kadamba, Campaka, Aśoka, Karaṇja, Bakula, Asana, Kunda, Mandāra, Kuṭaja and young Mango trees.

43. It is resounded with the sweet notes (warblings) of waterbirds like Karaṇḍava, Plava, swans, Kurara, waterfowls, cranes, ruddy-goose and Cakras.

44. It is visited by deer, boars, wild dogs, elephants, monkeys called Gopucchās and other species and musk deer.

45. The ancient king entered the sacred place along with his daughter. He saw the sage sitting after completion of the worship of fire.

46. The sage appeared brilliant as his body had undergone austere penance, but was not ostensibly emaciated (weak) on account of the affectionate glances of the Lord at him and due to hearing the nectarlike lunar rays in the form of Viṣṇu’s words.

47. The sage was tall. His eyes were wide like the petals of a lotus. He had matted hair. He wore bark-garments. He appeared untidy like an unpolished precious stone.

48. Thereupon, the sage, being pleased with the king, who had approached his hermitage paid obeisance to him, greeted him with courteous benedictions and gave him befitting reception.

49. The sage, remembering Lord Viṣṇu’s command spoke these pleasant words in soft and pleasant tones to the king who had accepted the reception, and took his seat modestly.

50. “Your Majesty, you are the protective power of Hari. Your tour is really for the protection of the righteous and the destruction of the wicked.
51. I bow down to you who are (the representative) of Pure Lord Viṣṇu. At appropriate time and place, you discharge the functions of the Sun, the Moon, the Fire, Indra, Vāyu, Yama, Dharma and Varuṇa.

52-54. When you who wield your fierce bow of terrific twang, frightening the enemies, do not go about in your victorious chariot, decked with precious stones making the whole earth quake by the trampling (march) of your army and when (if) you do not move about like the Sun leading a massive army, all the limits, i.e. rules and regulations pertaining to Varnaś and Āśramaś which are laid down by Lord Viṣṇu, will be violated by the villains.

55. When you sleep (are slack), unrighteousness will be spread by men who are given to pleasures and are uncontrolled (by principles), and this world will be at the mercy of the miscreants and will meet destruction.

56. Oh Warrior, may I however ask you why you have come here? We shall sincerely be happy to comply with your wishes.”

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

('Marriage of Kardama and Devahuti')

Maitreya said:

1. The emperor (Manu) whose all excellent attributes and deeds were thus eulogised, spoke rather bashfully (due to his modesty at hearing his own praise or the fear of the rejection of the marriage proposal) to the sage full of quietism (and dissociation with worldly acts).

Manu said*:

2. With a desire to preserve himself, Brahmā who is the Veda incarnate, created from his mouth you Brāhmaṇas who are full of tapas, learning, yoga and are free from lust. 752

* Verses 2 and 3 are the echo of the Puruṣa-sūktam.*

3. The thousand-legged God (Brahmā) created us from his thousand arms for their (Brāhmaṇas') protection. It is said that Brāhmaṇas form his heart and Kṣatriyas his body (limbs).

4. Hence Brāhmaṇas and Kṣatriyas protect each other. The immutable, disinterested God who is the Soul (antarjīmin) of all 753 thus protects all.

5. All my doubts have been resolved by your very sight as Your worship himself has explained to me, out of favour, the duty (dharma) of one who desires to protect (the world).

6. It is my good luck that I could see your revered self who are difficult to be met by those who have not controlled their minds. I am happy that I could touch the holy dust of your honour's feet with my head.

7. It is a great fortune that I have been advised (taught) by you. A great favour has been done to me. Your sweet words have been luckily received by my open ears (i.e. I could eagerly hear etc).

8. Oh sage, your worship should kindly listen to the request of a distressed person like me whose mind is tormented by affection for his own daughter.

9. This daughter of mine is the sister of Priyavrata and Uttānapāda. She desires to marry a husband who is suitable to her in age, character, excellences and other attributes.

10. When this (daughter) had heard from Nārada Your honour's excellent character, learning, beauty, youth and qualities, she has firmly decided to marry you.

11. Oh eminent Brāhmaṇa, therefore accept this (daughter) who has been respectfully offered by me. She is in all respects suitable to you in carrying out sacrificial and other duties as a householder.

---

752. Tāpocvidyā...yuktiḥ : (i) Possessed karma upāsanā (devotion) and jñāna (knowledge)—VR. (ii) Full of tapas, knowledge of śāstras and devotion (bhakti)—VJ.

753. sadasadātmakaḥ : (i) Whose nature is of causal relation, lit. who is of the form of cause and effect—VR.

(ii) Who is comprised of cause and effect.
12. It is not commendable even for a person who has given up attachment, to reject a desired object when it offers itself. What need be said in the case of a person who is attached to worldly objects?

13. A person who, having disrespected an offer (of a desired object) begs the same of a miser, gets (finds) his widespread fame diminished and his self-respect ruined by disrespect (from others).

14. Oh learned one, I have heard that you are ready to get yourself married. As you are to terminate your period of celibacy, you please accept (my daughter) offered to you.

The Sage said:

15. I definitely wish to marry. Your daughter is also not proposed to any other person. This first (or important) union in marriage of ours is suitable.

16. Oh King, may the desire (of procreation) expressed in the mantras of Vedic marriage-ceremony be fulfilled by my marriage with your daughter. Who will not feel respect for your daughter who surpasses ornaments by her complexion?

17. (Who would not like to marry your daughter) on seeing whom playing (with a ball) on the terrace of your palace and looking with a perturbed glance at the ball and her feet beautified by tinkling anklets, (Gandharva) Viśvāvasu got his mind bewildered by infatuation (made love for her) and fell down from his aerial car.

18. When Manu’s daughter and Uttānapāda’s sister who is the ornament of beautiful women, and who cannot be even seen by persons who have not served the feet of Lakṣmi, approaches with a request for marriage, what wise man will not give his consent?

19. Hence I will accept this pious (daughter of yours) on condition of staying with her till she bears a child to me. Thereafter I shall think more of the duties as taught by Viṣṇu (such as sama, dama) essential for attaining knowledge and which are characterised by ahimsā.

20. That infinite Eternal Lord, the Lord of all Prajāpatis is the highest authority to me—the Lord from whom was evolved this wonderful diversified universe, in whom it is sustained and in whom it will get dissolved.

Maitreya said:

21. Oh Vidura (wielder of a terrible bow), having spoken this much, the sage became silent quietly meditating over Lord Viśnu from whose navel has sprouted forth a lotus. But the heart of Devahūti was captivated by his smiling face (or he enticed Devahūti’s heart by his smiling countenance).

22. Having learnt the firm resolution of the queen and his daughter, he was overjoyed and gave in marriage to the sage who was endowed with excellent qualities, his daughter who was equal to him.

23. Empress Śatarūpā, out of affection bestowed upon the couple very costly marriage gifts such as ornaments, garments and articles of household use.

24. The King felt free from anxiety at the marriage of his daughter with a suitable bridegroom. He whose heart was greatly agitated by sorrow (due to the prospective departure of his daughter) took her in his arms.

25. Being unable to bear separation from her, he constantly shed tears. Calling her ‘Oh dear, Oh child’, he drenched the hair of his daughter with his tears.

26. He took leave of the eminent sage. Being permitted by him, he got into the chariot with his wife and set out to his capital along with his retinue.

27. (On way) he saw the beautiful hermitages of tranquil-minded sages on both the beautiful banks of the sacred river Sarasvatī.

28. Hearing that the king was returning, his subjects from Brahmāvarta became delighted, and came forward to greet him by songs, eulogies and playing on musical instruments.

29. (The place) where the hair of the Yajña Varāha fell while he shook his body, there arose the town called Barhiṣmatī endowed with all kinds of riches and prosperity.

30. Those hair became the ever-green kūṭa and kāsa with which the sages defeated the trouble-makers of sacrifices and performed sacrifice, (worshipped Yajña-Viṣṇu).
31. Having spread out a layer (= seat) of Kuśa and Kāśa grass, revered Manu performed sacrifice for Viṣṇu (Yañapuruṣa) and the earth as his place of residence from him.

32. The king went into (his capital) Barhiṣmati wherein he lived. Therein he entered his palace which (is free from) the three types of afflictions (viz. ādhibhautika, ādhyātmika, ādhidāivika).

33. With his wife and along with his subjects, he enjoyed pleasures without conflicting other purusārthas (viz. dharma, artha and mokṣa). His glorious fame was being sung by heavenly musicians along with their wives. Every day, at dawn, he heard the stories of Hari with a devoted heart.

34. Pleasures could not swerve the sage Svāyambhuva Manu (from the path of dharma) to the slightest degree as he was a past-master in yoga-māyā (and hence could create his desired objects), and was intensely devoted to Viṣṇu.

35. As he was (always busy in) listening to, meditating over, composing and describing the stories of Viṣṇu, (even) the small units of time during the period allotted to him (called Manvantara) were not spent unfruitfully.

36. In this way, he passed his prescribed period (called Manvantara) consisting of seventy-one Yugas. He overpowered (counteracted) the influence of three gatis (viz. wails or woes of the ādhyātmika, ādhibhautika and ādhidāivika types), by his devotion to Vāsudeva.

37. Oh Vidura, how can afflictions of a physical and psychological nature or sufferings due to heavenly or human cause affect one who has resorted to Hari?

38. He was always obliging to all beings. When consulted by the sages, he explained to them the various auspicious paths of duties prescribed for men belonging to all Varnas (classes of people) and Āśramas (stages in life).

39. This wonderful life of the ancient (first) praiseworthy king Manu has been described to you. Now listen to the great fortune of his daughter (Devaḥūti).
CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

(Married Life of Kardama and Devahūti)

1. When the parents of Devahūti departed, the pious lady who was expert in reading the inward thoughts of her husband, always attended upon him affectionately as the goddess Pārvatī did for Śiva, the Lord of the world.

2-3. Having given up passion, fraud, hatred, avarice, objectionable behaviour and pride, she who was very alert and was always ready (to serve Kardama), gave satisfaction to her brilliant husband by her confidence (in him), her physical and mental purity, respectfulness, self-control, service, sincere affection and sweet speech.

4-5. The eminent divine sage was verily overwhelmed with affection (favour) for that daughter of Manu and spoke in words choked with intense love to Devahūti—Devahūti who was devoutly attached to him and was expecting great blessings from her husband whom she considered more powerful than destiny (or a deity). She was greatly emaciated and weak by rigid observance of the vow (of serving her husband) for a long period.

Kardama said:

6. "Oh daughter of Manu, I am today highly pleased by your respectful, excellent service and intense devotion. To every being possessing a body, one's own person is extremely dear and worthy of being cared for. You, however, have not spared it (your body) as you wasted it over for me (in my service).

7. Just have a look at the blessings of the Almighty Lord secured by me who have been thoroughly devoted to my path of righteousness—blessings secured by the dint of my penance, meditation, Vidyā, and concentration of mind. These blessings which transcend fear and sorrow, have been achieved by you by your service to me. I give you the divine insight.

8. Of what merit are other pleasures, the desires (expectations) about which are foiled by the (slightest frowning) bend of the eyebrow of Lord Viśnu of immense powers? You have achieved your object. Enjoy the rich heavenly pleasures which accrue to you by your observance of the path of virtue—pleasures unattainable even to kings who covet for them.”

9. Realising that Kardama who spoke thus was proficient in all yoga-māyā and Vidyās, the lady (Devahūti) became free from anxieties. With her face beaming with smiles and slightly bashful looks, she spoke in words faltering with love and modesty.

Devahūti said:

10. “Oh eminent Brāhmaṇa, I am happy to know that all this (described by you) is within your powers—you who are the master of the unfailing powers of Yoga-māyā, my lord. (I request) that there should be at least one contact with your person which has been promised by you, oh Lord. To beget a child from a great husband (like you) is a blessing to virtuous women.

11. Oh Lord, for that purpose (be pleased to) arrange for the necessary materials as per prescription (in the Kāma-Śāstra). My body which has been tormented by (sexual) passion provoked by you and which has been emaciated with excessive desire for sexual enjoyment, will thereby become fit for it. Therefore think of a suitable mansion.”

Maitreya said:

12. Kardama resorted to meditation for fulfilling the desired object of his beloved. He created an aerial mansion capable of going as per the occupant’s will, oh Vidura.

13. It was a heavenly structure yielding all desired objects, decked with all (nine kinds of) costly jewels. (In it) all kinds of riches and prosperity were ever-increasing. It was beautified by columns of precious stones.

14. (It was) furnished with heavenly articles (like furniture and utensils). It was pleasant in all seasons. It was decorated with various kinds of silken bunttings and flags.

15. (It was beautified) with garlands of flowers of varie-gated colours with swarms of sweetly humming bees hovering around them, and with fine cotton and silken clothes.

16. (It appeared beautiful as) it was furnished with separate beds, cots, fans and seats in each of the storeys constructed one above the other.

17. It appeared very attractive on account of the various works of art arranged and exhibited at different places and with its emerald floors and daisies of coral.

18. It shone with its doors of red coral, thresholds and panels of diamonds. On its tops of blue sapphires were set gold pitchers.

19. The excellent rubies set in its walls of diamonds appeared like eyes of the aerial car. It was also furnished with wonderful canopies of variegated colours and costly arches of gold.

20. At various places it was filled with the warbling and cooing of swans and pigeons which mistook artificial birds as real ones like themselves and flew to them.

21. It was provided with play-grounds, sleeping apartments, places for enjoyment, quadrangles and outer yards constructed for enjoyment at will, so much so that it appeared wonderful to (Kardama) its maker.

22. Kardama who knew the inner thoughts of all beings spoke of his own accord to Devahūti who was not much pleased at heart to look at that type of mansion.

23. "Oh timid lady, take bath in this pool of water and get in this heavenly mansion. This sacred pool which is created by Viṣṇu, blesses men with all desired boons (objects)."

24-25. In compliance of the order of her husband the lotus-eyed lady who wore a dirty garment and had the hair on head tangled and her body covered with dust and discoloured breasts, entered the sacred waters of the pool in the Sarasvatī (wherein lived auspicious aquatic animals).

26. (When she took a plunge) under the waters of the pool she saw in a house a thousand maids, all of youthful age and fragrant like lotus.

27. Seeing her, those girls at once stood up and respectfully folding their hands said, "We are your servants. Please order us what we should do for you."
28. With costly materials necessary for bath, the respectful damsels made her take bath and gave her two new clean silken garments to wear.

29. (They gave her) very valuable brilliant ornaments according to her liking; they served her food of all excellent qualities and nectar-like (sweet and) stimulant drink.

30. In the mirror she saw herself wearing a garland of flowers, dressed in fine garments, her body very clean and decorated with auspicious marks and greatly respected by the girl attendants.

31. (She saw herself) bathed and washed from head to foot, beautified with all kinds of ornaments, wearing gold pendants round her necks and gold bangles (on her hands) and with tinkling gold ornaments.

32. (She put on) gold girdle studded with many jewels around her hips, and with very costly necklace of pearls and was decorated with auspicious (marks and designs drawn in) saffron etc.

33. Devahūti whose face looked very beautiful by her excellent rows of teeth, well-shaped eyebrows, with her beautiful affectionate side glances of eyes which rivalled with lotus (in beauty) and with her dark blue hair (dangling on her forehead).

34. When she remembered her beloved husband, the foremost among the sages, she found herself there with a thousand girls where Prajāpāti Kardama was sitting.

35. Seeing that she was in front of her husband and surrounded by thousand maids, and seeing the power of his Yoga, she was confused with wonder (doubted what it all meant).

36-37. Oh Vidura, the sage in whom love for Devahūti was aroused made her ascend in the aerial car (Vimāna)—Devaḥūti who washed herself clean in the bath and became resplendent as a new person and appeared in her original pre-marriage beauty with her attractive breasts covered (and hence concealed from view)\textsuperscript{755}.

38. In that aerial mansion, he whose greatness (or freedom) was not diminished and who was loved by his wife and whose person was attended upon by Vidyādhara damsels, \textsuperscript{755}. v.l.—stanam—adj. qualifying rūpaṃ: 'beauty of the charming breasts which were covered etc.

shone like the extremely beautiful moon surrounded by stars and with full blown night lotuses around him in the sky.

39. With that aerial car, Kardama who was praised by Siddhas and was accompanied by a bevy of jewel-like (extremely beautiful) damsels, enjoyed like Kubera for a long time in the valleys of mount Meru, the foremost amongst the Kula-parvatas which are the places of enjoyment for the eight protectors of the world (lokapāla). The valleys of mount Meru were enjoyable on account of gentle breeze, a friend of the god of Love. They were full of the echoes of the cataracts of the heavenly river.

40. He enjoyed himself with his beautiful wife in celestial gardens like Vaishrambhaka, Surasana, Nandana, Puspabhadra, Caitrarathya and in the Mānasa lake.

41. With his spacious, resplendent aerial car which could move anywhere according to the occupants' will, he travelled freely all over worlds like a wind, surpassing other gods.

42. What is difficult to attain for men of boundless mental powers who have resorted to the sacred feet of Hari who destroys the calamity of Samsāra.

43. Having shown to his wife the sphere of the earth full of wonders on account of all the arrangement of continents etc. the great Yogi returned to his hermitage.

44. Dividing himself into nine, the sage enjoyed the beautiful daughter of Manu who was eager for sexual happiness. He enjoyed with her for a number of years as if it was but a short period.

45. In the aerial car, lying with her beautiful husband on the excellent bed which increased her love and pleasure, she was not aware of the time passed.

46. A hundred years rolled away like a moment while the

758. Intending to beget nine children.—VR.
couple who were passionately eager for sexual pleasure were thus enjoying themselves by the force of their Yogic powers.

47. Due to his intense love (for her) he regarded her as his half. He who could read inner wishes of all (and hence knew her desire to have many children) was competent to satisfy them. The sage who realised his own Self\(^759\), divided himself into nine parts and deposited his semen in her.

48. Hence Devahūti gave birth to female children immediately on the same day. All of them were beautiful in all their limbs in every respect and they gave out the fragrance of red lotus.

49-50. At that time the beautiful\(^760\) virtuous wife anticipated that her husband was about to renounce the householder’s life (and to become a Saṁnyāsin). Though she was overcome with fear and pain, she smiled outwardly. She was scratching the ground with her foot beautiful with gem-like nails. With her head hung down (in modesty) she spoke soft winning words, controlling frequently her tears.

_Devahūti said:_

51. Your worship has fulfilled every promise that you gave to me. You however should give me protection\(^761\) (against fear from misery of Saṁsāra) as I have resorted to you.

52. Oh Brāhmana, your daughters will themselves have to find out suitable husbands. When you proceed to the forest as a recluse, there should be someone (a son) to relieve me of my sorrow\(^762\).

53. Oh Lord, I have given up (every thought about) the supreme self. It is enough that I have spent this much time (life) in satisfying the cravings of my senses.

---

759. VC. and VD. explain that due to his knowledge of the Supreme Self, Kardama was not so much attached to Devahūti as she was to him so intensely. Consequently Devahūti’s contribution was the greater at the time of conception. This resulted in the birth of all female children.

760. _utāti—Desirous of having a son (VJ., VD.).

54. I who am attached to the objects of senses, have associated myself with you (for that satisfaction) without realizing your higher (and real) Self. However let this association lead to my protection (i.e. liberation from Sāṁsāra).

55. The Association with the wicked formed through ignorance is the cause of the Sāṁsāra. That very association if formed with the good ones, leads to non-attachment to Sāṁsāra.

56. A person whose action does not contribute to the righteous path (dharma) or to non-attachment or to the service (worship) of the sacred feet of Hari, is meant as good as dead though physically alive.

57. As a matter of fact, I am completely deceived by the Māyā of the Lord, for, though I have (by marriage) obtained you who can give me liberation, I did not cherish any desire for it (liberation).

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

(Kapila-Incarnation)

Maitreya said:

1. When the praiseworthy daughter of Manu spoke despondently, the merciful sage, remembering the words of Viṣṇu (of white complexion) addressed her thus:

The sage said:

2. Oh blameless princess, do not thus torment yourself (and me as well). The imperishable and immutable\textsuperscript{763} Lord will soon enter your womb.

3. You have been observing vows. God bless you. Be devoted to the Lord with faith, self-control (dama), niyama

(ii) Knowledge incarnate; the Inner Controller—antaryāmin—VB.
(iii) Not assuming ordinary body (due to its independence of the semen etc. of the parents)—VD.
(observance of the ten prescribed restraints), penance and charitable donation of wealth.

4. Viṣṇu, so propitiated by you will be born to you as a son and spread my fame. He will instruct you about Brahman\textsuperscript{764} and thus He will cut the knot (of ahamkāra) in your heart.

Maitreya said:

5. With great respect Devahūti trusted the advice of the Lord of Prajās (Kardama). She devoted herself to the immovable, unchangeable Supreme Soul, the preceptor\textsuperscript{765} (of the Vedas).

6. After a lapse of long period, Lord Viṣṇu (Madhusūdana) was born of her by Kardama’s seed just as the fire does in a piece of wood.

7. At that time, showering clouds appeared. Gods sounded the heavenly musical instruments in the sky. The celestial singers (Gandharvas) began to sing and the heavenly damsels (apsarās) danced in joy.

8. Heavenly flowers showered by gods (who move through the sky fell (on the earth). All directions became clear, waters translucent and minds tranquil.

9. God Brahmā accompanied by Marici and other sages came to the hermitage of Kardama surrounded by the Sarasvati.

10. God Brahmā who has inborn perfect knowledge knew that the Supreme Lord had taken birth through his Sattva attribute for the promulgation of the true knowledge of the Principles (Sāṅkhya Śāstra), Oh Vidura (destroyer of enemies)!

11. With a pure heart, Brahmā expressed his respects for what he intended to do (viz. propagation of Sāṅkhya Śāstra). With his spirits (senses) ebullient with joy, he spoke to Kardama (and Devahūti) as follows:

Brahmā said:

12. Oh child, you have sincerely offered me worship in \textsuperscript{764} Brahma-bhūvanaḥ—The creator of God Brahmā—VJ.

\textsuperscript{765} gurū—(i) One who dispels ignorance (VR., SD.).
(ii) Propounder of knowledge about Brahman (VJ.)
obeying respectfully my words. (In this way) you honour others.

13. This much service should be rendered by children to their father, viz. the words of the father should respectfully and willingly be complied with.

14. Oh courteous child, these beautiful daughters of yours will multiply manifold and increase the creation of the world with their progeny.

15. Today, therefore, you give your daughters to the chief sages with proper regard to their tastes and character.

16. Oh sage, I know that the First Puruṣa (i.e. Viṣṇu) has incarnated through his Māyā and assumed the person (body) called Kapila who is a treasure (of blessings) to all beings.

17-18. Oh daughter of Manu, this (Puruṣa) of golden locks of hair, of lotuslike eyes and of lotuslike feet marked with lotuses has entered your womb, for uprooting all karmas by means of the śātric knowledge, Direct Perception or knowledge (vijnāna) and yoga. This enemy (killer) of Kaitabha will cut the knot of Nescience and doubt, and wander over the earth.

19. He is the chief of the category of Siddhas (who have obtained Perfect Knowledge). He will be deeply respected by the Masters of the Śāmkhya Śāstra.\(^{766}\) He will be known as Kapila in the world. He will increase your fame.

Maitreya said:

20. Cheering up the couple(Kardama-Devahūti) Brahmā, the creator of the world, with four Kumāras (Sanaka etc.) and Nārada mounted his swan-vehicle and went back to Satyaloka, the uppermost region above Svarga, the third world.

21. Oh Vidura, when god Brahmā departed, Kardama as per Brahmā’s instruction gave, as per Vedic rituals, his daughters to the procreators of the universe.

22. He gave (in marriage) Kalā to Marici, Anasūyā to Atri, Śraddhā to Aṅgirasas and married Havirbhū to Pulastya.

\(^{766}\) On the strength of Padma P., VJ., JG., VC., RR and VD record that Kapila the founder of the atheistic Śāmkhya is different from this eacher of the Theistic Śāmkhya.
23. He gave Yuktā to Pulaha, the virtuous Kriyā to Kratu, Khyāti to Bhṛgu and Arundhatī to Vasiṣṭha.

24. To Atharvan he gave Śānti who is the presiding deity of a Yajña (lit. who extends Yajña in the world). He satisfied the prominent Brāhmaṇas who were thus married and their wives as well.

25. Oh Vidura, then the sages, after the completion of marriages, took their leave of him (Kardama). They set out with great joy to their respective hermitages.

26. Having learnt that Viṣṇu, the great God, had taken incarnation, Kardama approached him while alone (privately), bowed to him and spoke:

27. "Oh! It is really after a very long time that gods are kindly disposed here to souls who are being roasted in the hell (-like Saṁsāra) by their own sins.

28. Ascetics (who have renounced the world) try to visualize the Lord’s feet, in secluded places, by following correct course of concentration in the Bhakti-yoga (path of devotion) which has been properly developed by them through many (previous) births.

29. That Supreme Lord who supports the cause of his devotees, is born today in the house of lowly (rustic) persons (like us), disregarding the humiliation therein.

30. You have taken incarnation in my house for the purpose of proving true to your word, as well as for propagating the knowledge of the Sāṁkhya doctrine. (Thus) you increase the veneration for your devotees.

31.* Oh Lord, although you are devoid of forms⁷⁶⁷, whatever forms (e.g. four-armed god, etc.) are liked by your devotees, are the proper forms for you.

* Oh Lord, you are devoid of ordinary or vulgar forms. Your superhuman forms (e.g. that of four-armed god etc.) are proper for you. (But) whatever form (e.g. that of a human being) is liked by your devotees is (also) liked by you.—ŠR.

32. I take shelter in you whose foot-stool is always worthy of paying obeisance by the learned ones who wish to perceive the Truth directly (as) you are perfect in the divine faculties (of omnipotence, omnipresence etc.), non-attachment, glory, knowledge, prowess (or strength) and majesty (or splendour).

33. I resort to Kapila who is the Supreme God. All the powers are within his control. He is in the form of Prakṛti, Puruṣa (who presides over Prakṛti), Mahat, Kāla (Time—the agitator), Ahamkāra (of three types as per three guṇas), the protector of the world. By his power of intelligence, he has absorbed the whole of the universe within himself. He is omniscient (mūla Brahma: a witness to the evolution and devolution of all principles like Prakṛti etc.).

34. You are the Lord of all creation. Hence I would like to ask something of you today. By you (being born as a son to me) I have repaid all the three debts (pertaining to gods, sages and forefathers). All of my desires have been really satisfied. Having taken to the path of Sarhnyāsa (recluse) I shall now wander meditating on you in my heart, free from all sorrow.

The Lord said:

35. Oh Sage, whatever I state about Vedic and worldly karmas is authoritative to the world. It is for validating what I told (promised) to you that I am born (as your son).

36. In this world, this incarnation of mine is for the exposition of the true knowledge of principles (like Prakṛti, Puruṣa etc.) leading to self-realization to those who seek liberation from the Liṅga sarīra (subtle body).

37. This subtle course of realization of the Soul (ātman) is lost for a long period. Please note that it is for the reinstitution of that path that I have assumed this body.

38. You have my permission. You may go at will. Dedicate all karmas to me. Having thereby conquered Death (i.e. samsāra) which is difficult to achieve, you resort to me for Liberation (Mokṣa);

39. By your mind realize within yourself Me, the Supreme Soul, the self-illuminating Light within the (cave of) hearts of all beings. (Thereby) being free from sorrow you will attain to Liberation.

40. I shall enunciate to my mother this spiritual lore which annihilates all karmas. She will thereby transgress Samsāra (cause of fear) and attain to the Highest bliss.

Maitreya said:

41. Prajāpati Kardama who was thus addressed by Kapila, was pleased. He circumambulated Kapila and went to the forest.

42. The Sage took the vow (e.g. ahimsā etc.) of the recluse’s way of life. He took resort only in the Supreme Soul. Free from attachment and renouncing fire-worship and home, he wandered all over the world.

43-45. He concentrated his mind on the Brahman which is different from cause and effect, which (though) devoid of attributes—(guṇas)—manifests the three guṇas and which is experienced only by complete unswerving devotion. Kardama became free from ahamkāra (ego), attachment. He transcended the pairs of opposites (e.g. pleasure-pain; heat-cold). He looked upon all equally and concentrated himself on self-realization only. His mental capacities turned inward (to Brahman) and became calm (and serene). Full of wisdom, he was (quiet) like a calm ocean unperturbed by waves. With highest devotion to Lord Vāsudeva, the Omniscient, the inner controller (antaryāmin) of all beings, he realized his Supreme Soul and became free from bondage (of ignorance).

46. He saw his Supreme Soul abiding in all beings and realized all beings within God and within his own Self (Ātman) as well.
47. He became free from desires and hatred (likes and dislikes). He looked upon all as equals. With highest devotion to the Lord, he attained Liberation (place where all bhāgavatas reach).

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

(Dialogue between Kapila and Devahūti: Importance of the Bhakti-yoga)

Śaunaka said:

2. I have heard many times about the Lord\(^{774}\) (Kapila). But really my senses are not fully satisfied by hearing his glory. Kapila is the seniormost (best) among all persons and the greatest among the Yogins.

Sūta said:

4. (Just as you now ask me), venerable Maitreya, the friend of Dvaipāyana was also urged (by Vidura) to explain the Science of Soul. Being pleased, he expounded this (doctrine) to Vidura.

Maitreya said:

5. When his father (Kardama) left for the forest, (they say that) praiseworthy Lord Kapila stayed in the Bindusaras with a desire to do good to his mother.

6. Devahūti who remembered the words of the creator (Brahmā), spoke the following words to her son who was sitting quietly (actionless), and who guided through, to the end of the Path of Knowledge (or Sānkhya Šāstra).

Devahūti said:

7. Oh All-pervading Lord, I am extremely disgusted with the thirst for enjoying the objects of wicked senses. By catering to the (urge of the) senses, I find myself lost in the darkness of ignorance.

8. Today, at the end of many births, and by your grace, I have secured you as a good vision (insight) which leads to the end of this blinding darkness of ignorance which is very difficult to cross.

9. Your Honour is verily the first glorious Lord, the controller of all human beings. Just like the rising Sun (enabling people to see) you are an eye to the world which is blinded with the darkness of ignorance.

10. Hence, Oh Lord, you should dispel my delusion—the delusion viz. strong attachment to my body and my belongings (as ‘me and mine’) which has been created by you (in us).

11. With a desire to know (the real nature) of Prakṛti and Puruṣa, I have come for shelter to you who are worth resorting to for protection. I bow to you who are like an axe (to cut down and put an end) to the tree of Sāṁsāra of your devotees and are the greatest among the knowers of true dharma.\textsuperscript{775}

Maitreya said:

15. The mind is certainly regarded as (the cause of) bondage and liberation of the Soul\(^{782}\). When attached to the objects of senses, it causes bondage. But when attached to the Supreme Man, it leads to liberation.

16. When the mind is cleansed of impurities like lust, avarice etc. born of \textit{ahankāra} (ego) about one's self and one's belongings, it becomes pure, free from (non-responsive to) pleasure and pain, and is perfectly tranquil and in balanced state.

17-18. Then the man with his mind filled with knowledge, non-attachment (to the world) and devotion, realizes\(^{783}\) his Self (\textit{ātman}) to be absolute, distinct from and beyond \textit{Prakṛti}, immutable, self-luminous, atomic, indivisible, passive (non-participant) and (finds) \textit{Prakṛti} to be powerless\(^{784}\).

firm devotion to me. For my sake, they have abandoned all other activities and their friends and relatives.

23. Taking refuge in me, they listen and narrate sweet stories (about me). As their minds are fixed on me, various kinds of troubles do not affect them.

24. Oh pious Lady, there are the saints who have dissociated themselves from all attachments. Hence association with such deserves to be sought by you. (You should associate yourself with them) as they remove the evil of attachment (to worldly objects).

25. In association with saints, there are (discussions about my) stories which give proper and complete knowledge about my power and which are pleasant to the ears and the heart. By serving (listening to) them, there will soon develop intense faith in, love for and devotion to Hari—which is the path that leads to Liberation.

26. Due to devotion generated by contemplation of my sportive work (viz. the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe), a man gets disgusted with the pleasures of senses and to the objects seen (in this world) and to those reported (available in the world beyond). Being alert, and by practising Yoga, he tries to control his mind by easy and straight courses of bhakti Yoga.

27. By not enjoying the guṇas of Prakṛti and by his knowledge reinforced by Vairāgya (non-attachment) and by Yoga and devotion concentrated on me, he attains to me, who reside in all beings, in this very human body.

Devahūti said:

28. What type of devotion is proper for you? Of what description is it? So that thereby I can quickly and easily attain to your place namely Liberation (Mokṣa).

29. Oh embodiment of Liberation (nirvāṇa), what is the nature of the yoga spoken of by you as reaching the Supreme Lord directly like a shaft (hitting its target)? How many parts (aṅgas or auxiliaries) has it whereby one gets the comprehension of the reality.

30. Oh Hari! As I am a woman of slow understanding, please explain this to me so that I shall easily understand this difficult yoga by your favour.

Maitreya said:

31. Having thus understood the object of his mother, Kapila felt affection for her from whom he was born (lit. got a body for manifesting himself). He explained to her the enumeration of tattvas or Fundamental Principles which they call Sāṃkhya sāstra and also the extensive course of Bhakti-yoga (Path of devotion).

The Lord said:

32-33. In the case of man whose mind is one, i.e. unswerving the natural, effortless, abiding disposition (devotion) of the presiding deities of the cognitive sense organs (lit. sense organs which cognise objects) and of the conative senses (which perform the acts prescribed in the Vedas) to Hari, the embodiment of Sattva is Bhakti. This unselfish (free from worldly desires) devotion to the Venerable Lord is superior to Liberation (Mokṣa) as it makes the vesture or sheath of the Līṅga Śarīra (subtle body) dissolve just as the fire in the stomach digests the food that is swallowed (eaten).

34. Some do not desire to get one-ness with myself (i.e. Sāyujya Mukiṭi). They are delighted in serving (worshiping) my feet and are happily engaged in activities for my sake. With deep interest and affection, the devotees of the Supreme Lord enjoy in describing to one another my exploits.

35. Oh mother, these saints see my splendid heavenly forms with beautiful kindly face and reddish eyes—forms which bestow blessings on them. They speak with them in affectionate terms.

36. Even though the devotees do not covet for it, Bhakti takes to the subtle state (Mokṣa) the devotees, with their minds enchanted by and with their sense organs attached to those beautiful limbs of mine; my dignified movements, smiles, glances and sweet speeches.

37. After (the disappearance of Avidyā) they do not aspire after the magnificent enjoyments and prosperity (in Satyaloka and other places) of mine, the Lord of Māya. Nor do they wish for the eight super-human powers (siddhis) which naturally flow form Bhakti. Nor do they long for the auspicious wealth of the Supreme Lord in Vaikuṇṭha. But they do enjoy it in my region, the Vaikuṇṭha.

38. Oh Mother of perfectly serene mind, in Vaikuṇṭha, my devotees are never ruined. My weapon, the Winkless Time, does not affect them as I am their beloved Soul, (and am like) a son, friend, preceptor, relative and their beloved God.

39-40. I take them beyond Death (i.e. saṁsāra)—those who abandon this world as well as the next and their Self which wanders in both these worlds along with their Liṅga Śarīra (subtle body) and who give up their wealth, cattle, houses and such other belongings and resort with devotion to me who am Omnipresent (or have faces on all sides).

41. The terrible fear (of Saṁsāra) cannot be removed by anyone else except me, the Supreme Lord, the controller of Prakṛti and Puruṣa and the in-dwelling Soul of all beings.

794. madhāḥ—They entertain a strong desire to enjoy my beauty, sweetness etc.—VG.

795. aśvina gatim—Commentators express their differences of opinion about this final stage called Mokṣa as per the tenets of their schools. Thus with VR. it is ‘The subtle path called archir-mārga leading to Mukti. It is subtle as it is traversed by few’. With VJ. it is sāyujya-lakṣanā mukti wherein the jīva has similarity in attributes with God. To JG. and VG. it is subtle as it is beyond Prakṛti and hence difficult to grasp and giving ‘attendantship’ (pārśadayatsa) of God. To GD., it is the very resplendent subtle body of the residents of Vaikuṇṭha.
42. It is through my fear that the wind blows, the Sun shines, Indra showers rain, the fire burns and the Death does its duty.

43. By means of Bhakti-yoga strengthened by knowledge and renunciation, yogins resort to my feet, the (seat of) Mokṣa for eternal blessings.

44. If mind is firmly set on me by intense Bhakti-yoga, it becomes quiescent and steady. This is the only way for attaining the highest bliss in this world.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX

(Kapila's description of Creation (Śāṅkhya Cosmology)*)

The Lord said:

1. Now I shall explain to you separately the characteristics of the fundamental principles. By knowing these, man is liberated from the ties (guṇas) of Prakṛti.

2. I shall explain to you that knowledge which, as the wise say, cuts the knot of ahamkāra (egoism) in the heart, and

*Although the Śāṅkhya theory is described previously (vide supra II, 5, III, 7, III, 7 and implied in I, 1, 1) this chapter and the next give a more systematic exposition of the same. This account differs materially from the classical Śāṅkhya which is tacitly atheistic in its earliest available text ĪŚK. (Īśvarakṛṣṇa's Śāṅkhya-Kārikās) and expressly so in later works like Śāṅkhya aphorisms attributed to Kapila. As Dasygupta points out, the theistic Śāṅkhya in the Bh. P. is 'quite different and distinct' from 'the theistic Śāṅkhya of Patañjali and Vyāsa-bhāṣya.' (Hist. of Ind. Philo. IV. 36). Most of the Purāṇas of the Viṣṇu group and some of the important Pāncaśītra āgamas (e.g. the Aḥirbudhya-Saṁhitā) follow the Śāṅkhya theory as expounded in the Bh. P. If the table of contents of the Śaṭṭi-tantra as given in the Aḥirbudhya-Saṁhitā be that of the original work (as Dasygupta believes), the Śāṅkhya system might be originally theistic. But all discussions regarding the problem of the authorship and contents of the Śaṭṭi-tantra are mere speculations and inconclusive, despite the contributions of great scholars like Schrader, Keith, Garbe, Dasygupta and others. Hence the emphasis on ĪŚK—the earliest representative of classical Śāṅkhya here. leads man to self-realization, and ultimately to the summum bonum (Mokṣa).

3. *Puruṣa is the beginningless (eternal) Soul. (He is) attributeless, distinct from and superior to Prakṛti. He manifests (himself) inside and is self-luminous. The universe, thereby, becomes illuminated.

4. This all-pervading Lord, of his own free will, has accepted the subtle, divine Prakṛti constituted of three guṇas as a part of his līlā (sport).

5. He was here immediately infatuated796 with Prakṛti

* (i) VR. explains: Puruṣa is jīva. As he illuminates himself as well as other things, he is regarded as self-luminous. But unlike jāda (non-sentient) lamp, his light (knowledge) is useful for himself in becoming conscious of himself and others. He is distinct from Prakṛti i.e. its products like the body, sense-organs, mind, vital breaths etc. Hence he is free from Sattva and other guṇas of Prakṛti. He has pervaded all the universe by entering into gross and subtle bodies from god Brahmā to a blade of grass.

(ii) V.J. states: The Supreme Soul is eternal (lit. is beginningless and endless). He is not caused (created) by anything. He is Puruṣa—i.e. the bestower of perfect bliss. Or he is within all but unrelated to guṇas. He is beyond Prakṛti. He lives in the lotus called Abhi-mukha. He is illuminated by his own light. He has pervaded the world of moveables and immovables.

(iii) SD. interprets: He is beginningless, i.e. He existed before the creation and is the cause of everything else. He enters all and controls them and confers on the jīvas the fruits of their Kūrmas. He is the shelter and controller of Prakṛti. He is devoid of guṇas and governs the sentient and non-sentient universe. Being self-luminous he has pervaded all the universe.

(iv) VB. constructs it differently: He being devoid of attributes (guṇas) and being their cause, is himself uncreated by anyone. He is distinct from and unrelated to Prakṛti. He is the self-knower and self-luminous and is thus distinct from ahamkāra. Thus he is Ātman—free from body, guṇas. Prakṛti and Kāla. His self-luminosity is his extra-ordinariness (alaukikatāvam).

(v) SR. tells us that the adj. pratyag-dhātva refutes the Buddhist doctrine of momentariness and the adjectives—nirguna and svayaṃ-tyoti refute the Mīmāṃsaka and Prabhakara's views about the nature of the Soul.

796. mumuha: (i) identified himself with Prakṛti—VR.

(ii) V.J. credits Hari for deluding the jīvas by his will or Prakṛti which obscures the knowledge of jīva.

(iii) Jīva forgot his own real nature by the śṛtti of Prakṛti known as avidyā. Jīva had this knowledge before the creation (during the Deluge) but forgot it after creation.
which covers (obscures) knowledge and which creates various wonderful beings similar in attributes (gunaś).

6. In this way, due to his wrongly presumed identification with Prakṛti, Puruṣa regards the authorship of karmas (as vested) in him when (actually) the karmas are being done by the gunas of Prakṛti.

7. Though the Lord is (really) actionless, an unconcerned witness and blissful by nature, it involves him in saṁsāra (cycle of births and deaths), bondage and reduces him to a stage of dependence.

8. They (wise people) know that Prakṛti is the cause of the effect (i.e. the body assumed by Puruṣa in an embodied state), means (organs of senses) and the doership (the presiding deities of sense-organs). In reality, Puruṣa is distinct and beyond—superior to—Prakṛti; (but) he is the cause of all pleasures and pains as the experiencer, due to his identification with Prakṛti.797

Devahūti said:

9. Oh best among men, please tell me the characteristics of Prakṛti as well as of Puruṣa. They are the cause of this universe, which consists of both gross and subtle products.

The Lord said:

10*. They (the knowers) call that as Prakṛti which is Pradhāna—(the chief, ultimate first principle). It consists of 797. Cf.

kārya-kāraṇa-karītve hetub prakṛtir ucyate

VJ. explains the 2nd half: They know that it is Viṣṇu who is superior to Prakṛti, is the cause of Jīva’s experience of pleasure and pain. VC. endorses the same.

*According to ISK this mūla-Prakṛti is avyakta (3) and Pradhāna (11, 57 etc.). It appears that the original doctrine of eight-fold Prakṛti (probably related to levels of yogic awareness, vide Kaṭha. 3.10-11) was represented later as ‘vertical’ evolution with Prakṛti as the first Principle. The characteristics of the Prakṛti are enumerated in ISK as follows:

Hetumad anityam avyaktaṃ sakrityam anekam āśrītām liṅgam
Śārayatam pratantaram vyaktan viparitam avyaktaṃ // 10//

Avyakta is the opposite of vyakta which is caused, finite, non-perva-three guṇas (Sattva, rajas and tamas). It is (by itself) unmanifest and eternal. It is of the nature of both cause and effect. It is, by itself, undifferentiated and without any specialities, but it is the basis of (and hence possesses) specialities or attributes.

11. The learned know Brahman as comprising of the effects of Pradhāna—a collection of twenty-four principles, viz. five tanmātrās (subtle potentials of elements), five elements (mahā-bhūtas), four798 internal organs, viz. manas, buddhi, ahām-kāra and citta and ten (sense-organs consisting of five cognitive and five conative organs).

12. There are only five gross elements (mahā-bhūtas), viz., earth, water, fire (heat-light), air and the sky (space).

sive, active, plural, supported, emergent, composite and dependent’. The next Kārikā (11) further describes Prakṛti as ‘characterised by three guṇas undiscriminated, objective, general (sāmdhyā), non-conscious and productive.

A reference to the Bh. P. (supra I. 10, II. 5, III. 5, III. 7 etc.) will show that the Prakṛti is not an independent real as is presumed in the ĪŚK. God, in his desire to realize himself, reflects himself in the Prakṛti which is his own power, and it is through this impregnation of himself in his own power, that Prakṛti is enlivened by consciousness, and he appears as individual Souls suffering from the bondage of Prakṛti. It is through his creative effort called Kāla (Time) that the equilibrium of the guṇas of Prakṛti is disturbed and categories (or ‘Principles’) are evolved. Later (infra XI. 13, XI. 22 etc.) an extreme idealistic monism practically effaces Sāṁkhya realism, as the Bh. P. holds that ultimate reality is one and that all differences are merely in name and form. Prakṛti and its manifestations are due to the operation of the Māyā power of God. This Māyā is defined as that which manifests non-existent objects but is not manifested itself (Bh. P. II. 9. 33).

It will thus be found that the concepts of Prakṛti in the ĪŚK and in the Bh. P. are not the same. (For Kapila’s Philosophy in the Bh. P. vide Dasgupta—Hist. Ind. Philo. Vol. IV. 24. 24-48).

A systematic comparative study of the Sāṁkhya in the Bh. P. and the classical Sāṁkhya is beyond the scope of such foot notes.

798. I enumerated these on the basis of verse No. 14 below. But VR. states them as manas, ahamkāra, mahat and asyaktā (caturbhīr mano’-ahamkāra-mahāt-asyaktāt!). He later (verse 14) admits that if the four aspects of mind enumerated in this verse are counted as independent, the number of categories will be twenty-seven.
The subtle objects of these (elements), viz., smell and others, i.e. taste, colour-form, touch and sound are also the same in number according to me.

13. The sense-organs are ten: the ear, the skin, the eye, the tongue and the nose. (These are the cognitive organs). The organs of speech, the hands, the feet, the organ of generation and the anus is called (enumerated) as the tenth. (These are conative organs).

14. The internal organ has four aspects viz. manas, buddhi, ahamkāra and citta. (This) fourfold distinction is observed through its characteristic functions.

15. This much is the list of the enumerated principles of Brahman as conditioned by guṇas as explained (to you) by me. What is called ‘Time’ (Kāla) is the twenty-fifth principle.

16. Some regard Time (Kāla) as the super-human power of God (Īśvara) whence comes fear (death, samsāra etc.) to the jīva who is possessed by Prakṛti, and thereby is deluded by I-ness (ahamkāra) in identifying himself with the body.

17. Oh Manu’s daughter, that divine power is designated as Kāla which sets commotion in the undifferentiated guṇas of Prakṛti which were (originally) in a state of equilibrium.

18. He is the glorious Lord who dwells within all beings as a controller and yet is unaffected, and outside of them as Kāla.

799. tanmātrās: These are not included in old lists of evolutes in the BG. and Mokṣadharma (MBH). I believe that the Bh. P. is following BG. and MBH. in enumerating the objects of senses under tanmātrās. In the classical Śāṅkhya the objects of senses are left out of the list of tattvas. In it the tanmātās are the products of ahamkāra and serve as subtle potential of gross elements (Mahābhūtas vide ĪSK. 38.) G. J. Larsen writes: ‘The subtle elements function somewhat like manas... They are products of self-awareness and yet they in turn come in contact with or generate the external world’—Classical Śāṅkhya, pp. 205-6.

800. VJ. and VD. state the functions as follows: Buddhi leads to conclusions; manas entertains doubt; ahamkāra creates pride; citta is the cause of remembrance.

801. Sr. concludes: Thus there are twenty-four categories of Prakṛti. The twenty-fifth is the jīva (individual Soul) and Supreme Soul (Īśvara) which are identical.
19. The Supreme Man deposited his energy into his Prakṛti whose guṇas were disturbed and agitated by the adṛśta (unseen-destiny) of jīvas. She gave birth to the principle called Mahat which was resplendent (as if made of gold).

20*. That cause of the universe which is unchangeable (eternal), wished to manifest the universe which was lying within it in a subtle form. It drank up (dispelled) by its lustre the thick darkness (of the time of deluge) which was capable of covering it. (Mahat was absorbed in Prakṛti at the time of Pralaya).

21. (It is well known in the āgamas) that Mahat which is characterised by sattva-guṇa, pure, free from passions (like love, hatred etc.) and the place of the Supreme Lord, is the citta which is called Vāsudeva and it is composed of Mahat Tattva.\[802\]

It will thus be seen that the Bh. P. presents three aspects of Time: God, Power of God and Time-sequence. In this chapter, the Bh. P. deals with the first two aspects. Time is a supra-phenomenal reality. Its characteristic feature is to disturb the equilibrium of Prakṛti and set in motion the process of creation. It thus pre-exists creation. It is God's power, dynamism and effort, as it is a force driving the cosmic process to materialize into subtle and gross creation. Kāla pervades the mind of man as his inner controller and the external universe as time. When Bh. P. enumerates Time as the twenty-fifth category of Sāṁkhya, it refers to the concept of Time as God. When it takes Time as the power of Puruṣa, it refers to the second aspect. For details Bhattacharya PSB. I. 247–259.

*VR. takes this with reference to God: The Lord, the cause of the universe which is unchangeable, wanted to manifest the universe which was lying absorbed in Prakṛti within him. By his lustre (knowledge in the form of his will to create) he drank up (destroyed) the darkness (ignorance, the attribute tāmas) which obscured (restricted the knowledge of) jīvātman.

802. Śr. explains: From this verse the concept of the four vyūhas and how to worship them is given. Here what is considered from the causal or adhībhūta point of view is Mahat, the same is called citta from the point of adhyātma (relation to the body). It has Vāsudeva as an object of meditation (uṣṭāya) and kṣetrajña as the presiding deity (adhiṣṭhātṛ).

It is a sort of a synthesis between the Sāṁkhya and the Pāṇcarātra āgama. The four aspects of antaḥkaraṇa of the Sāṁkhya are connected with the vyūhas (manifestations of God) of the Pāṇcarātras as follows:

The Peñcarātra idea of Vyūha is briefly as follows:

Vyūha is derived from √ūh with vi—‘to push, to remove, to thruts’ (Apte PSD 307). At the end of mahāpralaya, the following six attributes of God are manifested: Jñāna (knowledge), aīśvarya (power), śakti (prowess), bala (supremacy), vīrya (energy) and tejas (splendour). (They may be approximately rendered as: 1. Knowledge—pure consciousness, 2. Independence of activity, 3. Potency to become the material cause of the world, 4. Fatiguelessness and power to sustain, 5. Unaffectedness, 6. Self-sufficiency, splendour. These six guṇas form the material of pure creation. The Vyūhas have a cosmological function while avatāras are concerned with the līlās.

The Vyūhas are four: Vāsudeva, Saṅkarṣaṇa, Pradyumna and Aniruddha, each having some cosmic functions. Their traditional representation may be summarised in the following table (vide the Sāttvata Saṁhitā 5, 9-18).

22. The definition of citta is given with reference to its attitudes (abiding states) such as clearness (capability to bear the reflection of the Lord), changelessness (absence of laya and viksepa) and tranquillity (freedom from passion). It is just like water in its pure state (before it comes in contact with the earth), changeless (free from foam, ripples etc.), sweet, transparent and clean.

23. The Principle called Mahat which was born out of the potentiality of the Lord, began to undergo modifications. From this Mahat was produced ego (ahamkara) of three kinds. It (ahamkāra) possessed potentiality to do active work.

24. (The three kinds of ahamkāra are) Vaikārika, taijasa and tāmasa (according as it is characterised by the sattva-guṇa, rajo-guṇa and tamo-guṇa respectively). From these is the creation of mind (manas), sense-organs and great elements (mahā-bhūtas).

25. (Herein the vyāha—manifestation of God—to be meditated is) the Puruṣa called Saṅkarṣaṇa. He has actually a thousand heads and is designated as Ananta (endless). He is of the form of aggregate of bhūtas (elements), indriyas (sense-organs and the mind).

26. The ahamkāra is characterised as being the doer (as devatā), the instrument (as the sense-organs) and the effect or product (as the bhūtas). Or it may be characterised by serenity (with sattva-guṇa), vehemence (with rajo-guṇa) and dullness (with tamo-guṇa).

27. The principle called mind (manas) was created from sātvoika or vaikārika ahamkāra undergoing modifications. It is characterised by thinking and special meditation and is the source of desire.

28. The wise persons know it by the name Aniruddha, the Supreme Master of sense organs. He is bluish in complexion like blue lotus in the autumn. He is to be gradually propitiated by yogins (as it is difficult to propitiate him).

29. Oh pious lady, from the taijasa ahamkāra undergoing modifications was created the principle called buddhi (which as distinguished from citta) is characterised by intelligence or 803. kāma-sambhava—The son of Kāma, i.e Pradyumna.

special knowledge of understanding reality and the power to favour sense-organs.

30. From the point of its aspects, it is separately characterized by doubt, misapprehension, correct determination, memory and sleep (or unconscious state).

31. All the sense-organs (indriyaṇi) classified as the conative and cognitive organs, are created from the Taijasa ahamkāra only. For conation (activity) is the power of Prāṇa (who directs the organs of action). And cognition or the power of understanding and knowing is the power of Buddhi (which controls the cognitive organs). —Both Prāṇa and Buddhi being products of the Taijasa ahamkāra, all the sense-organs are also the products of the Taijasa ahamkāra.

32. From the Tāmasa ahamkāra which was prompted by the Power of the Lord, was produced the tanmātrā called Sound (‘the sound-potential’). Thence came forth the Mahābhūta (gross-element) called Space (ākāśa) whence was evolved the sense of hearing which receives sound. 804

33. The wise people know the characteristic of Sound to be the capacity to convey meaning or ideas, to serve as an index of the seer (or the speaker), and to work as the subtle-potential of the space (sky).

34*. With reference to its functions, the characteristics of the space (ākāśa) are to provide space for beings, to pervade them within and without, to afford support (abode) to Prāṇa, sense-organs and the mind.

35. Out of the Space (ākāśa) characterised by its subtle-potential sound, while undergoing modifications by the force of Kāla (Time), there arose the subtle-principle of Touch. From it evolved the Vāyu (wind) and thence the Skin (tvac) the sense-organ of touch which gathers i.e. comprehends touch.

36. The chief characteristics of the Touch (sparsa) are softness, hardness, cold and heat. It is the subtle principle of Vāyu (wind).

804. Cf. supra III. 5. 32.
* SR., VR. remark that in this way the following verses consist of groups of three, the first describing the creation of the gross-element, the second verse giving the characteristic of that tanmātrā and the third the characteristic of the mahābhūta.
37. From functional point of view, Vāyu is characterised by movement (of branches of trees), collecting together (of grass etc.) reaching (of things), carrying of particles (e.g. fragrance to the nose) and sound (to the ear) and giving strength to all sense organs.

38. When Vāyu with its characteristic subtle principle touch, was impelled by Destiny, was evolved the tanmātra (subtle principle) called Rūpa (Form—colour). Out of it arose Tējas (heat—light) and the eye which is the sense to grasp Rūpa (Form—colour).

39. Oh good lady, to give form to a substance, to be its attribute, to be co-extensive (and co-existent) with the substance as well as to be Tējas (heat-light) itself, are the abiding characteristics of the tan-mātra Rūpa.

40. To illuminate, to cook (food), to intoxicate, to destroy cold, to dry, to make one feel hungry and thirsty—these are the effects of Tējas.

41. When Tējas with its subtle principal(tanmātra) Rūpa (Form—colour) was undergoing modifications by being incited by Fate (daiva), the tanmātra called rasa (taste) was evolved. From it was produced water and the Tongue (the sense of taste) which grasps (apprehends) taste.

42. Due to the effect of substances mixed with it, rasa (taste), though only one, becomes distinguished as many, such as astrigent, sweet, bitter, pungent, sour (and salty).

43. Moistening, making adhesive, giving satisfaction, sustaining life, refreshing by satisfying thirst, softening, removing heat and exhaustion, abundance (unfailing continuous supply) or the preponderance (of water in the constitution of body)—these are the characteristic properties of water.

44. When water along with its subtle principle rasa was impelled by Destiny (daiva) and was undergoing modification, the subtle principle Smell was evolved. Thence was formed the earth, and the Sense of Smell (nose) which cognises smell.

45. Due to the different proportions of mixing up of particles of substances, the smell, though one, is distinguished as mixed smell, bad odour, strong fragrance, mild fragrance (as of a lotus), strong smell (as of garlic), acid smell and others.
46. The characteristic functions (and properties) of Prthvi are formation into an image of Brahman, independent stability in a position (without the support of jala etc.), supporting other objects (like water), to be the means of making distinction in ākāśa (such as ghaṭākāśa, maṭhākāśa etc.), to help distinctions in all beings and their qualities.

47. That is called the ear (the sense of hearing) of which the special characteristic is the apprehension of sound (śabda), the special attribute of the Space (ākāśa). They (the learned ones) know that to be the sense of Touch, the speciality of which is apprehension of touch, the special characteristic of Vāyu.

48. That is called the sense of seeing (eye) of which the object of perception is Tejas (Form—colour), the special quality of Tejas (Heat—Light). The wise know it to be the sense of taste (Tongue), the special object of which is rasa (taste) which is the special characteristic of Water. That is called the sense of smell (nose), the principal object of which is smell, the special characteristic of the earth.

49. The property of the cause is inherently found in the effect. Hence cumulatively, all the characteristics (of all elements) are found in the earth.

50. When the seven\textsuperscript{805} principles such as Mahat and others remained separate (there was no creation of the universe so) the creator of the universe along with Kāla (Time), karma (action or aṇāṣṭa) and guṇas entered into them.

51. Out of those principles synthesised and (thrown into commotion by him,) thre came forth the inactive, unintelligent Egg of the universe. From it arose the Virāṭ-puruṣa.

52. This Egg of the universe is called Viśeṣa. It is surrounded, by (elements such as) water and others, each ten times bigger than the previous one. (All of them) are covered on the outside by Pradhāna. Here this extensive world is the body of Lord Hari.

53\textsuperscript{*}. The Supreme God (giving up inactivity) rose from \textsuperscript{805} viz. Mahat, ahamkāra and bhūtas. As per older tradition tanmātṛas are subsumed under bhūtas.

\textsuperscript{*} VJ. takes the Abl. in hiranymayad ... koṭi in the sense of Acc. and interprets : The great God Hari made the golden Egg of the universe lying in the water to rise above it. He entered it and also the body of Virāṭ the golden egg, lying on the water. After entering (= controlling) it, he pierced the vacant space\(^{806}\) therein in various ways.

54. From this\(^{807}\), at first was evolved the mouth. From the Mouth came forth the speech. Along with speech the Fire (Vahni) came out. Then were evolved two nostrils. Out of them was issued the sense of smell along with Prāṇa (vital breath).

55. From the sense of smell was evolved Vāyu. (Then) two eyes were formed and thence the sense of seeing. From this (sense) was evolved the Sun (Sūrya). (Then) were formed the ears. Thence issued the sense of hearing from which came forth the (presiding deities of) directions.

56. Then was evolved the Skin to virāj. Thence grew hair, beard, mustaches etc. from which were produced herbs and plants. Afterward was evolved the organ of generation (the penis).

57. Thence came forth the semen out of which was evolved water. Then was produced the anus whence the Apāna. From Apāna came forth Death which causes fear to the world.

58. (Thereafter) were formed the hands from which came forth strength. From them came forth Indra (Svarāj). (Then) were evolved the feet from which came forth locomotion or movement. Thence came forth Hari.

59. The blood vessels were then formed in him. From them was produced blood from which were issued rivers (goddesses presiding over rivers). Thence was evolved the stomach.

\(\text{Parīkṣa who was born of him. Dwelling within, he made space (अक़ादा in the form of the space in mouth (and other organs), differentiated and manifest.}

\(\text{VB. states : When Hari woke up from sleep, the sense organs were differentiated and evolved for enjoyment of the various amās of God.}

\(806. \text{khom—(1) a hole,—ŚR. (iii) The conative and cognitive sense-organs which were undifferentiated in his four-fooed body (was differentiated by him into different sense organs).}

\(807. \text{aga : VR. takes this gen. in the Abl. sense and interprets : God Brahmā’s body is an aggregate considered to be made up of parts each of which is consubstantially the same with the whole. From the mouth of this Brahmā’s aggregate body the mouths of individual gods were issued. From the mouth was differentiated the speech, and thence Fire, its presiding deity.}
60. From it arose hunger and thirst. From them came forth (the presiding deity of) the ocean. Then the heart was evolved in him. From the heart came forth the mind:

61. From the mind was born the Moon: Then Intelligence (buddhi) was evolved. From it came forth the Lord of Speech (Brahmā). Then (was evolved Ego (ahāṅkāra). Thence was evolved citta from which was born Kṣetrajña.

62. These gods (with the exception of Kṣetrajña—the individual Soul) who have arisen, were unable to make him rise (and to activate him). (Therefore) in order to rouse him (into activity) they, one by one, entered into their own spaces (appointed sense-organs).

63. God Agni (Fire) entered the mouth along with the speech, but the Virāṭ was not roused thereby. When Vāyu (Wind) entered the nostrils along with the sense of smell, but thereby the Virāṭ did not rise.

64. The Sun entered the eyes along with the sense of vision, but even then the Virāṭ did not rise. When the (deities presiding over) directions (along with the sense of hearing entered the ears, the Virāṭ did not get up.

65. When the gods presiding over herbs and plants entered the skin along with hair, the Virāṭ did not rise. When the (presiding deity of) water entered the organ of generation along with semen, the Virāṭ was not roused.

66. The god of Death entered the anus along with Apāna but the Virāṭ was not activated. Indra along with strength entered the hands but the Virāṭ remained inactive.

67. Viṣṇu, along with power of movement, entered the feet but the Virāṭ was not roused. Goddesses of rivers entered the blood vessels along with blood, but the Virāṭ was inactive.

68. The (god of the) ocean entered the stomach along with hunger and thirst, but the Virāṭ remained unaroused. The Moon entered the heart along with the Mind, but the Virāṭ was not roused.

69. Even Brahmā entered the heart along with intelligence (buddhi) but the Virāṭ did not get up. When Rudra along with ahāṅkāra entered the heart, (still) the Virāṭ was not-roused.

70. But when Kṣetrajña (the intelligent individual Soul), the master of citta entered the heart, the Virāṭ Puruṣa immediately was roused and got up from water.

71. Just as Prāṇa (vital breath), sense organs, mind and intelligence are not able to wake up the (body of a) sleeping person by their own power without his (kṣetrajña’s) help (so was the case with Virāṭ Puruṣa).

72. By devotion unto God, (leading to) non-attachment to anything else, and with mind inclined to and concentrated by Yoga, and the knowledge obtained by it, one should meditate on the Soul (Pratyagātman) within oneself as different from it (from the chain of causal-relations)*.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SEVEN

(The Sāṃkhya Philosophy—Prakṛti and Puruṣa)

1. Though Puruṣa (the Soul) resides in the body (which is a product of Prakṛti), he is not affected by the guṇas of Prakṛti (such as pleasure, pain etc.), just as the Sun (in the sky) reflected in the water (is not affected by the qualities of or changes in the water). For the Puruṣa is destitute of guṇas; hence his freedom from action and the consequent changelessness.

* GD. makes explicit the process implied above by ŚR. The first stage is devotion (bhakti) of nine kinds. When the heart is purified by devotion, there arises non-attachment to pleasures or worldly things. Then comes the knowledge about the distinction between Prakṛti, Puruṣa and Īśvara. By that knowledge, understanding the individual Soul (Pratyagātman) to be different and distinct from the body which is an aggregate of cause and effect, one should, with mind trained for concentration by yoga discipline, meditate on the Kṣetrajña or Pratyag-ātman.

 (i) VR.: Jīva, though abiding in a body (a product of Prakṛti) is not affected by the guṇas of Prakṛti such as the form of existence as a god or a man or pleasure, pain etc. For the real nature of jīva does not undergo any change by his birth as a man or god. He is not the doer of the activities of his body, and is free from guṇas like satwa etc. He is like the image of the Sun in the water—the real remaining unaffected by changes in the reflecting medium. Jīva and the body have thus no connection
2* When this (jīva) is attached to the guṇas of Prakṛti, he becomes deluded by ahamkāra and regards himself as the doer (through false attribution).

3. Due to that (Ahamkāra), he loses his independence and blessed state. By the force of the (detrimental) effects of karmas due to the association with Prakṛti, he gets involved in sāṃsāra in some form of existence, good (as a god), bad (as a sub-human being) or mixed (as a man).

4. (The Soul being the non-doer), the real bondage of karmas does not exist. But sāṃsāra does not cease to be till (viprakāśa) from the point of place (deśa); time (Kāla) and nature (svabhāva).

Alternatively VR. interprets Prakṛti dharma as a birth in the from of existence as a man or a god, and states these dharmas do not belong to the jīva. His appearance as a man or a god is a false impression (bhrānti).

(ii) VJ : The Supreme Being and the jīva reside in the same body. But Viṣṇu being perfect is not affected by pleasure, pain, birth, death etc. for he is not affected by the six vikāras (changes such as birth, growth etc.). He is not dependent for his action on anybody, and hence an absolute agent. He is free from guṇas e.g. sattva etc. He is like the Sun, unaffected by the changes in the water wherein he is reflected.

(iii) JG., VC. follow ŚR. in general.

(iv) VB. : Although jīva is found in a body, he is merely reflected in the Prakṛti like the Sun in the water. He is not 'greased' by the guṇas like sattva etc. for there is no vikāra (change) in him. He has no adṛṣṭa and hence no action.

* (i) VR: The Soul is different from Prakṛti. But his (false) identification of himself with the body obscures his real essential nature. When he is attached to the guṇas of Prakṛti (like sound, taste etc.), he becomes egoistic that he is the independent doer and gets the bondage.

(ii) VJ : When the jīva is attached to the guṇas i.e. his body which is composed of guṇas, he is deluded by Ego. Consequently he forgets the essential nature of the Lord and his own limits as a dependent doer.

(iii) SD : Though the Soul is really free, he wrongly identifies himself with guṇas and out of egoism he gets deluded to regard himself as a man or a god and considers himself as the agent.

(iv) VB : guṇas cannot do anything independently. The Soul being cetana (sentient), transfers his own attributes to them (just as the Sun makes water hot though it is cool by nature). After thus controlling guṇas he becomes deluded by identifying himself with the guṇas, and (wrongly) thinks that he is the door.

(i) VR : The forms of a man, god etc. are not real forms of the Soul. But as long as he thinks about objects of senses, this calamity he is brooding over the objects (of senses), just as one experiences misfortunes in a dream (even though it is unreal).

5. Therefore, the mind which is attached to the wicked path of sensual enjoyment, should be gradually brought under control by the Bhakti yoga (path of devotion) and intense non-attachment (to worldly objects).

6-11. He who practises meditation by the paths of yoga characterised by aṅgas (stages) like yama, niyama etc., is full of faith (in me) by real, sincere love to me, and by listening to stories about me, looks upon all beings as equal, renouncing all attachment and company; hates nobody, practises celibacy and observes silence, follows his own duties which are powerful on account of his offering them to God, that sage who is satisfied with whatever he gets by chance, is moderate in eating, resorts to solitude, is serene and friendly to all and self-controlled, does not entertain false attachment (like ‘me’ and ‘mine’) to his body and its dependents or property, has the knowledge whereby one can realize the truth about Prakṛti and Puruṣa, has superseded the stages like wakefulness, sleep etc., and hence has ceased to see other things except God. The self-seer sage realizes his Soul (Atman) by his Self (conditioned by ego) just as one sees the Sun (in the sky) by the eye which is also a modified Sun, (such a sage) attains to that non-dual (absolute) Brahman which is completely distinct and free from the subtle-body (liṅga-sarīra) and which appears as real in unrealities like ahamkāra which is the friend, i.e. the support of Pradhāna; which is like an eye to the Asat (i.e. which sheds light on Mahat etc.) and which is woven fully into all causes and effects.

12. Just as the reflection of the Sun in the water is seen by its reflection on the (wall inside the house on the) shore of samsāra persists just as in a dream he experiences pain etc. though his body in the dream is unreal.

(ii) VJ. thinks the God’s grace is essential for the cessation of samsāra.

(iii) VC.: Even though karmas are unreal, the Soul due to his ahamkāra as being the doer broods over the objects (and gets bound in samsāra by the actions done by his body).
(at first)⁸⁰⁸ and just as (thereafter the real Sun in the heaven) is noted due to its reflection in the water.

13* Similarly _ahāmkāra_ of three kinds as typified by three _gūnas_ is seen as the reflection of _Sat_ by the images of _ātman_ which are conditioned by the _bhūtas_ (body), _indriyas_ (sense-organs) and the mind. By the reflection of the _ātman_ in _ahāmkāra_, the real _ātman_ whose essential nature is knowledge, is realized.

14. When, due to sleep, the _bhūtas_, their subtle principles (_tanmātras_), sense-organs, the mind, intelligence and others (such as _ahāmkāra_) are completely absorbed in the unmanifest _Prakṛti_, that which remains awake and free from _ahāmkāra_ (in the dead-like sleeping body) is the Soul.

15. In that state, when the _ahāmkāra_ is dormant (lit. lost), the Seer (_the jīva_), though himself is not lost, wrongly thinks that he is lost, like a man stricken with grief at the loss of his fortune, feels (about himself).

16. In this way, having thoroughly thought over (this distinctness of the _ātman_), he realizes the Soul which is the basis and the illuminator of all the matter (or combination of cause and effect) including _ahāmkāra_.

_Devahūti_ said:

17. Oh Lord, Brahman, as both ( _Prakṛti_ and _Puruṣa_) are interdependent (for their manifestation) and eternal, _Prakṛti_ never leaves the _Puruṣa_.

18. Just as the existence of smell and the earth (the smelling substance) or of taste and water cannot be mutually separate, _Prakṛti_ and _Puruṣa_ cannot be logically discontinuous (i.e. cannot exist separately).

⁸⁰⁸ VJ. adds one more interpretation: Just as the reflection of the face in water indicates the real face (person) standing on the bank, similarly the reflection of the Sun in the water leads to the knowledge of the real Sun in the sky.

* VJ. gives a totally different meaning: _Śeṣa_ is the presiding deity of three types of _ahāmkāra_ (according to three _gūnas_). He is seen through his reflections viz. the presiding deities of _bhūtas_, _indriyas_ (sense organs) and the mind ( _manas_). By the reflection called _Śeṣa_, the fourfaced Brahmā is perceived, and through the reflection called Brahmā is seen Lord Nārāyaṇa, the knower of the reality.
19. How can there be emancipation (lit. alone-ness) from Prakṛti when the guṇas of Prakṛti are in existence. These guṇas form bondage of karmas to Puruṣa who is (essentially), inactive.

20. Sometimes the terrible fear (of samsāra) may seem (practically) recede by careful reflection about the Principles (considered above). But as its cause (viz. the guṇas of Prakṛti) is not destroyed, the fear appears again.

21-23. By performance of one's duties (according to one's Varna—caste—and āśrama—stage in life) without any desire for its fruit, by pure mind, and by devotion intensified by hearing the stories of Hari for a long period, by knowledge which has comprehended the reality, by a very strong aversion to the world, by yoga accompanied with asceticism, and by intense concentration (of the mind) on the Soul (ātman), Prakṛti, being consumed day and night, gradually disappears in this very birth like the piece of Śanti wood (from which fire is enkindled), the source of fire, (is burnt down by fire).

24. Prakṛti which has been abandoned after enjoying her (products), and whose evil effects are always seen, does not bear anything inauspicious (like the bondage of karma) to the Supreme Lord who is established in his magnificence.

25. Just as a dream presents a great many of calamities to a man who is not awakened (but is dreaming in sleep), but the same (dream) is not capable of deluding him when he is awake.

26. Similarly Prakṛti never causes any harm to one who has realized the Truth, and who has set his heart upon me, and who is delighted in realizing the Self (ātman).

27. When a sage is delighted in his own Self (ātman), and after going through many births is unattached and averse to everything upto (i.e. including) the region of Brahmā.

28-29. (and being) my devotee has realized the true Self, by my grace, he easily attains to his essential state, as distinct from his physical body,—a state of final beatitude called Kaivalya. The wise man who has cut asunder all doubts (i.e. pseudo-knowledge) by his vision of the Self (ātma-jñāna) goes by my grace to the state attained after the destruction of the subtle body (liṅga-saṅkha) and from which state there is no reversion (to saṁsāra).

30. Oh mother, when the mind of the Siddha (the emancipated sage) is not attached to the miraculous powers born of yoga and obtained through yogic practice, then only is attained the ultimate state pertaining to me—a state where even the death cannot laugh (is powerless).

CHAPTER TWENTY-EIGHT

(Exposition of the Aṣṭāṅga-Yoga (the eightfold Path of Yoga)

The Lord said:

1. Oh Princess, I shall explain to you the nature of the sa-bīja⁸⁰⁹ type of Yoga, by practising which only, the mind becomes tranquil and pure, and goes to the path (leading) to Brahman⁸¹⁰.

2*. Performance of one's religious duties according to one's capacity, aversion to irreligion, contentment in what one obtains by the Lord's grace (or one's fate); worshipping the feet of those who have realized the Soul (ātman).

3. Abstention from duties pertaining to dharma, artha and kāma (the first three common goals in life), devotion to duties leading to mokṣa (liberation), eating pure food in moderation and permanent stay in a safe, secluded place.

4. Non-violence, truthfulness, non-stealing, acceptance of only the bare necessities of life, celibacy, penance, purity,

⁸⁰⁹. sa-bīja: The Yoga is of two types; sa-bīja and ni-rbīja. Sa-bīja requires an object for meditation (ŚR.) which is according to VJ. & VD. Viṣṇu. The ni-rbīja-yoga consists of curbing the wavering mind and subjugating it solely to the Self as prescribed in the BG. 6.26 (VB.).

⁸¹⁰. sat-paṭam—(i) The path of bhakti (RR.); (ii) The path leading to the realization of ātman (VB.) or of the Lord (VB., SD.).

* Although the commentators label the virtues enumerated in these (2-6) verses as yama and niyama, the first two āṅgas of Yoga, it is an elucidation of Ys. 2.30-32. Cf. the list of virtues in BG. 16.1-3; 17.7-11, 17.14-16 as 'means to knowledge' as the daivi sampad and as moral discipline (tapas) study of Vedas (or Śāstras), (ritualistic) worship of the Supreme Man.

5. Silence, ever-firmness in bodily posture and steadiness, gradual control of breath, mental withdrawal of senses from their objects into the heart.

6. Concentration of the mind and the breath in one of the plexuses (like the mūlādhāra cakra), constant meditation of the lilās (sports, actions) of Lord, and concentration of the mind on God.

7. By these and other means (such as observance of vows, giving donations) one should attain control over his breath, and deliberately and without slackness, direct the mind to the right path—mind which has become polluted by going to the path of worldly enjoyment.

8. Having firmly fixed his seat in a clean holy place, he should (firstly) get (thorough) control of his bodily posture. He should comfortably⁸¹¹ be seated on that seat, and keeping his body erect, he should practise (breath-control).

9. He should purify the passage (path) of the breath (the respiratory system) by systematic inhalation, retention and exhalation of breath or vice versa, so that the mind becomes quiescent and steady.

10. The mind of a yogin who has mastered his breathing, becomes pure immediately just as gold melted by the blast of wind and fire, gives up the dross mixed with it.

11. One should burn one's impure humids in the body by breath-control, the sins by Dhāraṇā⁸¹², the attachment to objects of senses by Pratyāhāra⁸¹³ and undivine qualities by meditation.

12. When one's mind becomes pure and properly steady

* This is practically a quotation from BG. 6.11-13.

⁸¹¹ svasti: ŚR. reads svastikam āśnam and interprets: 'in the bodily posture called svastikāsana'. He quotes a verse describing this posture. VR., VC., SD., VB. follow ŚR.

⁸¹² Dhāraṇā—'Fixed attention' is binding the mind to a place like a plexus (cakra) in the body—YS. 3.1.

⁸¹³ Pratyāhāra—sva-ūpiyāṇamprayogena śītasya svārāpāṇakāra tōmadṛṣyāpāṅk pratyāhāraḥ / YS. 2.54. 'Pratyāhāra (withdrawal of the senses) is as if the imitation of the mind-stuff itself on the part of the organs by disjoining themselves from their objects'. Wood—YSP. 197-98.
(poised), by \textit{Yoga}, one should meditate on the form of the Supreme Lord, with his eyes fixed at the farthest end (the tip) of his nose.

13*-18. The Yogin should meditate on the complete form of God, till his mind is completely fixed on God; whose lotus-like face is kindly (i.e. gracious); whose eyes are reddish like the interior of a lotus; whose complexion is dark-blue like the petals of a blue lotus; who is holding (in his hands) a conch, a disc (\textit{Sudarśana-cakra}) and a mace (\textit{Kaumodaki gadā}) whose silk garments are yellow like the bright (shining) filaments of a lotus; whose chest bears the mark of Śrīvatsa; who wears the resplendent jewel \textit{kaustubha} around his neck; who is garlanded by a \textit{vanamālā} about which intoxicated bees are humming sweetly; who is adorned with invaluable necklace, bracelets, crown, armlets (\textit{aṅgada}) and anklets; whose waist (lit. hips) is engirdled by a lustrous belt; whose seat is in the lotus-like hearts (of his devotees); who is the most beautiful, serene, delighting the eyes and the minds (of his devotees); who is extremely charming to look; who is ever bowed (and respected) by all the worlds; who appears like a boy (of fifteen) in age; who is eagerly absorbed in (showering) grace on his servants; whose holy fame deserves to be eulogised; who has enhanced the fame of Bali and other \textit{puryaśālokās} (persons of hallowed name).

19. With his mind full of pure devotion, he should contemplate the God as standing, walking, sitting, lying, or occupying his heart—Lord whose \textit{ltās} are worth looking.

20. When the sage finds that his mind becomes concentrated on all the members of the body of the Lord as a whole, he should try to fix on the members (of the body of the Lord) one by one.

21. He should reflect (contemplate) the lotus-like feet of the Lord which are enriched by the (lines showing) marks of the Vajra, the goad (\textit{aṅkuta}), the banner (\textit{dhoja}) and the lotus, and the lunar rays emanating from whose group of prominent, reddish, refulgent (toe-) nails have dispelled the dense darkness in the hearts (of his devotees).

* From this verse, the author gives the different mental representations of Viṣṇu on which the Yogin should meditate in a serial order.
22. One should contemplate for a long time the lotus-like feet of the Lord—Feet, the waters washing which flowed forth and became a great river, the Gaṅgā. God Śiva bore the sacred waters (of the Gaṅgā) on his head and became supremely auspicious. (One should meditate on) those feet which are like a thunderbolt discharged against the mountain of evils (sins) in the mind of the meditator (or the feet which detonate the Vajra, the mark on his feet, against the mountain of evils).

23. One should contemplate in one’s heart (the pair of the shanks and) knees of the All-pervading Lord who liberates from samsāra—the knees which are placed on her thighs and are gently served (pressed and massaged) with her brilliant sproutlike hands by Lakṣmī of lotus-eyes, who is the mother of god Brahmā, the creator of all the worlds.

24. (One should meditate in one’s heart on) the thighs of the Lord which appear superbly beautiful on the shoulder of Garuḍa, and which are the source (or reservoir) of strength, and are like Atasikā (linseed) flower in complexion. He should further contemplate his waist or round hips which are encircled (lit. embraced) with a girdle which belts his yellow garment (Pitāmbara) reaching up to his ankles.

25. (One should contemplate) his deep lake-like navel on the stomach which is like a cave accommodating all the worlds and from which sprouted forth the lotus which was the seat of God Brahmā and the abode of the universe. One should meditate on his pair of emerald-like nipples which appear bright and white by the rays of the shining wreaths of pearls.

26. One should then contemplate in one’s heart the chest of the great God (Hari) which is the resting place of his Supreme Power (goddess Mahā-lakṣmī), and which brings great joy to men’s minds and eyes. Next, one should meditate upon the neck of Lord Hari who is bowed down by all the worlds—the neck which beautifies the Kaustubha jewel.

27. One should then visualize for meditation his arms, the armlets on which got burnished by the circular movements of the Mandāra mountain (while the ocean was being churned for the nectar)—arms which are the support of the Lokapāla (deities protecting the world). (One should then contemplate) the Sudarśana disc of one thousand blades (spokes) of unbearable splendour (and velocity), and the conch which looks like a royal swan in his lotus-like hand (due to whiteness of the conch and the swan).

28. Then one should remember (contemplate) the Lord's beloved mace, Kaumodaki, besmeared with the thick (mudlike) blood of inimical warriors. (Then one should contemplate) the garland (in his neck) which is (as if) resonant with the humming swarm of bees around it. He should (next) meditate on the spotless jewel Kaustubha which represents the essential principle of jīvas 814 (beings).

29. One should (then) properly contemplate the lotus-like face of the Lord who, with his mind full of compassion for his servants, has assumed a form (incarnation) in this world—(his) face (beautiful) with shapely prominent nose and spotless cheeks illuminated by the oscillations of the refulgent earrings of crocodile-like shape.

30*. With close attention, one should contemplate in mind the lotus-like face of Hari which manifests itself in the mind—face looking beautiful due to the locks of curly hair around it, and lotus-like eyes with flashing charming eyebrows, and which thus surpasses in beauty the lotus-abode of Lakṣmī, which, due to its beauty is attended upon (hovered round) by black-bees and resorted to by a pair of fish.

31. With perfect and intense devotion one should contemplate for a long time the glances of the eyes of Hari who is dwelling in the cave in the form of one's heart—glances which are cast with great mercy and favour for soothing the terrible-most afflictions of three types (—ādhyātmika, ādhikau- tika and ādhidāivika), and which are accompanied with affec-

814. The gem, Kaustubha represents the Soul—the jīva-tattva—VR., JG.
Cf. Āmanam aya jagatu nirlepam aguṇāmalaṃ /
   Bibharti Kaustubha-mañi-stavaṃ  bhagavan Hariḥ //
   —VP. 1.22.68.

'Lord Hari wears on his neck the gem Kaustubha which is a form of the Soul of the living beings. It is destitute of any deposit, guṇa or dirt.'

* By clever arguments VB. tries to show that, the nine-fold devotion is described in verses 29 and 30.
tionate smile, and which confer abundance of grace (upon his devotees).

32. (One should then contemplate) Hari’s most enchanting smile which dries up the sea of tears caused by the intense grief of all the people who bow to him; (and should meditate on) his circular eyebrows which he has bent by his Māyā to entice and delude the god of love for the sake of sages (whom he—the god of Love—disturbs in their meditations).

33. Viṣṇu manifests himself in the cave of the heart in one’s body. With a heart full of (lit. moistened with) devotion, one should contemplate on Viṣṇu’s loud laugh as an object of meditation—laugh which exhibits his row of teeth like Kunda buds, which appear reddish by the bright glow of his lower lip. Having dedicated one’s mind to him, one should not desire to look anywhere else.

34. In this way (of meditating on the Lord) the sage gets the love of Hari engendered in him. His heart is melted with devotion. He finds his hair standing on their ends through ecstatic joy. Due to the tears of joy flowing on account of his ardent love for God, he finds himself frequently submerged in the flood of joys. He gradually disentangles himself from his heart which is like a hook to secure the Lord.815

35*. When the mind becomes unattached and with-

815. citta-baḍiśam etc. (i) The angle in the form of citta which hooks up the Lord who is difficult to capture—ŚR.

(ii) He should gradually disengage his mind from the person of the Lord which is to be mediitated. He should then meditate on his prayag-dīnā (Soul).—VR.

(iii) The sage who directs the hook of his heart to the Lord—the object of contemplation, disengages it (and enters samādhi without any purposeful efforts).—VJ.

This is the method of sabjā samādhi.

(iv) The heart of Yogan is hard like a hook. Its touch is troublesome to the Lord. When this hook is removed (disengaged), God confers experience of Prāyaṇa-dīnā and Mokṣa on the Yogan but not the experience of the Supreme Soul.

(v) The hook of the mind which is the instrument of grasping worldly objects and turned to meditation etc. which lead to the attainment of Hari.

—SD.

*VR. ’s explanation may be summarised as follows:

When mind becomes unattached, it becomes destitute of objects of senses like a flame of lamp free from smoke. When the mind ceases to ...drawn from the sense-objects, it loses its support (to function as the meditator has no standing in the absence of the object of meditation. It becomes dissolved in Brahman (i.e. its being is transformed into Brahman) just as a flame in the absence of its support (oil, wick etc.) becomes one with the Mahābhūta Fire. In this stage, a man who is free from the flow of gunas i.e. the limitations of the body etc. at once realizes his Soul directly as one (without distinction such as the meditator and the object of meditation).

36. Even he (the devotee or Yogan) becomes dissolved in Brahman which is beyond pleasure and pain. In this last stage attained by the practice of Yoga, his (Yogan’s) mind finally withdraws (and becomes free from avidyā). Tha Yogan thus realizes the essential nature of the Soul and transfers from himself the agency of the pleasure and the pain to ahamkāra (ego), known as asat which is the produce of avidyā.

37. Just as an addict, blind with the intoxication of wine, is not conscious of the existence of the garment he has worn, the perfect Siddha who has reached the final stage (described above) is not conscious whether his body is sitting or standing or is removed to another place or has returned by the will of the destiny, because he (the siddha) has reached (realized) his real self.

38. So long as the karma which is the cause of the body is effective (and not exhausted) till that period the body along with the sense-organs which is at the mercy of the fate does definitely exist. But he who has mastered the Yoga upto the Samādhi and who has realized the thing (i.e. the Soul) does not again accept the body along with its attendants (the Prapañca) as if it is an appearance in a dream. (He becomes think about these and rises above the contemplation of forms etc., it abandons its external activities. Then the individual Soul loses attachment to his body and the idea of being absolutely independent and directly finds himself to be a part or attribute of the Supreme Self.—VR.

V.C. : When mind becomes unattached and free from viparyas (objects of senses), it loses its stay or support, (as it has nothing to think about). Hence it naturally attains to nirvāna like the flame of lamp when deprived of its wick and oil. In this stage of dissolution of mind, jīva, directly experiences the identity of the pure Soul and individual Soul (jīva). Thenceforth he never returns to saṃsāra.
free from the ahānkāra regarding his body, his relatives, belongings etc.)

39. Just as a man is found to be different from his son or wealth, even though they are accepted as his own, similarly the Soul is distinct from his body (and things in association with it, though they are regarded as his self).

40-41. Just as the (real) fire is different from the fire-brand or from the sparks (emanating from it) or the smoke (issuing from it) or the burning wood is regarded as the fire, so also the Seer is different and distinct from bhūtas, sense-organs and the mind (antaḥ-karaṇa); the Brahman is different from what is designated as jīva, and the Lord (Supreme Soul) is different from Prakṛti.

42. Just as all types of beings (whether born from the womb or from the egg or from perspiration or germinating from seeds as plants) are identical from the point of their constitution from Mahābhūtas, similarly one should see (the identity of) the Soul (ātman) in all beings and of all beings in the ātman.

43. Just as the fire, though one, appears to be different according to the difference in the quality of its source (i.e. the shape, size and quality of the wood burnt by it)—similarly the embodied Soul appears different according to the difference in quality of its body (whether human, divine etc.).

44. Therefore, after conquering this incomprehensible Prakṛti, God Viṣṇu's own power, which is of the form of cause and effect (sat and asat), one remains in one's own (original, pure) form.

CHAPTER TWENTY-NINE

(The Path of Bhakti (Bhakti-Yoga) and The Power of Time)

Devahūti said:

1-2. Oh Lord, the accurate description of the Mahat and other principles and of the Prakṛti and Puruṣa as described in the Sāṅkhya-Śāstra has been narrated—the accurate description by which the real nature of these (Sāmkhya) principles is correctly understood. It is said to be the source of the Bhakti Yoga. Please tell (explain) to me in details the path of the Bhakti-yoga.

3. Oh revered Kapila, please tell me the different types of births (existences) of this world of living beings, by hearing which a man becomes free from attachment to everything (and everywhere) in the world.

4. Please tell me about the nature of your all-powerful Kāla or Time. He is regarded as the controller of the great (gods like Brahmā). It is because (of the fear of) Time that people take to good actions.

5. You have certainly manifested yourself as the Sun shedding light on the Yoga, in order to awaken the people who are ignorant and hence full of ahamkāra (pride) about unreal objects (like their body etc.) and are exhausted due to the attachment of their minds to actions (karmas) and are hence fast asleep for a long time in the unending darkness of samsāra.

Maitreya said:

6. Oh prominent Kuru! The great sage hailed with joy the beautiful speech of his mother. Being pleased with her and out of compassion (for her), he spoke to her.

The Lord said:

7. Oh mother, the path of Bhakti is regarded as having many branches; for the objects of men differ according to their natural dispositions and attributes (like sattva etc.)

8. He who becomes my devotee with the intention of doing injury (to others) or out of hypocrisy and jealousy or under the influence of anger or with an outlook full of differences (or with incorrect outlook of things), is called a Tāmasa type of devotee.

9. He who, with a desire of worldly pleasures or of fame or authoritative power, worships me in my images and entertains notions of difference, is a devotee of rājasa type.

10* He who wishes to purge all (his) karmas, or desires

---

* ŠR. and later SD. and GD. state that there are 81 types of saguna-bhakti. ŠR. details them as follows: 1-3 Tāmasa bhakti—actuated by injury (himsa), religious hypocrisy (dambha) and jealousy (matsara); 4-6 Rājasa to dedicate them to the Supreme Lord or worships the Lord with the simple objective of worship (and expecting no return for it) but entertains the idea of difference, is called a devotee of the Sāttvika type.

11-12. Just as the waters of the Ganga continuously flow into the sea, similarly by merely listening to (the description of) my qualities the mind incessantly flows to me who reside in the hearts of all (beings). This close and intimate devotion to the Lord (Puruṣottama), without any ulterior motive, is definitely regarded as the characteristic of the nirguna type of Bhakti yoga.

13. Even if the kinds of liberation (muktis), viz. residence in the same region with me (sālokya), equality in wealth, power and glory like me (sārṣṭi), staying near me (sāmīpya), similarity of form like me (sārūpya) and even union with God (skatva) are offered to these persons (the nirguna-bhaktas) they do not accept anything except my service.

14. That only is called the absolute (and the highest) Bhaktiyoga whereby one transcends the trinity of guṇas (and the saṃsāra caused by them) and attains to my state (Brahma-hood).

15. The mind of the man (my nirguna devotee) becomes purified by careful performance of daily religious duties without any motive, by performance of disinterested worship with ardent faith (as prescribed in the Pañcarātra ṛgama) without involving the least injury to beings.

16. by beholding at my image, by touching, worshippbhakti—motivated by the desire for objects of enjoyment, for reputation and for authority; 7-9 Sāttviki bhakti—generated by a desire to purge all sins, to dedicate karmas to God and to worship as a duty with no ulterior motive. Each of these is subdivided into nine according to the ninefold path of bhakti consisting of Śravaṇa, Kirtana etc.

816. VR. & VS. read a-ṛtha-g-bhāva : (i) The knowledge that he is like the body of the Lord (VR); (Who sees identity or oneness in my forms.

817. dyantika—That which takes place finally, i.e. sāyujya-tā (absorption into God).

818. nātiṁśreṇa—Some hina (injury) to subtle beings is inevitable while washing the temple, cooking food for offering to God, collecting flowers and fruit etc. for worship. But this injury is condonable.—VC.
ing praising and bowing to me, by regarding me (as residing) in all beings, by firmness or fortitude and non-attachment.

17. by paying great respect to the great, by showing compassion to the afflicted, by friendliness towards one’s equals and by observance of yama and niyama.

18. by listening to the philosophic discourses about ātman, by eulogizing the name (of God), by straightforwardness and by association with the noble (Souls) and by giving up ahamkāra.

19. As soon as such a devotee listens to (the description of) my attributes, he is easily attracted to me.

20. Just as fragrance being carried by (the chariot in the form of) the wind from its source (reaches the nose) and captures the smelling organ, similarly the mind which is constant and unperturbed and absorbed in yoga, attains to (and realizes) the ātman.

21. I am always abiding in all beings as their Soul (antaryāmin). A man who disregards me (the antaryāmin) performs a sham idol-worship.

22. He who foolishly neglects me, the controller of the world dwelling as a Soul (ātman) in all beings, and worships merely the images, is (as if), offering oblations in ashes (instead of in the fire).

23. The mind of a man who possesses ahamkāra (about his body identifying it with the Soul) and who hates me in another body regarding me as different (in every person) and contracts enmity with other beings, never attains tranquillity.

24. Oh sinless, I am not at all pleased with a person who slights all beings (even though) I am worshipped as an image by him, with (ritualistic) offerings of various articles (like sandle-paste, flowers, fruits etc.).

25. So long as a man does not realize in his heart that I, the Supreme Lord, am present in all beings he should perform his religious duties and worship me in an idol.

26* If a person makes even a slight difference between himself and the Supreme Self (Paramātman)\(^{819}\), I, who am Death, create a big fear for him who entertains the idea of difference.

27. Hence he should worship me by gifts and respectful behaviour, friendliness and equality of outlook—me who dwell in all beings as their Soul.

28. Oh auspicious mother, sentient beings are superior to non-sentient ones. Those who bear Prāṇa (have vital functions of respiration etc.) are superior to the sentient beings. To them are superior the possessors of citta. Those who possess the function of the sense organs are higher than the possessors of mere citta (mind).

29. Even amongst the possessors of sense-organs those who possess the sense of taste are higher than those who possess the sense of touch. To these are superior those who possess the sense of smell. Higher than these are the possessors of the sense of hearing.

30. Beings which know the difference in colour and forms (i.e. have the eyes) are higher than those possessing the sense of hearing. To these are superior, the beings who have teeth in the lower and upper jaws. Higher than these are the multipeds. Quadruped animals are superior to multipeds and bipeds are higher than the quadrupeds.

31. Among the bipeds, four Varṇas (castes) are superior and the Brāhmaṇas are the highest among them (the castes). Among the Brāhmaṇas, the reciters of the Vedas are higher. Superior to these are those who understand the meaning of the Vedas.

32. He who can solve doubts and difficulties (of Vedic interpretation) is superior to him who simply knows the meaning (of the Veda). To him is superior the performer of one’s prescribed religious duties. But a person who has renounced all association and does not desire the fruit of his religious acts is higher than the previous one.

33. Superior to him is the man who has dedicated all his actions and body to me and who does not entertain the notion of difference. I do not know anyone superior to a person who has dedicated his body to me, deposited his karmas in me, and has no ego of being the agent of any action and who sees all as equals.

\(^{819}\) Or: who regards body as coming in between his individual Soul and the Supreme Soul—ŚR.

34. One should understand that the glorious Lord himself has entered all beings as their jīva (individual Soul) and should pay great respects to them mentally and bow down to them.

35. Oh daughter of Manu, the Bhakti-yoga (the path of Bhakti) and Yoga (of eight stages) have been explained to you by me. By following one of them, a man will attain to God (the Supreme Man).

36. This is the form of the glorious Lord, the Supreme Soul, the Brahman. It is both Prakṛti and Puruṣa (and still) is also beyond them. It is the unseen destiny (daiva) which is the cause of all karmas (in the form of samsāra).

37. The divine form (of the Lord) which is the cause of the differences in the appearances of things, is called Time. From it, fear is caused to beings, which entertain the notion of difference and which preside over the Mahat and others.

38. He enters into all beings (bhūtas) and supports them all. He eats them up (annihilates them) by their means. He is called Viṣṇu, presiding deity of sacrifices who confers the fruit of the sacrifice (on the performer). He is the Time, the ruler of rulers.

39. Nobody is dear or inimical to him. He has no friend or relative. He is always alert and enters into the negligent people in order to destroy them.

40. It is out of his (Kāla’s) fear that the wind blows. It is due to his fear that the Sun shines. God Indra showers (water) out of his fear. Heavenly bodies shine out of his dread.

41. It is due to his fear that trees, creepers, plants and herbs blossom forth and bear fruits in the proper seasons.

42. It is out of his fear that the rivers flow and the sea does not overflow his fixed limits. Being afraid of him, the fire burns and the earth (burdened) with mountains does not submerge (in the sea).

43. It is due to his control that the sky affords space for living (breathing) creatures and the Principle Mahat expands its body into the world enveloped in seven sheaths.
44. It is out of his fear that (Brahmā and other) gods who preside over the guṇas (like sāttva etc.) and who can control this mobile and immobile world (creatures), carry out their duties of creation etc. in every Tuga.

45. He is endless but puts an end (to all). Time is beginningless but marks the beginning of all. He is immutable. He causes beings to be born of parents and causes the end of antaka (god of death) by means of death.

CHAPTER THIRTY
(Samsāra and Sufferings in Hell)

Kapila said:

1. Just as a row of clouds does not know the force of the mighty wind even though they are dispersed by it, similarly the people, though at the mercy of Time—Kāla—certainly do not know the great prowess of the mighty Time.

2. Whatever object (of pleasure) a man acquires with great efforts for the enjoyment of pleasures, the omnipotent Lord destroys it (lit. shakes it off) and the man grieves over it.

3. For it is out of delusion that an ignorant person regards as permanent that which belongs to this perishable body and its relatives such as the house, lands, money (and other property) which are transitory.

4. In whatever kind of existence (birth) a being is born in this samsāra, he feels happy in that (particular) birth. He is never disgusted (and unattached) with it.

5. The Jīva is so deluded with the Māyā of God that even in hell, while he has to subsist on and find pleasure in the products of hell, he verily does not desire to give up his (hellish) body.

6. With his heart deeply rooted in his body, wife, children, house, cattle, wealth and relatives, he regards himself as great and happy.
7. All his body is as if burning with anxiety of supporting these; (and) this ignorant person of evil intentions continuously goes on committing sins.

8. His mind and senses are attracted by the spell of the seductive charms of unchaste women in privacy, and by the sweet indistinct warbling of children.

9. He is prompt and watchful in the householder's life which is characterised by unfair moneydealings leading to a lot of misery. In such houses the householder regards it a pleasure to counteract the miseries.

10. He maintains them with money (and other objects) acquired here and there (in various ways and from any place) with great injury (and trouble to all). He can enjoy (but little of) what is left after their consumption. By (thus) maintaining them, he goes down (to hell).

11. When, despite his fresh attempts to start again and again, his means of livelihood become a failure, he becomes overpowered with greed. Growing weak, he begins to covet after another's property.

12. Being unable to maintain his family, the unfortunate fellow, whose all attempts have ended in failure, becomes destitute of wealth and miserable. Being at a loss to know what to do; the wretch goes on brooding and sighing.

13. Just as miserly farmers neglect old (and hence useless) bulls, his wife and others do not treat him with respect as before, as he has become incapable of maintaining them.

14-15. Even in that stage he does not feel disgust. He is deformed with old age and is approaching death. He is overcome with disease. He eats but little due to loss of appetite. His movements slow down and he is now nourished by those whom he had brought up. He stays in the house like a dog eating what is contemptuously thrown to him.

16. By the (vital) breath which is passing out, he has his eye-balls shot out. Phlegm chokes up the tubular passage (in his lungs). He suffers from extreme difficulty in breathing due to cough and asthma and a gurgling sound is heard in his throat.

17. He lies surrounded by his weeping relatives. He who is bound down with the noose of Death, does not reply, even though addressed (by his relatives).

18. In this way, a man who has devoted himself completely for the maintenance of his family and has not controlled his sense-organs, loses his consciousness (lit. intelligence, mind) through extreme pain and dies while his relatives are crying.

19. Then he sees two terrible-looking messengers of death with eyes full of anger. At their sight, with terrified heart, he passes on urine and excrement.

20. They perforce shut him (the jīva) in a body specially designed to torture him. Fastening a noose round his neck, they drag him along the rout (to the region of death) like the policemen (King’s men) do to convicts (persons to be punished).

21-22. His heart is breaking with their threats. He is trembling (with fear). On the way, hellish dogs bite him. Remembering his sins, he feels distressed. He suffers from hunger and thirst. On the road covered with hot sand, he is scorched by the heat of the Sun, forest-conflagration and (hot) blasts of wind. He is severely whipped on the back. Though weak and exhausted, he drags (on the road) where there is neither shelter nor water.

23. Now and then he faints exhausted. He rises again led by the most accursed dark path to the house of Yama (hell).

24. He is dragged within three or two muhārtas\(^{820}\) on this road of ninety-nine thousand Yojanas and undergoes the sufferings.

25. His body is burnt by surrounding it with firebrands. Sometimes he is made to eat his own flesh cut by himself or by others.

26. While he is alive, his entrails are dragged out by the hounds or vultures in the hell. He is subjected to torments by the biting and stinging of serpents, scorpions, mosquitoes and others.

27. His limbs are chopped off one by one. He is crushed by being trampled by the elephants and such other animals.

\(^{820}\) mukṣhā—A period of 48 minutes.
He is thrown down from the tops of mountains. He is confined and suffocated in caves or under water.

28. Whether a man or a woman, he or she undergoes extreme tortures of the hells called Tāmisra, Andha-tāmisra, Raurava and others as a result of mutual illicit relations.

29. Oh mother, some say that the heaven or the hell is here (in this world) only, because whatever tortures or afflictions are meted out in the hell are seen in this very world.

30. In this way, he who maintains his family or earns his livelihood only, gives up his family and his body, and experiences such kind of fruit for it after death (in the other world).

31. He who has collected only sins as the provision for a journey (in samsāra) has to give up his physical body which he has maintained by doing wrong to other beings and goes alone to the hell of darkness (andha-tāmisra hell).

32. A man who commits sins for feeding his family, experiences in hell their evil consequences brought to him by Destiny. He becomes afflicted like a man who has been robbed of his wealth.

33. The being (jīva) who is eager to maintain his family by irreligious behaviour only, goes to the Andha-Tāmisra hell, the lowest region of darkness.

34. He regularly undergoes suffering and miserable types of births (of sub-human beings below, which he has passed through before his rebirth as a human being). He goes through them by degrees and becomes pure and is born as a human being.

CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE
(Sufferings of the Jīva—The Rājast Gati)

The Lord said:

1. The jīva is impelled by the force of his Karma which is under the direction and control of God. For the formation of his gross body, he, through the medium of the semen of man enters the womb of a woman.
2. In one night, the mixture of the (man's) semen and (the woman's) blood takes place. In five nights, a circular bubble-like mass is formed. In ten days, it becomes (somewhat) hard like the fruit of the jujube tree (karkandhu). Thereafter, it becomes a ball of flesh or an egg.

3. In one month, the head is formed. In two months, the body develops arms, feet and other organs. In three months, nails, hair, bones, skin, the penis and the anus are formed.

4. By the end of the fourth month, the seven essential ingredients of the body are produced. In the fifth month, hunger and thirst are felt. In the sixth month, the foetus is enveloped with an external skin called jarāyu, and it begins to make movements in the right side of the mother's abdomen.

5. He develops the essential ingredients of the body by the mother's intake of food and drinks. The jiwa stays in an abominable hollow place, full of urine and feces, a breeding place of worms.

6. By the frequent biting of the hungry worms which are there (in the same hollow place), his whole body, being very delicate and soft, is wounded all over. Being extremely tormented, he falls into a swoon at every moment.

7. He is affected by the bitter, pungent, hot, salt, astringent, acidic and such other unbearable substances eaten by the mother, and thereby suffers pain spread all over the body.

8. Enveloped in the womb and surrounded on the outside with the entrails, it lies there with his head protruding towards the stomach and with his back and neck in a bent position.

9. Like a bird (shut up) in a cage, he is incapable of making (free) movements of his body there. As a result of his karma in previous births, he recollects his actions (karmas) done in the last hundred previous births and suffers the endless pain without a sigh. What happiness can he have (in such a condition).

10. From the seventh month, he gets consciousness. But as he is always moved by 'the winds of delivery' (sūti-vāta), he cannot remain in one spot like the worms born in the feces in the same place.
11. The jīva who knows both body and the Soul but is bound by seven essential ingredients of the gross body, is afraid. In repentance he folds his hands and in words expressing distress, he praises the Lord who has confined him in the womb. The jīva (the Individual Soul) said:

12. That the Lord has shown me this condition (made me to experience confinement in the womb) is quite befitting as I am wicked 821. I, who am of that type, (now) take shelter under the lotuslike feet of the Lord, who fearlessly moves over the earth, after assuming various bodies (incarnations), with the desire of protecting the world, which has submitted to him for refuge 822.

13. I stay as if bound down, here (in the mother's womb), depending on the Māyā in the form (of my body consisting) of five Bhūtas, sense-organs and mind (manas), and with

---

821. VB., VR. read: upa-pannam—(the world) created by him.
822. VC. : "I am ruined by great calamities. But the God has inspired in me such type of mental attitude as is capable of delivering me from this."

VR.: Paramātma occupies the same body (consisting of bhūtas etc.) as the one occupied by jīva. But though he is staying in Prakṛti along with jīva, he is untouched by the blemishes of the Prakṛti and hence is extremely pure. He is destitute of changes such as birth, death, grief, delusion, hunger, thirst etc. His knowledge is undiminished. Though he stays in the same impure body as the jīva who is subject to karmas, he is not at all affected by any impurities. Hence the jīva bows to him who manifests in his afflicted heart.

Basing his explanation on Satyam jñānam anantam Brahman (Tait. Up. 2.1.1) VJ. states: The Paramātman stays in the body even in the womb as the director of the Prakṛti. But (tu) there is extreme difference between the jīva and the paramātman as he is extremely pure, changeless, of unlimited knowledge. I bow to Hari whose presence in my heart burning with afflictions, is determined by his being free from them.

VC. : I bow to the Lord as we do not know whether he stays in this body to protect us or as a part of his lilā. It is proper that as a result of my past sinful actions I am here, but how does he live in this hell as an antaryāmin? His presence due to his dependence on Māyā does not bring any impurity, change or limitation to his knowledge as in my case. He stayed in my heart and gave me the (above) knowledge. Hence I realized this in my heart tormented with affliction.

VB. : This verse describes the absence of blemishes and excellences in the Lord. It describes the blemishes of the jīva. And the jīva bows to the Lord to remove his weaknesses and faults.
my real nature covered by karmas. I bow to the Lord who is being realized in my tormented heart yet is himself unaffected by changes (avikāra) as he is extremely pure and unlimited by conditions, and of uninterrupted knowledge.

14.* I who am falsely concealed in a body composed of five Bhūtas, am factually unattached to it. I am the jīva falsely reflected in the sense-organs, attributes (like sattva) and objects of senses. I bow to that Supreme Man whose greatness is not limited by the body—the Supreme Man who is the controller of the Prakṛti and Puruṣa and who is omniscient.

15. By what means can the jīva regain for himself his original status without the grace of the Lord by (the power of) whose Māyā he lost his memory (about his true self) and is wandering in this path of saṁsāra suffering the affictions resulting from it and wherein he incurs heavy bondage from actions (committed) due to the three guṇas.

16. Which of the gods except the Supreme Being has inspired in me this knowledge of the past, present and future? (It must be the Supreme God as) we jīvas follow the course of karmas (and are subject to births and deaths). By his amśa, he has pervaded the mobiles and immobiles (as an antaryāmin). We resort to him for the cessation of the three kinds of affictions (viz. ādhībhaṭṭika, ādhyātmika and ādhi-daivika).

17. Oh Lord! this embodied being has fallen into the hollow place full of blood, feces and urine in the cavity in the body of another person (i.e. the mother). His body is extremely scorched by the abdominal fire (of the mother). Being anxious of getting out of this place, he is counting his months.

*VR. takes the first half as the description of Paramātman. “Paramātman, though concealed or covered by the body composed of five bhūtas, is not at all touched by the defects or blemishes resulting from the contacts with the body. He is the controller of both cit and acit (sentient and non-sentient) for his body consists of guṇas, objects of senses and the sentient principle (jīva)”.

823. v.1. avagunṭha-mahīṃnam—The shroud enveloping whose greatness is destroyed—ŚR.
824. lokam—The real knowledge of the self, the means to liberation—VR.
825. Katamaḥ—(1) Extremely blessed—VJ. (2) The highest Brahman—VB.
When will this low-minded being be delivered (lit. pushed out of this place)?

18. Oh Omnipotent Lord, you are simply incomparable. By your unbounded mercy, you have blessed a jīva of ten months with this knowledge. May that protector of the distressed (i.e. you) be pleased with his (your) own action (of this gift of knowledge). What can anyone do to him (you) except offering one’s obeisance?

19*. This another kind of jīva (sub-human beings like birds, beasts) certainly feels physical (pleasures and pains) pertaining to his body. I am blessed by him with intelligence (knowledge and discretion) and gifted by him with a body capable of being disciplined with śama, dama etc. I can see that eternal, perfect Puruṣa directly both within and without my heart just like a caitya (the jīva who possesses ahamkāra and is an enjoyer of pleasure and pain).

20. Oh All-pervading Lord, though I am dwelling in the womb full of many kinds of afflictions, I do not wish to get out of the womb and fall into a dark well (of ignorance) (and be born in this world). (Because, outside) God’s Māyā approaches the jīva which has fallen into the dark pit (well) of samsāra. The Māyā is followed by false apprehension (about the identification of the body and the Soul etc.) and this cycle of samsāra.

21. I have now attained to the feet of Viṣṇu and am

* VR. compares the jīva in the womb with a Yogi (damaśārirī). I can directly see the Lord in my heart by the power of knowledge (dhīṣupā) gifted to me. Caitya=the eternal god to be grasped by mind purified by Yoga. The Yogi has a body of seven sheaths but is different from the body. By the power of seeing, blessed by the Lord, a Yogi visualises the Lord due to his controlled mind and senses.

VC: This jīva in the human womb sees by his intelligence the physical pleasures and pains. Another fortunate one becomes a damaśārirī (knower, jñāni). Though I am notorious of being evil-minded, I can directly see with the intelligence gifted by him, the Lord—the eternal Puruṣottama, presiding over my mind, both within and without my heart.

826. sapta-vadhri: vadhra= A leathern strap—ASD 828.
(i) VR. explains it as ‘a jīva with seven skin sheaths’ (i.e. body).
(ii) JG. and VC. : A jīva in the womb.
(iii) ŚR., SD, GD. : A jīva.
(iv) VJ.: jīva, the possessor of seven organs of knowledge.
free from destruction. I shall stay therefore, here (in the womb) only with the help of my mind which is like a friend, I shall soon lift myself up from ignorance. So that the calamity of staying in many holes (wombs at the time of each birth in samsāra) will not befall me.

*Kapila said:

22. In this way, the jīva who is ten months old and who has acquired knowledge, makes up his mind. While he is praising the Lord in the womb the wind produced in the womb during the pangs of travail suddenly pushes him with his head downward for his birth.

23. Being thus thrust down by the wind of delivery, the jīva gets suffocated and anguished and loses his memory. With great trouble, he is suddenly born with his head downward.

24. He falls on the ground in a pool of blood and urine. He moves about like a worm in feces. (Finding that) he has lost his knowledge and has fallen in the contrary state (of dark ignorance), he frequently cries out.

25. He is being fed by persons who cannot understand the will (and need) of another. If he is presented an unwanted object, he is incapable of refusing it.

26. He is made to lie down (sleep) on a dirty bed rendered troublesome by worms born of sweat. He is unable to scratch his limbs or make movements like sitting, standing or moving.

27. Just as big worms gnaw and bite smaller worms, similarly mosquitoes, flies, bugs etc. bite the soft and delicate skin of the crying child who has lost its (previous) memory.

28. In this way having suffered miseries in childhood and boyhood, (in youth) he becomes down-cast with grief for his inability to obtain the desired object. He flares up with rage out of ignorance.

29. His pride and anger go on increasing with the growth of his body. He, being passionate, fights with other passionate persons like him, and meets his end (ruin).

30. This ignorant, dull-witted embodied being constantly entertains the false notion about this body which is composed of five bhūtas to be himself and as belonging to him.
31. He performs action for the sake of the body—the body which gives the jīva a great trouble (from birth to death) and which being bound down by avidyā (ignorance) and karmas (destiny, fruit of actions), always follows him (in the next birth). It is by being bound down to the body that the jīva goes to (and is entangled in) the cycle of saṁsāra.

32. While on the path of righteousness, if the being comes in contact with and is influenced by the unrighteous who are striving for the gratification of their lusts and appetites and enjoys himself (in those ways), he enters the darkness (of ignorance or hell) as before.

33. (For virtues such as) truthfulness, purity, mercy, silence (control over speech), intelligence or the sense of the highest objective (puruṣārtha), affluence, modesty, renown, forbearance, control of sense-organs, control of the mind, prosperity go on diminishing in the company of the evil.

34. One should not form association with those wicked persons who regard the Soul as identical with the body and are devoid of serenity and are ignorant. They are under the influence of women like the domesticated deer with which the women play and hence pitiable.

35. He is not that much affected by delusion and bondage on other occasions as when he is attached to women or to those who are attached to women.

36. The Lord of Creation (Brahmā) was enamoured of the beauty of his daughter when he saw her. When she assumed the form of a female deer, the shameless god assumed the form of a male deer and ran after her.

37. With the exception of the sage Nārāyaṇa who else in this world (and out of the sages like Marici created by Brahmā and out of sages like Kāśyapa and others born of them and among gods, human beings etc. created by Kāśyapa), is not attracted by the Māyā in the form of woman.

38. Look at the power of my Māyā in the form of the woman. By the mere movement of her eyebrow she tramples under foot (conquers) the conquerors of the quarters (the entire world).

39. He who has attained Self-realization by my service and desires to attain to the highest stage of Yoga, should never associate himself with women. (For) they (Yogins) call woman as the gate of hell.

40. A woman is the Māyā created by God. She slowly approaches you. You should look upon her as your death, like a deep pit covered by grass.

41. Similarly a woman who wants liberation (should regard as death the Māyā who approaches her in the form of a man and who she thinks to be her husband. The woman is a jīva who, due to his attachment to women (in a former birth) has attained the form of a woman which procures for her, wealth, a house and children.

42. Just as the song (sweet notes) of a hunter is a death to the deer, similarly one should understand the Māyā to be the death in the form of the husband, children and home brought to her by Fate.

43. By his Liṅga-sarīra surrounding the jīva, he wanders from one world to another (from one body to another). While the man enjoys the fruits of actions, he continuously goes on committing actions (karmas).

44. The jīva i.e. the subtle-body (Liṅga-sarīra) closely follows the ātman and is conditioned by it. The gross body is the product of the Bhūtas, indriyas (sense-organs) and manas (the mind). The suspension of the use of the gross-body is the Death, and the manifestation of its powers (to produce the effect) is the birth.

45*. When the gross body which is the place (and condition) of the perception of substances becomes incapable in its function of observing them, it is called death. When it (the gross body) is identified with the Self through ahaṁkāra and is capable of perceiving the objects, it is called the birth.

*VR. states that the change of state is the death of the previous state and the birth of a new one. Here the subtle state (sūkṣmāvasthā) wherein a man becomes incapable of perceiving the elemental composition of the gross body, is called the death of that man. But when he sees it with ahaṁkāra (It is I). it is his birth.

VJ. agrees with ŚR. : The state in which a man is incapable of taking in the experience of gross objects in relation to the gross body, is called death. When he has the sense of I-ness ('I am this body') with reference to the body and is able to experience gross objects, it is the birth.
46* (For example) when the eyes (the region of visual perception of objects) becomes incapable of seeing the parts of a substance, it is the incapability of the sensory organ. When the (physical) eyeballs and the sensory organ both cease to function, the seer (the jīva that perceives (becomes incapable of seeing. (Thus the Līṅga-śarīra—subtle body—becomes incapable of functioning after the incompetence (and cessation of function) of the gross body. But that is not the death of jīva, himself).

47. (As there is no birth or death to the jīva), the wise man should not get agitated with grief or show niggardliness (or be down-cast with dejectedness in life) nor should get confused. He should understand the nature and the course of jīva and should move about (lead his life) without any attachment.

48*. By the power of his intellect capable of properly grasping the truth, and reinforced by the practice of Yoga and non-attachment, he should place his body in this world created by Māyā (i.e. he should give up attachment to his body) and go about the world.

*VR. explains: For the creation of the sense of renunciation and to emphasize the distinctness of ātman from the body which is created and destroyed, the example of the organ of sight is taken. The physical eye is incapable of seeing the organ of sight and other objects. The organ of seeing is incapable to function when the eye is diseased, even though the object of seeing is present. When a person is absent-minded, he does not see the object though his physical eye and the sense of seeing are healthy and the object is present. Thus it is the intelligent seer (Soul) who sees and he is distinct from the rest. So is the distinction between the Soul and the body.

827. jīvagati—The nature of jīva as distinct from Prakṛti and Brahman.

*VJ. states that this is the way how jīvan-muktas should lead their life here:

The jīva is unattached to the body and things pertaining to it. The body of the jīva lives in this karmabhūmi—the world created by the will of Nārāyaṇa. He should give up attachment, be unmoved like the deep (ocean). He should have correct knowledge and faith. With his intellect strengthened by Bhakti, Yoga and vairāgya he should realize Nārāyaṇa, the support of heaven, hell etc. where jīvas go. He should lead his life in the service (and meditation) of Nārāyaṇa.
CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO

(Excellence of the Bhaktiyoga)

Kapila said:

1. Now, a person who sticks to domestic life and performs the (religious) duties prescribed for householders, obtains from them the two objectives, viz. kāma (enjoyment of desired objects) and artha (wealth). He continues to perform the same duties again.

2. He also is so much deluded with the objects of enjoyments, that he becomes averse to the Bhāgavata dharma. Endowed with earnest faith, he continues to worship the gods and Pītrīs (ancestors) by performing sacrifices.

3. The man has his mind completely possessed of faith (in gods and Pītrīs). He observes the religious vows (for the propitiation) of manes and gods, and drinks Soma juice (in the Soma sacrifice). Such a man will attain to the heaven presided over by the Moon, (but) will come back (i.e. will be born) again to this world.

4. (But) when Hari who is seated on Ananta (Śeṣā) goes to sleep on the bed of that Lord of serpents (at the time of Pīlaya at the end of Brahmā’s day) those regions (accessible to such householders) are (also) dissolved.

5-7. The wise persons who do not perform their religious duties for obtaining kāma (their desired objects) and artha (wealth), who are unattached and have deposited (offered) all their religious acts (in God as his worship); who are extremely serene and of pure mind; who are engaged in the Nivṛtti-dharma; who have given up the sense of ‘mine-ness’ (ownership) and I-ness (ahaṅkāra)—such wise persons, by their power called ‘observance of one’s duties’ (Swadharma), and by thoroughly purified mind, go through the portals of the Sun to the perfect (or omniscient) Puruṣa (the Supreme Man), who is the Lord of the universe (of the movables and immovables, the liberated and the unliberated etc.), and who is the material cause of the world, and who causes the creation and the destruction of the universe.

8. Those who meditate upon Hiranyagarbha (Brahmā) as the Supreme Being\textsuperscript{828}, stay in the Satyaloka (Brahma's region) to the end of the second Parardha which is the time of god Brahma's Pralaya (the mahāpralaya indicating the end of Brahma's period).

9* When the great god Brahma enjoys his full span of life called Parardha, he desires to withdraw the universe composed of the gross elements, viz., the earth, water, fire, wind and the sky, the mind, the sense-organs along with their objects and the ahamkāra. He becomes one with the Prakṛti composed of three guṇas and enters the unmanifest Brahman.

10. The Yogins who have controlled their breath and mind and are unattached to worldly objects reach along with Brahma (Hiranya-garbha) to the immortal highest Brahman, the ancient Puruṣa; (for till then) they have not yet shed off their ego (ahamkāra) completely.\textsuperscript{829}

11. Oh brilliant mother, you devoutly take shelter under him who is enshrined in the lotuslike hearts of all beings and whose glory you have heard (from me).

12. (Even god Brahma is born again). God Brahma (who bears the Vedas within him) is the first (i.e. the creator) of the movable and immovable world. Along with sages (like Marici), great Yogins like Sanatkumāra etc., and Siddhas who have propagated yoga path, even he—

13. Having attained to the Saguna Brahman, the \textsuperscript{828} paraṣya paraṁśūntakāḥ : Yogins who meditate upon the Paramātman —VR.

VC, notes that those who meditate upon Hiranyagarbha only are not liberated after Brahma's liberation.

* VJ. gives a different process of this saṁrhāra or withdrawal : Brahma is withdrawn into the unmanifest Lakṣmi along with the deities presiding over all Tatwās. He enters Parabrahman through Lakṣmi.

\textsuperscript{829} agatābhimānāḥ : They are proud of being the votaries of Hiranyagarbha. Hence they are not completely absorbed in the Supreme Lord. Their dissolution being prakṛtī in nature, they are born again—VC.

* VJ. explains : Jiva attains to the Lord (Puruṣa) by proper understanding of the exact differences between Jiva, Iśvara and by complete knowledge that is so essential for Liberation (mukti) and by doing actions without any desire even after attainment of knowledge. The Lord is Brahman, i.e. full of all excellences. He possesses infinite guṇas like know-foremost among the Puruṣas on account of his actions done without any desire for their fruit, but on account of his notion of being different (from god) as a creator and the (consequent) ahamkāra about creation,

14. [He] is born again as before at the time of the (next) creation when the balance of three guṇas gets disturbed and the guṇas get into commotion by the force of Time (Kāla) which is a form of the Lord.

15. They (the sages etc.) also, having enjoyed the divine glories and positions accrued to them by their religious acts, are born again when the universe is created (lit. guṇas get mixed up at the time of creation).

16. Those whose minds are attached here to Karmas, perform with faith all the daily religious duties as well as those (kāmya) actions which are not prohibited by the Dharma Śāstra.

17. Those whose mind has become dull by rajo-guṇa, and is attached to enjoyments, have no control over senses. Their heart finds pleasure in domestic life. These (persons) propitiate the Pitṛs (ancestors).

18. Those who value only the first three objectives in life (viz. dharma, artha and kāma) set their face against the stories of Hari (the vanquisher of demon Madhu) whose great prowess is worth eulogizing and memory about whom eliminates the saṁsāra.

19. They are certainly of accursed fate who leaving aside the nectarlike stories of Hari, listen to the vile accounts just as fœces-eating animals feed upon excrement.

ledge, power etc. and is Saguṇa as the creator of the universe. He assumes Human form for his devotees. Hence he is called Puruṣa. He is beyond kṣara and akṣara Puruṣa. Hence he is called Puruṣārṣabha. Brahmā ‘enters’ into him, that is, gets sāyaṅga type liberation.

830. bhedadṛṣṭi: (i) Jīva's ego as being independent and the wrong identification of the body and the Soul—VR.

(ii) The ego of being the creator of the world just as Viṣṇu is the protector—VG.

Even Sanatkumāra and others had the egoistic tinge of being the experiencers of Brahman and they regarded Brahman as ‘spotted’ with Māyā—VG.
20. They go to the region of Pitṛs (ancestors) through the southern path of Aryaman (technically called dhūmra-mārga—path of smoke). Those who perform all the prescribed religious rites from the pregnancy—garbhādhāna—to the funeral, are born in their own family (lit. of their descendants).

21. Oh pious mother, thereafter when their merit (accrued to them by their religious acts) is exhausted, they are immediately deprived of their means of (celestial) enjoyments by Gods. They being helpless (at the mercy of their karmas) fall again to this world. ³³¹

22. Therefore you adore the Supreme Lord (Viṣṇu) with utmost regard and devotion based on (i.e. felt on account of contemplation of) his excellent attributes. The lotuslike feet of the Lord deserve service.

23. If the yoga called devotion to Lord Vāsudeva is intensely practised, it immediately generates desirelessness and knowledge that leads to the realization of Brahman.

24. (As a matter of fact) all objects are equal. But it is when the mind of the devotee becomes fixed and steady in God due to the votary’s love for the excellent attributes of the Lord that it does not discriminate (between them) according to the attitude of the senses—as being favourite and agreeable and non-favourite and disagreeable.

25. At that time (in that stage) he realizes the Brahman by his own Self as being free from all attachment, of perfect wisdom,³³² free from acceptability or rejectability (i.e. above merits and demerits) and full of the highest bliss.

26. The Para Brahman is pure knowledge (consciousness). It is described as the Supreme Ātman, the Īśvara and the Puruṣa. The Lord (Bhagavān) is the same who is equally perceived in different capacities (as the seer, the thing-to-be-seen and the act-of-seeing).

27. Perfect non-attachment (to the world) in all respects is the only desired fruit that a Yogan is to get by practising all yogas in this world.

³³² sama-dārsana—(i) One who gives pure knowledge—SD.
(ii) One who knows the reality as it is—VJ.
(iii) One who knows all world as imbed with Brahman—VR.
28*. The Brahman is one (without a second). It is of the nature of knowledge or consciousness and without any attributes. It is an illusion when through outward looking sense-organs it appears as things (like the sky) possessed of sound and other attributes.

29. Just as the one Mahat (-tattva) appears as ahamkāra of three types (viz. sāttvika, rājasa and tāmasa) and of five kinds (according to the five Mahābhūtas) and eleven kinds (as per ten sense-organs plus the internal organ, viz. the mind), it is from the same principle that the Svārāj (jīva), its body and its egg (of the universe) make their appearance.

30. Verily it is only a non-attached person whose mind is composed and serene by faith, devotion and continuous practice of Yoga who realizes this Brahman.

31. Oh mother, I have up till now explained to you the knowledge that leads to the realization of the Brahman. It is by this knowledge that the real nature of Prakṛti and Puruṣa is clearly understood.

32. The path of knowledge (Jñāna yoga) pertains to the attributeless Brahman while the Yoga called Bhakti (devotion) is based on firm devotion to me. But both of them have the same objective viz. (the realization of) the Supreme Lord.

33. Just as the same object possessing many attributes is perceived in different forms by the sense-organs with separate functions (lit. doors), (similarly) the Supreme Lord (though absolutely one without a second) is seen in different ways through different śāstras.

34. By doing religious acts, by performing sacrifices, by donating gifts, by penance, by the study of the Vedas, by sub-

(i) VR. Quoting BG. 14.27 interprets ‘Brahman’ as jīva. Jīva is of the nature of knowledge, destitute of guṇas like sattva. To regard it as identical with its gross body is illusion. Jīva is conditioned by elements like Prthóv but the Supreme Soul is beyond these.

(ii) Brahman which incarnated as a Fish, should be understood as possessing non-prākṛtic body. It appears as one endowed with a gross body to the senses which are familiar with gross objects. But that is a delusion.—VJ.

(iii) The Brahman which is of the nature of knowledge appears to outward-looking sense-organs as objects (like the sky) possessing the attribute of sound. It is devoid of rejectable attributes.—SD.
duing the ātman and the sense-organs and by renunciation of karmas.

35. By means of the yoga with (eight) different stages, and by the Path of Bhakti (Bhakti yoga), by religious practices both with and without the desire for their fruits, which are called Pravṛtti and Niyṛtti.

36. By clear knowledge about the nature of the Soul and by firm sense of non-attachment—by means of these, the self-illuminating Lord whether Saguna or Nirguna is realized.

37. I have clearly described to you the nature of the four kinds of Bhakti-yoga and of kāla (Time) whose course is unmanifested but which runs within the beings (to bring about their birth and death).

38. (I have narrated to you) the external courses of Īśva, which are created by avidyā and karma. Oh mother, when the Soul enters into these, he does not know its own real nature.

39. This knowledge should not be explained to the evil person nor to one of undisciplined (arrogant) nature, nor to a dullard nor to a man of bad character, nor to a hypocrite.

40. (One should not) advise this to a person of greedy nature, nor to a person whose mind is attached to his house (property etc.), nor to one who is not devoted to me. It should never be taught to the enemies of my devotees.

41. It should be taught to my faithful devotee, who is modest and disciplined and is not jealous of anybody; to one who has formed friendship with beings, and who takes pleasure in serving (his elderly persons or preceptor).

42. It should be expounded to him who is completely unattached internally and externally, who is of tranquil heart, and is not envious of anybody, is pure and to whom I am the dearest of the dear.

43. Oh mother, the man who even once hears this knowledge with faith, or relates this to others with his mind set on me verily attains to my abode.
CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE

(Devahūti's Enlightenment and Liberation)

Maitreya said:

1. Having heard the discourse of Kapila, his mother Devahūti, the (beloved) wife of Kardama, got her veil of delusion torn open. She bowed to him and praised him who was the founder (lit. land) of the Sāṃkhya (system of philosophy) which is mainly characterised by the topic—treatment of Tattvas (principles).\(^{833}\)

Devahūti said:

2. Even god Brahmā himself who was born of the lotus in your stomach (could not see your body but mentally) meditated upon your person which was lying manifest in the cosmic waters; which was the cause of the entire universe; which consisted of bhūtas (elements), sense-organs and their objects (e.g. fragrance, taste etc.), and the mind, and which has the flow of guṇas (Sattva, Rajas, Tamas) in it.

3. It is with your power divided by the flow of your guṇas that you (of above description), remaining inactive, bring about the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe; Your will power is effective; You are the controller of all the jīvas (for whose enjoyment you create the universe; Your powers are infinite and beyond comprehension.

4. Oh Lord, how was it possible that you were borne by me in my womb. It was your Māyā, you in whose stomach lay the whole of the universe, and who, at the end of Yugas \(^{833}\) Tattva-viṣṇuṇākita-siddha-bhūmim.

(i) Kapila was the patron of Yogins who are famous for their knowledge of the Tattvos viz. Prakṛti, Puruṣa and others—VR.

(ii) Kapila was the supporter of Brahmā and other numerous Siddhas who are devoted to the Tattva, viz., Viṣṇu.—VJ.

(iii) Kapila is so called because he was the past master in the Bhakti-tattva, Sāṃkhya-System, Yoga-tattva etc.—VG.

(iv) Kapila was the asylum of Siddhis which are characterised by Vaiṣṇava-Sāṃkhya the main subject of which are the Tattvas, viz., ati, esti Brahman.—SD.

(v) Kapila was the preceptor of Siddhas who are characterised by the knowledge of Tattvas, viz., Prakṛti, Puruṣa, Īśvara etc.—GD.
(i.e. after the deluge set in) lay alone on a banyan leaf in the form of an infant sucking its toe.

5. Oh Supreme Lord, you have assumed the corporeal form for the destruction of the wicked sinners and for the prosperity of those who obey your commands. Just as you have your (other) incarnations of Boar etc., this incarnation (of yours) is for showing the path of self-realization.

6. Oh glorious Lord, even a Cāṇḍāla (lit. a dog-eater) immediately becomes worthy (like a performer) of the Śoma Sacrifice, if he has but once heard or uttered your name or bowed to you or remembered you. What need be said of a person (like me) who has (directly) seen you?

7. Oh how wonderful it is that even a Cāṇḍāla (the lowest-born person) becomes superior and worthy of respect simply because Your name is on the tip of his tongue. Those persons of noble behaviour who take your name have (the merit of having) performed penance, sacrifices and baths in holy waters, and Vedic studies (Or: It is as a result of doing these meritorious acts in the previous life that they take your name in this birth).

8. I pay obeisance to you, Kapila, who are the highest Brahman, the Supreme Man who are worthy of meditation in mind which is withdrawn from external objects, and who have dried up the flow of guṇas by your brilliance and who are Viṣṇu (who holds Vedas within him).

Maitreya said:

9. The Supreme Man called the venerable Kapila who was thus praised and who was affectionate to his mother, spoke thus to her in words deep in significance (Or: with words choked up with emotions.).

Kapila said:

10. Oh mother, I have explained to you the path which is easy to follow. By following this path, you will reach the highest stage (of being liberated while alive).

11. Have faith in my doctrine which has been followed by the knowers of Brahman (or the Vedas). By following this you will attain to me who am without birth (i.e. eternal). Those who are ignorant about this path go to death (samsāra).

Maitreya said:

12. The venerable Kapila showed to his pious mother the path leading to Ātman. Having obtained the permission of his mother, who realized the Brahman, Kapila departed (from her hermitage).

13. And in that hermitage which was like a flower-chaplet on the head of the Sarasvati (river), she adopted Yogic practice in accordance with the guidance of her son, and became composed in mind.

14. She performed ablutions three times a day. Her curly hair became matted and tawny in colour. By severe penance her body became emaciated. She wore bark-garments.

15. The household comforts that were created by Prajāpati Kardama by means of his penance and Yoga were incomparable. They were covetable even to gods.

16. The beds were white and soft like the foam of milk. The ivory couches were chased with gold. The seats of gold were provided with soft cushions (covers).

17. In the walls of transparent crystals and very costly emeralds were shining jewel-lamps along with statues of beautiful damsels made of precious stones.

18. The garden around the house looked beautiful with many blossoming celestial trees, on which couples of birds were warbling and the intoxicated black bees were humming sweetly.

19. Where the followers of gods (Gandharvas) used to praise her when she, fondled by Kardama, entered in the swimming pool fragrant with lotuses.

20. It (the household) was most covetable even to the queens of Indra. But she just abandoned it. Due to the anxiety caused by the separation of her son, she was dejected in appearance.

21. As her husband left for the forest (after renouncing the world) Devahūti, though she realized the Truth (the Sāṃkhya Principles), became overanxious due to the separation from her son, like a calf-loving cow is fond after her young one.

22. Oh child (Vidura), she meditated upon her child Kapila who was the God Hari. In a short time, she became indifferent to that type of rich household.

23. According to the guide-lines given by her son, she meditated upon the form of the gracious-looking Lord—the object of meditation—by the method of contemplating the complete form followed by concentration on the parts of it. 834

24. By means of stream or overflow of devotion, by powerful renunciation, and by knowledge which was produced by the proper observances of vows 835 leading to Brahmahood.

25. Her mind became pure. She was then lost in the meditation of all-pervading Atman who by his essential light removes the limitations of the gunas of Mayā.

26. Her mind became steadied in the glorious Brahman which is the shelter of all the jīvas. As she superseded her state of being a jīva, all her afflictions were over and she attained to the blessed stage.

27. As she was always engaged in continuous meditation and her delusion due to gunas was dispelled, at that time she did not remember her body, just as an object seen in a dream (is found to be unreal) after waking up.

28. Her body was fed by others (viz. Vidyādhara damsels who were produced by Kardama for attendance upon her). As she was free from diseases, she did not become emaciated. Her body was covered with filth. She looked like a fire covered with smoke.

29. Her mind was so deeply entered (i.e. absorbed) in Vāsudeva that she was not conscious of her body. She had so completely given herself up to penance and Yoga that her hair fell dishevelled and clothes were dropped and she was protected by her previous karma (daiva).

30. In this way she progressed by the path expounded by Kapila. Within a short period she attained to the Supreme

834. Vide Supra III. 29.12-33.
Soul, the Brahman, the glorious Lord; the stage called Nirvāṇa.

31. Oh warrior (Vidura), the place called Siddhapada where she attained the Liberation became famous as the holiest place in the three worlds.

32. Oh gentle Vidura, her mortal body from which impurities were eliminated by Yoga, was transformed into a river, a prominent one among many rivers. It blesses one with siddhis and is resorted to by Siddhas.

33. Even glorious Kapila, the great Yogin, obtained the permission of his mother to depart from his father’s hermitage and proceeded to the northern direction.

34. He was praised by multitude of Siddhas, Cāraṇas, Gandharvas, sages and celestial nymphs. He was also respectfully received by the sea and was presented a valuable dwelling place.

35. Kapila stays there practising Yoga. He is highly eulogized by the great teachers of Sāmkhya School. For the peace and tranquillity of the three worlds, he lives there (absorbed) in meditation.

36. Oh child (Vidura), as per your query I have narrated to you the sacred dialogue between Kapila and Devahūti, Oh sinless one.

37. He who listens to this or narrates this doctrine of the Sage Kapila regarding the secret knowledge about the Ātman, becomes able to concentrate his mind upon the venerable Lord whose banner has the emblem of Garuḍa, and he attains to the lotus-like feet of the glorious Lord.

FOURTH SKANDHA

CHAPTER ONE

(The Progeny of Svāyambhuva Manu's Daughters)

Maitreya said:

1. Besides (his two sons Priyavrata and Uttanapāda) Manu had three daughters from Śatarūpā. They became well known as Ākūti, Devahūti and Praśūti.

2. The king, with the consent of Śatarūpā, gave Ākūti to (the progenitor) Ruci in marriage, on condition of Putrikā dharma¹ (even though) Ākūti had brothers.

3. The venerable progenitor Ruci, full of the spiritual glory of Brahman, begot through her a twin—a son and a daughter, by virtue of his supreme concentration (of mind on the Lord).

4. Of the two, the male child was Viṣṇu himself who had assumed the form of Yajña). And the female child was called Dakṣinā (‘sacrificial fee’) who was a part of Lakṣmī (the goddess of fortune) inseparable (from Viṣṇu)².

5. (As per stipulation in the marriage) Svāyambhuva Manu brought to his house his daughter’s son of pervasive glory. With great delight, Ruci (also) joyfully accepted Dakṣinā (as his child).

6. Lord Yajña, the Lord of all Sacrifices (or mantras) married her (Dakṣinā) who was in love with him. He felt

1. Putrikā-dharma: When a daughter is given in marriage on the explicit condition that the first male child of the daughter shall be the (adopted) son of the giver, it is called Putrikā dharma. This was done by one who had only daughters and no son. The obvious object was securing the continuity of one’s race. V.J. explains that although Manu had sons, he laid down this condition as he knew that Lord Viṣṇu would be born to Ākūti. He wished to secure Viṣṇu’s higher grace by becoming his adopted father.

2. aha: ŠR., VR. VC. point out that Dakṣinā was an aha (part) of Lakṣmī. Hence the marriage of Yajña and Dakṣinā, though born as brother and sister, is not objectionable. V.J. takes the word to mean ‘One who has neither birth nor death’. Like Nārāyaṇa, Lakṣmī manifested herself to others as an avertbhava.
delighted and had twelve sons by her, who too was highly pleased.

7. These twelve sons were: Toṣa, Pratoṣa, Santοṣa, Bhadra, Śānti, Iḍapsati, Idhma, Kavi, Vibhu, Svaḥna, Sudeva, Rocana.

8. In the epoch (Manvantara) called Svāyambhuva, they (these sons of Yajña and Dakṣinā) officiated as gods, and were (collectively) called Tuṣitas; Marici and others were the seven sages (Saptarṣis of that era) while Yajña, the incarnation of Hari, occupied the post of Indra (the rulership of gods).

9. Priyavrata and Uttanapāda, the sons of Manu, were endowed with great power and splendour. They, their sons, grandsons (both from sons and daughters) and their descendants ruled throughout the period (of this Manvantara)*.

10. Oh Vidura, Manu gave his (second) daughter Devahūti to Kardama (a Lord of created beings). (History) relating to them has been already heard by you as narrated by me.

11. Venerable Manu gave (his third daughter) Prasūti (in marriage) to Dakṣa (another Lord of creation), a mind-born son of Brahmā. Their progeny has very widely spread all over the three worlds.

12. Now, hear as I tell you about the sons and grandsons of the nine daughters of Kardama who became the wives of the Brāhmaṇa Sages (born of Brahmā) and about whom I have spoken to you.

13. Kalā, the daughter of Kardama and the wife of the sage Marici, gave birth to two sons—Kaśyapa and Pūrṇimān whose descendants have fully populated (filled) the world.

14. Oh conqueror of enemies (Vidura), Pūrṇimān was the father of (sons) Viraja and Viśvaga and (a daughter called) Devakulyā who washing the feet of Hari became the heavenly river Gaṅgā (in her next birth).

*According to VP. 3.2.48 every Manvantara (epoch of a manu) has the following batch of office bearers: (1) Manu, (2) seven sages—Saptarṣis, (3) gods, (4) the ruler of gods—Indra, (5) ruling progeny of Manu. To this Bh. P. 12.7.15 adds: (6) Incarnations of Hari. The dignitaries of these posts in the Svāyambhuva Manvantara are mentioned in the above verses.
15. Anasūyā, the wife of Atri, gave birth to three illustrious sons, viz. Datta (god Dattātreya, the sage), Durvāsas and the Moon-god, each of whom was separately born (as a manifestation of the portion) of Viṣṇu, Rudra and Brahmā (respectively).

Vidura said:

16. Oh Preceptor, please narrate to me for what purpose these (three) most eminent gods who are severally the cause of the creation, preservation and destruction (of the world), were born in the house of (the sage) Atri.

Maitreya said:

17. When the sage Atri, the foremost of the knowers of Brahman, was urged by god Brahmā (to undertake the work of) creation, he along with his wife went to one of the principal mountain ranges, Rkṣa³ and was engaged in the performance of austere penance.

18-19. The mountain was covered with the forest of Palāśa and Aśoka trees which were beautified with clusters of flowers. All around, it was resounded with the echoes of the waterfalls of the river Nirvindhyā. On that mountain, the sage controlled his mind by means of Prāṇāyāma (breath-control) and stood for one hundred years on one leg, defying heat and cold (and such other pairs of opposites), and subsisted on air.

20. He contemplated (and prayed in his mind): 'I take shelter under him who alone is the Lord of the World. May he bless me with progeny just like himself.'

21-22. Seeing that the three worlds were being distressed by the fire produced by the fuel of (the sage's) breath-control (Prāṇāyāma) and issuing from the head of the sage, the three Lords (of the world, Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva) went to the hermitage of the sage—the three Gods whose glories were extensively eulogised by celestial damsels, sages, Gandharvas

---

³. Rkṣa—The eastern part of the Vindhya range extending from the Bay of Bengal to the sources of the Narmadā and the Šoṇa—including the mountains of Čhotta Nagpur and Gondwana in which the Mahānadi rises—GDAMI 168-69.
(celestial musicians), and (demigods like) Siddhas, Vidyādharas and Nāgas.

23. The sage got his mind illuminated by the simultaneous manifestation of the three gods. (To show them respect) he stretched up his body (while standing on the leg), and saw those prominent gods.

24. (He paid them homage) by prostrating himself fully (before them) on the ground, like a stick. With articles of worship in the hollow of his palms, he respectfully received the gods who were severally riding a swan, Garuḍa and a bull and were characterised by their speciality (viz. possession of a Kamanḍalu, Sudarśana discus and a trident).

25. They directly expressed their pleasure by their gracious looks and smiling faces. The sage closed his eyes as they were dazzled by their (gods’) brilliance.

26. With his mind concentrated on them and with folded palms he praised, in sweet words of deep significance, the three gods who are the supreme-most in all the worlds.

Atri said:

27. You are (obviously the celebrated gods) Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva who in every Yuga (kalpa), assume forms with the help of the guṇas (attributes) of Māyā, trifurcated for bringing about the creation, maintenance and dissolution of the universe. I bow to you all. (Kindly tell me) which of you has been invoked by me here.

28. In this hermitage, I have concentrated (contemplated) only on one glorious Lord by various means, with a desire to get a child. It is a great surprise to me how (all of) you who are beyond the range of the mind of bodied beings, have come here. Be pleased to tell me the mystery.

Maitreya said:

29. Oh Lord (Vidura), hearing this speech of the sage (Atri), the three prominent gods laughed. They replied to the sage in soft gentle words (as follows):

The gods said:

30. “Oh Brahman! As you have willed it, so shall it exactly happen and not otherwise. You are of true resolve. We three form that Principle (called the Lord of the world) which you are contemplating.

31. Oh sage! May you be blessed! from our artśa (parts) now you will beget sons who (themselves) will be celebrated in the world and spread your reputation as well."

32. Having granted their desired boon, the Lords of gods who were properly worshipped by the couple, returned from that hermitage while they (Atri and Anasūyā) stood looking on (agape).

33. Thus Soma was born with a portion of Brahmā, Datta, the master of Yoga, with that of Viṣṇu, while Durvāsas with the portion of Śaṅkara. Now listen (to me), about the progeny of Aṅgiras (another mind-born son of Brahmā).

34. Śraddhā, the wife of Aṅgiras gave birth to four daughters viz. Sinīvālī, Kuhū, Rākā and the fourth Anumati.4

35. Besides these he (Aṅgiras) had two sons—Utathya who was the venerable Lord himself and Brhaspati (the preceptor of gods) the eminent knower of Brahman. They became celebrities in the Svārociṣa Manvantara.

36. By his wife Havirbhū, Pulastya (another mind-born son of Brahmā) had a son called Agāstya who was abdominal fire in another birth and also (another son) Viśravas, the great ascetic.

37. Of Viśravas and his wife Iḍaviḍā was born god Kubera (the god of Wealth), the king of Yakṣas. Rāvaṇa, Kumbhakarna and Vibhiṣaṇa were born (to him) by another wife (Keśini).

38. Oh talented Vidura, Gati, the pious wife of Pulaha, gave birth to three sons, viz. Karmaśreṣṭha, Variyān and Śahisūṇ.

39. Even Kratu’s wife, Kriyā, bore sixty-thousand (thumb-sized) sons known as Vālakhilyas—all brilliant with the splendour of Brahman.

---

4. These are the deities presiding over the 14th and 15th day of the bright and dark fortnights who came to designate those days. Thus Sinīvālī is the day preceding the new moon day. On this day the moon rises with a scarcely visible crescent, while Kuhū is the 15th day or the last day of the lunar month when the moon is invisible. Rākā presides over the full moon (15th) day, while Anumati is the 14th day in the bright half—Vide ASD under these heads.
40. Oh tormentor of enemies (Vidura), by his wife Ūrjā (Arundhati) Vasīṣṭha had seven sons of whom Citraketu was prominent. They all were pure-hearted Brāhmaṇa-sages.

41. They were Citraketu, Surociṣṭa, Virajas, Mitra, Uḷbaṇa, Vasubhraṇḍa yāna and Dyumat. He had other sons such as Śakti and others (by another wife).

42. Citti (or Śānti), the wife of Atharvan, got a son, Dadhici alias Aśvaśiras who took the vow (of austere penance). (Henceforth) hear from me the race of Bṛgus.

43. The distinguished sage Bṛgu begot by his wife, Khyāti, (two) sons—Dhātṛ and Vidhātṛ, and a daughter, Śrī, who was devoted to the glorious Lord (Viṣṇu).

44. (The sage) Meru gave his daughters Āyati and Niyati (in marriage) to these (sons of Bṛgu) severally. Of them (Āyati and Niyati) were born Mṛkaṇḍa and Prāṇa (respectively).

45. Of Mṛkaṇḍa was born Mārkaṇḍeya, and of Prāṇa, the sage Vedaśiras. Kavi, (another) son of Bṛgu, had the venerable Uṣanas (Śukrācārya, the preceptor of Daityas) as his son.

46. All these sages peopled the worlds by their descendants. I have narrated to you, Oh Vidura, the account of the progeny of Kardama's grandsons (from daughters' side)—an account which immediately removes the sins of the faithful and reverential listener.

47. Dakṣa, another (mind-born) son of god Brahmā, married Prasūti, the daughter of (Śvāyambhuva) Manu. He begot, by her, sixteen fair-eyed daughters.

48. The Lord (Prajāpati Dakṣa) gave thirteen of his daughters to Dharma, one to Agni, one to all Piṭṛs combined, and one to god Śiva, who cuts the bonds of Samsāra.

49*. Śraddhā, Maitri, Dayā, Śānti, Tuṣṭi, Puṣṭi, Kriyā, Unnati, Buddhi, Medhā, Titikṣā, Hri and Mūrti—these (thirteen) are the wives of Dharma.

50*. Śraddhā gave birth to Śubha (auspiciousness), Maitri to Prasāda, Dayā to Abbaya, Śānti to Sukha, Tuṣṭi to Mud (a daughter) Puṣṭi to Smaya.

5. Vide supra 4.1.11 above.

Vide infra p. 427, note
51-52*. Kriyā bore Yoga, Unnati, Darpa; Buddhi, Artha; Medhā, Smṛti (a daughter); Titikṣā, Kṣema and Hri, a son called Praśraya. Mūrti who was the fountain-head of all excellent qualities, gave birth to sages Nara and Nārāyaṇa.

53. When these two (sages) were born, the universe rejoiced with great pleasure. The minds (of men), the quarters, winds, rivers and mountains—all became calm and serene.

54. Trumpets were blown in the heavens; showers of flowers rained; sages offered their prayers. Gandharvas and Kinnaras sang joyfully.

55. The celestial nymphs and goddesses danced; highest bliss reigned everywhere. (There was auspiciousness everywhere.) All divinities like Brahmā (and others) attended upon (Nara and Nārāyaṇa) with eulogistic prayers.

Gods said:

56. Salutations to the Supreme Man who, manifested in himself this universe created by his own Māyā power, just like the phenomenal appearance (e.g. a city of Gandharvas) in the (cloudy) sky, and who appeared today, in the house of

*Dharma (Religion or Piety) is always associated with virtues or certain pious mental states. These are described as the wives of Dharma and his progeny from them.

(i) By his Will or Māyā power, this created universe is supported on Brahman, but it does not affect the Brahman, just as colours blue, white etc. of the clouds, do not stick to the sky. Or the changes of form, such as that of a god or a subhuman being with which jīva is associated (when it is born in that particular yoni), do not affect the real nature of Ātman. The Lord has manifested himself as sages under the roof of Dharma in order to instruct the distinctness of Ātman, Brahman, from the form of god, man etc., and to lead to liberation by this knowledge. We bow to that Supreme Person.—VR.

(ii) His own Māyā has arranged (created) this universe on the support of Ātman like the cluster of clouds in the sky. For shedding light (explaining the nature) of the Ātman, he has manifested himself.—VC.

(iii) Just as different kinds of cavities, (ghañkāṭa, maṭhukāṭa) are in the sky, similarly the universe is arranged (created) in Yourself. Just as the sky is neither different from, nor circumscribed by, these cavities or vacuums, so also the Lord is neither affected nor delimited by the universe. The illustration of the sky is taken to emphasize the unattachedness and not unreality.—GD.

VB. has not written his commentary on this skandha.
Dharma, in the form of sages (Nara and Nārāyaṇa), for revealing the true nature of the Self.

57. May the Lord, whose real nature is to be inferred by the Śāstras, condescend to look on us, the gods, who have been created by him, by means of Sattva, for the protection of the world from the disturbances in the orderly existence of the world—his eyes which are overflowing with mercy and which surpass the beautiful lotus, receptacle of Śrī (or the home of Lakṣmī).

58. Oh child (Vidura), the two divine sages who were thus extolled and worshipped by the (multitude of) gods, blessed them by their look, and left for mount Gandhamādana.

59. Verily, those two part (-manifestations) of Lord Hari, have incarnated in this world as Kṛṣṇa, the descendant of Yadu, and the dark-complexioned Arjuna of the Kururace, for relieving the burden of the earth.

60. And Svāhā, the wife of Agni, gave birth to three sons—Pāvaka, Pavamāna and Śuci—all of whom are the deities presiding over Agni, and who subsist on sacrificial offerings.

61. They gave birth to fortyfive fires. These fortyfive fires, their three fathers (Pāvaka, Pavamāna and Śuci) and one grandfather (god Agni) make fortynine fire-gods.

62. These are the fire-gods in whose name īṣṭis (small sacrifices) called Āgneya (pertaining to Agni) are performed during Vedic sacrificial sessions, by persons, well-versed in the Vedas.

63. The manes (Pitṛs) are* (1) Agniśvātta,(2) Barhiṣad, (3) Saumya and (4) Ājayapa. They are either Sāgnaya (receiving libations of water through the sacred fire) or Anagnaya (receiving libations directly without agnaukarana). Svadhā, the daughter of Dakṣa was their wife.

64. Svadhā bore to them two daughters—Vayunā and Dhāriṇī. Both of them were well-versed in scriptural knowledge and spiritual knowledge, and they expounded the same.

---

*These are main divisions of the Pitṛs: (1) Those who joined the manes by following only Śmaṭa karmas are Agniśvātta; (2) Those who joined forefathers after performing Agnihotra and Vedic sacrifices are Barhiṣadas; (3) Those who drink Soma in sacrifices and become Pitṛs are Somāpas or Saumyas; and (4) Those who partake of ghee in sacrifices are Ājayapa.
65. Though Sati, the wife of Siva who was like him in qualities and character served him, she had no son.

66. (For) when she was quite young, she cast off her body of her own accord by Yogic process, as she was angry with her father who was antagonistic to her innocent husband, Siva.

CHAPTER TWO

(The Rift between the God Siva and Dakṣa*)

Vidura said:

1. Dakṣa was affectionate to his daughter. Why did he disregard his own daughter Sati and cherish hatred towards Siva who was the foremost among the virtuous?

*Introductory: Chapters 2 to 7 (both inclusive) treat of the legend of Dakṣa's sacrifice. It is a very popular legend and is found in MBH. Shānti. 284 (283 is a different episode), the Va. P. Ch. 30 (which repeats verbatim the MBH. text), to mention a few pre-Bhāgavata texts.

The development of the conception of Dakṣa in the Vedic period is traced in PGK 407 and MP-a Study 54-8. This solar deity of the Vedic age seems to have developed into two Dakṣas in the Purānic period: (1) Dakṣa Prajāpati of the Svāyambhuva Era (Manvantara) and (2) Dakṣa Prācetas of the Sāvarṇi Era. The MBH and subsequently Va.P. mix up these two Dakṣas and the story of the destruction of the sacrifice of the first Dakṣa is described to have happened in the case of the second (Prācetas) Dakṣa.

According to the BH.P. the cause of rift between Dakṣa and Śiva is due to Dakṣa's insult by Śiva (Bh. P. IV. 2, Br. P. 1.1.64). But in MBH, and Va.P. it is the argument between Dakṣa and Dadhici as to the relative superiority of Śiva and Viṣṇu which led Dakṣa to ignore Śiva during the sacrifice.

It is possible that this legend represents the conflict between the pra-vṛtti dharma characterised by the orthodox sacrificial culture and the nirotti dharma emphasizing renunciation and Yoga. The latter may be pre-Aryan as the relics of Yogins and Śiva worship are found in the Indus valley. But it is an overstatement to say that this legend is a symbol of the struggle between monarchy and republics as stated by Dr. T.S. Rukmani (A Critical Study of the Bh.P. 100-2).
2. Who would and how could one hate the god Śiva who is a great divinity to the world of the movables and immovables; who bears enmity towards none, and who is tranquillity incarnate; and who is delighted in his own blissful self?

3. Oh Brahman! Narrate to me what led to the enmity between the son-in-law (Śiva) and the father-in-law (Dakṣa) which made Sati give up her life with which it is difficult to part.

Maitreya said:

4. Formerly during the sacrificial session of the Prajāpatis (progenitors of the world) were assembled great seers and sages, all classes of gods including divinities presiding over the sacred fires, along with their attendants.

5-6. When Dakṣa who was brilliant like the Sun entered, he dispelled the darkness of the great assembly-hall by his splendour. Seeing him, all the members of the assembly, including the presiding deities of fire, were overwhelmed with his brilliance, and stood up from their seats. Only Brahmā and god Śiva did not stand up.

7. The leaders of the assembly reverentially received Lord Dakṣa. He bowed down to god Brahmā, the creator of the universe and with Brahmā's permission, he took his seat.

8. Finding that Śiva (the Delighter of the world) was already seated and had ignored him, Dakṣa did not tolerate this. Looking askance at him, as if to consume him with the fire (of his wrath), he burst forth:

9. "Listen to me, Oh Brāhmaṇa Sages, along with gods and divinities of fire, I explain to you the mode of behaviour of good people. This is not out of jealousy or ignorance (that I speak).

10. This (god Śiva) is shameless, and has detracted the glory of the protectors of the world. This haughty fellow who does not know what should appropriately be done, has polluted the path followed by the good.

11. He has been like a disciple unto me, as he, like a virtuous person, took the hand of my daughter who is like Śāvitrī, in the presence of Brāhmaṇas and sacrificial fire.

*Some annotators interpret this as the praise of Śiva.
12.* Having married (lit. taken the hand of) my daughter, this monkey-eyed fellow did not show due courtesy, even by words, to me whom he should have respected by standing and by bowing.

13. To this proud, impious fellow who has given up performance of religious acts, and has violated all the bounds of religious propriety, I gave my young daughter though reluctant to do so, as one would be to impart the sacred beautiful word (Vedas) to a Śūdra (who is not eligible to receive Vedic lore).

(i) Conforming to the traditional religious practice (at the time of his marriage), he took the hand of my daughter who is pure like Śāvitrī in the presence of Brāhmaṇas and the sacred fire. He is, however, of the status of non-disciple i.e. worth bowing. He is a jīva-mukta, and is, therefore, above formalities—GD.

(ii) Being omniscient, Śiva knew from the beginning my unworthiness which remained undisclosed till today. Hence he did not pay respect to me who am like (but not really) a good person. It is due to the virtuousness of my daughter like Śāvitrī that he married her, in the presence of Brāhmaṇas and the sacred fire—VC. & VD.

*Out of his grace, he (Śiva) satisfies the desires of persons who are passionate etc., like monkeys. He desires to be respected by us, by standing and paying obeisance. But fie upon me! I did not show even verbal courtesy to him—VC. & VD.

(ii) He is anxious about the redemption of people who, like a monkey, take interest in sensual pleasures. To remove the pride of the egotist Dakṣa, he established relationship with him by marrying his daughter. To eliminate his ego, Śiva incited him by not paying even verbal respect to him, though Dakṣa, as a father-in-law, should have been shown due courtesy—GD.

(i) All religious activities are lost in Śiva as he is the Brahmā. Nothing is more pure than he. He is not proud nor has he crossed any bound of propriety—VC.

VC. presumes an avagraha before mānine and bhinna-setave.

(ii) He is so great that even the desire to give my daughter in marriage to him did not occur to me, as comparatively my daughter was not worthy of him. It was due to the advice of Brahmā that I overcame that shyness. Śiva accepted her out of respect to Brahmā's word. Śiva is Śūdra i.e. one who removes grief by his favour and advice (sucām sukām kṛpayā jāna-bhaktyādysateṣa drāvyatīti śūdraḥ) As this belongs to Pra-tod-arādi group 'c' in 'āuc' is lost and -u- is lengthened as -ū-. As to violation of etiquettes, Śiva being the Brahmaṇ, all kriyās (religious and other actions) are lost in him. He is absolutely pure and worthy of the highest respect. He is beyond the limits of ordinary jīvas. Hence the duties prescribed by the Vedas, do not apply to him.
14.* Surrounded by spirits and hosts of goblins, and with his hair scattered, he wanders in nudity, laughing and crying like a madman, in the terrible abodes of ghosts (crematories).

15. He is bathed in the ashes of funeral pyres, and is adorned with the garlands on corpses and with human bones. He is Śiva (auspicious) in name only, but is (actually) inauspicious. He is (always) intoxicated and loved by drunken people. He is surely the Lord of devilish spirits (pramathas), and ghosts which are the personification of tamo-guṇa.

16. Alas! It was at the instance of god Brahmā, that I gave my virtuous daughter to such a fellow who is destitute of purity (and cleanliness), and of wicked heart, the lord of goblins (called unmāda).

Maitreyā said:

17. Having thus reproached Śiva who sat all the while quiet (without retaliation), the enraged Dakṣa touched water (sipped it in ācamana) and proceeded to curse him.

18. "When sacrifices are offered to gods, this Śiva, accursed of the gods, shall not (henceforth) get his share (in

*VC. states that Śiva's behaviour like a mad person is his līlā (sports) out of godly ecstasy.

(ii) GD. : The bounds of Vedic injunctions are not applicable to a votary who has realized the Brahman. The show of madness is for the purpose of teaching the world, to renounce worldly bonds of wife, sons, property etc. Rudra performs penance, while he externally behaves like a mad person.

ŚR. explains the eulogistic aspect thus:

He, being the Brahman, no kriyās are possible in him. There is nobody more pure than he. I was diffident about offering my daughter (a human being) to this great god, but did so to establish relationship. There is none more auspicious than he. That he is the Lord of goblins, evil spirits etc. shows how kind he is to his devotees. He removes their tāmasic nature and protects. He is compassionate to the wicked in his heart. Hence he is dur-kṛṣ. I am glad (bata) that as per advice of Brahmā, I overcame shyness, fear etc., and gave my daughter to him.

VR. rightly criticises the absurdity of giving double, i.e. contrary interpretations, one a praise, the other a censure of Śiva. Pertinently he saw the propriety of uttering a curse on Śiva if Dakṣa praised him so highly.
the sacrificial offerings) along with Indra, Upendra (Viṣṇu) and other gods”.

19. Oh Vidura, though Dakṣa was prohibited (from uttering the curse) by prominent members of the assembly, he pronounced it, on Śiva (the Lord of the mountains). In great rage, he left the place and retired to his abode.

20. Having come to know about the curse, Nandiśvara, the leader of Śiva’s followers, with his eyes reddened with anger, uttered a terrible curse upon Dakṣa and the Brāhmaṇas who approvingly listened to Śiva’s denunciation.

21. “He who, being ignorant, highly thinks of this mortal frame, and hates the Lord (Śiva) who does not bear enmity against anybody, cherishes the notion of difference, and has his face turned away from the Truth.

22. With the desire of gratifying low sensual pleasure, he (Dakṣa) is attached to householder’s life which is full of deceptive pseudo-religious practices. His intellect is confused by arthavāda in the Vedas, and he is engrossed in kārmic ritual (pertaining to sacrifices and other such acts).

23. With his intellect wrongly concentrated on the body as the Soul, and having forgotten the real nature of the Soul, Dakṣa is as good as a beast. He will be intensely addicted to women, and will soon have the head (face) of a goat.

24. This dullard (Dakṣa), who regards the avidyā (ignorance) consisting of performing of sacrifices and other religious acts, as the real knowledge, and those who followed him (approved of him) in his censure of Śiva, shall continue in the saṁsāra (the cycle of births and deaths).

25. The enemies of Hara (Śiva) shall be infatuated with (and attached to) karmas, as their minds will be agitated by the churning (rod) of rich promises (viz. happy life in heaven) alluring like the smell of wine given in the flowcry language of the Vedas.

26. Brāhmaṇas will eat anything and everything (without considering whether it is permitted by Śāstras). They will be devoted to learning, tapas (penance) and vratas (vows) for the sake of their own livelihood. They shall wander a-begging in this world, taking delight in property, (pleasure of) the body and sense organs.”
27. Hearing him pronounce this curse upon the Brāhmaṇa community (as a whole), Bhṛgu uttered a counter-curser which is an irrevocable punishment inflicted by Brahmanical power.

28. "Those who observe the vows to propitiate god Śiva, and those that follow them, shall be the heretics and the opponents of true Śastra.

29. They shall lose their (sense of) purity, shall be dull-witted. They shall wear matted locks of hair and bones, and smear themselves with ashes. They shall enter the cult of Śiva worship where wine shall be the divinity.

30. As you denounce the Vedas and Brāhmaṇas who, like protective dams, lay down fixed laws restricting men (for preservation of the society), you have embraced hereticism.

31. This is the only auspicious, ancient path for the people (viz. the path laid down by the Vedas). The ancients (our forefathers) have followed it, and Janārdana is its standard authority.

32. It (Veda) is the Supreme Brahman, absolutely pure. It is the eternal path of the good. Condemning this, you shall embrace hereticism wherein the Lord of goblins is the divinity”.

Maitreya said:

33. While Bhṛgu was uttering the curse, Lord Śiva, being slightly disconsolate at heart (for what had happened), left (the assembly hall), along with his followers.

34. The progenitors of the world also completed the sacrificial session of one thousand years-sacrifice in which Lord Hari was the deity to be propitiated.

35. At the conclusion of the session, they took their concluding bath (avabhrtha) in the confluence of the Gaṅgā and the Yamunā. Purifying themselves thus, they returned to their respective homes.
CHAPTER THREE

(Śiva dissuades Sati from attendance at Dakṣa-Yajña)

Maitreya said:

1. A long time elapsed while the son-in-law (Śiva) and the father-in-law (Dakṣa), continued their lasting enmity to each other.

2. When Dakṣa was installed as the chief of all Lords of creation by Brahmā, the highest of gods, he felt puffed up with pride (An additional factor to exclude Rudra from sacrifice).

3. Having performed the Vājapeya sacrifice, and disregarded Īsvara and others who were thoroughly proficient in Brahma-Vidyā, he (Dakṣa) began the best of sacrifices, called Bṛhaspatisava (as the Śruti enjoins this sacrifice, after the performance of the Vājapeya).

4. In that sacrifice, all Brāhmaṇa sages, heavenly sages, Pitṛs (and other) divinities were welcomed with auspicious formalities. Their wives, along with their husbands, were given auspicious reception (Those divinities, whose wives attended, were thus worshipped again).

5. Goddess Sati, the daughter of Dakṣa, came to know about the grand festival of her father's sacrifice, from the talks of the heavenly beings, while they were passing through the sky.

6-7. She saw that beautiful women of demi-god tribes (e.g. Gandharvas, Yakṣas) of rolling eyes, clad in rich garments, and wearing padakas (a gold ornament) round their necks, and burnished ear-rings, going with their husbands, in heavenly cars, from all directions. Seeing them flying past her own mansion, she in her eagerness, spoke to her consort, god Bhūtapati (the protector of all beings).

Sati said:

8. "It is reported that the great sacrificial festival of your father-in-law, Prajāpati Dakṣa, has now commenced. Oh beautiful Lord, let us go there, if you so desire, as these gods are also going thither."
9. My sisters, desirous of seeing their kith and kin, will certainly go there with their husbands. I wish to receive along with you, the presents which will be offered by my parents.

10. Oh Śiva, really I am eagerly longing to see there, my sisters worthy of their husbands, my aunts and my mother whose heart is full of (lit. wet with) affection, and the greatest of the sacrifices being conducted by leading sages (or the flag or sacrificial post of the sacrifice raised by great sages).

11. Oh unborn Lord! This wonderful universe consisting of three guṇas (sattva, rajas, tamas), appears created in you by your own Māyā. Hence you have no curiosity to go. I am, however, a poor woman who do not know your real nature. I, therefore, strongly desire to see my native place.

12. Oh birthless Lord, look at those other women (in no way related to Dakṣa), richly adorned, going with their husbands in crowds. Oh Śitikāṇṭha the sky looks beautiful by the movements of their aerial cars white like sweet warbling swans (Kala-haṁsas).

13. Oh great God, how can the body (including mind) of a daughter remain unmoved, after hearing about a festival in the father’s house? Even though uninvited, people go to the houses of their friends, their husbands (masters), their preceptor and parents. (The formality of invitation is superfluous in these cases).

14. Oh immortal Lord! Be gracious unto me. You are compassionate. You should really grant me this desire. I have been located in half of your person by you who possess perfect wisdom. Do this favour as entreated by me, to you.”

The Sage said:

15. Thus earnestly entreated by his beloved wife, Śiva, who was so affectionate to his friends and relatives, was fully) reminded of the shaft-like bitter words, cutting to the quick, which Dakṣa spoke to him in the presence of (other) progenitors of the universe. He, however, replied to her with a smile.

_The Lord Śiva said:_

16. Oh charming lady, you have put it nicely when you said that people go to their relatives, even though they are not invited. But that is only when their vision (outlook) is not prejudiced by their powerful ego about the body being the ātman, and by their wrath (against such a visitor).

17. Learning, penance, wealth, beautiful personality, youth and (high) pedigree are good qualities in the case of the good, but are like a curse to the most wicked. When these attributes destroy the memory and knowledge of the wicked, they increase only the arrogance, as these wicked people cannot realize the glory of the great.

18. One should never go to the house of such persons, of unsteady minds, regarding them as relatives—persons who look upon the visitors (to their house), with crooked mentality, with frowning eye-brows and angry eyes (looks).

19. A person whose body is (deeply) wounded with arrows of the enemies, does not feel the tortures to that extent, as he who is cut to the quick by the harsh words of his own relatives of crooked minds. For the former can (at least) get sleep, but the latter suffers day and night, with a tormented heart.

20. Oh beautiful lady (of charming eyebrows), I do certainly agree that you are the most beloved of all the daughters of Dakṣa (the Lord of created beings) of eminent rank. You will not however receive (proper) attention or respect from your father, because of your relations with me, whom he hates intensely.

21. At the sight of the prosperity (glory, possession of siddhis) of great persons who stand (unconcerned) like a witness to the minds of jīva (i.e. are devoid of ahamkāra—ego), his heart is boiling with jealousy, and his senses are over-anxious for gratification. But being incapable of attaining to their eminent position easily, he hates them intensely as the Asuras hated Hari.

22. Oh slender-waisted lady, the mutual exchange of respects, viz. going forth to receive, expressing modesty, paying obeisance is properly done by the wise bhāgavatas (devotees of the Lord) only. They do it all mentally to the Supreme Person Vāsudeva, who abides in the heart of all, but not to him who regards the Soul and the body as identical (and expects the external observance of formalities directed to his body).

23. The absolutely pure sattva (heart or the attribute called sattva) is designated as Vāsudeva; for it is in the sattva that Supreme Man Vāsudeva is manifested (and realized) in his real (unveiled) form. It is in the sattva (absolutely pure mind) that I pay obeisance* to him who is beyond sense perception.

24. Therefore, Oh beautiful lady, you should not see Dakṣa and his followers—even though Dakṣa is your father, the protector of your body, Dakṣa is my enemy. When I went to attend the sacrifice performed by the Prajāpatis, he expressed his hatred, by using abusive language to me, even though I was innocent (not at fault at all).

25. If you go there ignoring my advice, no good will betide you thereby. When a person of well-established reputation suffers insult from his relatives, the indignity leads immediately to his death.*

CHAPTER FOUR
(Sattva Self-immolation by Yoga)

Maitreya said:

1. Having said this much, Saṅkara became silent, as he anticipated the destruction (death) of his wife's body, in either case (whether he permits her to go or refuses to do so).

7. v.1. manasi—deeply meditate upon him in mind.—ŚR.
*Of saṃbhāvitaṁ yatra adhisthir marapadaśi iriṣyate/ BG. 2.34
Sati who was eager to see her friends and relatives, but was afraid of Śaṅkara, became indecisive (two in mind). (Like an oscillating pendulum) she went out (to see her relatives), and returned (for fear of Śiva).

2. Sati was troubled in her mind by the thwarting of her desire to see her kith and kin. Out of affection, she burst into tears and wept in utter despondence. She trembled in rage. She looked in wrath at the peerless Śiva, as if she would burn him.

3. Then she lost her judgment, due to her womanly nature. Heaving heavy sighs, and with her heart tormented by grief and anger, she went to her parents’ house, leaving him (Śiva) who is beloved of saintly persons and who, out of love, had given half of his body to her.

4. Thousands of followers of the three-eyed-god (Śiva) including personal attendants and Yakṣas like Maṇiman, Mada and others, and with Nandikesvara at the head, hastily yet fearlessly (or with saddened heart at her disobedience to Śiva), went after Sati who set out all alone, with quick pace.

5. They made her ride the best of the bulls (Nandikesvara). They accompanied her, taking with them Sārikās (singing birds), balls, mirrors and lotuses (for her entertainment), a white umbrella, chowries, and garlands (her insignia of royalty) and musical instruments like kettle-drums, conchs and flutes.

6. She entered the place of sacrifice where Vedic hymns were loudly chanted by Brāhmaṇas, keenly competing with each other in reciting Vedic mantras; where Brāhmaṇa sages and divinities were in attendance; where on sides were (seen) vessels and utensils made of clay, wood, iron, gold, darbha grass and hides.

7. Being afraid of the sacrificer (Dakṣa), who treated her insultingly, nobody except her mother and sisters, dared to welcome her, on her arrival. They (her mother and sisters),

8. Ā- brāhmaṇa-varāhāya: OR ‘Where the sacrificial act of killing the animal is sanctified by the loud chanting of Vedic hymns.’—SR.

RR. brands this as ‘coarse’ (adilīla) and prefers the explanation given above. All commentators do the same.
however, eagerly and rapturously embraced her, with their throats choked with tears of affection.

8. Sati who was not welcomed by her father, did not accept the hospitality and the seat of honour respectfully offered to her by her mother and maternal aunts. Nor did she pay attention to her sisters’ affectionate enquiries about her health etc.

9. Seeing the sacrifice being performed without offering the due share to Rudra, and the insulting treatment meted out to Lord Śiva by her father, the great goddess Satī, who herself was not given proper reception at the sacrificial assembly, became enraged, as if she would burn the worlds in anger.

10. By her divine lustre, the goddess Sati controlled the hosts of goblins (who accompanied her) who sprang to their feet (to destroy the sacrifice). But within the hearing of the whole world, she censured (Dakṣa), the enemy of Śiva who was proud of his exertions in the path of smoke (i.e. was puffed up with performance of great sacrifices), in accents faltering with anger.

11. "Who else than you would behave inimically towards the Lord, who is above enmity? To him nobody is superior in the world. Though he is the beloved Soul of all embodied beings, nobody is dear or hateful to him. He is the cause of all.

12*. Oh Dvija! Persons who are jealous like you, discover faults in the virtues of others (and not merits) are called mean. Those who, occupying a middle position, note merits and demerits as they are, are regarded as great. Good people note only the merits and not the weaknesses (and these are greater). The greatest ones do not see the defect at all, but they magnify even the minutest good points.

13. It is no wonder that out of jealousy, there is always the malicious condemnation of the great among unrighteous persons who look upon this inert material body as the Soul. The glory (of such slanderers) is obscured by the dust of the feet of those great men. Hence it befits these (slanderers to revile the good Souls):

14. Alas! Your honour has become inauspicious, as you hate god Śiva, whose fame is holy and commands inviolable, and whose name of two syllables (Śi-va) if incidentally uttered by the tongue even once, destroys all the sins of men (who utter it).

15. Your honour is hating (Śiva), that friend and protector of the universe. His lotuslike feet are resorted to by the bee-like minds of the great (sages like Sanaka etc.), who long to taste the winelike honey of Brahmānanda (bliss of being absorbed in Brahman)—Feet which shower blessings upon people desirous of worldly objects (irrespective of their worthiness to receive them.)

16.* You say that god Śiva is inauspicious—a-śiva—in his dress and behaviour. If that be so, do not gods etc. other than your honour, (such as Brahmā and others) who wear on their heads flowers etc. fallen from his feet,* know that he is auspicious (śiva) only in name but is really inauspicious—Śiva who with his dishevelled matted locks of hair, dwells in the cremation grounds in company of goblins, and who decorates himself with the flower-garlands, ashes (of funeral pyres) and skulls lying there?

17. When the Supreme Lord (Śiva), the protector of religion, is blasphemed by restraintless people, one should shut one’s ears and leave the place if he is powerless (to kill the slanderer or die in the action). If he is powerful enough, he should, by force, cut off the vituperative tongue which utters such evil words, and lay down his own life (if necessary for that). Such is the course of righteous duty (dharma).

18. I, therefore, shall not retain this body which is born of you, the slanderer of Śiva. For, the wise people say that the remedy for eating of the impure food taken in through ignorance, is to vomit it out.

---

*VR. is hard put to it to reconcile this verse with the injunction in the Sāttvata-tantra that no god other than Nārāyana should be respected (nāryah devah namas-kuryāt etc.). He says that injunction is restricted to those who are trying for mokṣa. He concludes:

sarva-devānām brahmāmakatvena-anusandhānah tvāviruddhah-eva na virodhaḥ /
19. The mind of the great sage who finds joy in his own Self, does not necessarily follow Vedic statements (regarding injunctions and prohibitions). Just as the movements of celestial beings and men are different (the former through the sky and the latter on the earth) a person who follows his own course of duty, should not find fault with another following a different path.

20. It is true that karmas of two kinds—pravrddta (sacrificial acts etc.) and nivrddta (self-control, renunciation etc.) are prescribed in the Vedas, severally, for two distinct types of men—one characterised by attachment to worldly objects and the other, by absence of it. Both the types of karmas cannot be found (practicable) simultaneously in the same agent. But no duty of doing a karma of any kind devolves upon the Brahman (god Šiva).

21. (You need not entertain the pride that you are affluent and Rudra is a pauper for), the mystic powers (siddhīs like animā etc.) possessed by us, can never be yours, oh father. They are not found (attained) in sacrificial halls (by performance of sacrifices). The cause of our (attainment of) powers is unmanifest (as they depend on our will). They are enjoyed by Āvadhūtas (knowers of Brahman who have renounced everything). While your path is extolled by creatures following the path of smoke (karma-mārga) who are gratified with the food offered in sacrifices.

22. Now enough of this impure body born of you who have sinned against (offended) Lord Šiva. I have been ashamed of my kinship with an unworthy father. Fie upon the birth from a man who vilifies the great Souls.

23. When (out of joke) Lord Šiva (the bull-banneered god) refers to your gotra by addressing me as “Dākṣāyaṇī” (Dakṣa’s daughter), I immediately lose all joyfulness and smiles, and become extremely pained at heart. Therefore, I shall give up this body (corpse) begotten of you.”

Maitreya said:

24. Oh vanquisher of enemies! Having thus addressed Dakṣa in the sacrificial hall, she sat silently on the ground with her face to north. She wore a yellow garment. She touched water (i.e. sipped it as in ācamana), and closing her eyes, she entered the yogic path (for casting off her material body).

25. Steady in her yogic posture, she controlled prāṇa and apāna equally at the navel. Forcing up the vital air called udāna from the mystic plexus at the navel (manipūra cakra), she gradually brought it up and steadied it along with intellect at the mystical plexus in the heart. The pure, sinless lady brought it through her throat to (ājnā cakra), the mystical plexus in the midregion of the eyebrows.

26. Thus, out of her anger against Dakṣa, she desired to cast off her body which was many times lovingly placed (and caressed) on his lap by god Śiva, the most exalted amongst the great. The strong-willed lady instituted the yogic contemplation (dhāranā) of fire and wind in her limbs (body).

27. Then meditating on the bliss of the lotus-like feet of her lord, the preceptor of the world (Lord Śiva), Sati (was so absorbed that she) perceived nothing else. She destroyed all impurities. And her body was soon ablaze with fire produced by her samādhi (yogic concentration).

28. There arose a tremendous uproar of grief (‘alas! alas!!’) both in the heaven and on the earth by those who witnessed the great miracle. “Alas! provoked by (her father) Dakṣa, Sati, the beloved spouse of Lord Śiva, had thrown away her life.

29. Oh! Look at the enormous wickedness of the Lord of Creation (Dakṣa) from whom are born all creatures, mobile and immobile. His high-souled daughter who always deserved honour, had to give up her life, due to insults inflicted by him.

30. This Dakṣa of intolerant (jealous) heart, the hater of the Brahman, will reap great infamy in this world. This enemy of god Śiva did not prevent his own daughter, while she prepared for death, on account of the disrespectfuil treatment meted out to her.”

31. While the people were criticising thus, at the sight of the miraculous self-immolation of Sati, her attendants rose with their weapons to kill Dakṣa.

32. Having noticed the vehemence of the on-rushing attendants of Śiva, venerable Bhrṛgu offered oblations in the sacrificial fire called daksināgni reciting the mantras of Yajurveda efficacious to kill the destroyers of the sacrifice.

33. While the priest adhvaryu (viz. Bhṛgu) poured the oblation, gods called Ṛbhhus who had secured share in the soma juice by their austere penance, rose up in thousands, (from the sacrificial pit) with great force.

34. Beaten by the gods who were armed with fire brands and who were resplendent with Brahmanic lustre, all the attendants of Śiva, pramathas and guhyakas dispersed in various directions.

CHAPTER FIVE

(Destruction of Dakṣa's Sacrifice)

Maitreya said:

1. Having learnt from Nārada, the report of the death of his wife (Satī) on being insulted by Prajāpati Dakṣa, and of the total rout of the army of his attendants by the Ṛbhhus in that Sacrifice, Śiva's anger knew no bounds.

2. Śiva (the god with matted locks of hair) got enraged, and bit his lips. He pulled out a matted lock of hair which dazzled with terrific splendour, like the flash of lightning, and a flame of fire. He suddenly sprang to his feet, and with a loud laughter and roar, dashed it on the ground.

3. From it (was born Virabhadra), of colossal size, who touched the skies, by his stature. He had a thousand arms. His complexion was like a dark cloud. He had three eyes brilliant like the Sun. He had sharp fangs. His locks of hair were shining like burning flames of fire. He wore a garland of skulls and held various weapons aloft (for striking).

4. Śiva, the Supreme Lord, the master of bhūtas, commanded Virabhadra who, with folded hands, requested for an order. "Oh Rudra, as you are my part (manifestation, you need not be afraid of Brahmanic power). You be the leader of my army, oh warrior, and destroy Dakṣa along with his sacrifice".
5. Being thus commanded by wrathful Śiva, he circumambulated the all-powerful god of gods. Oh Vidura, he then regarded himself capable of withstanding the might of very powerful warriors, by his irresistible force.

6. He was followed by the attendants of Rudra who were roaring loudly. He himself thundered most terribly. Raising his trident which was capable of killing even the god of Death, he dashed forth, with his feet jingling with ornaments.

7-8. Having seen (a cloud of) dust in the northern direction, the sacrificial priest, the sacrificer (Dakṣa), members of the sacrificial assembly, Brāhmaṇas and their wives began to speculate: “What darkness is this? From which place is the cloud of dust (coming)? Winds are not blowing. Nor can these be robbers, as king Pracīnabarhiṣ of iron rule, is still alive. Cows are not driven home so hastily. Whence is this dust? Is the world now due for dissolution (pralaya)?”

9. Ladies of whom Prasūti was prominent, commented with a troubled heart: “This is the consequence of the sin committed by Dakṣa, the Lord of Creation, who slighted his innocent daughter Satī, in the presence of his other daughters.

10. It may be due to Dakṣa’s offence against Rudra who dances at the end of the universe, with his locks of matted hair scattered about, and with the elephants supporting the directions pierced on the prongs of his trident, and with his bannerlike hands holding up the missiles (for discharge), tearing down the directions, by thunderlike peals of laughter.

11. When he is full of rage, can anyone fare well, even if he be god Brahmā himself who provoked his (Rudra’s) wrath—Rudra, who is of irresistible splendour, full of wrath, unbearable to look at when he knits his eyebrows in angry looks, and who has scattered the whole group of constellations with his terrible fangs.”

12. While people with perturbed eyes, were speculating thus wildly, there were thousands of omens portending misfortune to Dakṣa, frequently appearing in the sky, and on the earth.

13. Oh Vidura, in the meanwhile the big sacrificial pandal was rushed at on all sides, and occupied by the followers of Rudra with their weapons held up in their hands. They were short in stature, dark and brown (in complexion) and their faces and stomachs were like crocodiles.

14. Some broke the Prāgoamśa (the beam resting on the eastern and western pillars of the sacrificial hall). Others broke the apartment of the sacrificer’s wife (This is to the west of the sacrificial hall). Some broke the assembly hall in front (of the sacrificial hall). Some broke the store-room of the materials for sacrificial offerings; others, the cottage of the sacrificer himself, and the kitchen.

15. Some smashed the sacrificial utensils; some put out the sacrificial fire; some urinated in the sacrificial pit, and some cut down the zonelike construction around the sacrificial platform.

16. Some struck the sages; others threatened the wives of the priests, etc.; others seized gods who were near by and trying to run away.

17. Maṇīman bound Bṛgu; Virabhadra, Prajāpati Dakṣa; Caṇḍīśa, god Pūṣan; Nandiśvara caught hold of Bhaga.

18. All the sacrificial priests, along with the members of the assembly and gods, saw this. Being severely pelted with stones, they ran quickly, helter-skelter in all directions.

19. Glorious Virabhadra pulled out mustaches and the beard of Bṛgu, while he was offering the oblations with sruva (a ladle) in his hand, as he had laughed derisively in the assembly showing his beard (when Dakṣa insulted Śiva).

20. Out of anger, venerated Virabhadra knocked down Bhaga and pulled out his eyes, as in that sacrificial session of the assembly (while Dakṣa censured Śiva), he made signs with his eyes to Dakṣa.

21. He knocked out the teeth of Pūṣan as Balarāma did to the king of Kaliṅga, as he laughed, showing his teeth, while the great god Śiva was vilified by Dakṣa.

22. The three-eyed Virabhadra (threw down Dakṣa and) seating himself on Dakṣa’s chest, he tried to cut his head by a sharpedged weapon, but he was unable to do so.

23. Hara (Virabhadra) was greatly wonderstruck to find that the skin of Dakṣa was not cut by weapons charmed with Vedic mantras called astras. He (who is a form of Paśupaṭi) deeply thought what to do.
24. Observing the way in which animals are killed in the sacrifice, the Lord of Paśus (Souls) severed by that method the head of Dakṣa, the sacrificer, whom he made the animal to be sacrificed.

25. There arose a shout of applause 'well done', 'bravo' from the Bhūtas, Pretas and Piśācas (members of Virabhadra's army) who praised that act of gallantry. The reverse was the case in others (i.e. in Dakṣa's camp).

26. Full of rage, Virabhadra threw Dakṣa's head in the sacrificial fire called Dakṣiṇāgni, as an oblation. Having burnt down the sacrificial edifice, he returned to Kailāsa, the home of Guhyakas.

CHAPTER SIX

(Appeasement of Rudra—Revival of Dakṣa)

Maitreya said:

1-2. Thereupon all the hosts of gods who were defeated by the armies of Rudra, had got their bodies hacked and hewn with tridents, spears (paṭṭiśa), swords, maces, iron bars and clubs. Being overwhelmed with fear, they, along with the sacrificial priests and their associates, approached god Brahmā, bowed down to him, and narrated in details this incident.

3. (As) worshipful Brahmā and Nārāyaṇa, the Soul of the universe, had long back foreseen it, they did not go to the sacrifice of Dakṣa.

4. After giving them hearing, Brahmā said, "the desire to retaliate against a person of superior might, even though he has offended you, cannot generally lead to the welfare (of the weak retaliator).

5. Here, however, you have committed the offence against Śiva, inasmuch as you excluded him from the sacrifice, even though he had a rightful share (in the sacrificial offerings). Now, with a pure chastened heart, you resort to his lotuslike feet and obtain his grace, for he can be easily propitiated,
6. You, who wish for the revival (and completion) of the sacrifice, should immediately beg the pardon of the god, who is cut to the quick, by words of abuse (by Dakṣa), and is bereaved of his beloved wife. If he is enraged, the whole world along with its protectors, will cease to be.

7. The Lord Rudra is absolutely independent. Neither I nor Yajña (Indra of that era), nor you nor sages or any embodied being, knows his real nature and the extent of his strength and power. (This being the case) who can be certain of the means to be adopted (for his propitiation)".

8. Having advised the gods, thus, Brahmā accompanied by them (gods), Pitṛs, Prajāpati set out from his own region (Satyaloka) to Kailāsa, the chief of the mountains, the favourite abode of god Śiva, the destroyer of the Tripuras.

9. Mount Kailāsa is inhabited by gods who have attained superhuman powers (śiddhis) by their (superiority in) birth, or by drugs, penance, mantra (incantation of mystic power) or the practice of Yoga. It is always crowded with Kinnaras, Gandharvas (celestial musicians) and celestial damsels.

10. Its summits are made up of various kinds of gems; they are variegated with different kinds of metallic ores; they are covered with various kinds of trees, creepers and shrubs. They abound in different kinds of wild beasts.

11. With its streams of crystal clear water, and its peaks and caves, the mountain is a pleasure-haunt for siddha women, to sport along with their lovers.

12. It is resonant with the cries of the peacocks, melodious humming of bees intoxicated with honey, loud notes of cuckoos and warbling of birds.

13. It seems to invite birds, by the highly raised boughs of wish-yielding trees. It appears to be in motion by the wandering of elephants. It is, as if, speaking with the murmuring of flowing springs.

14-15. It is beautified with trees such as (the heavenly) Mandāra and Pārijāta; with Saralas, Tamālas, Sālas, Tālas, Kovidāras, Asanas, Arjunas, mango-trees, Kadambas, Nīpas, Nāgas, Punnāgas, Campakas, Pāṭalas, Aśokas, Bakulas, Kundas, and Kurabakas.

16-19. It is ornamented with lotus flowers of golden hue (and hundred petals), excellent cardamom creepers, Mālati (Jasmine), Kubjas, Mallikās, Mādhavīs; and also with (fruit) trees (such as) Panasa, Audumbara, Aśvattha, Plakṣa, Nyagrodha, Hiṅgu, Bhūrja; with herbs and plants like betel nuts, Rājapūga (a kind of arecanut palm), rose-apple trees, date-palms, Jambū, mango-trees and others, with Priyāla, Madhuka, and Ḡinguda (soapnut trees). It was adorned with various kinds of bamboos called Veṇu and Kīcaka; it was beautified with swarms of birds which were sweetly singing on the banks of the lakes rich in the beds of lilies and lotuses of various kinds.

20. It was abounding in deer, monkeys, boars, lions, bears and Porcupines, Gavayas (a species of ox) Sarabhas (a mythical eight-footed animal), tigers, ruru-deer, buffaloes and other beasts.

21. It was infested with a number of beasts called Karpāṇtra, one-footed animals, horse-faced animals, wolves, musk-deer; and it presented a charming sight with its sandy banks of lotus lakes, surrounded by gardens of plantain trees.

22. It was surrounded by the Nandā (the Ganges) whose waters have been all the more hallowed by the ablutions of Sati. At the sight of that mountain of Lord Śiva, gods were filled with wonder.

23. There (on the mountain), they beheld the famous and beautiful city of Alakā, with its garden called Saugandhika, where grew the species of lotus, bearing the same name (Saugandhika).

24. Along the outskirts of the city, flow the two rivers Nandā and Alakanandā, which are highly sanctified with the dust of the ever-hallowed feet of Viśṇu.

25. Oh Vidura, when celestial women get tired of their amorous sports, they descend from their heavenly cars into these rivers. They then plunge and sport therein, sprinkling their mates with water.

26. (Being tempted by the fragrance of saffron), elephants, though not thirsty, drink the waters of these rivers, yellow on account of the fresh saffron washed (from the breasts of celestial women) during their baths, and make the female elephants also drink it.
27-28. Alakā, the capital of the Yakṣa king (Kubera), which was swarmed with hundreds of aerial cars made up of silver, gold and highly precious stones, and inhabited by Yakṣa women, looked like the sky, overcast with clouds and streaks of lightning. They (Brahmā and others) bypass the capital of Kubera, and the Saugandhika forest, which was beautified with wish-yielding trees with variegated flowers, fruits and leaves.

29. (Therein) the cooking and warbling of cuckoos and other birds, harmonised with the melodious humming of bees. It was full of lakes with lotus beds, which were the most favourite haunts of swans of melodious notes.

30. (In that forest) the breeze blowing over the Hari-candana trees against which wild elephants have rubbed their bodies, created frequently more agitation in the wives of Yakṣas.

31. There were tanks beautified with lotuses, with steps of vaidūrya gems, built around them. It was enjoyed by Kim-puruṣas. Having seen the forest, the gods saw a banyan tree near by.

32. It was hundred Yojanas in height; its branches extended seventy-five Yojanas, on every side; it had a permanent shade on all sides; it had no nests on it, and it warded off the Sun.

33. Beneath that tree, which induced great concentration of mind (mahā-yoga), and which is the resort of people seeking liberation, the gods beheld Śiva, seated like the god of Death, free from anger.

34. (They saw) Śiva of a very tranquil personality. He was attended upon by great serene Yogins like Śanandana and others and also by Kubera, his friend, and the master of Guhyakas and Rākṣasas.

35. (They saw) the Supreme Lord Śiva, the friend of the universe, who is following the path of upāsanā, concentration and Yoga meditation, practising it out of affection for the welfare of the people.

37. He was seated on a seat of darbha grass. He was expounding to Nārada the nature of the eternal Brahman, while other saints were listening.

38. He placed his left lotuslike foot on the right lap, and placed his left hand on the left knee (i.e. in the Vīrāsana posture\(^{10}\)). A rosary of beads was round his right wrist, and he assumed tarka mudrā\(^{11}\).

39. The sages, along with the protectors of the world, folded their hands and bowed to god Śiva (Lord of Mountains). Śiva who was absorbed in the meditation of being one with the blissful Brahman; who wore a Yoga-kakṣa (a strap to secure the position of the left knee)\(^{12}\); and who was the foremost among the contemplators.

40. Knowing that god Brahmā (Self-born god) had come, he (Śiva) whose feet had been respected by the Lord of gods and asuras, rose (from his seat) and bowed to him with his head, as the most adorable Viṣṇu did to Kāśyapa (in Vāmana incarnation).

\(^{10}\) VJ. : They saw Śiva who was contemplating on Nārāyaṇa who is the disinterested friend and well-wisher of the universe, and confers auspiciousness on the people, and who is the preceptor in and object of knowledge, penance and Yoga which he is practising.

\(^{11}\) GD. explains: Śiva practises the path of upāsanā, mental concentration and Yoga. He practises upāsanā out of affection for the world, to confer on it auspiciousness. He is the well-wisher of the world of which he is the creator, preserver and destroyer. Being the Lord of the world, he takes care of its welfare.

\(^{12}\) It is described as under:

\[\text{itarasminstathā bāhum vīrāsanam idam smṛtam} //\]

\(^{11}\) Tarka-mudrā or Jñāna-mudrā : Joining the tips of the thumb and the index finger, and straightening the other fingers after joining them together. This position of the hand is tarka mudrā.

\(^{12}\) Probably it might be a wooden support called kubëṭ in Marathi. Yogis keep it under their armpit to support the erect posture of their body during contemplation.
41. So also the hosts of other Siddhas, along with great sages, who were (sitting) around Śiva, did the same. God Brahmā who was thus bowed (to by them), spoke, as if with a smile, to Śiva (the god who wears the crescent moon on the head), who was still in a respectful pose (bowing).

*Brahmā said:

42*. I know you to be the Lord of the universe. You are the same undifferentiated Brahmā which is the cause of both the Śakti (prakṛti or the divine energy) and Śiva (the puruṣa) who are both the womb and the seed of the world.

43. Oh Lord, it is you who carry on your sport through Śiva and Śakti who are essentially one (sarūpayoh)¹³, and create, protect and destroy the universe, as a spider does with his cobweb¹⁴.

44. You have created the institution of sacrifice through Dakṣa, as a string or instrument for the preservation of the

*(i) Parabrahman is the inner controller (antar-yāmin) of Rudra who is merely an ādēsa type of incarnation of Parabrahman. Therefore Rudra is identified with the Parabrahman and the attributes of the latter are applied to him. Hence this is the eulogy of Parabrahman—VR. (ii) VJ. says that these verses are in praise of Narasimha (Viṣṇu) for the same reason as above. (iii) VG. regards that the author has followed Śaiva-mātra, in this panegyric.

13. VR. accepts the v.l. svāṁstāyoh : Śiva and Śakti are the parts or anītas of the viṣṭṭa mentioned as svā. This verse is addressed to Parabrahman who is the antar-yāmin of Rudra. Prakṛti and Puruṣa form the body of Parabrahman. VR. expounds the stand of viṣṭṭadvaita with reference to god and the world etc. in this com. (ii) VG. explains this reading: Śiva is god’s anīta. Śakti is Śiva’s shadow. Hence they are equated here. VJ. accepts the v.l. Svāṁstāyoh. He regards this verse as addressed to Viṣṇu who is the antar-yāmin of both Śiva and Śakti. They are not one in essence with Viṣṇu. He uses them as instruments for the creation etc. of the universe.

Oh bestower of dharma and artha (religious merit and wealth)! For the attainment of puruṣārthas, you have created the institution of sacrifice by efficacious (dakṣa) sūtra. The bounds of varṇa, āśrama etc. are fixed by you. Brāhmaṇas adopt strict religious vows and faithfully follow these limitations or commands—VR.

(iii) VG. and SD. state that here Brahmā implies that as Śiva had destroyed the sacrifice of Dakṣa who followed Vedic injunctions laid down by Śiva, it was Śiva’s responsibility to see to it that the sacrifice was completed.
three Vedas which bestow dharma and artha (religious merit and wealth). It is you who have ordained the boundaries (of the course of conduct) of the world-boundaries which Brähmanas, who have adopted religious vows, follow with faith.

45. Oh auspicious Lord! You confer heaven (svarga) or final beatitude (Mokṣa) on those who perform auspicious deeds, and assign the terrible dark hell to the perpetrators of evil deeds. Why is it that the same act in the case of some persons, gives the contrary result? (Why should Dakṣa who followed the Vedic path, and accordingly tried to perform a sacrifice as per Vedic injunction, meet with that fate?)

46*. Verily anger cannot generally overwhelm pious people as it would do in the case of brute (-like ignorant persons. For these (righteous people) have offered their hearts to your feet, and visualise you in all beings, and see all beings as one with (their Soul). (If your righteous devotees are above anger, how is it that you, their god, can be wrathful?).

47. A person (of exalted status) like you, ought not to kill those who perceive differentiation in their hearts; who fix their eyes on karmas (ritualistic acts) only; being of wicked minds, they are always jealously burning in their hearts at the prosperity of others; who being naturally disposed to hurt the

15. dharmārtha-dugha: Alternatively ŚR. takes it as a Voc.—dugha. Oh Lord Śiva who give religious merits and wealth! For the attainment of dharma and artha you have created etc.

(ii) VJ. takes this as instr. sing. and explains it as qualifying Dakṣa. According to VJ.: Dakṣa’s sacrifice was disturbed by Hari, as Dakṣa treated Śiva disrespectfully. Śiva was superior to Dakṣa even as a devotee. Hence Hari disturbed the sacrifice, as the boundary or etiquette to be observed was crossed by Dakṣa.

*(i) It is impossible that your wrath can be the cause of such a contrary result. The righteous persons entertain no anger against good people (ŚR.) (ii) VJ. takes this verse as addressed to Viṣṇu, and explains that Brahmā does not attribute any anger to Viṣṇu. If the devotees of Viṣṇu are not overwhelmed with anger, there is no possibility of finding resentment in Viṣṇu.

16. Prāyāṣa—Śiva might have been angry as there are exceptions in such people, e.g. Sanaka’s anger on Jaya & Vijaya.—VC.

feelings of others, wound them by harsh words. For such (wicked) persons are doomed by the Providence.

48*. If persons who have their minds deluded by the unfathomable Māyā of Viṣṇu, and who consider the universe as different from God, offend the righteous at any time or place, they regard it (the offence) as caused by the Providence. Out of compassion they (the righteous) definitely show mercy to them, but do not show their prowess for their destruction.

49. Oh Lord! you have your intellect uninfluenced (untouched) by the irresistible Māyā of the Supreme Man, and hence you are Omniscient. You should therefore show grace to persons whose minds are affected by the Māyā, and hence, whose minds follow (the path of) ritualistic karmas.

50. Oh Lord! Be pleased to revive (recommence) the sacrifice of Dakṣa, the son of Manu—the sacrifice which remained incomplete as it was wrecked by you when the petty minded priests who conducted the sacrifice did not offer you, your due share (in it).

51. May this sacrificer (Dakṣa) be alive again. May Bhaga get back his eyes as before. Let Brṛgu grow his beard and mustaches. Let Pūṣan have his teeth as before.

52. Oh Rudra (Manyu)! By your grace may gods and sacrificial priests, the limbs of whose bodies have been wounded and broken by weapons and stones, be restored to health immediately.

53. Oh Rudra! Whatever will remain after the completion of the sacrifice shall be your share\(^{18}\). Oh destroyer of the sacrifice, let this sacrifice be consummated today, with this share assigned to you.

---

*VJ. This verse is addressed to Rudra so that he should not entertain any anger against Dakṣa: ‘In this world, minds of persons like Dakṣa, are overpowered by Māyā—the binding power of Viṣṇu. How is it that when the persons of incorrect perception, offend or hate the good, righteous persons like you do not feel compassion for them, and oblige them by toleration? For the ignorant have acted so, due to their previous karmas and under compulsion of Lord’s will.

(ii) SD. & GD. : The righteous persons take the offence done to them as due to their own karmas, and feel compassion for the wicked, for their future life in hell.

18. Literally : Oh Rudra! May all that has remained of the sacrifice be your share.
CHAPTER SEVEN

(Completion of Dakṣa's Sacrifice)

Maitreya said:

1. Oh Vidura (of mighty arms)! God Śiva who was thus entreated by Brahmā, was highly pleased. With a loud laugh, he said, "Listen".

Śrī Mahādeva said:

2. Oh Lord of the created beings, I do not refer to (pronounce), nor do I recollect the misdemeanour of the ignorant who are overwhelmed with Lord's Māyā. I have only meted out punishment there (to the offenders).

3. The head of Prajāpati Dakṣa which has been burnt, may have the face of a he-goat. Let god Bhaga look at his own portion of offering in the sacrifice, through the eyes of Mitra god.

4. Let god Pūṣan who eats flour only eat the offering of flour with the teeth of the sacrificer. The gods, who have offered to me the remaining portion of the sacrifice, will have all their limbs restored, properly.

5. Let Adhvaryus and other sacrificial priests who have lost their arms use the arms of gods, Āśvins; while those who have lost their hands should work with those of god Pūṣan. Bhrigu will have the beard and mustaches of a he-goat.

6. Oh Vidura, when all beings heard the speech of the most bountiful god Śiva, their hearts were fully satisfied, and they exclaimed ‘Well done, well done’.

7. Thereupon, gods along with sages, (cordially) invited god Śiva (to help the consummation of the sacrifice), and went again to the site of the sacrifice, along with Śiva and Brahmā.

8. Having accomplished completely whatever Lord Bhava instructed them to do, they joined the head of the sacrificial animal (he-goat), to the trunk of Dakṣa.

9. While the head was being joined (to Dakṣa's body), Śiva cast a gracious look at it, (and lo!) Dakṣa got up as though from sleep, and saw Śiva in front of him.

10. Prajāpati Dakṣa whose mind had been turbid with hatred against Śiva (god with a bull on his banner), became free from that impurity (hatred), like a pool (the waters of which become clear and translucent) in the autumn.

11. He (Dakṣa) had a mind to offer praise (to Śiva). But recollecting his daughter who was no more, his throat got choked with tears of affection and anxiety, and he could not utter a word of praise.

12. The wise Prajāpati Dakṣa who was overwhelmed with affection, controlled his mind with difficulty. He then praised Lord Śiva, with sincere devotion.

Dakṣa said:

13. "Oh venerable Lord! Even though you were disrespected by me, a great favour has been shown to me by you, in meting out a (corrective) punishment. Both you and Hari are never different to even fallen Brāhmaṇas. How can you be so to those who follow religious vows (i.e. the sacrificial duties).

14. For the preservation of the Vedas and knowledge of Ātman19 you created out of your mouth20 Brāhmaṇas who possessed learning and practised penance and religious vows21 at the beginning (of the world). Oh great god, you therefore protect Brāhmaṇas in all calamities like a herdsman protects his cattle with a staff.

15. May the Lord who, though insulted in the assembly with arrowlike piercing words of abuse, by me, who was ignorant about the true knowledge (of his real nature), ignored them, and with his gracious look (at me) saved me who was falling down for having reviled the most worshipful person—May that venerable Lord be pleased with his own (merciful) act (as it is beyond my capacity to repay this obligation)."

19. Brahmatva-tatauvamavium. To protect the continuity of the knowledge that everything mobile and immobile is in reality Brahman, GD.
20. mukhataḥ—chiefly (V.C.).
21. Or: Manifesting yourself as Brahma at the beginning of the world.—Śr. Vr.: You are the four-faced Brahmā who created Brāhmaṇas for the preservation of the true knowledge about Paramātman and ātman by your own realisation and instruction, at the beginning of the kalpa. VJ. accepts the v.l. brahmaśīrṣāmah prathāyitum. For pro-claiming that you are the protector of the Vedas (Brahman). Or: You are the special abode of Brahman (Hari) perfect in all highest attributes.
Maitreya said:

16. Having thus apologised to Śiva (who showers blessings on devotees), he (Dakṣa), with the permission of god Brahmā, restored the continuity of sacrifice, with the help of preceptors and sacrificial priests and fire.

17. For the continuity of the sacrifice and for purification (from the pollution resulting) from the touch of warriors (such as, Pramathas), the best of the Brāhmaṇas offered in three plates Puroḍāśa (oblation made of ground rice) dedicated to Viṣṇu.

18. Oh King (Vidura), while, along with the sacrificial priest (adhyāryu) who stood holding the oblation in hand, the sacrificer (Dakṣa) meditated upon Hari with pure heart (so earnestly that) Hari manifested himself.

19. Then eclipsing their (of the members of the assembly) splendour by his lustre which illumined the ten quarters, he was brought there by Garuḍa whose two wings were the two Sāma hymns (viz. Brhad and Rathantara).

20. He was of blue complexion and wore a zone of gold. He was adorned with a (gold) crown brilliant like the Sun. His countenance was beautified with locks of hair, dark like black-bees, and with ear-rings. With a conch, a lotus, a discus, an arrow, a bow, a mace, a sword and shield in each arm adorned with gold ornament, he looked (beautiful like a blossoming Karṇikāra tree).

21. His consort (Lakṣmī) was resting on his bosom (in the form of Śrīvatsa). He wore a garland of forest-flowers (vanamālā). He delighted the universe even with his slight winsome smile and looks. On his sides were waving fans and chowries (white) like royal swans. He appeared beautiful with a moonlike white umbrella over his head.

22. Seeing him arrive, all gods and others of whom Brahmā, Indra and Śaṅkara were prominent at once stood up and bowed to him.

23. Their splendour was eclipsed by his. With their tongues faltering through his awe, they folded their hands on their heads, and attended upon him (respectfully).

22. Stotra-Vājinā—(i) Who was expert in singing the hymns (VR).
   (ii) VJ. reads Stotra-nirjita: Who has secured Hari's grace by singing Śāma hymns.
   (iii) Cf. brhad-rathantarē pakṣau—Kausṭtaka Up. 1.5.
24. Even though his glory was beyond the reach of their capacities (as they are his partial manifestations), Brahmā and others began, to the best of their knowledge, to sing the glory of him (Viṣṇu) who manifested that form to confer his blessings.

25. Dakṣa himself took with him the articles of worship in an excellent receptacle. Joyfully singing his praise with his hands folded, devoutly he sought the protection of the Lord of Sacrifices, who is the Supreme preceptor of the Prajāpatis and who was surrounded by attendants like Nanda and Sunanda.

* Dakṣa said:

26. In your own essence (essential form), you are pure, untouched by states of mind (e.g. wakefulness etc.). You are absolutely one (without a second), and (hence) above fear and of the nature of pure consciousness. You have negated Māyā and are completely self-dependent. But when you take incarnations (as Rāma or Kṛṣṇa) by the same Māyā, you appear to abide in Māyā tainted with impure matter.

The officiating sacrificial priests said:

27. Oh Lord, untainted by merits or demerits (or by

---

23. * grhīta-uttamam: Taken as adj. qualifying Tajāśvara it means: Viṣṇu who out of grace, accepted the excellent receptacle of presents from Dakṣa. But VR.'s interpretation is better: ‘Viṣṇu who is the best of all the means which lead to puruṣārthas'.

* As SR. points out, the following eulogy of Viṣṇu contains a variety of metres.

24. pratīṣṭhītya māyām etc.: VJ. The word Māyā signifies inert, unintelligent prakṛti the material cause of the world and not unreal jugglery (indrajāla). The verse means: You have distanced the unintelligent Prakṛti. You have created Mahat (and other principles) and grossest bodies called Puruṣa from it. You are called Puruṣa as you are the inner-controller (antar-yāmin) of these bodies. The ignorant Māyā-vādins regard you affected by Prakṛti like the Jīva.

25. * su-a-dhāmni (i) In Vaiṣṇavatha—JG.

(ii) Of the nature of the highest bliss—SD.

(i) VJ.: It is through the gracious looks of Sadaśiva which blossomed (created) in us the real knowledge that the ritualistic act, viz., this sacrifice that we are performing, is an act of worshipping you. It leads to devotion and other pious qualities. This is logically proved by three upādhi or māyā! Due to the curse of Nandīśvara, we were strongly attached to ritualistic duties, and we did not know your real nature. We have known this sacrifice (yajña) as your form—the sacrifice which is established by (and expounded in) the three Vedas; which implies (i.e. creates) religious merit (apūrva); for the purpose (of accomplishing) which, the definite instructions for the arrangement of specific deities in specific places, have been laid down (Or for this purpose, you have assumed different forms such as Indra).

The assistant priests said:

28. Oh Lord (who affords protection to all)! This caravan of ignorant people who are overburdened with the heavy load of their body (misconceived as their soul), and their house (mistaken as their own), and who are tormented with desires (passions), is traversing the path of saṃsāra (lit. path of births) which is devoid of any shelter; (and) is difficult to travel on account of great hardships; which is under the strict watch of the terrible serpent called Death (to devour) them; which has the (enticing) mirage of the objects of senses; which is full of pitfalls of pleasures and pains (and such pairs of opposites); which is fearful on account of carnivorous beasts in modes of proof, viz., Pratyakṣa (perception), anumāna (inference) and āgama (authoritative word or the Veda). For accepting the oblations due to you, but offered to gods like Brahmā etc., you dwell in them. This is the decisive proof.

You, being the Supreme God, are object of apūrva (merit) which accrues from the performance of sacrifice. We thought that the act of sacrifice is for Indra and other deities. Hence our ignorance about you.—VJ.

VC: When we did not comprehend your real nature, how can Dakṣa do so? We knew the sacrifice only as your form.

GD: Due to the imprecation of Nandīśvara, we could not understand that you underlie the forms of the deities of Rudra etc. Hence we ignored Rudra’s share in the sacrifice, and proceeded with it. Now we realize that it is you who have assumed all forms.

27. tri-viś—(i) Vedas of which three pramāṇas (modes of proof) viz. Pratyakṣa (apprehension by senses), anumāna and āgama (Vedic testimony) are given.—VJ.
the form of the wicked; and which is encircled by the wild fire of grief—when will this crowd resort to your feet for shelter?

Rudra said:

29.  Oh bestower of boons! Your excellent feet which confer all the purusārthas here (in this very world), are definitely worthy of worship with reverence, even by the sages who are not attached to worldly pleasures. I have fixed my mind on your feet. Even, if the ignorant people call me an apostate (fallen from the path of established rules of conduct), I do not mind it due to your supreme grace.

Bhrigu said:

30.  Brahmā and other embodied beings have been deprived of their knowledge of Ātman by your mysterious Māyā. They sleep (i.e. are immersed) in the darkness of ignorance, and do not even now comprehend your real nature lying within them (as antar-yāmin). May you, who are the Soul and friend of your suppliants, be gracious unto me.

Brahmā said:

31.  What man perceives through his sense-organs which cognize difference between the objects, is not your (real) nature. You are the basis of knowledge, the objects of senses and the (three) guṇas, you are (hence) quite distinct from the illusory phenomenon of Māyā.

Indra said*:

32.  Oh Acyuta! Even this form of yours which creates the world and which is delightful to the mind and the eyes, is a real one (even though it is perceptible)—your form which is distinguished with eight mighty arms holding weapons in readiness, to destroy the enemies of gods.

The wives of the Priests said:

33.  (In days of yore) the institution of sacrifice was established by god Brahmā as your worship. It has been now

---

*According to ŚR, here Indra contradicts Brahmā by stating that the form of Viṣṇu that is visible to them is real even though it is perceived through a sense-organ.
ruined by Paśupati (Śiva) out of his ire against Dakṣa. Therefore, Oh embodiment of sacrifice, be pleased to sanctify with your lotuslike charming eyes, this sacrifice of ours which has been made (desolate) like a cremation-ground devoid of joy and auspiciousness.

The sages said:

34. Inscribable are your ways, Oh Lord, for you perform an act of your own accord but are not affected thereby. People worship the Supreme goddess Lakṣmī for their prosperity. But you do not think highly of her, though she waits upon you of her own accord.

Siddhas said:

35. This elephant in the form of our mind which is scorched in the forest-conflagration of afflictions, and is distressed by the thirst (of sensual pleasures/desires) has plunged in the pure, nectarlike river of your stories. It does not (even) remember the wild-fire of saṁsāra. Nor does it come out of it like one who has attained Brahman.

Dakṣa’s wife said:

36. Oh Lord! Auspicious (indeed) is your appearance here. Please be gracious unto us. I bow to you. Oh Lord of Śrī (Lakṣmī), may you and your consort Lakṣmī protect us. Oh Supreme Lord, a sacrifice, though complete in all its parts (e.g. prayāja, anuyāja), does not appear beautiful (i.e. really complete), like the trunk of a man without its head.

Guardians of the worlds said:

37*. Are you (in your real form) seen (by us) with our

---

*The different interpretations are interesting:

(i) ŠR.: To those of pure heart, you appear in pure sāttvic form. But to us whose senses can look externally only you are simply a jīva invested with a material body of five elements. You (i.e. your real form) are not perceptible to our senses. Fie upon our life!

(ii) VR.: The attribute bhūman (all pervasive) distinguishes the Lord from jīva which is atomic in size (ānu-svarūpa) and also from ātman. “It is due to your mystical power called māyā that ātman and the material body are falsely regarded as one, and jīva is wrongly taken to be identical eyes (senses) which can perceive things in the wrong light?²⁸ (No) you are the seer from within (as antaryāmin) by whom the phenomenal world is seen. For, Oh infinite Lord (bhūman), it is certainly your Māyā that you appear to be (as if) the sixth (jīva) associated with the (material body composed of) five bhūtas (elements).

Yogeśvaras (Masters of Yoga) said:

38*. Oh Lord! There is none who is more beloved to You than he, who does not see (regard) himself different from You, the Para Brahma (lit. the ātman of the universe). However, Oh merciful Lord, please be gracious to those (Your devotees) who resort to You with unswerving devotion (like loyal servants to their masters).

with the Lord (Ika). You are different from jīva and acit (five bhūtas) but you appear as the sixth (i.e. jīva) due to your māyā".

(iii) VJ.'s alternative explanation: Oh how lucky we are that you who can be apprehended with the divine eye (of knowledge), are visible to our sight.

(iv) VG.: Though you are the Seer, it is through your Grace that you can be seen. The apprehension of our senses which are accustomed to grasp their objects, is not real. It is your Māyā that you appear to be vested with material body with you as the sixth (distinct from the five bhūtas). Jarāsandha and others who thought your real form (Śri-vigraha) to be material, have not seen your real self, though they have just seen you, for they remained impervious to your sweetness.

(v) GD.: The sense organs are incapable of apprehending you. It is your Will due to which you became visible to us.

28. asad-grahaik—(i) By us who are strongly attached to body and its belongings, and who look upon the body as the ātman—VR.

(ii) By our eyes or senses which are habituated to apprehend inauspicious sounds, objects etc.—VD.

(iii) By senses which comprehend their objects—VG.

(iv) By senses, mind, intelligence (and other vṛttis) which have attachment to this transient saṃsāra—SD.

*(1) RR. and VD. clarify that devotees (servants of God) are more dear to him than mere possessors of knowledge (jñānīn).

(a) VR. accepts the v.l. bhṛyeṣṭatayā for ŚR.'s bhakteṣṭatayā, and points out that 'master-servant relation' given here conflicts with the interpretation which supports the identification of the jīva with God, as such identity between jaṣṭa and ajāṣṭa is sheerly impossible. Thus VR. interprets: There is none more dear to you than he who does not regard himself existing independently of you, and who sees that he is a part of Lord's body, as such his existence is inseparable from God.
39. By means of your Māyā in which are exhibited many and different varieties of guṇas by the destiny (adyātta) of the jīvas, you give rise to a notion of diversity about yourself (by assuming the form of Brahmā, Viṣṇu etc.) for the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe. But in your own real, essential state, you are free from the illusive notion of difference and its cause, the guṇas. We bow to you who are such.

Brahmā (Śabda-brahman or Vedas) said:

40. I pay my obeisance to you who have assumed the satvā attribute and are (hence) the source of (puruṣārthas like) Dharma (artha etc.), but are still destitute of attributes. Your real nature is incomprehensible to me as well as to others.

Agni said:

41. I, whose flames are brightly enkindled by your light, bear the offerings soaked in ghee, in every good sacrifice. I bow to you who are sacrifice incarnate, and the protector of sacrifices—you who are five-fold in form and are duly worshipped by five hymns of the Yajurveda.

The gods said:

42. You, the first Puruṣa who, formerly, at the end of the kalpa, withdrew in your stomach the universe which is the

(3) SD. : (the first half). Those who know that jīvas who are your parts (saktas) are different inter se and from you, and that they are still not different from you as you are the Soul of the universe (and an anhitā), are dearest to you.

*VR. : Obeisance to you who have given rise to differentiation about the Soul (ātman) such as god, man etc. through your Māyā. Your Māyā assumes the forms of Brahmā, Śiva etc. with you abiding in them. Your essential nature always keeps away the attributes (e.g. satvā etc.) which lead to misapprehension.

29. The five forms of sacrifice are : (i) Agnihotra, darśa, Pūrṇamāsa, Cātuṁśāya and Patūsoma (ŚR., VC., SD., GD.).
   (ii) VR. lists : Dakṣīṇa, Āhavaniya, Gārhapāya, Sabhya and Āvasathya.
   (iii) VJ. enumerates : Tajka, Tajka puruṣa, Tajhela, Tajhā-bhāvanā and Tajhā-bhuj, as the five forms.

30. The five-hymns mentioned are : āśraya, ētraṣṭ, yaja, ye yajā-mahā and Vasat.
effect caused by you, lie down on the excellent bed of Śeṣa (the king of serpents), over the cosmic waters (after the deluge). You, the path of realizing whom is sought after by the Siddhas in their hearts, today move in the range of our sight and protect us, your servants.

Gandharvas said:

43. Oh God, these progenitors like Marīci and others, the hosts of gods like Brahmā, Indra and others of whom Rudra is the foremost, are merely the parts of your part (manifestation). Oh highest Lord! We always pay obeisance to you whom this universe is a toy-box.

Vidyādharas said:

44. Oh Lord, (even) after entering into the human body which is the means of (attaining) the (highest human) objective, viz. Mokṣa, a person thinks his material body as ‘I’ and ‘mine’ due to Your Māyā. This wicked-minded fool hank-ers after the unreal pleasures of the senses, even though he is reproached by his relatives. He who drinks the nectar in the form of stories about you, will be able to shake off the delusion about his body.

The Brāhmaṇas said:

45. You are the Sacrifice. You are the sacrificial offering. You are the sacrificial fire. You are certainly the incantations (sacred Mantras recited at the time of offering the oblations to fire), the sacrificial fuel, the darbha grass, and sacrifcial utensils. You are the sadasya and the ṛtvij (the superintending and officiating priests forming the assembly at the sacrifice). You are the couple (the sacrificer, and his wife), the divinities (to be propitiated in the sacrifice), the āgnihotra
(the act of offering oblations to fire), the Svadha the sacred oblations offered to Pitṛs), the Soma juice, the clarified butter (to be offered to the sacrificial fire) and the sacrificial animal.

46. Oh Lord, whose body is constituted of three Vedas, you are the embodiment of sacrifice (and of the will and the activity of the performance of sacrifice. Formerly you assumed the form of a mighty boar. While Yogins were eulogiizing you, you, with a roar, sportively brought the earth on your tusk (to the surface of waters), from the Rasātala, just as a big elephant would playfully do to a lotus plant.

47. May you (who are) of so great a glory, be gracious unto us, who long to see you, as our auspicious undertaking (of performing sacrifice) is interrupted. Oh Lord of Sacrifices, when your name is sung by men, all obstacles to sacrifices vanish. To you we offer our obeisance.

Maitreya said:

48. Oh blessed Vidura! While Viṣṇu the protector of sacrifices was being eulogized, the wise Dakṣa recommenced the performance of the sacrifice that was interrupted by Rudra (Virabhadra).

49. Oh sinless Vidura! The Lord who is within all (as antaryāmin) and (thus) the enjoyer of the oblations offered to all, expressed pleasure at the offering of his share (of tri-puro-dāta). Addressing Dakṣa, He said:

The Lord said:

50*. I am the prime cause of the universe. I am its Soul and the Lord and the witness (of all). I am the self-refulgent one, not subject to any condition (upādhi). I am Brahmā and Rudra (the creator and destroyer of the universe).

51. Oh Brāhmaṇa (Dakṣa), having entered my own Māyā constituted of three Guṇas, it is I, who create, protect

*The gist of VR.’s lengthy commentary is as follows:
I, Brahmā and Śiva (the latter two) who constitute my body and who have (thus) no independent existence, (as I am their antaryāmin) are the cause of the world. I am the Lord of myself and abide as the controller from within, in all jīvas (āmeṣṭvara). Being bereft of name or form (as a god or a man) I am simply a witness or onlooker (upadrasṭa). I am free from the defects or limitations of Prakṛti and Puruṣa such as lack of intelligence, limitedness, affliction. (avītesaṇa is not a negative concept as the Lord is svayam-aṅk—possessor of all excellent attributes.

31. āmeṣṭvara—(i) The Lord of all jīvas—VJ.
(iii) Having none superior or Lord to him—SD.
32. avītesaṇa—(i) The best of all (sarvottama)—VJ.
(iii) With nobody equal or superior to me—SD.
(iii) Free from all attachment—GD.

(1) VR.: I alone am the cause of the effect called universe consisting of cīd (sentient) and acīd (non-sentient). By my will, I enter my and destroy the universe, and assume the name (Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Rudra) suitable for the function.

52. It is only the ignorant persons who view Brahmā, Rudra and all creatures as distinct from me who am the one Brahman without a second (either of the same or different kind, and who am the absolute, the Supreme Soul (paramātman).

53*. Just as a man never entertains the idea that his own limbs like head, hands etc. belong to others, similarly a person devoted to me does not regard other creatures as distinct from him.

54. Oh Brāhmaṇa! He who sees no difference between the three (Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva) who are essentially one and who are the Souls (antaryāmins) of all creatures, attains real peace (Mokṣa).

Maitreya said:

55. Thus enlightened by the Lord (Viṣṇu), Dakṣa, the foremost among the Prajāpatis (first) worshipped Hari by his special sacrifice (tri-kapāla-purodāsa), and (then) other gods Māyā and protect the world, and create it through Brahmā, and destroy it through Rudra. I assume the names Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva according to the function performed.

(a) VJ. : I enter the unintelligent Prakṛti under my control. With rajo-guṇa as the material cause, I create Brahmā, enter into and abide in him and create the world . . . . In this way, by my form as Viṣṇu and my ātītas in Brahmā and Rudra. I carry on the functions of the creation etc. It is a wrong notion that Brahmā or Rudra creates or destroys the universe.

(b) SD. : God is essentially free from vikāras. His modifications etc., are due to his Śakti. It is by means of his ātīta that the creation etc. take place, and God assumes the particular name suitable for the function.

*VR : Even a man who wrongly identifies his body with his Soul, does not regard that the limbs of his body (which cannot exist independently of his body) as belonging to another person or have an existence apart from his body. Similarly, a person devoted to me, does not think that creatures can have an existence independent of me (Brahman).

VR tries to interpret this verse as supporting the tenets of the Visistadvaita school. The gist of his lengthy erudite Com. is as follows :

'The existence of the three (Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra) is dependent upon Viṣṇu who is really independent and exists by himself, and the existence of Brahmā and Rudra is in Viṣṇu's power.
also in both ways (i.e. through principal and secondary types of sacrifices).

56. With a concentrated mind, he waited upon Rudra, by offering the share due to him (viz. the remains of the sacrifice). By performing the concluding rite called udavasāṇa, he offered oblations to gods who were eligible to drink Soma and also to others. Thus, after completely performing the sacrifice, he (Dakṣa) along with the priests (participants in the sacrifice), performed the sacred ablution called avabhṛtha.

57. Even though Prajāpati Dakṣa attained Siddhis (divine powers or knowledge) by his own merits, the divinities blessed him with devotion to Dharma only and returned to heaven.

58. We hear that Sati, the daughter of Dakṣa cast off her previous body, was born of Menā, the wife of Himavān (the presiding deity of the Himālayas).

59. Just as Sakti (the Divine Power) which lies asleep (dormant, during the period of Pralaya) again resorts to Puruṣa (God, at the beginning of creation), Ambikā (Sati, of the previous life) who was devoted to Rudra exclusively as her only resort, sought again the same beloved (Rudra) as her husband.

60. This deed of Lord Śambhu (Śiva) who destroyed Dakṣa’s sacrifice, was heard by me from Uddhava, the great devotee of the Lord and the disciple of Bṛhaspati (preceptor of gods).

61. Oh Vidura (descendant of Kuru), a person who, every day, devotedly listens to and recounts this sanctifying work of the Supreme Lord (Rudra)—the work which enhances glory, confers longevity and purges all sins—shakes off sin (of himself and his listener).

62*. Oh Vidura, Śiva again obtained as his wife Sati, (now) the daughter of Menā. God Śiva enjoyed himself with her for a hundred years.

63. Realizing that she is incapable of bearing his semen, Dhūrjaṭi (Śiva) discharged it out into the sky, and the river Gaṅgā bore it.

---

33. ekagatim : VR. takes this as adj. qualifying Rudra : ‘Rudra who was brooding over her only’.

*The verses 62–65 are commented upon by VJ. only.
64. (Finding the Gaṅgā too weak to bear it), Agni swallowed it (through svāhā) into a bush of reeds. There was born god Kumāra whom the six Kṛttikās (the stars constituting the Pleiades) adopted as their son.

65. By sucking their milk with six mouths, the child came to be known as Śaṅmukha (six-faced god). The gods then appointed him—the terror of all Asuras,—as the commander of their army.

CHAPTER EIGHT

(Story of Dhruva)*

Maitreya said :

1. Sanaka and others (viz. Sanandana, Sanātana and Sanatkumāra), Nārada, Ṛbhu, Haṁsa, Aruṇā and Yati—these sons of Brahmā did not take to the life of a householder, and observed life-long celibacy.

* From the 8th verse of this chapter, we find the famous story of Dhruva, so popular in Purāṇas and later literature. V.S. Agrawala (MP—a Study 58-9) traces this story to R.V. X. 72.3-4. Agrawala interprets it as 'the Sun', while Siddheshwar Shastri Chitrav takes it to mean 'the tree' (R.V. Marathi translation, p. 671). In MBH, Dhriva is a holy name which if remembered, wards off difficulties (Anuśāana. 150.78). The Vā. P. (2.62.75-83) briefly refers to the story of Dhruva of the Cākṣusa Manvantara, but therein, it is god Brahmā and not Viṣṇu who confers on him the eternal astral position. The nucleus of the story of Dhruva in the Bh. P. is obviously the one given in V.P. I. Chs. 11 and 12. But there are some important differences. For example:

(1-2) In the VP., Nārada plays no part in Dhruva's spiritual guidance. The seven sages initiate Dhruva with the mantra: Om nama Vāsudevāya and Not Om nome bhagavate Vāsudevāya as given in the Bh. P. (vide verse 54).

(3) In the VP. 1.12. 13-30, gods tried to disturb Dhruva's meditation by their Māyā. In the Bh. P. there is no such distraction.

(4) The eulogy of Viṣṇu sung by Dhruva in the VP1.12. 53-75 is a Paurāṇic version of the Purua Sākta (R.V.X.90). But the beautiful classic eulogy in the Bh. P. IV.9.6-17 is quite independent.

The Bh. P. seems to have revised and enlarged the story of Dhruva as given in the V.P.
2. Oh Vidura (destroyer of enemies), Adharma's wife, by name Mrśā (falsehood) gave birth to a twin—Dambha (Hypocrisy) and Māyā (deceit). Nirṛti (the Evil spirit presiding over the South-West) who was childless adopted that couple (as Dambha married his sister Māyā).

3. Oh man of great wisdom (Vidura)! To them (Dambha and Māyā) were born Lobha (Avarice) and Nikṛti (Wickedness). Of these (Lobha and Nikṛti) were born Krodha (Anger) and Himsā (Violence); of these again (were born) Kali (Quarrel) and his sister Durukti (Abusive language).

4. Kali begot Bhaya (Fear) and (the daughter) Mrtyu (Death) through Durukti. Of this couple (Bhaya and Mrtyu) was born a twin, viz. Niraya (Hell) and Yātānā (Extreme tortures), Oh righteous-most Vidura.

5. Oh sinless one! I have described to you briefly the Pratisarga (secondary creation or the creation that leads to Pralaya). Having heard this sacred account thrice, one shakes off the impurities from his Soul.

6. Oh Scion of Kuru! I shall now describe the race of Svāyambhuva Manu of sacred renown, born from the part of (Brahmā who himself was) Hari's anśa (part).

7. Priya-vrata and Uttāna-pāda, the sons of Manu, the consort of Śatarūpā, were engaged in the protection of the world, as they were endowed with an anśa (a part of protective energy) of Lord Vāsudeva.

8. Uttānapāda had two wives—Sūñīti and Suruci. (Of the two) Suruci was more beloved of her lord, and not the other (Sūñīti) whose son was Dhruva.

9. One day, while the king was fondling Suruci's son Uttama by placing him on his lap, he did not like Dhruva who also wished to climb up his (Uttānapāda's) lap.

10. To Dhruva, her co-wife's son who was thus trying to climb (his father's lap), the extremely proud Suruci jealously spoke, while the king was listening:

11. 'Oh child, even though you are the king's son, you do not deserve to ascend the royal throne, as you were not borne by me, in my womb.

12. It is a pity that you are but a child, and you do not verily know that you were borne in another woman’s womb. Hence you desire for an unattainable object.

13. If you cherish a desire for the king’s throne, you propitiate the Lord (Pūruṣa) by penance, and by His grace, get yourself borne in my womb (secure birth as my son).”

Maitreya said:

14. Being cut to the quick by the harsh words of his stepmother, Dhrūva, like a serpent beaten with a stick, heaved heavy sighs with anger. Leaving his father who was merely looking on tongue-tied, he went away crying to his mother.

15. Suniti took up on her lap, the child which was (heavily) sighing with quivering lips. She was extremely distressed to hear from the inmates of the harem, the words of her co-wife.

16. Being scorched by grief like a forest creeper by the (encircling) forest conflagration, the young queen lost her heart and wept bitterly. Remembering the words of her co-wife, tears flowed out from her lotuslike beautiful eyes.

17. Heaving long sighs, and being unable to see the end of the misery (miserable state), the young lady spoke to her child, “Oh child! Do not blame others for the misery. A person experiences the same suffering which he has inflicted on others.

18. What Suruci said was true as you were borne in the womb of and were brought up with the milk of my unfortunate self whom the king is ashamed of recognising as his wife (nay even his maid servant).

19. Oh child! Remain above jealousy. Abide by the true path even though it is advised by your step-mother. If you desire the highest seat (throne) like Uttama, propitiate the feet of Adhokṣaja (god Viṣṇu).

20. It is by worshipping the lotuslike feet of Lord Viṣṇu who has assumed the satīya gūra for the protection of the universe, that god Brahmā attained to the position of paraṃśu-thin (the most exalted among gods), which is worthy of being bowed to by sages, who have controlled their minds and breath.

21. So also, your grandfather, the venerable Manu, with complete faith in him as the antaryāmin of all, worshipped him, by performing sacrifices with liberal sacrificial fees (dakśinā). He obtained earthly and heavenly happiness, and the highest bliss in Mokṣa, unattainable by other means.

22. Oh child, resort to him who is kind to his servants (devotees), the path of whose lotuslike feet should be sought by people desirous of Liberation (Mokṣa). Adore the Puruṣa (Supreme Man) by firmly fixing him in your mind by being exclusively devoted to him, and purified by performance of righteous duties.

23. My child! I find none other than the lotus-eyed God who can redress your grievance. The Lord is sought after by goddess Lākṣmī with a lotus in her hand, but who herself is sought by all others (like god Brahmā etc.).

Maitreya said:

24. Having heard the words thus spoken out to him, guiding him how to attain his objective, Dhruva controlled his mind by his will power, and left his father's capital.

25. When Nārada heard this and came to know what he (Dhruva) desired to do, he touched his (Dhruva's) head with his purifying hand, and said to himself in wonder:

26. "Oh, how wonderful is the spirit of the Kṣatriyas who cannot put up with the loss of respect; for even though (Dhruva) is but a child, he has taken to heart, the vile speech of the step-mother."

Nārada said (to Dhruva):*

26A. "Oh child! Where are you going alone leaving behind your home full of prosperity? I can perceive, Oh child, that you are indignant at the insulting treatment (meted out to you) by your own relatives."

Dhruva said:

26B. "Did you perceive this, Sir, by your power of contemplation developed by Yoga? I cannot console my heart which is wounded by the words of Suruci."

* 26 A and 26 B are additional verses in the text of the Bh. P. commented by VR. and VJ.

34. You have seen everything by your Yogic power born of contemplation. Although you can perceive everything, I, however, tell it to you. —VJ.
Nārada said:

27. Oh child, we do not find that (the sense of) honour or dishonour is developed now (at this early stage) in a child (like you), who is (normally and) naturally fond of play and (such) other things.

28* Even though the sense of distinction between honour and dishonour is developed, there are no other causes of dissatisfaction and misery for a man except his misapprehension. For in this world, people are different in their weal and woe as a result of their (past) karmas.

29. Therefore, observing the ways of the Almighty, a wise man should remain contented with whatever has been allotted to him by the Providence, Oh child.

30. Moreover, the Lord whose grace you aspire after by the path of Yoga as advised by your mother, is in my opinion, very difficult to be propitiated by men.

31. Though the sages have been seeking his path by intense Yogic meditation, and by remaining free from attachment through many births, they have not been able to find it.

32. Hence please return home. This persistence of yours is futile. You may try for your good (or final beatitude), at the proper time (viz. in advanced age).

* (1) VC: Insults or those who inflict them (upon us) are the creations of our misapprehension. From the point of jhāna-yogins, the vikalpa (the difference between honour and dishonour) being non-existent, the misery (resulting from mal-treatment) or the persons who cause it have no existence. In the case of bhaktas (bhakti-yogins) and karma-yogins, they consider that as everything in this world happens according to our past karmas, they should not blame anybody else except their own fate.

(a) In the first half VR. prefers to read vikalpa avidya-mānśa’pi instead of vidyamsa’pi: In the same ātman there is no difference of categories like man, god etc. But it is the false identification of ātman with the body (of man, god etc.) which causes dissatisfaction.

In the later half : VR. prefers to read lokāh for loka. Lakas i.e. sentient beings are different (as men, gods etc) as a consequence of their past karmas.

(3) VJ. affirms that there is a difference in the world as friend or foe; but it is due to misapprehension that dissatisfaction or troubles to mind are caused. People are different from each other, according to their past actions (karmas).
33. An embodied being, who reconciles himself to the pleasure or pain (happiness or misery) meted out to him by Providence, reaches the end of the darkness of ignorance (i.e. attains Mokṣa).

34. One should feel delighted to see a person of superior merits; should feel compassion to one who is inferior; and should desire friendship with one's equals. (In this way) one is not overwhelmed with afflictions.

Dhruva said:

35. This path of tranquillity has been graciously shown by your venerable Self, to persons whose hearts are affected with pleasure and pain. But it is beyond the ken of persons like us.

36. It, however, does not dwell (i.e. impress) in my heart which is shattered by sharp arrow-like words of Suruci—heart of mine who am undisciplined, and have inherited terrible martial (Kṣatriya) spirit.

37. Oh Brāhmaṇa (sage Nārada), I desire to secure (lit. conquer) a place which is the highest and the most exalted of all in the worlds, and which had never been attained either by forefathers or anybody else. Be pleased to tell me a good path (leading to it).

38. You are the son of the Lord Parameṣṭhin (Brahmā). Certainly it is for welfare of the world, that your honour roam over (the world) like the Sun, playing on (your) Viṇā (lute).

Maitreya said:

39. Hearing this excellent reply, the venerable Nārada was pleased with the child. Out of compassion, he then spoke to him the (following) excellent words in reply.

Nārada said:

40. The path pointed out to you by your mother will verily lead to the highest good. The course is no other than Lord Vāsudeva. Adore him with a mind completely devoted to him.

41. If one wishes to be blest with good fortune known as Dharma, Artha, Kāma and Mokṣa (righteousness, wealth, sense-pleasure and Liberation from Samsāra), worship of Hari's feet, is the only course for attaining it.

42. Therefore, Oh Child, God bless you! You go to the holy bank of the Yamunā where there is the sacred Madhuvana which is ever permeated with Hari's presence.

43. You bathe in the holy waters of the Yamunā three times (morning, mid-day and evening) a day; perform religious duties (e.g. bowing to god) proper for (a child like) you; be steady in a suitable easy posture (like Svastikāsana) on a seat (of Kuśa-grass etc.).

44. Gradually remove the impurities fickleness etc. of Prāna, Indriyas (sense-organs) and the mind by threefold Prāṇāyāma (breath-control consisting of Pūraka, Kumbhaka and Recaka). With a steady and a concentrated mind, you should meditate upon Lord Hari.

45. Hari is disposed to show his grace. His face and eyes are ever graciously cheerful. He has a well-shaped nose, beautiful brows and charming cheeks. He is the most beautiful of all gods.

46. He is ever youthful with beautiful limbs, red lips and reddish eyes. He is the only resort of all suppliants (devotees), the dispenser of infinite happiness (or the reservoir of all Puruṣārthas, the protector and the ocean of mercy.

47. He is distinguished by the mark called Śri-Vatsa. He possesses all the characteristics of the Supreme Man. He is dark blue like a cloud, and wears a Vanamālā (about his neck); and his four arms are distinguished with Śankha (a conch), Cakra (a discus), gadā (a mace) and Padma (a lotus).

48. He is adorned with a crown, (a pair of) ear-rings, armlets and bracelets. His neck adds to the beauty of the Kaustubha gem. He wears yellow silken garments.

49. He wears a girdle furnished with small tinkling bells round his waist, and is adorned with anklets of burnished gold. He is extremely beautiful, serene, and enhancer of the delight of the mind and the eyes.

50. Having occupied the pericarp of the lotus in the form of his devotees' heart, with his feet beautified by a row of gemlike nails, he presents himself to the mind of his worshippers.

51. With a steady, concentrated mind, one should contemplate Hari, the formost among the bestowers of boons, as (having a) smiling (face) and looking with affection (to the devotees).

52. The mind which contemplates the extremely auspicious form of the Lord in this way, is soon filled with highest bliss and does not revert (to sanśāra).

53. Oh Prince, hear from me the most secret mantra (mystic formula to be continuously repeated mentally during meditation). Any person who repeats it for seven days (and nights) can see the heavenly beings (moving through the skies).

54. The Mantra is Oṁ namo bhagavate Vāsudevāya (salutation to venerable Vāsudeva who is the embodiment of Oṁ or pранаva). Judging the appropriateness of the articles of worship with due regard to time and place, a wise man should perform the worship of the Lord with various material substances, repeating all the while this Mantra.

55. He should worship the Lord with sacred waters, garland of flowers, roots, fruits etc. found in forests, sprouts approved for worship (e.g. дурвā-grass-blades), garments and leaves etc. of Tulasi so dear to the Lord.

56. Having secured an image of substances like stone or through the medium of the earth, water etc. as a substitute for the image, the sage should perform the worship of the Lord. He should be controlled in mind and speech; should be serene and should subsist on moderate quantity of forest products (life fruit, roots etc.).

57. He should meditate upon the glorious deeds which the Lord of hallowing fame, will perform in the incarnations which He assumes at his will and pleasure, by the force of his incomprehensible Māyā.

58. Whatever articles (or forms) of worship are adopted by the ancients for his adoration, should be offered to the

35. v.l. niśṛtti : renunciation. 'The mind is immediately filled with renunciation (of worldly objects)'.

36. v.l. ādirātmā—with a devout mind—VR.

Lord embodied in the Mantra, by means of repeating the same Mantra (of twelve letters).

59-60. When the Lord is thus being worshipped with body, speech and mind with acts of devotion, he enhances the Divine Love in men who properly perform his devotion sincerely. He confers upon them the bliss cherished by them as beneficial, in the form of Dharma, Artha etc.

61. He (the devotee) should be indifferent to sensual pleasures. With a highly intensive practice of Bhakti-yoga (path of devotion) and with his mind exclusively devoted to God, he should worship him directly for Liberation from Samsāra.

62. The Prince, who was thus advised, circumambulated Nārada. After bowing down to him (Nārada), he went to the holy Madhuvana which was adorned with Hari’s footprints.

63. When Dhruva went to the forest for penance, the sage Nārada entered (Uttānapāda’s) harem. He was received with due worship by the king. Seating himself comfortably, he spoke to the king.

Nārada said:

64. Oh King, what is it that you think about so long, with a withering face? Is there any deficiency in your Dharma (religious duties), Artha (wealth and prosperity) and kāma (fulfillment of desires)?

The King replied:

65. Oh sage My wise and noble son of five years has been exiled along with his mother by me, who became heartless due to my subservience to (her) co-wife.

66. Oh Sage May not the wolves prey upon my helpless child lying in the forest, fatigued and famished, with his lotus-like face faded.

67. What a pity! Look at the wickedness of a fellow like me who am under the thumb of a women. I am an extremely vile fellow, I did not welcome him while he affectionately wished to climb my lap.
Nārada said:

68. Oh King! Do not worry about your child at all. He is protected by the Lord. You do not know his greatness. His glory will spread over the whole world.

69. Oh King! After achieving a feat difficult even for the Protectors of the world, your powerful son will soon return enhancing your glory.

Maitreya said:

70. Having thus heard the speech of the divine sage Nārada, the King Uttānapāda discarded his royal fortune and anxiously brooded over his son only.

71. There (in Madhuvana), Dhruva had his bath in the Yamunā. Remaining self-controlled, he fasted that night. With a concentrated mind, he worshipped the Supreme Man according to the instructions of the sage.

72. He passed one month in the worship of Hari, eating at the end of every third night fruits called kapittha (wood-apple) and badara (jujub), just enough to maintain his life.

73. The second month also he continued the worship of the Lord, eating every sixth day withered blades of grass, leaves etc.

74. He spent the third month in propitiating the Lord of hallowing fame, with perfectly concentrated mind, drinking water only, on every ninth day.

75. With perfect control over his breath, he passed the fourth month in contemplating the Lord, subsisting on the air, on every twelfth day.

76. When the fifth month arrived, the Prince controlled his life-breath and meditating upon Brahman (the Supreme being) stood motionless like a post.

77. He withdrew his mind which is the basis of the sense-organs and their objects from every side (external objects). He meditated upon the form of the Lord in his heart and perceived nothing else.

78. While he was having the Dhāraṇā (steadfast fixation of mind on the Supreme Brahman, the support of Mahat and other principles and the controller of Pradhāna and Puruṣa, all the three worlds began to shake.
79. When the child of the King (i.e. Dhruva) stood on one leg, the earth, being pressed down by his great toe, became semi-inclined to one side, as a ferry-boat carrying a big elephant does at every step, according as he raises his right or left leg.

80. Dhruva controlled his life-breath and the (working) of his senses and began to meditate on Hari, the Soul of the universe as not being different from himself. While he was contemplating thus, the worlds along with their protecting deities became greatly distressed at the stoppage of their breath, and they resorted to Hari for refuge.

_Gods said:_

81. We do not know the reason of this sudden and simultaneous stoppage of breath of all beings, mobile and immobile. We have sought refuge under you who alone can afford shelter to us. Therefore save us from this calamity.

_The Lord said:_

82. Do not be afraid. I shall dissuade the child (Dhruva) from this austere penance. You return to your respective abodes. The son of King Uttanapada has identified his Self with me (as the Soul of the universe). This has led to the stoppage of your breath.

CHAPTER NINE

_Viṣṇu’s boon and Dhrūva’s Coronation._

_Maitreya continued:_

1. Gods, whose fears were thus dispelled, bowed down to Viṣṇu (God of very great valour or God of long strides in His Trivikrama form). When they returned to heaven, even Lord Viṣṇu (the Cosmic Man of thousand heads), being eager to see His devotee, sped to Madhu-vana riding on Garuḍa.

2. Verily, Dhruva found that the lightening-like brilliant form of the Lord which he visualized as manifested in the lotus of his heart, due to his intellect sharpened by his intense yoga, suddenly disappeared. (Opening his eyes) he saw him standing outside in the same state (form).

3. Awed at his presence (lit. sight), the child bowed to him, bending down his body and prostrating himself before him like a stick. While looking at him, he was as if drinking him (with his eyes). He was, as if, kissing him with his mouth, and embracing, as it were, with his arms.

4. Hari who dwells in the heart of Dhruva as well as those of others, knew that the child which folded its palms before him, desired to praise him, but did not know how to express himself. Out of grace, He touched him on the cheek with his conch, the embodiment of the Veda.

5. Immediately (at the touch of Visnu’s conch) Dhruva whose eternal abode was reserved, was inspired, with the divine speech and realized decisively the real nature of the Supreme Soul (Brahman) and the jīva. Being full of devotion and love, he calmly (and without faltering) began to praise the Lord whose great glory is heard everywhere.

Dhruva said:

6. Salutations to you, Venerable Lord, the antaryāmin of all. You are the Lord of all powers. Having entered into me by your power of intelligence, you reactivate the power of my speech which was lying dormant, and enliven the activities of my (cognitive and conative) sense organs like hands, feet, ears, tactile sense and others.

7. Oh Lord! You are really only one. Having created the entire universe consisting of Mahat and other principles by your power called Māyā consisting of guṇas of infinite varieties, you enter as an antaryāmin (Inner Controller) in it, and appear as many in the apparent guṇas of Māyā (in the form of the presiding deities of organs of senses), just as the fire (though one) appears of different forms in relation to the different shapes and sizes of the wood (fuel).

8. Oh Lord! God Brahmā has completely submitted to you for refuge. By the knowledge conferred by you, he saw (i.e. created this universe like a man awakened from sleep. Oh friend of the distressed? How can your feet which are the shelter of the liberated persons, be forgotten by one who is grateful to your benevolent acts (such as resuscitating all the sense-organs etc.).

9. Your Māyā has really deluded their intelligence who worship you—a veritable wish-yielding tree (capable of) liberating persons from the cycle of births and deaths—for other purpose, and desire physical pleasures enjoyable by this body which is as good as a corpse—pleasures which men can get even in the hell.

10. Oh Lord! The bliss that embodied beings enjoy from meditating upon your lotus-like feet, or from listening to the stories of your devotees, is not available in the Brahma who is essentially blissful. How can it be enjoyed by beings who fall from the celestial cars struck down by the sword of Death.

11. Oh Infinite Lord! Bless me with the intimate companionship of those great persons, who bear constant devotion to you, and are of pure (desireless) heart. Thereby, being intoxicated with drinking the nectar in the form of stories about your honour’s excellent attributers, I shall easily cross the terrible ocean of samsāra, teeming with great calamities.

* VJ. construes differently: The bliss is not enjoyable by the Jīva who is in contact with Brahma by meditation etc.—Brahma whose greatness lies in its absolute independence. There is no need to speak of persons who, having attained the heaven (Saṅgāra), move in the celestial cars, for the heaven is subject to destruction by the impending sword of Kāla or death.

39. nesā: (i) VJ. notes a pun here (i) Cross over and (II) shall not return to (na+igye).
(ii) VC. & VD. : defeat, overcome. Just as the god of death cannot touch a person who has drunk nectar, the ocean of samsāra dare not affect me who am drunk with your nectarlike stories.
12.* Oh Lord with a lotus in the navel! Those who closely associate themselves with (your devotees) whose hearts are longing for the fragrance (excellent attributes) of Your lotuslike feet, do not remember (even) their mortal frame which is extremely dear to them, much less their sons, friends houses, wealth and wives which are connected with it.

13.* Oh unborn Lord! I know only your grossest form (the Virat rupa) consisting of the world teeming with beasts, trees, birds, reptiles, gods, demons human beings etc.—the world characterised by sat and asat and produced by a number of principles like Mahat. I do not know, Oh Supreme Lord, your other form which is beyond this, where speech and mind cannot reach.

14. I bow to that glorious Lord, the Supreme Man, who at the end of Kalpa (at the time of the dissolution of the universe) withdraws this entire universe in his stomach. He, the friend of Ananta (the serpent Sesha) turns his eyes (inwards) upon him self (in Yoga-nidra—Yogic sleep), and lies (asleep) on his coils. It is in the interior part of the gold lotus (comprising all worlds) which sprouted in the oceanlike navel of the Lord, that the resplendent god Brahman appeared.

15. (As contrasted with the jiva) you are the eternally free, absolutely pure, omniscient, intelligent spirit, essentially unchangeable, First Person (existing before the creation and

* VJ. construes the first half differently:
Those who think of their own sons, friends, house, wealth, and wives, do not remember you who are (really) the dearest of all and who are the First Being.

* VR. takes objection to SR's interpretation as he is knowable by Sastras. He combines na-yatra-vada, and separates param-a-vedamine, and interprets: 'Not that I cannot, by your grace, comprehend your subtle form about which there is a controversy...' VR. gives another interpretation of na-yatra-vada—'The controversy whether it is prakrti (produced of Prakriti) does not arise'.

(ii) VJ. adopts the v.l. na-yatra-vadeha and explains:
It is not possible for me to know your subtle form which the goddess of speech (which implies Laksmi, Brahman and other divinities) who sees him everyday, cannot comprehend due to his infiniteness.

SD. states: I do not know fully even your gross form. Need it be said that I cannot comprehend your subtle form?
after the dissolution of the universe), possessor of divine attributes, and the controller of the triad (of guṇas or worlds or Vedas or divisions of time.). For you are the seer of the different states of the mind by your unobstructed vision. For the maintenance of the universe, you stay as (Viṣṇu) the presiding deity of sacrifices. You are thus totally distinct from jīva.

16.* I take resort to you who are that Para Brahma in whom various powers of contradictory character, such as knowledge and others, incessantly yet causelessly manifest themselves in succession—that Para Brahma who is the cause of the universe, the indivisible whole, infinite, beginningless and endless, of purely blissful nature and unchangeable.

17. Oh Lord! You are the embodiment of the highest bliss. To those who are devoted to you that way (without cherishing any desires), your lotuslike feet themselves are the real blessings which are far superior to other worldly boons such as sovereignty and others. Oh noble Lord, you are however, so eager to confer your grace that like a mother-cow which nourishes and protects (against wolves etc.) its newly born calf, Your Lord hip protects us, your miserable devotees, who cherish worldly desire.

Maitreya said:

18. Verily, on being thus highly extolled by the intelligent (Dhruva) of noble heart (intent), the Lord who loves his devotees, applauded him and spoke thus.

The Lord said:

19. Oh Young prince, I know what you cherish in your heart. You are a strict observer of religious vows. May you be blessed. I bestow on you your cherished object even though it is unattainable (to others).

20. Oh blessed one, (I confer to you) that resplendent eternal place which is not attained to by anyone else. On it is based the entire circle of stellar luminaries like planets, stars and constellations of stars.

21. The circle of luminous bodies like stars etc. are fastened to the eternal post offered to Dhruva like a team of oxen to the central post in the threshing ground. The place given to Dhruva will survive even the destruction of three worlds in intermediate Kalpaś. The stars presided over by Dharma, Agni and others and those by seven sages (Ursa Major) revolve round it (always) keeping it to their right.

26. Lord Viṣṇu (whose banner is Garuḍa), who was

* It (this eternal place) continues to exist even after the destruction of those who live for a Kalpa. Just as a team of oxen employed to thresh out corn by trampling over it, is fastened to a post in the middle of the threshing ground, and the bulls go round it, the stars presided over by Dharma, Agni, Katyāpa, Śukra (Venus) and the forest dwelling sages (Ursa Major) along with stars and constellations, revolve round it, keeping it to their right. worshipped (by Dhruva) promised to give his own realm (to him), and returned to his own abode, while the boy stood gazing in wonder.

27. Although he got his wishes gratified by obtaining his cherished object through the service of the feet of god Viṣṇu, Dhruva was not very much pleased. He also returned to the city (his father's capital).

Vidura asked:

28. How is it that Dhruva, who knew the real (value of) Purusārthas, regarded himself as unsuccessful in obtaining them even when, within (the period of) a single birth he secured the promise of the supreme abode of Hari, by worshipping his feet—a place extremely difficult to attain to by persons actuated with desires.

Maitreya replied:

29. Dhruva whose heart was pierced with sharp arrow-like words of his step-mother, (pointedly), remembered those words, and did not desire to attain the Final beatitude from the Lord who confers Mukti (Liberation). Hence, he became full of regrets (as the bitterness about his step-mother disappeared at the Lord’s blissful presence.)

Dhruva said (to himself):

30. I attained within a period of six months the asylum of the Lord’s feet which life-long celibates like Sananda and others could realize by Yogic meditation extending over a span of many lives (i.e. births). Alas! I, whose mind was fixed on diversity (or on worldly pleasures), have receded from them.

31. Oh! Look at the folly of a luckless fellow like me. Alas! Having reached the feet of the Lord who can terminate samsāra (the cycle of births and deaths), I begged for what was ephemeral.

32. My judgment was possibly deluded by jealous gods who attain to positions lower than mine. Hence, I, the wicked-most fellow, did not follow the true and salutary advice of Nārada.

33* I became deluded by Divine Māyā. Like sleeping man experiencing (fear at the sight of tigers etc. in) dreams while (in reality) there is nobody else (except the dreamer), I entertained a perverted view—a notion of difference, even though the second is non-existent (i.e. only the ātman exists everywhere—one, without a second), and mistaking my brother as an enemy, I got afflicted at heart with jealousy.

34. In vain have I solicited this kingdom of the world or eternal astral position, (as it is) like the medical treatment administered to a person whose life has ended. Having propitiated by penance, the Soul of the Universe who is so very difficult to propitiate, and who alone is capable of terminating the sāṃsāra, I, a luckless fellow, begged of him sāṃsāra only.

35. Alas! From the Supreme Lord who offered his own blissful state, I, whose fund of good merits is exhausted, stupidly begged for pride (i.e. sovereignty etc. the cause of pride), just as a penniless fellow begs unhusked grains from an emperor.

36. Oh Vidura, people like you who are devoted to the pollen dust in the lotus-like feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa, and whose hearts are satisfied with whatever they get by chance (or by

* Other interpretations:

(i) Like a man in sleep, I am under the influence of the divine Māyā which is difficult to overcome. Due to her influence, I mistake my body for the real Soul (Ātmā) and think that I have got independent existence, even though, in reality, there is nothing which is not under the control of Brahman. Hence, under the misconception that my brother is my enemy, I am afflicted with this heart-burning.—VR.

(ii) I am influenced by Hari’s binding power—Māyā, just as a person asleep (steeped in ignorance) fails to see things in correct perspective, but takes a perverted view, I mistakenly look upon brother Uttama as my enemy, and am afflicted at heart by this misconception, even though Hari is the only independent, omnipotent Lord without a second.

—VJ.

(iii) From point of ātman, I and my brother Uttama are fixed (the tapastha-urti of the Lord), and from physical point of view, our bodies are composed of five bīdhas. In spite of this, I am deluded by Māyā to look upon him as an enemy.—VC.

42. bhinna-āḍāk—who thinks of a puruṣārtha other than the Lord.—JG.
his will), do not really seek for any personal objective (purusartha), except his service.

37. When King Uttanapada heard that his son Dhruva was coming he did not believe in it, thinking as if it were like the news of the return to life of a dead man, and thought to himself, "How could an unfortunate person like me be so lucky?"

38. He, however, put faith in the words of the Divine Sage Narada. He was overwhelmed with joy. Being highly pleased with the person who brought the news, he presented him a costly necklace of pearls.

39-40. He mounted a chariot decked with gold and drawn by excellent horses. Surrounded by Brahmanas, elderly members of his family, ministers and kinsmen, he, being eager to see his son, immediately set out of his capital, while conches were being blown, kettle-drums sounded, Vedic hymns chanted and flutes played upon.

41. Adorned with gold ornaments, his queens, Suniti and Suruci, accompanied by prince Uttama, went forward in palanquins to receive him.

42-43. The king saw him (Dhruva) coming, near the garden. Being overwhelmed with love, he hurriedly got down from the chariot and quickly approached him. The king, whose heart was full of anxiety for a long time (for his missing son), was heaving deep sighs, and clasped in his arms his son Dhruva who was absolved of all the bonds of sins by the touch of Lord Hari's feet.

44. Then, the king whose most cherished desire (to see Dhruva safe) was fulfilled, smelt again and again the crown of Dhruva's head, and bathed his son with his cool tears (of joy).

45. Dhruva, the foremost among the pious people, respectfully welcomed by all, bowed at his father's feet and was addressed with blessings. He paid respects to his mothers by bowing his head.

46. Suruci (Dhruva's step-mother) lifted up the child that bowed down at her feet. She clasped it to her bosom and with her throat choked with tears, she blessed, 'May you live long'.

47. Just as water automatically flows to a lower level, all creatures bow to him with whom Lord Hari is pleased, on account of his qualities like universal friendliness and others.

48. Overwhelmed with love, both Uttama and Dhruva embraced each other. With their hair standing on the end at the touch of each other, they constantly shed tears of joy.

49. His mother Suniti hugged her son (who was) dearer to her than her life. Feeling happy at the touch of his body, she was relieved of her mental anguish.

50. Oh warrior Vidura! Milk flowed out from her breasts which were then constantly bathed in the tears of joy (flowing) from the eyes of the hero’s mother (Suniti).

51. People praised the queen, “luckily your son, who was missing for a long time, has returned to remove your mental affliction. He will now protect the world (lit. the globe of the earth).

52. You have really propitiated the Lord who removes the afflictions of his suppliants, and by constantly meditating on whom, heroes (wise men) have conquered death which is very difficult to overcome”.

53. While people were thus caressing Dhruva, the king placed Dhruva along with his brother, on a female elephant, and joyously entered his capital, amidst their cheers (lit. praise).

Description of the decorations in the city

54. There, at different places brilliant alligator-shaped festoons were hung; plaintain-trees and young areca-nut trees, with bunches of fruit were set up.

55. At every door (were placed) vessels full of water with lights burning on them, and decorated with leaves of mango trees, pieces of cloth, wreaths of flowers and strings of pearls hanging round their necks.

56. The ramparts, gates and mansions which beautified the city were decked in gold, and the tops (of the buildings) were shining like the pinnacles of celestial cars.

57. Its quadrangles, royal roads and streets were swept clean, and sprayed over with (scented) sandal-water. It was spread over with fried rice, unbroken rice aṣṭas, flowers, fruits and other articles of worship.
58-59. Wherever Dhruva was seen on the road, the ladies of the city, out of affection, gave him auspicious benedictions. They showered on him white mustard, unbroken rice, curds, water, blades of durvā grass, flowers and fruits. While listening to their sweet strains, he entered his father’s palace.

60. Fondly caressed by his father, Dhruva lived in the best of mansions built of most precious stones, like a god in the celestial region.

61.* There that palace was furnished with beds white and soft like the foam of milk, on ivory bed-steads chased with gold. The seats were highly precious and the furniture was made of gold.

62. There, on the walls of crystals and very costly emeralds, were shining jewel-lamps held by statuettes of beautiful damsels made of precious stones.

63. The gardens were beautiful with various species of celestial trees on which couples of birds were warbling and the swarms of intoxicated black-bees were humming sweetly.

64. There, the tanks in the garden had steps of cat’s-eye (Vaidūrya). They contained white and blue lotuses and lilies, and were resorted to by swarms of swans, ducks, ruddy goose and cranes.

65. The royal sage Uttānapāda was highly wonder-struck at seeing his son’s most wonderful prowess, of which he heard (only the reports).

66. Seeing that Dhruva had come of age, and was acceptable to his cabinet of ministers, and was loved by the subject the king coronated him as the Lord of the earth.

67. Realizing that he had grown old, the King, contemplating over the nature of the Soul, became unattached to worldly pleasures, and left for the forest.

3.33. 16-19—the description of Kardama’s mansion.
CHAPTER TEN

(Dhruva invades Alakā)

Maitreya said:

1. Dhruva married Bhrami, the daughter of Prajāpati Śiśumāra. They had two sons, Kalpa and Vatsara.

2. And by his second wife Ilā, the daughter of Vāyu, the mighty Dhruva begot a son by name Utkala who was covetous to women like a jewel. 43

3. But Uttama, who was yet unmarried, was killed in a hunting expedition, in the Himālayas, by a more powerful Yakṣa. His mother, Suruci, also followed his course.

4. Having heard of his brother’s death, Dhruva was filled with wrath, revenge and sorrow. Mounting his victorious chariot, he marched against the abode of Yakṣas, the city of Alakā.

5. Proceeding to the northern direction, he saw, in a valley of the Himālayas, the city, Alakā, crowded with Yakṣas, and frequented by the followers of Rudra (Such as goblins, spirits).

6. The stout-armed Dhruva blew his conch, resounding the sky and all the quarters. Oh Vidura, thereby the demi-goddesses (women of the Yakṣa tribe) became greatly terrified and looked bewildered.

7. Incensed at the blast of the conch, the mighty and great warriors among the Yakṣas sallied forth from the city, and with uplifted weapons, fell upon him.

8. While the Yakṣas were dashing towards him the great warrior 44 with a formidable bow, simultaneously hit each one of them with three arrows.

9. With those arrows planted on their foreheads, all of them felt definitely vanquished, and verily appreciated that heroic deed.

10. Being enraged like serpents trodden under feet, the Yakṣas also, desiring to do the double of what he did, simultaneously shot at him double the number of arrows (six each).

11-12. Then fired with anger, and desirous of retaliation those one lakh and thirty-thousand Yakṣas showered on him, his chariot and charioteer iron bars, swords, darts, spears, axes, lances, double-edged swords, bhūṣūṇḍi missile and arrows with variegated feathers.

13. At that time, being covered with the heavy volley of weapons, Dhruva, the son of Uttānapāda, could not be seen, just as a hill is hidden by a thick shower of rain.

14. Immediately arose the cry ‘Alas! Alas’ from the Siddhas who were witnessing the fight from the sky. ‘This Sun of Manu’s race, drowned in the ocean of Yakṣa-army, is killed’.

15. While Yakṣas and Rākṣasas (Yātudhānas)\(^\text{45}\) were shouting and proclaiming their victory, the chariot of Dhruva came into view, like the Sun from behind the mist.

16. Twanging his divine bow, he struck terror in his enemies. He shattered to pieces their volley of missiles, like strong wind dispersing the army of clouds.

17. Sharp arrows discharged from his bow, pierced through the armours of the Rākṣasas into their bodies, just as thunderbolts (vajrās) into the mountains.

18-19. When they were mowed down with Dhruva’s arrows of bhalla type, the battlefield was covered with their heads adorned with beautiful ear-rings; with their thighs resembling golden palms; with arms beautiful with bracelets; with precious necklaces, armlets, crowns and costly turbans, and it appeared attractive to warriors.

20. Most of the survivors of the Rākṣasa army who escaped death, got the limbs of their bodies cut off with the arrows of Dhruva, the foremost among the Kṣatriyas, and they fled away from the field of battle, like the elephant-leaders discomfited in their fight with a lion (king of beasts).

21. At that time, Dhruva, the best among Manu's race, did not see anyone with a weapon in hand, on the great battlefield. Though he desired to see the city of the enemies, he did not enter it. 'A man cannot know the intentions of those expert in black magic'.

22. Telling this to his charioteer, Dhruva of wonderful chariot, apprehended an attack from the enemies and remained alert. He heard a noise like the roaring of the sea, and saw on all sides dust raised by a strong wind.

23. In a moment, the sky was overcast on all sides by a host of clouds accompanied with flashes of lightening and terrible thunders rattling, in all directions.

24. They (the clouds) showered blood, phlegm, puss, excreta, fat and urine. Headless bodies fell down from heaven before him, Oh sinless (Vidura)!

25. Then a mountain appeared in the sky; and from all directions were showered maces, iron clubs, swords, pestles along with a volley of stones.

26. Serpents with thunderous hissing and emitting fire from eyes with rage, rushed at him. Intoxicated elephants, lions and tigers attacked him in multitudes.

27. Terrific like the ocean at the time of deluge, at the end of a Kalpa, a loudly roaring terrible sea, engulfing the earth on all sides with waves, approached him.

28. By means of their special power of black magic, the Asuras (Yakṣas) of cruel disposition, created many kinds of such phenomena which strike terror into unthinking men.

29. Hearing that insuperable type of black magic had been employed against Dhruva by the Asuras, sages assembled there praying for his welfare.

Sages said:

30. Oh Dhruva, son of Uttānapāda! May the glorious Viṣṇu (wielder of the Śāṅgā bow), your God who removes afflictions of the suppliants, destroy your enemies—the Lord by uttering or hearing whose name, people easily overcome death which is so very difficult to conquer.46

CHAPTER ELEVEN

(Svāyambhuva Manu Dissuades Dhruva from Fighting)

Maitreya said:

1. Hearing this speech of the sages, Dhruva sipped some water as ācamana, and set to his bow the missile created by Nārāyaṇa.

2. Oh Vidura, just as afflictions disappear at the dawn of the (highest) knowledge, the manifestations of the black magic created by Guhyakas, immediately vanished, while the missile was being set on the bow.

3. Even while he was fixing on his bow the missile devised by the sage Nārāyaṇa, shafts with gold-plated heads and feathers resembling the wings of swans, shot forth from it, and penetrated the enemy's forces like peacocks entering a forest, with a terrible cry.

4. Assailed on every side, in the battle, by those sharp-pointed arrows, the Yakṣas (Punyajanās) got enraged. With their weapons raised, they rushed towards him on all sides, just as cobras with their hoods raised, would attack Garuḍa.

5. Even as they were attacking him in the battle, he cut down their arms, thighs, necks and stomachs, and sent them to that highest region, to which sages with lifelong celibacy attain, penetrating their way through the sphere of the Sun.

6. His grandfather Manu saw that the innocent Yakṣas were being slaughtered in great numbers by Dhruva, of a wonderful chariot. Out of compassion, he, accompanied by

46. VC. and VD. add: What of dispelling the Māyā of Yakṣas. Hereby, they (sages) suggested him to use the missile Nārāyaṇāstra.
sages, approached Dhruva, the son of Uttanapâda and spoke thus:

Manu said:

7. Oh child, enough of this sinful rage which is a gateway to Tama (hell)—rage, (blinded) with which you have killed these innocent Yakṣas.

8. Oh child! This act of slaughtering innocent demi-gods (Yakṣas) commenced by you, is censured by the good. It is not becoming to our race.

9. Being enraged at the murder of your brother, whom you dearly loved, a great number (of Yakṣas) have been killed by you, for the crime of one (Yakṣa), on your suspicion of their involvement in it.

10. To massacre creatures like beasts, mistaking the gross body for the Soul (ātman)—this is not the way of the righteous who are devoted to Hari (the Lord of sense-organs).

11. Having propitiated Hari who dwells within all creatures, and who is difficult to be pleased, and looking upon all living beings as (a part of) your own self, you have secured for yourself the highest realm belonging to Lord Viṣṇu.

12. You are constantly remembered by Hari, and are highly respected by his devotees. How is it that you, who should instruct others by your (exemplary) righteous conduct, have committed this censurable act?

13. It is by patience, compassion and friendliness and the attitude of equality to all beings that the glorious Lord, who is the Soul (ātman) of all, becomes propitious.

47. Or: who is the abode of all creatures.
48. Sarva-bhūtāna-bhāvena: (i) Looking upon Hari as the indwelling Soul of all creatures. — VR.
   (ii) Hari as antaryāmin of all creatures abides in all beings.—VJ.
   (iii) Identifying yourself with all creatures. — VG.
   (iv) Realizing that all creatures, mobile and immobile are your own Self. — GD.
49. GD. thinks that the qualities are to be shown to the superiors, the inferiors and equals respectively. Thus patience to elders etc.
50. samatvena — (i) To regard that all beings are essentially equal, as the Lord dwells within each of them. — VR.
   (ii) To show enmity to enemies and friendliness to friends is equality. — VJ.
14. When the Lord is thoroughly pleased, a man becomes free from all the guṇas of Prakṛti. Liberated from the stage of Jīvahood (i.e. his subtle Liṅga Śarīra), he attains to the blissful Brahman. 81

15. The male and the female are the products of the five gross elements developed in the forms of bodies. It is by their cohabitation that the creation of men and women takes place here in this world.

16. Oh king, it is due to the intermingling of guṇas caused by the Māyā (power) of the Supreme Lord that the creation, preservation and destruction of the world, take place.

17. The Supreme Man who is devoid of all attributes (like sattva, rajas etc.) is merely an apparent cause—therein that the universe consisting of manifested and unmanifested things, is in a state of flux like iron moved (by the presence of a magnet).

18.* The Supreme Lord whose power and energy is distributed by the disturbance in the equilibrium of guṇas caused by his potency called Time, verily creates (the universe) without being its agent, and destroys it himself not being the destroyer. Inscrutable, indeed, is the working of the Almighty.

51. niruṣa (i) Characterised by the highest bliss.—VR.

(ii) (Brahman) which is free from body or full of bliss — VJ. VJ. strongly objects to the concept of merger with Brahman as Liberation (mukti) will be śūnya.

(iii) the highest (beyond atiśayas)—SD.

(iv) Beyond saṁsāra — GD.

* The first half:

(i) The Lord's power is differently distributed in different species of beings such as a man, a god etc., and according to the various degrees of happiness or unhappiness to be experienced according to their Karmas. His potency is so divided due to His power called Time, which causes commotion among the guṇas. — VR.

(ii) OR: For the sake of creating disturbance in the balance of guṇas for the creation etc. of the universe, he divides his power, i.e. He assumes the form of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra. — VR.

(iii) VJ. accepts the v.l. yogakhyā for kāla-takhyā.

It is by his power of Yoga that the Lord exhibits his power, and carries out the function of creation etc. through his three guṇas. Due to his effortlessness in creation he is regarded as non-creator. Though he 19* He is a creator, as he makes men beget men. As he destroys the destroyer (robbers etc.) by means of death (through kings and others), he is called the destroyer—Time. But the Almighty Himself is endless (immortal), beginningless, unchangeable and subject to no dimunition.

20. The Supreme Lord has nobody as his own or none as his enemy; (for) he enters all beings equally as (i.e. in the form of their) death. Not being their masters (due to their Karmas), all creatures follow\(^5^8\) him in his course, just as particles of dust follow the blast of wind.

21. The All-pervading Lord cuts short or prolongs the life of a creature according to its destiny (previous karma), while he himself, being above these changes, abides in his natural state.

22. Oh King (Dhruva)! Some call him Karma; others, destroys the universe, he has no enmity against anyone. Hence he is not regarded as destroyer. — VJ.

The Lord is the cause of the creation etc. of the universe, but his workings defy our comprehension. The creation etc. of the world is due to the power of Time which creates commotion in gunas. — SD.

*Though he himself is endless (immortal), he brings about the end (of the world) as Time. Though he is without a beginning and imperishable, changeless, he brings about the beginning (of all). He is the creator by making men beget men and destroys the destroyers (robbers etc.) through death.

(ii) VR. points out that the Almighty whose form is Time, does not directly create or destroy but does so through the father or death.

 (i) The Lord who is untouched by saṁsāra (or whose body is death), enters the bodies of all creatures as antaryāmin for controlling them according to their karmas. Nobody is his friend or enemy. (All are equal to him). All creatures, not being their masters (but subject to their previous karmas) follow the Lord who runs (i.e. controls them according to their karmas) just as particles of dust helplessly follow the wind. (The dust particles may fall at any place or pit, the wind is impartial to all the particles) — VR.

(2) Though God enters all beings as Death, creatures get different fruits according to their karmas despite God's equality, just as the wind treats all particles of dust equally, though some of them fall in darkness, light, water or fire. — VC.

52. *anudhāvanti—(i) do the actions — SD.
      (ii) take births — GD.
Nature; some, Time-spirit; others, Destiny; while others, the Kāma (desire) of men.

23. Verily nobody knows the design (purpose) of the Unmanifest Immeasurable Lord who is the source of innumerable potencies (like Mahat etc.). Oh child who can then know the Lord Who is one’s own origin?

24. Oh dear son! These Yakṣas (the servants and followers of Kubera) are definitely not the slayers of your brother. For, oh child, it is the Destiny (daiva) alone, which brings about the birth or death of men.

25. It is he only who creates the universe. Nobody else but he alone protects and destroys it. In spite of this, he is not affected by guṇas (attributes) and karmas, as he is free from ahankāra (ego).

26. This Soul of created beings, their Lord and creator gets united with his Māyā power and creates, preserves and eats up (i.e. withdraws within him) the created beings.

27. Dear child! Completely submitting all your Self, seek the shelter of the Deity who is the final resort of the world, and who is the death itself (to the unrighteous, non-devotees)—Deity to whom creators of the universe bear offerings, just as bulls controlled by a string passed through their nostrils, carry the loads (of their) masters.

28. Cut to the quick by the (harsh) words of your stepmother, you, as a child of five, went to the forest leaving back your mother. By your penance, you propitiated Lord Viṣṇu who is beyond the ken of senses, and secured (for you) a position at the head of the universe.

29. Oh dear child, with your mind (lit. sight) turned inward (on your self), seek the Supreme Lord who dwells in the heart that is free from enmity—the Lord who is beyond attributes (guṇas); one (without a second), imperishable, eternally liberated and in whom this phenomenal world of

53. ātmadṛk — Or one who looks upon all as himself.
   (ii) With your mind concentrated on the Supreme Self.

54. mukta-vigrahe — Adj. qualifying ātmani,
   (i) the Soul which is indivisible (without parts).
   (ii) VJ. reads: vimukta-vigrahair upapāśritam : Who is resorted to by Yogis who have become free from physical bodies.
differences, though unreal, appears to exist\textsuperscript{55}.

30. (While seeking the Lord), You practise intense devotion to the Almighty Lord who abides in all as antar-yāmin; who is infinite, pure and absolute bliss, and is possessed of all powers. Then you will gradually cut asunder the knot of avidyā (nescience) which has grown very strong by (brooding over the notions that this is) 'I' and 'Mine'.

31. Oh King, by your deep and extensive study of the śāstras, control your anger which is a formidable hindrance to attaining to the final beatitude, just as you would control a disease with a medicine. May God bless you!

32. A wise man who wishes to attain the state of fearlessness for himself, should not allow himself to be overpowered by that passion (anger). For people get afraid of a person who is overwhelmed with anger.

33. Inasmuch as you, being enraged, have killed Yakṣas thinking that they were the slayers of your brother, you have committed a grave offence against Kubera, the brother (i.e. friend) of god Śiva (the Lord of the mountains).

34. Oh child, while the wrath of the exalted Souls (like Kubera) does not vanquish our race, you try immediately to propitiate him by paying him obeisance, and offering humble apologies.

35. Having thus admonished his grandson Dhrūva, who bowed down to him, Svāyambhuva Manu returned to his city along with the sages.

\textsuperscript{55} In the jīva, the worldly difference of being a god or a man is not part of his essence, but it is seen on account of meritorious or sinful karmas. It is not that way mithyā. This difference is unreal (asat), as it is always changing—VR.
CHAPTER TWELVE

(Kubera's Boon and Dhrura's Attainment of Viṣṇu's Realm)

Maitreya said:

1. Learning that Dhrura's anger had been appeased and that he had desisted from slaughter, the divine Lord of Wealth (Kubera) who was being eulogised by Cāraṇas, Yakṣas and Kinnaras, arrived there, and spoke to him (Dhrura) who folded his hands (to pay respects to Kubera).

Kubera (the donor of riches) said:

2. Oh sinless Kṣatriya Prince! I am extremely pleased with you, as at the behest of your grand-father, you have given up the feeling of enmity which is very difficult to renounce.

3. (The fact of the matter is that) neither you have killed the Yakṣas nor did they slay your brother. It is none but Kāla (the power of God called Time), which is responsible for the creation and destruction of created beings.

4. Just as a notion in the state of dreaming is false and meaningless, so is the notion of difference as 'I' and 'You' which arises in man due to his ignorance, and on account of continuous thinking of the physical body as the Soul. Bondage of saṃsāra and miseries are due to this notion.

5. Oh Dhrura! Please return now. God bless you. For the sake of Liberation from saṃsāra, adore Lord Adhokṣaja (Viṣṇu) who manifests himself in the bodies of all creatures, and consider that he is the antaryāmin (indwelling Soul) abiding in all beings. 56

6. For terminating saṃsāra (the cycle of births and deaths), please worship him whose feet are worth resorting, and who destroys saṃsāra, and who, though associated with his own māyā-takti constituted of the three Guṇas (attributes—Sattva, Rajas and Tamas), is yet aloof from it.

7. Oh son of Uttānapāda, we have learnt that you are very close to Viṣṇu's (God with a lotus in His navel) feet. Oh King Dhrura, as you deserve to receive a boon, ask of me freely and without any hesitation, any boon at will, cherished by you in your heart.

56. Or: considering all beings as your own self.
Maitreya said:

8. The great devotee of the Lord, that highly intelligent Dhruva, who was thus induced by Kubera (the king of Kings) to ask for a boon (from him), sought to be blest with the constant remembrance of Hari, whereby one effortlessly goes beyond the darkness (of ignorance or samsāra) which is very difficult to cross.

9. With a glad heart, Kubera (the son of Iḍaviḍā), having conferred that boon (on Dhruva), immediately disappeared while Dhruva was gazing. He also repaired to his capital.

10. Thereafter, by performing sacrifices with liberal donations and sacrificial fees, he worshipped the Lord of Sacrifices who is both the donor of the fruit of religious karmas, and is himself the reward of the religious duties (sacrifices). He performed them with proper materials as per ritualistic technique and with due offerings to Gods.

11. Bearing an intense flow of devotion to Acyuta (Viṣṇu) who abides in all as their Soul, yet is distinct from them, he visualised the All-pervading Lord as dwelling within himself and in all other beings.

12. The subjects considered him as their father (protector)—him, who was of such noble character, friendly to Brähmaṇas, compassionate to the afflicted, and the protector of the bounds of religion.

13. Exhausting the fund of his meritorious deeds by enjoyments of pleasures, and the balance of inauspicious deeds by performing sacrifices and other religious acts, he governed the sphere of the earth for thirtysix thousand years.

14-15. In this way, the great-Souled king of perfectly controlled senses, passed a long time in performing a number of sacrifices which result in the attainment of the Trinity—of Dharma, Artha and Kāma. He then regarded this universe as being illusory—constructed by Māyā on the basis of the Soul, like the dream city of Gandharvas created by Avidyā (Māyā or Nescience), and abdicated the throne in favour of his son.

16. Comprehending that his own body, wife, children, friends, army, rich treasury, harem, beautiful places of sport and recreations and the whole sphere of the earth engirdled by the ocean, are subject to destruction and hence transitory, he proceeded to Višālā (Badarikāstrama).

17. Having performed ablutions in the sacred waters thereof, he purified his mind (by observing yama and niyama, the code of Yogic discipline). Having steadied himself firmly in a yogic posture, and controlled his breath (through prāṇāyama), and restraining his senses by his mind, he concentrated his mind on the gross (Cosmic) form of the Lord, viz. the Virāt-rūpa. In course of meditation, the consciousness of the distinction between the meditator and the object of meditation, was lost. Being absorbed in meditation, he forgot the thought of that gross (Cosmic) form also.

18. He cherished constant devotion to the venerable Lord Hari. He was now and then overwhelmed with tears of joy. His heart melted (with emotions for the Lord), and his hair stood on their ends all over the body. He detached himself from his gross body, and did not remember that he was so-and-so (Dhruva).

19. Dhruva noticed an excellent heavenly car descending from the heavens, illumining the ten directions like the rising full moon.

20. Later on, in that heavenly car, (he saw) two prominent gods in the prime of their youth. They were four-armed of dark complexion and with eyes (beautiful) like red lotuses. They were richly attired, and were adorned with crowns, pearl necklaces, armlets and beautiful ear-rings. They stood leaning against their maces.

21. Comprehending them to be the attendants of Hari (the God of excellent renown), he stood up (to show respect). Forgetting the due procedure of worship in the hurry of that (agitated) moment, he folded his hands uttering the names of Hari, as he thought them to be the chief attendants of Viṣṇu (the slayer of the demon Madhu).

22. Sunanda and Nanda, the esteemed servants of Viṣṇu (the lotus-navelled god) approached him (Dhruva) who had concentrated his mind on Krṣṇa’s (Viṣṇu’s) feet; had folded his palms and bowed down his neck in humility.
Sunanda and Nanda said:

23. Oh King! May you be extremely blessed! Your honour, who, while yet a child of five, had pleased the Lord by your penance, listen to our speech attentively.

24. We both are the attendants of the God with the Śāṅga bow (Viṣṇu) who is the sustainer of the whole world. Both of us have arrived here for taking you to the Lord’s abode.

25. You have successfully attained to the region of Viṣṇu which is extremely difficult to secure, and to which sages, (the saptarṣis—Ursa Major) not being able to reach, merely look up from below. Now occupy that place round which (luminous bodies like) the Moon, the Sun (and other luminaries), planets, constellations of stars and (independent) stars go, keeping it to their right.

26. Dear (Dhruva), take your abode in the realm which has never been occupied by your forefathers. That highest region of Viṣṇu is adorable to all worlds.

27. Oh long-lived one, you should now ascend this excellent aerial car, despatched to you by Viṣṇu who is the foremost among persons of meritorious renown. 57

Maitreya said:

28. Having heard the extremely sweet (honey-dripping) words of the two prominent deputies of Lord Viṣṇu, Dhruva, the beloved devotee of Viṣṇu, took his bath, performed his daily auspicious duties, paid his obeisance to sages and received their blessings.

29. Having circumambulated that excellent heavenly car, he worshipped it. He bowed down to both the attendants of Viṣṇu. Assuming a form brilliant like gold, he desired to get into the car.

30. At that time, when the son of Uttānapāda (Dhruva) saw that the god of Death had come, he placed his foot on the head of that god (of Death) 58 and mounted that wonderful aerial mansion.

57. uttama-loka.

58. Urukrama: Viṣṇu, so called because in the Vāmana incarnation he took very long strides to occupy the three worlds from Bali.

59. Sr. narrates the episode thus: When Dhruva was about to enter that heavenly car, the God of Death arrived there, bowed to him and
31. At the very moment, drums and musical instruments like Paṇava, etc. were sounded. Prominent Gandharvas sang his praise. Showers of flowers fell on him from above.

32. As he was about to fly to the heavenly regions, Dhruva suddenly remembered his mother Sūniti, (saying to himself), 'How am I to proceed to the inaccessible celestial region, leaving my poor mother behind?'

33. Having understood this wish of Dhruva, the two excellent gods showed to him the brilliant queen-mother Sūniti—going ahead of him, in an aerial car.

34. At every stage on way, Dhruva was being showered with flowers and praised by gods seated in their heavenly cars; and he went past planets, one after another.

35. Then he (Dhruva) who was blest with an eternal position, went by the devayāna path (or by the celestial car sent to him by the Lord), beyond the three worlds and the astral positions of the seven sages (Ursa Major), and reached the abode of Viṣṇu which lies beyond them.

36. It (Viṣṇu's abode) shines brilliant by its own splendour. It illuminates these three worlds (the earth, the heaven etc.) by its light. The people who are not compassionate unto living beings never attain to this realm. Only those who always perform auspicious deeds, reach there.

37. Those who are of tranquil mind, who look upon all beings as equals, whose minds are cleansed of all sins and impurities (like rajas and tamas), who are pleasing to all beings, who look upon Acyuta (Viṣṇu) as their dear relative—those easily reach the abode of Viṣṇu.

38. In this way, Dhruva, the son of Uttānapāda who was solely devoted to Kṛṣṇa (Viṣṇu), became as if a refulgent crest-jewel of the three worlds.

39. Oh Vidura (descendant of Kuru)! Riveted to this (Dhruva's) post, the whole group of heavenly luminaries revolve round it ceaselessly, just as (pairs of) bullocks tied to a post in the middle of the threshing ground, go round with great speed (for threshing out the corn by trampling).

requested him to accept him. Dhruva welcomed him, requested him to sit down for a moment; and remembering Lord Viṣṇu placed his foot on the head of that God (Death) and ascended into the heavenly car.
40. Having seen the great glory of Dhruva, the venerable sage Nārada, playing on his lute, sang the (following) verses at the sacrificial session of Pracetās:

_Nārada said:

41. Despite their knowledge of the means, Brāhmaṇa sages, the expounders of Vedas, are not able to reach the attainment secured by the dint of his austere penance, by Dhruva, the son of Suniti who looked upon her husband as god. How can then, kings attain to it?

42. As a child of five, he went to the forest with his heart afflicted by being wounded with the arrow-like words of his stepmother. Abiding by my advice, he conquered i.e. won the favour of the unconquerable Lord who is overpowering only by the excellent qualities of his devotees.

43. Can an ordinary Kṣatriya on the earth even imagine to reach after many years to the exalted position occupied by Dhruva who, as a child of five or six years, secured it by propitiating Lord Viṣṇu within a few days?

_Maitreya continued:

44. I have narrated to you everything that you asked me here about the life-story of Dhruva of excellent fame—the life story which is held in high regard by the righteous.

45. If heard and recited, it (Dhruva’s life story) leads to wealth, glory and longevity; it is meritorious and brings in great auspiciousness; it helps to attain to the celestial region and to reach even the eternal abode; it leads to godhood; it is extremely praiseworthy, and cleanses all sins.

46. By constantly listening with faith and devotion the lifestory of Dhruva who was dear to Lord Acyuta (Viṣṇu), devotion unto the Lord will be engendered, which will lead to the destruction of all miseries.

47. Here this story is a sacred fountain of greatness for those who seek it. When it is heard, virtues like good-naturedness generate in the listeners. Those who desire bravery and splendour get it developed (in them by listening to it). It bestows respectability on the noble-minded (listeners who aspire after it).
48. One should recite both in the morning and in the evening, the glorious life, with a concentrated attention, of Dhruva of sacred glory, in the assembly of the Brāhmaṇas.

49-50. Or one who resorts to the sacred feet of Hari, should narrate to the faithful (audience, the life of Dhruva) on the full-moon day or the new moon day, the twelfth day of a fortnight or when the moon passes by the constellation of stars called Śravaṇa or on dina-kṣaya or on (the astronomically inauspicious yoga called) the Vyatipāta, or on the Saṅkramaṇa day (when the Sun crosses the sign of the zodiac) or on Sundays. He should cherish no desire and be self-contented; thereby he attains Liberation.

51. Gods bestow favours on the merciful man who is helpful to the afflicted and who imparts this knowledge (which is like) nectar in the pathway to God, to persons who are ignorant of the Truth.

52. Oh Vidura (the foremost descendant of Kuru), I have narrated to you this biography of Dhruva who is well-known for pious deeds, and who, as a child, abandoned his toys and mother’s house, and resorted to Viṣṇu.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN*

(Dhruva’s descendants: King Aṅga’s Abdication)

Sūta said:

1. After listening to (the account of) Dhruva’s ascension to the Vaikūṭha region as described by Maitreya, Vidura whose devotion to Lord Viṣṇu (Adhokṣaja) was intensified, proceeded again to make further queries.

Vidura said:

2. Oh strict observer of religious vows (Maitreya)! Who were those Pracetasas? Whose children were they? To whose family line were they known to belong? Where did they have the sacrificial session?

3. I regard Nārada as a great devotee of the Lord, and as one who has directly realized the Almighty. It is he who has expounded (in the Pañcarātra Āgama) the Kriyā-Yoga (Yoga of practical devotion), in the form of the detailed procedure of worshipping Hari.

4. They say that while the Lord, the presiding deity of sacrifices, was being worshipped (by performing sacrifice) by men (Pracetasas) who were devoted to their righteous duties, Nārada, who was full of devotion, extolled him.

5. Oh Brahman, you should please narrate to me in details, all the stories of the Lord which have been related there, in that sacrifice by the divine sage (Nārada), as I long to hear them.

Maitreya said:

6. When the father (Dhruva) retired to forest, Dhruva's (eldest) son Utkala did not wish to ascend the imperial throne and to enjoy the imperial glory.

7. From his very birth, he was of tranquil mind, unattached and of impartial outlook. He saw his Soul as pervading the world and the world abiding in his Soul.

8-9. By the fire of the uninterrupted practice of Yuga, Utkala had burnt down all the impurities of the past actions in his mind. He realized that the individual Self is the same as the tranquil Brahman in whom all differences dissolve and disappear, and who is the embodiment of the joy of pure knowledge, absolute bliss, existing everywhere. Knowing thus his own real Self, he ceased to perceive anything different from it.

10. To ignorant persons on the road, he (outwardly) appeared to be a stupid, blind, deaf, mad or a dumb man, though (in reality) he was mentally not like any of these. He was like a fire that had ceased to send out flames.

11. Considering him to be a dull idiot, the elders of the family along with the ministers, coronated the younger brother Vatsara, the son of Bhrami, as the ruler of the earth.

12. Svarvīthi, the beloved wife of Vatsara, gave birth to six sons, viz., Puspārṇa. Tigma-ketu, Iṣa, Urja, Vasu and Jaya.

13. Puspārṇa had two wives—Prabhā (Day-light) and Doṣā (Night). Prātar (morning), Madhyandina (Mid-day) and Sāyam (Evening) were the sons of Prabhā (Day-light).

14. Pradoṣa (night-fall or the first part of night), Niśitha (Midnight) and Vyuṣṭa (Dawn or the late part of the night) were the three sons of Doṣā (Night). Vyuṣṭa begot from (his wife) Puṣkarini a son called Sarva-tejas.

15. He got from his wife Ākūti a son, Caksus the Manu (after Svāyambhuva Manu). Manu’s queen Naḍvalā gave birth to (twelve) sinless sons.

16. (They were) Puru, Kutsa, Trīta, Dyumna, Satyavat, Rta, Vrata, Agniṣṭoma, Atirātra, Pradyumna, Śibi and Ulmuka.

17. Ulmuka begot through his wife Puṣkaraṇi six excellent sons by name Aṅga, Sumanas, Khyāti, Kratu, Aṅgiras and Gaya.

18. Sunīthā, the wife of Aṅga, gave birth to the strong-willed (but wicked) Vena. Disgusted with his (Vena’s) wickedness, the royal sage left his capital (and retired to the forest).

19. Oh child (Vidura) ! The sage whose words were (destructive) like thunderbolt, got enraged and pronounced a curse on him. (As a result of the curse he fell dead). They churned again the right hand of his dead body.

20. When there was no King, in that period, the subjects in the world, were troubled by robbers. Then Prthu, the first Lord of the earth (so called as he was the first founder of cities, habitations etc.) was born embodying in him an amśa or portion of Narāyaṇa.

Vidura said:

21. How is it that the high-souled, pious king, who was a treasure-house of virtues and so friendly to Brāhmaṇas got such wicked progeny, that he had to leave his capital in sadness and grief.

22. Or for what offence did the sages, who were well-versed in Dharma-Śāstra, directed their curse against King Vena, who had vowed to punish the evil-doers.

23. As the king, in the capacity of the protector of his subjects, possesses the energy and the splendour of (Indra and other) world-protectors, in his own superior glory, he should not be disrespected by the subjects, even though he be at fault.

24. Oh Brahman, as you are the foremost among the knowers of para and avara⁶⁰, please narrate to me, a devout devotee, the deeds of the son of Sunītha.

Maitreya said:

25. The royal sage Aṅga performed a great Horse-Sacrifice (Āvamedha). But in that sacrifice, the deities though invoked by the priests well-versed in the Vedas, did not turn up (to receive their share of the sacrificial offerings).

26. Then the sacrificial priests who were wonder-struck told the sacrificer (King Aṅga), “the deities do not accept the sacrificial oblations though poured into the fire.”

27. “Oh King, the materials for oblations are unpolluted and pure and have been devoutly procured by you. The Vedic incantations are not ineffectuous, since they are chanted and used by persons of steadfast vows.

⁶⁰ para and avara: Variously interpreted as ‘past and future’, Parmātaman and products of Prakṛti, etc.
28. We do not know if the slightest disregard is shown to gods here (in this performance of sacrifice) as a result of which gods who witness the performance of this sacrificial act, do not partake of their share of oblations’.

Maitreya said:

29. Hearing the words of Brāhmaṇas, the host, the performer of the sacrifices, Aṅga became deeply grieved. With the permission of the members of the assembly, he broke his silence in order to ask them the reason of the non-acceptance of oblations.

30. “Oh Members of the sacrificial assembly! Here (in this sacrifice) deities even though invoked, do not attend. Nor do they accept their cups of Soma. Be pleased to tell me what censurable act has been committed by me.”

The Leaders of the Assembly spoke:

31. Oh King, there is not the slightest sin committed by you so far in this life. There is however one sin of your previous life on account of which you are thus issueless.

32* Oh King, the Lord, the enjoyer of sacrifices, when worshipped, will vouchsafe a son to you who are so desirous to have one. Try that way to have good progeny. May God bless you.

33. If Lord Hari, the presiding god of the sacrifices himself, is directly invoked by you for a child, all sacrificial deities (the residents of heaven) will automatically accept their respective share of oblations.

34. Hari confers upon men (his devotees) whatever desires are cherished (and sought) by them. The attainment of the desired objects, however, depends upon the manner (and devoutness) of the worship (of the Lord).”

35. Thus resolved, the Brāhmaṇas offered purodāsa to Viṣṇu in the form of Śiśivīśa, for securing progeny to that king.

---

* With a view to ensuring that deities should be pleased to accept oblations from you, you should try to secure a child to you. — ŠR.
*61. Purodāsa — a sacrificial oblation made of ground rice and offered in a kapāla or vessel. ASD. 341.
*62. Śiśivīśa (i) ‘One who has entered the sacrificial animal (the beast to be sacrificed) in the form of Sacrifice’. ŠR. quotes a Śrutī.
36. From that sacrifice arose a person adorned with gold necklace and clad in immaculate garments, bringing with him in a gold vessel ready made pāyasa (rice boiled in milk).

37. With the assent of the Brāhmaṇas the generous-minded King accepted the boiled rice in the hollow of his folded palms, smelt it and gave it to the queen joyfully.

38. Having eaten that food which had the efficacy of creating a male child, the issueless queen varfly became pregnant from her husband, and in due course of time gave birth to a son.

39. Since his childhood, the boy was attached to his maternal grandfather Mṛtyu who inherited a portion of Adharma. Hence he became unrighteous.

40. Taking up his bow and wandering as a hunter in the jungle, this wicked boy killed innocent deer. Hence people (after seeing him) would cry out “This is Vena” (the tormentor).

41. This extremely ruthless, hard hearted boy used to slay violently like beasts, boys of his own age playing on the playground.

42. Seeing that his son was so wicked, and finding that he (the king) was not successful in disciplining him in spite of different kinds of punishments, the king became sorely dejected at heart.

43. (He thought) ‘Most probably the householders who are issueless must have worshipped god for they are spared the unbearable agony caused by a wicked child.

44-45. Indeed what wise man will think highly of the embarrassing bondage called (his own) son if he brings evil reputation (to his father) among men and implicates him in serious unrighteousness, if he creates conflicts with all and causes unending mental torture (to his father) making his home-life full of distress.

which means that Viṣṇu resides in the sacrificial animal as the spirit of the sacrifice. This form of Viṣṇu is invoked in the sacrifice specifically performed to get a son. (Putra-kāmeṣṭi).

(ii) Or: from whom rays are emanating—VR.

63. ŚR. derives the name from ṣrṇa — ‘to harass’ or ‘to make others full of anxiety.’
46. (In a way) I regard a bad child preferable to a good child as it is a cause of many sorrows. And a man gets disgusted with his home which is full of troubles.

47. The king who was thus dejected at heart, could not get any sleep. At midnight he got up and leaving Vena's mother asleep and unnoticed by other men, he departed from the palace abounding in prosperity.

48. When the subjects, royal priests, ministers, friends and relatives of the king learnt that the king had departed in disgust, they became overwhelmed with excessive grief. They searched for him all over the world (without success), just as Yogins on the wrong path do in search of the unmanifest Supreme Man hidden in their heart.

49. Being unable to trace any trail of the king and having thus failed in their attempts to do so, the subjects returned to the capital. Bowing to assembled sages, they reported with tearful eyes the disappearance of their king, oh Vidura (descendant of Puru).

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

(The Story of Vena: Prthu's Birth)

Maitreya said:

1-2. Bhṛgu and other sages who were solicitous about the well-being of the people, saw that men are reduced to brute-level at the time of anarchy. Those sages, well versed in the Vedas, invited Sunīthā, the mother of the hero (Vena), and coronated Vena as the Lord of the Earth, even though he was not approved by ministers or people.

64. ŚR. thinks that the king disguised himself while Vena's mother was sleeping.

65. ŚR. states that the king was somewhere in the town while they were searching for him outside all over the world.
3. Having heard that Vena, the very high-handed iron ruler, had ascended the throne, robbers hid themselves immediately like rats afraid of a serpent.

4. After occupying the king's place he who became proud and self-conceited, regarded himself invested with the powers of the eight protectors of the world automatically, and contemptuously treated the great sages.

5. He, who thus became blind with pride, and haughty like an elephant uncontrolled by goads, mounted his chariot and wandered over the earth shaking heaven and earth.

6. With the sound of drums, he promulgated everywhere, "Oh Dvijas, you shall never perform worship, and shall give no donations and shall not perform sacrifices". Thus he prohibited religion everywhere.

7. The sages, seeing the ill-behaved conduct of Vena, and considering the public calamity, assembled at a sacrificial session and said.

8. "A great danger has arisen to people from both sides—from robbers and the king, like (that to ants who find themselves in the middle of) a piece of wood burning from both sides.

9. This unworthy prince was made a king on account of the fear of anarchy. But today danger has arisen even from him. How can the welfare of beings be ensured?

10-11. Vena who is born from the womb of Sunīthā, is hereditarily wicked. Just as the nourishing of a snake with milk is dangerous even to the man who so feeds it, Vena who has been appointed as the protector of the subjects verily desires to destroy them. Let us (however) persuade him (to behave properly) so that his sin may not touch us.

12-13. Despite our full knowledge of Vena's wicked conduct and sinfulness, we made him the king. If, in spite of our gentle persuasions, that unrighteous fellow does not abide by our words of advice, let us burn him by our spiritual power, although he is already burnt by the reproach of the people". Having decided thus, the sages, concealing their anger, approached that Vena, and pacifying him with conciliatory words, spoke.
Sages said:

14. "Oh Great King! Please note that what we propose to urge for your consideration will, Oh child, increase your longevity, prosperity, power and glory.

15. Righteous duty (Dharma) practised in thought, word, deed and understanding, bestows on ordinary people worlds which are free from sorrows and the eternal abode (Moksha) to those who perform it without any attachment (to its fruits).

16. Oh brave king, let not your Dharma (duty) of ensuring security and well being of the subjects, be neglected (and lost) by you. For when it is lost (disregarded), the king falls from his rulership.

17. Oh king, a king who protects his subjects from wicked ministers and from thieves (and other miscreants) and takes revenue (from them as prescribed in Śāstras), leads a happy life.

18-19. Oh illustrious King! The Lord creator of all beings, the Soul of the universe is pleased with the king who obeys his commands, and in whose kingdom and capital city, the glorious presiding deity of the sacrifice is worshipped according to their dharma, by persons who follow the duties of their respective Varna (social class) and āśrama (stage of life).

20. What is unattainable, when the Lord of the rulers of the worlds (e.g. god Brahmā etc.) is pleased? For all the worlds along with their protecting deities devoutly offer worship to him.

21* Oh King! It behoves you to approve of, and be

* VR.: The Lord controls all worlds, their presiding deities and sacrifices which lead to the attainment of godhood. He is the embodiment of three Vedas which explain what is and is not the righteous duty (dharma). The Vedas prescribe both the ways of sacrifices and of penance. It is for the sake of your Liberation or prosperity that the inhabitants of your country perform different kinds of sacrifices. You should therefore follow their example.

SD.: You should direct the inhabitants of your country to perform their respective duties—the inhabitants who according to their abilities of the pravṛtti and niyṛtti type, worship the Lord who protects all the worlds, gods and sacrifices, and who is the embodiment of three Vedas which give the knowledge of sacrifice, and who is the sacrificial materials and the penance, the knowledge leading to Liberation. It is thus that you will get prosperity here and Liberation hereafter.
conciliatory to the inhabitants of your country who, for your prosperity, worship, by performance of various sacrifices, the Lord who is the Controller of all worlds, gods and sacrifices—the Lord who is the embodiment of three Vedas and of all sacrificial materials, and who is the object of penance.

22. Oh brave king, if gods who are parts (āṁśas) of Hari, are properly worshipped and well-propitiated by performance of sacrificial sessions by the twice-born Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas and Vaśyas, they will confer whatever is desired by you. It is not, therefore, proper to disrespect them (by prohibiting sacrificial and religious performances).

Vena said:

23. Verily, all of you are foolish. You regard non-righteousness (adharma) as righteousness (dharma). What a pity! Abandoning the husband who gives you means of subsistence, you wait upon a paramour.

24. Those fools who disregard the supreme Lord in the form of a king, do not obtain any good either here or hereafter.

25. Who is this Ṭajña-puruṣa (the presiding deity of sacrifices) for whom you cherish such (intense) devotion like characterless women who, being absolutely devoid of love for their husbands, cherish it for their gallants.

26-27. Gods like Viṣṇu (the protector of the universe), Brahmā (the creator of the world), Śiva (the destroyer of the universe), Indra, Vāyu (Wind), Yama (god of death), the Sun (-god), the rain-god, the god of Wealth (Kubera), the Moon (-god), the (presiding deity of the) Earth, the Fire (-god) and Varuṇa (the Lord of Waters)—these and other gods who are competent to confer boons or pronounce curses reside in the person of the sovereign ruler. The Monarch is thus the embodiment of all gods.

28. Therefore, Oh Brāhmaṇas! Being free from jealousy, you worship me with your religious rites. Give me all your offerings (taxes etc.). What other person than me, deserves to be propitiated (honoured) for it?

66. svadeśa: (i) The persons whom you command— the sacrificers. VR. (ii) The Brāhmaṇas on whom donations or gifts are conferred —VJ.

Maitreya said:

29. Even though so humbly entreated, the wretched sinner was of such a perverted mind and had gone so astray on the wrong path, that he did not accede to their supplications, for he had lost all auspiciousness.

30. Oh Vidura! When he, priding himself as very learned, insulted these twice-born (Brāhmaṇas), and spurned their request made in the interest of the public good, the Brāhmaṇas got angry with him.

31. "Let him be slain; let this wicked fellow of terrible nature be killed. If he lives (any longer), he will soon reduce the world to ashes.

32. This shameless fellow vilifies Viṣṇu, the Supreme Deity of Sacrifices. This man of wicked conduct does not deserve the exalted seat of a monarch.

33. Or who else other than this base unlucky Vena alone, will revile Viṣṇu after attaining to such sovereignty over world through His grace."

34. With their rage flared up, the sages who thus decided to slay him, killed by their hissing (hum) sound, Vena who was already dead by his vilification of god Viṣṇu (Acyuta).

35. When the sages departed to their hermitages, Sunītha who was full of grief, preserved the dead body of her son by means of incantations (mantras) and medicines.

36. Once upon a time, those sages, having performed ablutions in the Sarasvatī, and after offering oblations to the sacrificial fire, were sitting on the bank of the river, talking about the stories of the Lord.

37. Observing the appearance of terrible ill omens striking terror into the world, they (wishfully) said: "May no evil befall the protectionless earth from robbers."

38. While sages were thinking thus, there arose in all directions clouds of dust from the rushing of the thieves and miscreants who ran amuck plundering (wherever they went).

39. They came to know that the serious trouble to the world was caused by those free booters who plundered the wealth of the people, and by those who tried to kill each other, as the king (Vena) was dead.

40. When anarchy prevails, the state becomes weak and the country is infested with robbers. Though they (sages) were powerful enough to control, they did not check the people as they saw the evil (involved therein).

41. "Even if a Brähmana who should view all beings equally and should be tranquil, neglects (to protect) the afflicted, his penance leaks away like water filled in a pot with a hole.

42. The race of the royal sage Aṅga should not come to an end, as it is in this family that there were many kings of unfailing prowess, yet completely dependent on Keśava (Viṣṇu).

43. Having resolved thus, the sages churned forcibly the thigh of the deceased king. Therefrom appeared a dwarf-fish man.

44. He was black as crow, had very short limbs and small arms, protruding chin, short legs, flat nose and blood-red eyes and red hair.

45. To him who bowed to them, and meekly asked them, "What I should do", they asked him to sit down (niśāda). Therefore, Oh Vidura, he became niśāda (by tribe).

46. As soon as he was born, he took upon himself the heinous sins of Vena. His descendants the naiśādas took refuge in mountains, jungles, etc.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

(Birth of Prthu and his Coronation)

Maitreya said:

1. Thereupon, a couple (a boy and a girl) was born from the arms of the sonless king, when they (the arms) were being churned by the Brähmaṇas.
2. Having seen the birth of the couple, the sages who were well-versed in the Vedas, became highly pleased to know that it was an anśa (portion or digit) of the glorious Lord and spoke.

Sages said:

3. This (Prthu) is a manifestation of that anśa (portion) of Lord Viṣṇu which protects the world. This (girl) is the portion and incarnation of Goddess Lakṣmī who is never disunited from the Supreme Man (Viṣṇu).

4. As to this male child, he will be the first and foremost among kings, the enhancer of their glory. As his fame will spread far and wide, he will be known as Prthu, the great king.

5. And this beautiful, resplendent lady with finely set teeth who is the ornament of ornaments and virtues, will be called Arcis and will be Prthu’s consort.

6. It is with the object of protecting the world that this anśa (portion) of direct Hari himself, is born. And this is verily the Goddess Lakṣmī who is inseparable from him and ever (absolutely) devoted to him.

Maitreyo said:

7. Brāhmaṇas eulogised him; the foremost among the Gandharvas sang (his glory); Siddhas poured down showers of (heavenly) flowers; the celestial damsels danced.

8. The heavens were reverberating with sounds of musical instruments like conchs, trumpets, timbrels and drums. There assembled all the gods, sages and pītṛs (manes) of all grades.

9-10. With gods and kings of gods, Brahmā, the father of all the worlds, arrived there. Observing the mark of Viṣṇu (the wielder of the mace) on (Prthu’s) right palm, and the lotus-mark on the soles of Prthu’s feet he concluded that he (Prthu) is verily the part (kalā) of Viṣṇu; for he on whose palm the cakra (discus) mark is uncrossed by any other line, is the anīṣa (portion) of the Lord.

11. His coronation ceremony was commenced by Brāhmaṇas who were well-versed in Vedas (and expert in the Vedic rites and rituals of the ceremony). From all directions, people brought all the materials necessary for the coronation ceremony.

12. Rivers, seas, mountains, snakes, cattle, birds, beasts, deer, the sky, the earth and all beings brought tributes to him.

13. When the emperor, arrayed in excellent royal robes, and richly adorned with ornaments, was thus installed, along with the well-adorned queen, consort Arcis, he shone like another Fire-god.

14. Oh warrior, Kubera (the god of wealth) brought to him an excellent throne of gold; Varuṇa (the Lord of Waters), a royal umbrella radiating moon-white rays and dripping with water;

15. Vāyu (the Wind-god) presented him two chowries (special types of fans made of the tufts of hair on the tails of particular kinds of wild cows); Dharma, a garland, the very embodiment of glory; Indra (the King of gods), an excellent crown; Yama (the god of death and controller of the world), a sceptre to govern the world.

16. God Brahmā bestowed upon him an armour of Vedic incantations (or Vediknowledge); the goddess of learning, an excellent necklace; Lord Hari, the Sudarśana disc, and his consort Lakṣmi, undiminishing prosperity and affluence.

17. Rudra gave him a sword engraved with ten moon-like marks, while Pārvatī, gave him a shield bearing the marks of a hundred moons; the Moon-god presented him immortal, indefatigable, undaunted horses made of nectar, while Tvaṣṭṛ gave him extremely artistic and beautiful chariot.

18. The Fire-god gave him a bow made from the horns of goats and oxen; the Sun-god supplied him with his solarray-like arrows. The earth presented him sandals with mystic (Yogic) powers; and the sky, an ever fresh flower garland.

19. The demigods that move through the sky bestowed on him the arts of dancing, vocal and instrumental music, and the mystic power of vanishing. The sages gave him their never-failing efficacious blessings, and the Ocean-god, a conch born from him.

20. The oceans, mountains and rivers gave the high-souled King roads of communications by chariots. Then bards (Sūtas) minstrels (Māgadhās) and heralds (Bandins) began to sing his panygeric.

21. Knowing their intention, Prthu, the chivalrous son of Vena, laughed and spoke to them in a voice deep like the thunder of clouds.

Prthu said:

22. Oh Sūta! Oh Māgadha! Oh gentle Bandin! What is the basis of your panygeric of me whose qualities are yet to be manifested in the world? You should address it to me when my merits will be acknowledged by the public. Your words of praise in my case should not prove untrue.

23. Oh bards of sweet words! Therefore, after a lapse of some time (when we perform some exploits worth singing), you may compose as many panygerics about my glory as you like. But when praise-worthy attributes of Lord Hari of excellent glory are there for glorification, good people do not eulogise ordinary (contemptible) men (like me).

24. What man with the capability of acquiring high merits will allow the bards to sing of qualities that are actually non-existent in him? The dullard who fools himself that those (non-existent) virtues may be manifest in him (later), does not see that he becomes thereby a butt of public ridicule.

25. Really competent persons and illustrious persons abhor the praise, (even though they possess the qualities so praised, and are known for them). Truly modest and noble-minded persons shrink from the praise of their uncomplimentary show of valour.

26. Oh bard! We are still unknown in this world for the performance of any exploit. (As we have not performed any great deed which can be extolled), how can we, like fools, allow you to sing of our glory.
CHAPTER SIXTEEN
(The Eulogy of Pṛthu by Bards)

Maitreya said:

1. The bards were satisfied at heart by hearing his nectarlike words. Being urged by sages, they began to extol the king who was speaking thus.

2. We are competent to describe fully your glory as you are the Supreme God who have incarnated in this world by your Māyā (power). The intelligence of even masters of speech (like god Brahmā and others) has been perplexed in describing the exploits of you who are born from the arms of Vena.

3. We are, however, devoutly interested in the nectarlike stories of Pṛthu, of glorious renown, who is an incarnation of an anta (part) of Hari. We are instructed by sages. We broadcast far and wide the praiseworthy deeds, according to the instructions of the sages.

4. This (king Pṛthu) is the foremost among the upholders of religion. He makes the people act according to Dharma (righteous path). He is the protector of the established institutions of religion and morality. He is the punisher of those who are antagonistic (to religion).

5. (Though) he is one, he bears in his person the bodies (i.e. the powers and functions) of the guardians of the world from time to time, as per needs (of the situation) for the public good, both here and hereafter.

6.* He is impartial to all beings. This mighty monarch collects taxes and tributes at proper times, and releases (the fund) at the opportune time (like famine etc.), just as the bright Sun (evaporates the waters in the summer and returns it as showers of water in the rainy season).

7. The behaviour of the king is like the goddess of the earth. The compassionate son of Vena (i.e. Pṛthu) always bears the faults of the distressed beings, though they may encroach upon him.

* From this verse onwards the king's execution of the functions of the eight protectors of the world (lokapālas), is described.
8. He is veritable Hari who has assumed the body of the king. When the rain-god withholds showers of rain, he would like Indra, easily protect the subjects whose life was in danger.

9. He pleases the world with his moon-like face—the embodiment of nectar—beaming with charming smiles and brightened with affectionate looks.

10. His ways are inscrutable; his acts are secret and unsurmisable; his intentions are too deep to be comprehended; he strictly guards his wealth; he is the sole receptacle of infinite greatness and innumerable excellent attributes; like Varuṇa, the Lord of Waters, Prthu’s true nature is unfathomable (hidden from the public view).

11. He is (like) the fire born from (the friction of) the arani (piece of Śamī wood) in the form of Vena (for he was born after churning Vena’s arm). He is (even mentally) unapproachable to his enemies. His overwhelming power is irresistible by his enemies. Though he be near, he is as if at a great distance (as he is well-guarded by his security force). It is impossible to overpower him.

12. Though he sees the overt and covert activities of human beings through his intelligence service (spies), he behaves as if he is indifferent (to praise or blame). He is thus like the vital air; the Soul that witnesses, as if unconcerned, the inner and outer activities of all.

13. He is so firmly established in the path of dharma (royal duties) that he never punishes anyone if he does not deserve punishment even though he be the son of his personal enemy; and that he would punish his own son, if found guilty (and worth punishing).

14. His unchallenged cakra (sway, march of his army or the path of his chariot) extends from the Mānasottara mountain⁶⁸ to all regions where the Sun-god shines by his rays.

68. Mānasottara.—A hill of Puṣkaradvipa to the east of Meru. Devadhāni, the city of Indra and other cities are there; like the wheel of an oilmill, the wheel of Sūrya’s chariot is said to rotate on the hill as its axis (P.l.a. 686), A.B.L. Awasthi’s identification of this mount with the northern portion of Mānasādri, the neighbouring hill overlooking Mānasā lake (Studies in Śanda Purāṇa, p. 198) is purely conjectural.
15. He will delight and bring happiness to all people by his acts. It is on account of his acts of promoting happiness (and welfare of the people) that his subjects will call him rājan (lit. one who pleases, i.e. the king).

16. He is firm in his vows; true to his words; a friend of Brāhmaṇas (who are devoted to the studies of Vedas); a servant of aged people; the shelter of all beings; paying respect (where due) and kind to the afflicted.

17. He shows the same regard and respect to other women as he would to his mother. He treats his wife as if she were half of his own person. He is affectionate to his subjects like a father. He behaves (respectfully) like a servant, to those who are well-versed in the Vedas.

18. He is most beloved to all creatures as if he was their own Self. He enhances the delight of his friends and well-wishers. He is especially attached to the company of those who are free from worldly attachments. He wields his rod of punishment against the evil-minded (miscreants).

18A*. By dint of his great personal power, he will make the good earth produce all the plants (as one milks the cow). He will make this earth flat by the end of his bow.

19. But really he is directly the Supreme Lord himself who has incarnated by his kalā (portion, part)—the Supreme Lord who governs the three worlds; is the unchangeable perpetual inner controller of all beings; even the apparent multiplicity created in whom by nescience is rendered substanceless (and unmeaningful) when he is realized.

20. This matchless warrior, the King of kings, is the sole protector of the sphere of the earth, from the Udaya mountain with a bow in hand, and seated in his triumphant chariot, he will go round the earth from right to left, just as the Sun does.

* This verse is included here, being authenticated by VR., VJ., SD. and BP. who have commented on it. It is found in the Southern recension of the Bh. P. But SR., RR., VD. GS. and GD. have ignored it in their comments.
21. Kings, as well as the guardians to the quarters of the world, will certainly pay tribute to him at every place. Their queens will regard this first king as Lord Viṣṇu (the god whose weapon is cakra—discus), and sing of his glory.

22. This King of kings, the protector of subjects with a view to providing means of livelihood to his subjects, will milk the earth in the form of a cow. Like Indra, he will break down the mountains with the point of his bow, and level the earth as if in a sport.

23. Twangling his irresistible ājagava bow in the battle, when he, like a lion with his tail erected, traverses the earth, the evil-doers will hide themselves in all directions.

24. He will perform a hundred horse-sacrifices (ātvamedha) at the source of the river Sarasvatī. While the last sacrifice will be performed, Indra (the performer of hundred ātvamedha sacrifices) will steal away his sacrificial horse.

25. He will meet the venerable Sanatkumāra alone in the garden of his palace. He will propitiate him (Sanatkumāra) with devotion. He will get from him the pure knowledge which leads one to attain to the Supreme Brahman.

26. Wherever he will go, Prthu, of celebrated glory and enormous prowess, will hear various songs and ballads and praise based on his\(^{70}\) exploits.

27. His cakra (sway, army, wheels of his chariot) will be unobstructed and unchallenged. After conquering all the quarters of the earth, he will remove the evil-doers of the world by his heroic justre. He will be the supreme master of the world whose great glories will be sung by the chiefs of gods and demons."

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

(Prthu subjuges the Earth)

Maitreya said:

1. King Prthu, the illustrious son of Vena, who was thus eulogised for his excellent attributes and exploits, satisfied those bards by honouring them with gifts as desired by them and by appreciating them.

2. He honoured all the classes of people of whom the Brāhmaṇas were foremost, and also his servants, ministers and family priests, the citizens as well as the rural public, various trade guilds and other prominent subjects.

Vidura asked:

3. Why did the goddess of the earth who can assume multifarious forms assume the form of a cow? When Pṛthu milched her who became the calf and what was the milk-pail?

4. How is it that he levelled the goddess of the earth who was by nature uneven? For what purpose did the god Indra carry off his sacrificial horse?

5. Oh Brāhmaṇa (Maitreya)! To what state did the royal-sage attain after getting initiated in the knowledge of the Brahman and its personal experience\textsuperscript{71} from the venerable Sanatkumāra, the best among the knowers of Brahman?

6-7. I am a votary devoted to you as well as to Lord Kṛṣṇa (Adhokṣaja). Your honour should narrate to me many other deeds of Lord Kṛṣṇa of sanctifying glory, connected with the account of his former manifestation as Pṛthu. Kṛṣṇa in the form of Pṛthu has milched this cow in the form of the earth.

Sūta said:

8. When he was thus urged by Vidura to narrate the story of Vāsudeva, Maitreya, who was pleased with him in mind, praised him and replied.

Maitreya said:

9. Dear child (Vidura)! When Pṛthu was coronated and was called as the protector of the public, the subjects with their bodies emaciated with hunger due to barrenness of the earth, approached Pṛthu, the protector and appealed.

10. "Oh King! We are oppressed by the gastric fire

\textsuperscript{71} Jñānam savijñānam — In B.G. III. 41, Śaṅkara explains jñāna as ‘knowledge of the self and other things acquired from the scriptures and the teachers’ and vijñāna as ‘the personal experience—anubhava of things so taught’.
just like the wood with fire in its hollow. Today we have approached you for shelter, as you are installed as our king who will provide us with means of livelihood, and are worthy of seeking asylum.

11. Oh King of kings! You are verily the protector of the people and the bestower of the means of livelihood. Therefore, while we have not perished from starvation, Your Majesty should endeavour to supply food to us who are famished with hunger."

Maitreya said:

12. Oh great Kuru! Having listened to the heart-rending laments of his subjects, Prthu contemplated deeply for a long time, and at last came to perceive the cause of the scarcity.

13. By his reasoning power he came to the conclusion (that the earth had held up the seeds of herbs, plants and food-grains within herself). Being indignant, he took up his bow and fitted an arrow on it aiming at the earth, just as the enraged destroyer of Tripura (Śiva, did against Tripura).

14. When the earth saw the king with his weapon uplifted, she began to tremble. She assumed the form of a cow and in terror began to run fast like a terrified female deer chased by a hunter.

15. The enraged son of Vena, with eyes blood-red with wrath, and with the arrow fitted to his bow, chased after her whithersoever she ran (for shelter).

16. Running to all the directions (cardinal points) and intermediate directions (e.g. South-east, South-west etc.), to the heaven and the earth and in the space between them, the goddess Earth saw him chasing her everywhere with uplifted weapon.

17. Just as people do not get protection from death, she did not get any asylum in the world against Prthu, the son of Vena. Terrified, she returned with a troubled heart.

18. And she spoke to the illustrious king, "Oh Knower of Dharma! you are kind to the afflicted. Determined as your majesty is on the protection of creatures, protect me as well."
19. Such as you are, why do you intend to kill me who am afflicted and innocent? How could a person who is regarded as expert in (the niceties of) Dharma, strike women?

20. Oh King! Beings (people) do not at all strike the females even though they have committed an offence. Much less would persons like you who are merciful and compassionate to the helpless, do so, Oh King.

21. How can you support yourself and these subjects of yours on the surface of (cosmic) waters after destroying me—a strong boat wherein the whole universe is established?"

Pṛthu said:

22. "Oh Earth! I want to kill you as you disobey my commands—You partake of your share in the sacrifices, but you do not yield us wealth.

23. It is not that punishment is disapproved in the case of a wicked cow which every day eats fodder but does not yield milk from her udders.

24. You are dull-witted. You have confined in yourself the seeds of plants etc. created already by god Brahmā. You do not allow them to grow, thus you set me at nought.

25. I shall pacify the afflictions of these subjects who are famished with hunger and are distressed, with your flesh cut down by my arrows.

26. To kill a vile self-conceited fellow—whether a man, a woman or an impotent person—who is merciless to others, is no killing at all, in the case of kings.

27. You are obstinate, arrogant and have assumed a false form of a cow. Having shattered you to sesamum seed like pieces with my arrows, I shall support these subjects by the dint of my Yogic power."

28. The earth began to tremble. She bowed to him who like the god of death bore a form which was wrath incarnate, and spoke to him with folded hands.

The Earth-goddess said:

29. "I pay my obeisance again and again to the Supreme Man who manifested his various forms by his Māyā (power),

72. ŚR. explains that the body of the god of death is not made of anger.
and appears to be composed of the (three) guṇas, though (in reality) by the realization of his essential nature; he has been ever free from the waves of love, hate (etc.) born of ahamkāra (his false identification) with regard to matter (adhibhūta), action (adhyātma) and the agent (adhidaiva).

30. That Supreme Being, the very Creator who created me as the abode of all jīvas (living beings) and as the support of the four classes of creatures composed of the guṇas of Prakṛti, has come, with uplifted arm, to strike me down! To whom else can I resort now for shelter?

31. He who, at the beginning of creation, created this world of mobiles and immobiles by his supra-logical Māyā Power which rests on him (for support) is said to be now ready to protect it by dint of the same Power. Devoted to righteousness (and its promotion) as he is, how does he desire to kill me?

32. The Almighty, though one, appears as many on account of the other, i.e. the Māyā Power. He created god Brahmā and made him evolve the universe. Alas, the intention of the Lord cannot at all be fathomed by people whose minds are distracted by the invincible Māyā.

33. I bow to the Highest Person, the Creator (of the world) who manifests and withdraws his powers (suitable for the occasion or purpose), and who brings about the creation (preservation and destruction) of the universe by means of his potencies in the form of substance (i.e. five gross elements—mahābhūtas), action (senses and deities presiding over sense-organs), the principle of intelligence (buddhi) and ego (ahamkāra).

34. Oh birthless Almighty! It is Your Majesty who as the primeval Boar verily lifted me up from the waters of Rasātala, with the intention of establishing the world created by you and consisting of five gross-elements, sense-organs and the inner organ (the heart).

35. Today that very Boar (the upholder of the earth) has appeared as the hero (Prthu) who desires to protect his subjects who have resorted to me as on board a ship on the surface of the waters. Your Majesty whose arrows are terrible, certainly desires to kill me for the sake of milk.

36. Oh Warrior! The intention of sovereign rulers (like you) is certainly not comprehended by people like us, whose paths of minds are deluded by the Māyā which creates the universe consisting of three gunas. I pay my respects to those kings who bring glories to all."

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

(Milking of the Earth (in the form of a Cow)

Maitreya said:

1. Having thus praised Pṛthu whose lips were quivering through rage, the goddess of the earth steadied her mind herself (by her reasoning and will power) and addressed the king again, although she was afraid (of him).

2. "Oh King! Please control your wrath completely." Please consider what I tell you. For like a bee, a wise man takes the essence from everything.

3. Expedients for the accomplishments of the welfare of men in this world as well as in the next, have been discovered and employed by the sages who have realized the truth.

4. Anyone belonging to the later periods, who properly and with faith adopts the measures demonstrated by the ancients, easily accomplishes his objectives.

5. Even if a learned person, disregarding those expedients adopted and tested successfully by the ancients, tries to accomplish those objectives in his own (independent) ways, his objects are never realized, despite his frequent efforts and experiments.

6. Oh King! It has been observed by me that the herbs and plants which were produced by god Brahmā formerly, were being enjoyed by the wicked who did not undertake religious observances.

7. When I was left unprotected and uncared for by rulers of the people like you (i.e. Vena and other ordinary kings), and when the world was infested with thieves, I swallowed up those herbs and plants (to preserve them within me) for the performance of sacrifices.

73. Restrain your anger so as to offer me protection (ŚR.).
74. If the text is read as āvidadhū, 'one who in his ignorance' etc. (ŚR.).
8. Due to a lapse of a long period, those plants and herbs within me have become diminished and weak. You should, therefore, try to take them out by some expedient known to be effective in such matters.

9-10. Oh mighty-armed hero! Oh protector of creatures! If Your Lordship desires (to provide) nutritious food coveted by creatures, please arrange for a calf, a suitable vessel (milk-pot) and a milk-man competent to draw (my) milk, so that, being full of affection, I shall yield for you all your desired objects in the form of milk, Oh warrior.

11. Oh mighty king! Make me a level plain so that the waters showered by god Indra may stand on me, even after the rainy season is over. God may bless you."

12. Accepting the agreeable and wholesome words of advice of the goddess of the earth, the king made (Svāyambhuva) Manu as the calf, and milked all the herbs and plants (such as cereals etc.), in his own hand.

13. Similarly, other wise men also extracted essence of everything everywhere. Then others (fifteen including sages) drew out their desired objects from the cow (earth) tamed by Pṛthu.

14. Oh most righteous Vidura! Then the sages made Bṛhaspati, the calf and drew from the goddess (earth) milk in the form of the holy Vedas, into their own sense-organs (viz. ears, speech and mind).

15. The gods made Indra a calf, and extracted in a vessel of gold Soma-juice, and (nectarine) milk giving mental vigour, splendour, energy and physical strength.

16. (The demonic tribes) Daityas and Dānavas made Prahlāda, the foremost among the Asuras, as the calf, and milked from her wine and decoction (spirituous liquors) in a vessel of iron.

17. (The celestial artistes), Gandharvas (heavenly musicians) and Apsaras (heavenly nymphs) made Viśvāvasu the calf, and extracted the milk in the cup of lotus-flower and it became the special Gāndharva honey giving sweetness of voice and beauty.

18. The venerable manes (Pitṛs), the presiding deities of the Śrāddha ceremony performed in memory of the departed souls, made Aryaman (the head of the Pitṛs) as the calf, and reverentially drew milk in an unbaked earthen vessel and it became Kayya (food for the manes).

19. The Siddhas (Semi-divine beings) made Kapila the calf, and extracted in the vessel of the sky the eight superhuman powers (Siddhis) exercisable by mere will. The Vidyādharas (a tribe of demigods) drew the milk in the form of the art of moving through the sky (in the same vessel with Kapila as the calf).

20. Others (such as Kimpuruṣas, a semi-divine tribe) noted for their power of conjuring tricks (māyins) made Maya the calf and got from her, magical powers possessed by wonderful beings who can become invisible at will.

21. The Yakṣas and Rākṣasas (demonic beings), Bhūtas and Piśācas (ghosts and fiends) who feed upon raw flesh made the Lord of ghosts (Rudra) as the calf, and extracted in a skull the wine of blood.

22. In the same way, hoodless reptiles, scorpions, serpents and snakes made Takṣaka (the chief of Nāgas) a calf, and drew poison as the milk, in their mouths as the vessels.

23-24. Herbivorous beasts made the bull of Rudra the calf and drew grass as their milk, in the vessel in the form of the jungle. The carnivorous beasts with big tusks and feeding upon raw meat, with the lion (the king of beasts) as the calf, drew in (the vessel in the form of) their body flesh (as their milk). The birds who used Garuḍa (the chief of birds) as the calf, had mobiles (like worms and insects) and immobiles (life fruits) for their milk.

25. With the Banyan tree as the calf, the trees extracted their own respective juices as the milk. Mountains had the highest (mountain) Himālaya as the calf and milked various minerals (as their milk) in (the vessels in the form of) their ridges.

26. All species of beings used their own chiefs as the calf and extracted severally in their own vessels the milk specifically useful as food to their own species, from the earth which yielded all desired objects when she was tamed by Pṛthu.

27. Oh Viṣṇu (son of the Kuru family)! In this way, Pṛthu and others who subsisted on food obtained from the earth different kinds of milk in the form of their specific food, using different kinds of calves and milk-pots.

28. Thereafter Pṛthu, the lord of the earth, was highly pleased with the earth-goddess who yielded all desired objects, and affectionate as he was to daughters, he regarded her as his daughter, out of paternal affection.

29. The mighty son of Vena, the king of kings, crushed to pieces mountain-peaks with the ends of his bow and made the surface of the globe of earth almost level.

30. The illustrious son of Vena was a father unto his subjects, as he provided them with means of livelihood. He then constructed on the earth, at different places, suitable houses for them.

31. He founded a number of villages, towns, cities, forts and castles of different types. He built abodes for cowherds and cowpens and planned camping grounds, quarries. He provided agricultural habitations and hamlets on hillsides.

32. Before the time of Pṛthu, there was no such planning and construction of cities, towns etc. in this world. During his reign subjects began to live comfortably at various places (in rural and urban areas) with a sense of security.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

(Pṛthu's Conquest)
(Pṛthu's Horse-sacrifices and Conflict with Indra)

Maitreya said:

1. The king (Pṛthu), thereupon, consecrated himself with the intention of performing one hundred horse-sacrifices at Brahmāvarta, the land of Manu, where the Sarasvatī flows towards the east.

2. Anticipating that Pṛthu would excel his record performance of sacrifices, glorious Indra grew jealous of Pṛthu's grand festival of sacrifices.

3. In that festival of sacrifices, the glorious Lord Hari, the Soul of all beings, the revered father of all the world, and the ruler of the universe, was perceived directly as the Lord of the sacrifices by all.

4. He was accompanied by Brahmā, Śiva and protectors of the world along with their followers. His glories were being sung by Gandharvas (celestial musicians), sages and troupes of Apsaras (heavenly nymphs).

5-6. Semidivine beings like Siddhas and Vidyādharas, Daityas, Dānavas, Guhyakas and others and Lord Hari’s prominent attendants headed by Sunanda and Nanda, Kapila, Nārada, Datta and the great masters of Yoga like Sanaka and others—all devotees of the Lord who were eager to serve the Lord, accompanied him.

7. Oh descendant of Bharata (Vidura)! In that sacrifice the earth which supplies the materials for oblations in the sacrifice acted as a wish-yielding heavenly cow, and gave as milk, all the objects desired and required by the sacrificer Prthu.

8. The rivers flowed flooded with all kinds of sweet juices like those of sugarcane, grapes etc. as well as with milk, curds, food, ghee and butter-milk. Trees of gigantic dimensions which oozed out plentiful honey bore fruits abundantly.

9. The oceans brought to him heaps of precious stones as tributes; mountains, four kinds of food; all people along with their protectors76 paid tributes to him.

10. The mighty Indra grew jealous of this great prosperity of Prthu who regarded god Viṣṇu as his Master, and created obstacles in his way (to sabotage his scheme of hundred horse-sacrifices).

11. While Prthu, the son of Vena, was propitiating Viṣṇu, the Lord of Sacrifices, with the last (hundredth) horse-sacrifice, the jealous Indra carried away the sacrificial horse, himself remaining invisible.

12. The venerable sage Atri noticed him hurrying through the sky in the disguise of a heretic who mistakes unrighteousness for righteousness and the guise served him like an armour.

13. As directed by Atri, the son of Prthu, who was a great warrior, pursued Indra to kill him, and shouted to him in rage “Halt! Halt!”

76. lokapāāḥ—Protectors of the world like Indra—GD.
14. Seeing Indra in that sage-like form with matted hair and body smeared with sacred ashes, the son of Prthu thought him to be Dharma (piousness, religion) incarnate, and did not (feel disposed to) shoot an arrow at him.

15. When the Prince returned without killing Indra, Atri urged him again to slay him, saying, “Oh child, kill this great Indra, who is the meanest of gods as he had obstructed your father’s sacrifice”.

16. Thus incited (by Atri), the son of Prthu, got furious and chased Indra who was fleeing through the sky as Jāṭāyu76 (the king of vultures) pursued Rāvana.

17. The King of the Heaven (Indra) gave up his own form and the sacrificial horse and disappeared. Taking with him his own sacrificial horse, the hero (Prthu’s son) returned to (the place of) his father’s sacrifice.

18. Witnessing his miraculous deed, the great sages conferred on him the (significant) epithet Vijitāśva (conqueror of the horse), Oh Lord (Vidura)!

19. The mighty Indra created very thick darkness under the cover of which he stole again the horse tied with a gold chain from the sacrificial post with the circular wooden ring called casāla on its top.

20. Atri (again) pointed out Indra hurrying through the sky. But the warrior (Prthu’s son) did not molest him as he was carrying a human skull and Khaṭvāṅga (a club with a skull at the top) in his hands (like a Kāpālikā).

21. Being urged by Atri, however, he indignantly fixed an arrow (on the bow) aiming it at Indra. The king of heaven (Indra) gave up the sacrificial horse, and his guise (as Kāpālikā) and stayed invisible.

22. Taking the horse with him, the hero (Prthu’s son) returned to (the place of) his father’s sacrifice, while people of poor understanding accepted the censurable guise assumed (and left) by Indra.

23. Whatever forms were assumed by Indra with the intention of carrying away the consecrated horse, were the marks of sins. Here the word khaṇḍa is used in the sense of “mark”.

24-25. In this way while carrying away the horse with the intention of interrupting Pṛthu’s sacrifice, Indra assumed and abandoned deceitful disguise of nude ascetics (Digambara Jainas), red-robed ascetics (Buddhists) and others (such as Kāpālakas). Minds of men, through their misapprehension (of the true teachings of the Vedas), are generally attracted to these pseudo-religious sects as the true religion, as they are charmingly presented with excellent eloquence.

26. When the illustrious king Pṛthu of great prowess learnt this, he got infuriated. He took up his bow and aimed an arrow at Indra.

27. Finding that Pṛthu was determined to kill Indra and appeared of irresistible vehemence and terrible to look at, the sacrificial priests prevented him urging, “Oh highly intelligent and wise king, it is not proper to kill anything else here (at the sacrifice) except the consecrated beast (as enjoined by Vedas).

28. By the force of Vedic incantation of undiminished power, we shall now invoke (and forcibly bring) Indra, the Lord of Maruts who has interrupted your object (of performing this sacrifice) and has lost his glory by your high reputation. Oh King, we shall then forcibly offer your enemy as an oblation to fire.”

29. Oh Vidura! Having thus addressed Pṛthu, the master of the sacrifice, his sacrificial priests, with the ladle (Śrūc) in their hands, indignantly proceeded to pour oblations in the sacrificial fire, when the self-born god Brahmā appeared and prevented them (from doing so saying).

30. “Indra whom you wish to kill by means of the sacrifice, should not be killed. For Indra designated as Yajña is the manifestation of the Almighty Lord (himself), and gods whom you offered oblations are (mere) forms of Indra.”

31. Oh Brāhmaṇa! consider this great violation of Dharma (leading to propagation of heretic sects) perpetrated by Indra who desires to interrupt the king’s performance of the sacrifice. (He may again encourage heretic doctrines to the detriment of the world.)
32. Therefore may Pr̄thu who has performed ninety-nine sacrifices be more famous than Indra” (Brahma then addressed to Pr̄thu): “As Your honour knows the path leading to Liberation, the sacrifices which you have so magnificently performed are enough.

33. May you be blessed (despite the non-completion of this sacrifice). Both you and Indra are the embodiments of Viṣṇu of excellent renown. Hence, it is not proper to cherish anger against the great Indra who is your own self.

34. Oh great king! Please do not worry about this (interruption or non-completion of the sacrifice). Listen to our words with respectful attention. The mind of the person who contemplates to accomplish what has been frustrated by the Fate, certainly gets extremely infuriated and enters blinding darkness of delusion77 (and does not get peace).

35. Let this sacrifice be stopped now for there is obstinacy in gods.78 It is here (due to this sacrifice) that Dharma was violated by heretics created by Indra.

36. Have a look at these people who are being enticed away by attractive heretical doctrines propagated by Indra who maliciously plotted against your sacrifice and stole away the sacrificial horse.

37. Oh son of Vena! You are a part of Viṣṇu incarnated on this earth now from Vena’s body to protect the religion79 of the people suitable to the present times—religion that declined by the misdeeds of Vena.

38.* Oh sovereign ruler of the people! Such a ray of

79. Religious tenets based on Vedas and orthodox philosophic systems like Sāṁkhya, Yoga etc.—ŚR.

* VJ. differs: As you have incarnated yourself for the protection of religion, you should consider that your performance of the intended hundredth sacrifice will be an insult to Indra (Prajāpati) and as such you should not perform it. You should completely fulfill the desire of Indra that you should not complete the hundredth horse-sacrifice. Taking into account the all-round auspicious effects of not opposing Indra’s will, you Viṣṇu as you are, you consider the origination of the universe⁸⁰ and fulfil the purpose of the progenitors of the world (like Bhṛgu and others who created you.) Oh Lord! destroy the formidable heretic path—the illusion created by Indra which is the source of pseudo-religious sects’”.

Maitreyā said:

39. Being thus advised by Brahmā, the creator of the world gave up his insistence on the performance of the hundredth sacrifice, adopted a friendly policy to Indra, and made peace with him.

40. Those gods who were propitiated in the sacrifice and were disposed to confer blessings bestowed boons upon Pṛthu who had performed many auspicious deeds including the concluding ablution (avabhṛtha) at the end of the sacrificial session.

41. Oh, Vidura! The Brāhmaṇas whose blessings were efficacious, and who were faithfully paid the sacrificial money and honoured, became satisfied and pronounced their blessings on the first monarch (Pṛthu).

42. Oh mighty-armed king! All the manes (Pitṛs), gods and sages who were invited by you, have attended and have been worshipped by you paying proper respects and gifts.”

⁸⁰ obey the desire of the creator of the universe (viz. myself) that you should perform only ninety-nine sacrifices. By this sacrifice or religious conduct you should destroy the formidable heretic path which is the illusion created by Indra—a source of pseudo-religious creeds.

⁸⁰. VC. and SD. interpret bhava as the ‘good’ of the universe.
CHAPTER TWENTY

(Pṛthu initiated by Viṣṇu)

Maitreya continued:

1. Even the glorious Lord Vaikuṇṭha (Viṣṇu), the all-pervasive Master and Enjoyer of sacrifices, was highly pleased with sacrifices (performed by Pṛthu). (Manifesting himself) along with Indra, he addressed Pṛthu as follows:

The Lord said:

2. This (Indra) has verily caused obstruction to your hundredth sacrifice. (As) he is begging apology for the same, you should (now) pardon him.

3. Oh King! The best ones among men who are highly intelligent and righteous, cherish no illwill against creatures (even though) they have offended them, inasmuch as the physical body (so offended) is not the Soul (Hence the irrelevance of retaliation).

4. If persons like you are deluded by divine Māyā, service of elderly people (rendered by you) for a long period, has turned out to be mere fruitless labour.

5. A wise man who has realised that this body is the product of avidyā (ignorance about the real nature of the Self), kāma (desire) and karma (actions of the previous life), cherishes no attachment for it.

6. What wise man who has no attachment to his body will cherish a feeling of mineness to house, offspring or even wealth produced by the body?

7*. The Self (ātman) is a changeless one, pure, self-luminous, free from guṇas, the substratum of the attributes (of

* GD. draws a clear contrast between Self (ātman) and the body in his com. as follows:

This Soul is different and distinct from the physical body. The Soul is one while bodies are many. The Soul is pure while the body being composed of five elements (bhūtas) is impure. The Soul is self-effulgent, self-luminous, while the body is dull, dead. The Soul is beyond guṇas but the body is the product of guṇas and hence dependent on them. The Soul is the substratum of guṇas. The Soul is all-pervasive while the body is limited (by spatio-temporal relations). Due to its all-pervasiveness the knowledge, bliss etc.), omnipresent (and hence) unveiled by anything, (a detached) witness, and possessing no other Soul, and distinct from the body (which, in contrast with the Soul, changes with childhood, youth and age; is impure, unintelligent; is constituted of guṇas and dependent on guṇas which produce it; is limited, covered over by houses etc., and is an object of sight; and possesses a Soul distinct from it).

8. The man who thus knows the Soul abiding in him, is established in me. Though he dwells within (the domain of) Prakṛti, he is not affected by its attributes.

9. Oh King! He who, possessed of deep faith (in me) and with no desire of any fruit, always worships me according to his prescribed religious duties (according to his Vāṇa and āśrama) gets his mind gradually purified.

10. When he gets serenity of mind, he becomes unassociated with guṇas (worldly objects), and attains pure vision (true knowledge). He enjoys eternal peace, and the absolute Brahmanhood which is a state of unconcernedness and equipoise like me.

11. He who realizes this Supreme unchangeable Soul to be quite unconcerned though presiding over the material body,

Soul is uncovered while the body being of limited dimensions can be covered with dress. The Soul being consciousness by nature and witness to all, is a seer, but the body being a dead material is subject to perception. The Soul is void of another Soul, mind (inner organ), while the body is the receptacle of the Soul. In this way the knowledge of the identity of jīva (individual Soul) and Īśvara (God)—knowledge which is a means to liberation is explained.

(2) VR. explains the concept of Soul held in the Viṣṇu School:

The Soul which resides in different types of celestial human or subhuman bodies is one, due to his inherent knowledge which is one (common). He is pure while the body is filthy. He is self-luminous, free from qualities like love, hate, the Seat (substratum) of attributes like knowledge, bliss. Though he is atomic he is all-pervasive due to his knowledge of dharma etc. He is not covered by environments such as house, dress etc. He is a direct seer (of his own body, sense-organs) but the body is an object of perception possessing qualities like love, hate, coverable (by clothes etc.). The Soul enters the body and sustains it and while the body is the object to be so sustained. Hence it is distinct from the body.

81. nirūṃnaḥ—Having no controller superior to him.—VJ.

82. aṁśmanah parah—Superior to and distinct from jīvas who are devoid of good attributes—VJ.
the sense organs of cognition and action and the mind, attains the highest bliss.83

12. Samsāra (cycle of birth and death) which is a product of the guṇas (of Prakṛti) pertains to the liṅga sarīra (subtle body) which consists of subtle elements, subtle conative and cognitive sense-organs and their presiding deities and the mind
—the reflection of ātman. That body is distinct from the Soul.
Learned persons who are deeply attached to me are not affected by pleasure or pain, while experiencing prosperity or adversity.

13. Oh valiant King! Being equally undisturbed by pleasure or pain, looking upon the excellent, the middling and the vilest as equals, and having subdued all the sense-organs and the mind, you carry out the duty of protection of all the world with the cooperation of all the people (ministers etc.)
appointed by me.

14. Protection of the subjects is the only way to the final beatitude in the case of a king, as he obtains in the next world one sixth of the meritorious acts performed by his subjects.
But if he collects only taxes and does not protect his subjects he loses his own merits and becomes responsible for the sins of his subjects.

15. (Considering this), if you are mainly devoted to the righteous duty (dharma) as approved by the foremost Brāhmaṇas and handed down by tradition and if you are completely detached from (the puruṣārthas like) dharma (artha and kāma) you will protect this earth and will be their beloved king. In a short while, you will see Siddhas (like Sanaka, Sanandana) who will come to visit you.

16. Oh ruler of men! Ask for whatever boon you like from me. I am bound to you on account of your virtues and character. I am not easily available by the performance of sacrifices, austere penances or by Toga, as by nature I like to dwell with those who are even-minded and look upon all as equals.”

83. v.l. abhayam—Liberation (Mokṣa).
Maitreya said:

17. Thus advised by the All-pervading god Viṣṇu, the preceptor and the Lord of the universe, Prthu, the conqueror of the world respectfully received Hari’s command with his head.

18. He affectionately embraced Indra (the performer of hundred sacrifices) who, being ashamed of his own act, was touching his (Prthu’s) feet (to beg his pardon), and gave up enmity with Indra.

19. Thereupon the venerable Lord (Viṣṇu), the Soul of the universe, was offered worship by Prthu who clasped his lotus-like feet with overflowing devotion.

20. The god whose eyes were like petals of lotus and who is a well-wisher and friend of pious saints, was about to leave. But looking at him (Prthu), he lingered on to confer his grace, and did not depart.

21. The first monarch (Prthu) could not see Hari as his eyes were full of tears. Nor could he speak as his throat was choked with tears. With folded hands he stood, embracing Hari in his heart.

22. Then wiping out his tears, he beheld with unsatisfied eyes the Supreme Man who stood before him touching the ground with his feet and placing His palm on the elevated shoulder of Garuḍa (the enemy of serpents). Prthu spoke to him (as follows).

Prthu said:

23. Oh Omnipresent Lord! From you—the Supreme Lord of gods like Brahmā who can confer boons on others—what wise man would seek for boons craved after by persons dominated by ego (ahamkāra), the product of guṇas (or enjoyable to those who regard the material body as Self). Oh bestower of Mokṣa (Liberation), I do not seek them as they are available even to embodied beings in Hell, Oh Lord.

24. Oh Lord! I do not desire even that Mokṣa (final

84. Normally gods do not touch the earth with their feet. This action of Hari indicates that he was so overwhelmed to shower his grace on Prthu that he forgot himself and touched the ground with his feet—ŚR.
beatitude) (if there be no opportunity to taste) the honey from your lotus-feet, which surges from within hearts of great saints and oozes out of their mouths. Bless me with ten thousand ears for hearing your glory. This is the boon (I seek).

25. Oh Lord of excellent fame! The breath laden with small drops of the nectar of your lotus-like feet which issues from the mouth of great saints, restores the knowledge of the Self to false Yogins who have forgotten the Path of Truth. Hence enough of boons to us (as there is absolutely no possibility of us—devotees being affected by passions like love, hate etc. Bhakti comprises within it the bliss of liberation).

26. Oh Lord of excellent renown! If, by a lucky chance, one happens to listen even once, to your auspicious glory in the assembly of noble saints, how can an appreciator of virtues forget it—unless he is a brute. For the goddess Lakṣmī earnestly seeks your glory with a desire of assimilating those virtues (or concentrating in her all purusārthas or objectives of man’s life).

27. Hence, being full of ardent desire, I would, like Lakṣmī (the lotus-handed goddess) be eagerly devoted to you, the Supreme most Person, the receptacle of all excellent attributes. May there be no jealousy⁸⁵ between us who are vieing with each other for the service of one and the same Lord, and have concentrated our minds on your feet alone.

28.* Oh Lord of the World! There may arise jealousy in the mind of Lakṣmī, the mother of the worlds, as we have

---

⁸⁵. As there was between Indra and myself for the performance of sacrifices—ŚR.

* (i) VR. gives an additional interpretation:

Oh Lord of the world! The fruit of sacred duties like sacrifices bestowed on us by Prakṛti the mother of the universe is unimportant and disastrous as it leads to Saṁsāra. But you are so magnanimous and kind to the poor and distressed that you do not see any wrong in it and you elevate that insignificant act of sacrifice yielding ordinary commonplace fruit to the dignity of the means leading to Mokṣa (Liberation). For such commonplace fruits are trifles to one who is satisfied in one’s natural Self.

(ii) VJ. differs. The gist is as follows:

The danger that there would arise a quarrel between Prithu and Lakṣmī a desire to share her work (of rendering service to you). However you who are compassionate to the poor and distressed, magnify (the value of) our insignificant services. Of what account (importance) is she (Lakṣmī) to you who are satisfied in your own natural Self.

29. (As you are kind to the poor and pitiable) pious persons (who are free from attachment) resort to you (even after attainment of knowledge). You are above the deluding effects of the guṇas of Māyā. We do not know whether the righteous souls cherish any ulterior motive other than the act of remembrance and contemplation of the feet of the Lord.

30. That you addressed the words, “Seek a boon” to me who am your devotee, your words are, I think, deluding to the world. If the world is not bound by the cords of Your speech (Vedic injunctions) who could be so deluded again as to perform the usual (ritualistic) actions.

31.* Oh Supreme Lord! An ignorant man is indeed (as is natural in common rivals) is not possible as both of them were devotees of the Lord:

Oh Lord of the universe! There will be naturally an injurious rivalry among persons under ordinary kings. But there is no cause for such rivalry amongst us (Lakṣmī and myself). In our actions, viz. your worship, what we do is very little. You magnify it as you are compassionate to the poor. Conferring blessings even for a small act does not however mean that you change an atom-like insignificant act into a mountain.

(iii) VC. regards this a characteristic of a warrior-devotee. I shall face opposition with mother Lakṣmī. We desire to perform her work, viz. service of your feet. Let her rest on your bosom. As a son, I shall serve your feet. I am not afraid that Lakṣmī, as compared with me, is more ancient and great. But as you are kind to the weak and meek, you magnify our insignificant service. As I am confident of my power, I am not concerned with Lakṣmī’s pleasure or displeasure.

86. From the minds of your devotees, you dispel the delusion caused by the guṇas of Māyā.—VR. and VD.

* (i) VR.: Being deluded by your Māyā, a person becomes devoid of true knowledge. If such ignorant person fortunately adores you and requests you for artha, kāma etc.—objects other than you,—he remains separate from you. This means, Oh Lord, you have compromised your own greatness. Just as a father guards the interests of his minor and ignorant child, you should do what is good for him (even without his request to do so).

(ii) VC.: You should not test your devotee by asking him to select a boon, for people are likely to select other material things. You should therefore, yourself do what is good for us according to you.

(iii) GD.: Oh Lord! This ignorant person is separated from your real Self by your powerful Māyā. Hence he seeks from you son’s property and other things. You further entice him by telling him to choose a boon, just as a father etc.

87. abudhāḥ: If the word be taken as budhāḥ the verse means: It is indeed by your Māyā that man is separated from you, his real Self.
separated from you—his real Self—by your Māyā. Hence he covets after something else (like artha, kāma etc.). Just as a father, of his own accord (without being requested by the child to look after his interests), looks after the good of his child, you yourself also should do what is good for us.

Maitreya said*:

32. The Omniscient Lord who was thus eulogised by Prthu, (the first monarch of the earth) said, “Oh King! May your devotion in me remain (constant). Fortunately, you have such a (firmly devoted) mind towards me, as would enable one to get over my Māyā which is so difficult to cross.

33. Therefore, Oh Protector of the People, you carry out my commands carefully. People who abide by my commands are blessed with happiness here and hereafter.”

Maitreya said:

34. Having thus gladly received the deeply significant compliments of the royal sage Prthu (the son of Vena), and being worshipped by him, Acyuta (the imperishable Lord) blessed him (with his grace) and thought of departing.

35-36. Gods, sages, manes (Pitrṣ), Gandharvas, Siddhas, Cāraṇas, Serpents, Kinnaras, Apsaras, men, birds and various creatures and the attendants and followers of Viṣṇu were regarded as Viṣṇu (The Lord of Sacrifices) and were honoured with devotion by respectful address, donation of wealth, folding of palms by the king—after which they departed.

37. Carrying away (as it were) the mind of the royal sage as well as that of his preceptor, Lord Acyuta (Viṣṇu) also returned to his own abode (Vaikuṇṭha).

38. Having paid obeisance to the Lord, the god of gods, who though unmanifest by his nature, (out of grace) revealed himself to Prthu and became invisible again, Prthu returned to his capital.

Hence even though he be wise or learned, he longs for other things (such as sons etc.).

* Verses 32 and 33 are not commented by SR but are annotated by VR., GD. and others.
CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

(Pṛthu explains Dharma to his subjects)

Maitreya said:

1-3. (Pṛthu retired to his capital city)—the city was decorated everywhere with wreaths of pearls and garlands of flowers, with silk drapery and decorative arches of gold, and with extremely fragrant incense (burning). Its streets and squares were besprinkled with water scented with sandal and agaru (agalochum). They were beautified with flowers, aksatas (unbroken rice pigmented with red kumkuma), fruits, tender barley-shoots, parched grains of rice, and illuminated with lamps. It was adorned with plantain trees as well as with young arica plants laden with fruits and flowers, and was beautified with wreaths of tender leaves of (mango and other) trees.

4. His subjects, along with beautiful girls wearing bright gold earrings, went forward to greet him with lamps, materials of worship, and all other auspicious articles (such as curds) prepared (for the occasion).

5. In the midst of blowing of conchs and sounding of kettledrums and chanting of Vedic hymns (by Brāhmaṇas), the warrior who was untouched by pride, in spite of the singing of his eulogies, entered his palace.

6. The highly renowned king was honoured everywhere on his way. He (in return) honoured the residents of his city as well as his subjects from rural areas. He was pleased with them, and granted them the boons they liked.

7. Performing many such and other achievements, the most adorable king of great virtues and pious conduct, governed this globe of the earth. After establishing his pure reputation, he ascended to the highest abode (Vaikuṇṭha).

Śūta said:

8. Oh Śaunaka (Leader of the sacrificial assembly in the Naimiṣa forest)! Vidura, the great devotee of the Lord respectfully adored Maitreya, (the son of Kuśirava), who was eulogising the primal king’s (Pṛthu’s) worldwide renown of all excellent attributes which was glorified by highly virtuous people. He spoke to him (Maitreya, as follows):
9. Prthu who received adorations from all gods, and who bore in his arms the mighty and heroic lustre of god Viṣṇu wherewith he milked the earth (in the form of a cow), was coronated by Brāhmaṇas.

10. What wise man will not listen to the glories of Prthu on the remnants of whose valorous achievements, all the rulers of the world, the guardian deities and the people, still subsist to their hearts’ content—Please, therefore, narrate to me in details his pious deeds.

Maitreya said:

11. Dwelling in the land (doāb) lying between the rivers—the Gaṅgā and the Yamunā, Prthu enjoyed only those pleasures which came to his lot, as a result of the fruition of his past deeds, as he desired to exhaust (the stock of) his merit (and not due to addiction to pleasures).

12. His writ ran unobstructed everywhere. He wielded his sceptre (sovereignty) over seven island-continents—with the exception of Brāhmaṇas and devotees of Hari (who was like their progenitor).

13. Once upon a time, he was consecrated for the performance of a great sacrifice. There assembled, Oh Vidura, a congregation of gods, Brāhmaṇa sages and royal sages.

14. When all the respectable persons were duly honoured according to their merits and positions, he (Prthu) stood up in that assembly, like the moon in the midst of stars.

15. He was tall with muscular long arms; he was fair in complexion; his eyes were reddish like a red lotus; his nose was shapely; his countenance, beautiful. He was gentle in appearance; his shoulders were rounded. His rows of teeth and smiles were beautiful.

16. That powerful monarch had a broad chest, full, bulky loins, stomach shaped like a pipal leaf and beautified with three folds; his navel was deep and circular like a whirlpool, his thighs were like pillars of gold, and the fore part of his feet was slightly plump (elevated) and prominent.

88. They are: Jambu, Plakṣa, Śālmali, Kuśa, Krauṇca, Śāka and Puṭkara.
17. He had fine, curly, dark and glossy hair on the head. His throat was (marked with three spiral lines) like a conch. He wore two costly silk garments, one around his waist and one around his upper part of the body.

18. Due to his sacrificial vow, he laid aside his ornaments. So the natural splendour of the limbs of his body became manifest. He looked dignified with (upper part of) his body covered with the skin of a black-antelope, and with Kuśa grass in his hand he had completed the prescribed religious acts (of that time).

19-20. He looked around with his calm, soothing, affectionate eyes. With a view to thrilling the assembly with joy, the Lord of the earth delivered the following address which was pleasant to hear, couched in beautiful figurative expressions, polished, deep in significance, unagitated and calm. He was, as if, briefly narrating, at that time, his own experiences for the benefit of all.

The King said:

21. "Oh members of this assembly, please listen to me. May auspiciousness betide you all righteous people who have come here. Persons desirous of knowing (the true nature of) Dharma—righteousness—should state (fully) their concept (of Dharma) before the righteous people. (Hence I speak out to you my concept.)

22. I have been installed here as a king to govern and dispense punishment (to anti-social elements), to protect the people, to provide them their means of livelihood, to control them severally within their respective spheres of duties.

23. May those regions which yield whatever one desires and which are reached—according to the knowers of the Vedas—by persons with whom (Lord Hari), the Witness of the previous deeds of all persons, is pleased, be attainable to me, by my performance of this duty.

24. The monarch who collects taxes without imparting instruction to his subjects in their respective religious duties, shares their sins only, and forgoes his own good luck.

25. My dear subjects! You should, therefore, (continue to) perform your own righteous duties, fixing your mind on god Viṣṇu, and remain free from jealousy. It will be in the interest of the subsistence of your king hereafter, as well as in your own. You would thereby be rendering a great favour to me.

26. Oh purehearted and sinless Pitṛs (manes), gods and sages, kindly give your hearty approval (to my request): 'May the doer, the preceptor and the consenter of any action share equally its fruit in the next world.'

27. Oh most worthy men, Mīmāṁsakas! According to some (believers in God), there exists the Lord of sacrifices (the dispenser of the fruit of karmas). For here and in the next world, there are seen some rare regions full of moonlight (meant for enjoying pleasures), as well as bodies brilliant like moonlight (which are the mediums for enjoying worldly pleasures as a result of karmas).

28-29.* In the opinion of Svāyambhuva Manu, Uttānāpāda, even of king Dhruva, the royal sage Priyavrata, my paternal grandfather Anīga and such others, as well as that of god Brahmā and Lord Śiva, as also that of Prahlāda and even of Bali (whom Viṣṇu pushed down to subterranean regions), Gadādhara (Lord Viṣṇu) must necessarily be postulated as the dispenser of the fruit of karmas.

30.* With the exception of Mrtyu's daughter's son (i.e. Vena) and others who are deluded about religion, and deserve to be pitied (lamented), others believe that there must be one common cause (i.e. God) who mainly dispenses the three puruṣārthas (viz. Dharma, Artha and Kāma), heavenly bliss and Liberation.

31. The relish and desire of serving the Lord's feet, increase with the passing of each day. Like the river (Gaṅgā) flowing out from his (Viṣṇu's) toe, this ever-increasing desire

* These verses refute the view of Pūrva-mīmāṁsā (and that of other heretic doctrines attributed to Indra's Māyā) about the non-existence of God. The karm doctrine must be accepted to explain the variety and inequality in the world. Karma, by itself, is inert (jaṣa) and deities like Indra, Varuṇa are themselves dependent (paratapura). For the dispensation of the fruits of karm and for explaining inequality in the world, we must postulate an independent God possessing powers of doing, undoing and changing differently: atāḥ svāntāntyena kartum akartum anyathā-kartum samarthena Paramesvaro bhāvyam/—SR.
to serve, washes off instantaneously the sins, accumulated through all the past lives, in the minds of people who are tormented with pains and afflictions.

32. A person who takes shelter at His feet, gets all the impurities in his mind washed off, develops special powers of non-attachment and self-realization, and does not return to \textit{samsāra} (the cycle of births and deaths) which brings with it all miseries.

33. With faith in sure achievement of your goal (Liberation) according to your capacity and merit, and without any hypocrisy, you worship him only—whose lotus-like feet yield all your desires—with (i.e. dedicating to him) all duties pertaining to your vocations, and with all the powers of mind, speech and body (i.e. performance of meditation, prayer and worship), and with duties (of your respective caste and stage of life—\textit{vāṇa} and \textit{āśrama}).

34.* Though, by nature, he is pure knowledge and consciousness, and devoid of any attribute, he manifests himself here as sacrifice possessing innumerable attributes (or essential requirements etc. of sacrifice), such as rice (and other sacrificial materials), qualities (of things such as whiteness, blackness), actions (such as threshing, winnowing of grains), words (\textit{mantras} used in sacrifices), purpose (for which acts are meant), the

  \item[(i)] VC.: Verses 34 and 35 state that \textit{karma} is essentially impure, inert (\textit{jaḍa}) and \textit{rājas} (characterised by the \textit{guṇa}, \textit{rajas}). But if it is, devoutly dedicated to God, it is transformed into pure \textit{sāttvik} nature, and yields fruit. Hence the author advises \textit{karma} mixed with \textit{bhakti} (devotion).
  \item[(ii)] VJ.: This verse illustrates the term \textit{svakarmaḥ} in the previous verse (33). \textit{Nārāyaṇa} described in \textit{Ait. Up. 1.1}, is attained to by a righteous person who performs sacrifices of many kinds, and of many attributes (or requirements), such as materials (\textit{purodāśa} etc.), qualifications viz. good heredity or birth from particular parents (of the sacrificer), actions i.e. Vedic incantations for gods like Indra, Agni, by the sacrificial priests, the interest of these gods in the sacrificer, and the characteristics of gods, e.g. Indra, holdidg a \textit{Vajra} (or god \textit{Nārāyaṇa}, the wielder of Sudarśana disc). By this sacrificial act, the mind gets purified, and the higher knowledge which terminates the \textit{samsāra}, dawns on the sacrificer. It is by such deeds that Janaka and others attained final beatitude (B.G. 9.20).
  \item[(iii)] SD: \textit{Karmas} dedicated to God lead to God-realisation. God is devoid of bad attributes (\textit{aguna}) and possesses innumerable auspicious attributes (\textit{aneka-gunaḥ}).
\end{itemize}
intention or object (of performing the sacrifice), the efficacy (of sacrificial materials so used), and means (by which the sacrifice is known, e.g. agnistoma).

35.† Just as fire (a piece of) wood appears as possessing all the characteristics (e.g. size, shape etc.) of the (piece of) wood, the Omniscient Lord (though essentially the Highest Bliss itself) appears as intellect or consciousness (which identifies itself with the external objects) in the body, which is a product of Pradhāna (Prakṛti or Primordial Nature), Kāla (the Principle of Time which sets in commotion or agitation the guṇas of Prakṛti), Vāsanā (impressions unconsciously left on the mind by the past actions which give rise to pleasure or pain) and dharma (merit or demerit constituting the fate or adṛśta of an individual) and manifests himself as the fruit of religious acts (e.g. a sacrifice).

* (i) The previous verse identifies God with sacrifice. In this verse, the fruit of sacrifice is stated to be the manifestation of the Lord—ŚR.

(ii) VR. : This verse identifies the Lord with Jīva, the enjoyer of the fruit of karma, as well as the fruit of the act itself (atha karma-bhoktṝ-jīva-rūpataḥ tat-phala-rūpataḥ cāha). The Lord is the innerdweller (antar-yāmin) of jīvas. As such, through the medium of jīva, he gets the experiences of external objects in relation to body (due to dharma-bhūta-jñāna, the theory of attributive consciousness of the Self). The body is the product of Pradhāna, Kāla, Vāsanā and adṛśta. The Lord is hence regarded as the fruit of sacrifice, (such as Svarga). But despite these experiences, the Lord is not contaminated by the blemishes etc. of the karmas, just as fire appears to share the characteristics (e.g. length, curvature etc.) of the burning wood, (and yet actually it shares none of them).

(iii) VJ. : Nārāyaṇa, the Omniscient Lord enters Jīva who, having renounced everything, retains a formal relation with Jīva. The pious persons (jīvas) know that Nārāyaṇa is the fruit of the righteous acts, and the dispenser of the fruits as well, according to Brahma Sūtra—phalam ata upapateḥ (3.2.39 acc. to Madhva bhāṣya).

(iv) VG. : God realization is the fruit of karmas dedicated to God. After such dedication of karmas, God, out of his grace, manifests himself. But this degree of god-realization varies directly with the intensity of faith, devotion, knowledge in the dedicated one's acts to the Lord, even as the fire differs with the quality of the wood like sandal, agaru, khadira. (The first two give out sweet fragrance while the last does not.)

(v) GD. : This All-pervading Lord who enjoys the experience of happiness of intellect—due to contacts of the objects to the body, is also realised to be the fruit of acts (such as sacrifice etc.)
36. * Oh! How blessed I am that my subjects of firm vows, always worship Hari by performing their prescribed religious duties in this world—God Hari who is the preceptor (or Father) and the Supreme Lord of divinities who receive obligations in sacrifices. These (subjects) render me great favour.

37.  At no time may the martial lustre of the ruling princely families, born of great military power and effluence, dominate over the race of Vaiṣṇavas, the votaries of the unconquerable god (Viṣṇu) and that of the Brāhmaṇas who (though lacking in opulence) are resplendent on account of their forbearance, austere penance and learning.

38. Even Lord Hari, the most ancient person, the foremost among the greatest (of gods like Brahmā) is gracious unto Brāhmaṇas. It is by paying obeisance to their feet that he got Lakṣmī (the goddess of wealth) who never forsakes him and great glory that hallows the world.

39. The Absolutely independent Supreme God who resides in the hearts of all and to whom Brāhmaṇas are dear is certainly pleased by service rendered to them (Brāhmaṇas). Therefore, may the Brāhmaṇa race be served sincerely, and with all your hearts, by persons who are self-controlled, disciplined and devoted to the righteous duties (prescribed in the Bhāgavata way of life) pleasing to him.

40.  By constant association with and service of the

* Prθtu hereby confirms the religious tendencies of his subjects who with a firm resolve worship the Lord (ŚR. and others) but VJ. treats this as a compliment to Brāhmaṇas who as teachers and pupils are born from Hari’s mouth, and always conduct their religious duties, and as such, they should be worshipped.

 (i) VR. : The verse indicates that Brāhmaṇas and Kṣatriyas should mutually respect and favour each other: ‘May not the votaries of Viṣṇu, the Brāhmaṇa caste which stands resplendent with its forbearance, austerities and such other virtues, be provoked by the Princely houses puffed up with pride in their power and affluence’. VJ. endorses the same view.

(ii) VC. : For firm establishment of devotion to god, this verse prohibits the insubordination to Vaiṣṇavas and Brāhmaṇas.

ŚR. : This verse removes the following doubt:

(i) If one always serves Brāhmaṇas, the performance of sacrifices—offering oblations to gods in sacrificial fires—will be neglected. This laxity in religious duties will not lead to purity of mind and the final beatitude which depends on it.
Brähmaṇa (caste), the mind soon attains purity and serenity, (and consequently) the person, automatically (without any effort to get knowledge or Yogic practice) attains the highest bliss and final emancipation. Is there any better mouth of gods who receive oblations through fire than the Brähmaṇa race? (The fruit of sacrifices and of knowledge is obtained by service of Brähmaṇas).

41. The infinite Lord who is essentially knowledge incarnate and the indweller of all creatures, does not verily relish so much the oblations offered to the sacrificial fire which is devoid of consciousness, as certainly those offered with faith, into the mouths of the Brähmaṇas in the names of adorable divinities (like Indra, Varuṇa) to be invoked in sacrifices, by the knowers of the Truth.

42. With a view to understanding the true import of the Vedas in which the universe is clearly reflected as in a clean mirror, they (Brähmaṇas) bear (in their memories) the pure and eternal Vedas with faith, austere penance, auspicious conduct, control of speech unrelated to Vedic studies, self-control and concentration of mind. (Hence Brähmaṇas are superior to fire due to their knowledge of Vedas).

43. I would like to bear on my crown the dust from the lotus-like feet of those (Brähmaṇas), for, the sin of the man who wears this dust, immediately disappears, and all excellent attributes abide in him, Oh noble ones.

44. Affluence (in every respect) and accomplishments of desires seek to follow a man who is the receptacle of excellent qualities, looks upon character as his wealth, is full of gratitude, and resorts to wise elderly people. May the race of Brähmaṇas, and that of cows, Lord Viṣṇu, along with his votaries (and followers) be gracious unto me.”

(ii) VR. : By service of Brähmaṇas, the deities to be propitiated by performance of sacrifices are served.

(iii) VJ. : The Brähmaṇa caste is in constant contact with the Lord. By serving them, one obtains serenity of mind and immediately attains to the highest bliss, the final beatitude (Mokṣa). By service of Brähmaṇas, one gets the fruit of performance of sacrifices, knowledge.
Maitreya said:

45. All Pitṛs (manes), gods and Brāhmaṇas felt highly pleased at heart with the king who spoke thus. Those pious souls expressed their approbation and praised him.

46. True is the Vedic text that a man attains to the higher worlds by means of a son. For the sinful Vena (Prthu's father) who was killed by Brahmanical curse, has crossed over the dark Hell (through Prthu).

47. And Hiranyakasipu also was about to enter the dark hell for reviling the Lord, but crossed over it through the power of piety of Prahlāda (his son).

48. Oh foremost warrior, father of the earth! May you live long for eternal years, as you cherish such devotion to Lord Viṣṇu, the sole ruler of all worlds.

49. Oh King of holy fame! With you as our ruler, we regard ourselves as having today Lord Viṣṇu as our ruler, as you reveal to us the narratives of Viṣṇu whose renown saves others from infernal regions and who is favourable to Brāhmaṇas.

50. Oh Lord! It is the nature of the great, whose hearts are full of pity, to love their subjects. Hence, it is no wonder that you exhort your dependants this way.

51. Oh King! You have brought us today across the hell—we who, losing their insight due to our past deeds designated as Fate,—have been wandering in Saṃsāra.

52. Salutation to you, the most powerful Person with dominant Sāttvic attributes, who inspiring the Brāhmaṇa race by your force support the Kṣatriya race and vice versa, and inspiring both Brāhmaṇas and Kṣatriyas support the universe by virtue of your own power.
CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

(Sanatkumāra’s Sermon to Prthu)

Maitreya said:

1. While people were thus extolling Prthu of mighty prowess, there approached four sages, brilliant like the Sun.

2. Attended upon by his servants, the king saw those lords of sages descending from the heavens. They were recognized to be Sanaka and others by their lustre which absolved the worlds of sins.

3. Just as the lord of sense-organs (jīva) rushes forth to the objects of senses, Prthu, the son of Vena, along with the courtiers and attendants, immediately stood up (and went forth to the sages), as if to recover his vital breaths which sprang forth at their sight.89

4. When the sages accepted preliminary reception (arga) and occupied the seats (offered to them), the courteous king, who was hypnotised with their august presence, bowed down his head out of modesty, and worshipped them with due formalities.

5. (To purify himself) he sprinkled the hair on his head with (the sanctifying drops of) water with which he washed their feet. He, thereby, observed the course of conduct of the virtuous, to show respect to them.

6. The king was endowed with deep faith and self-discipline, and was full of joy. He addressed those elder brothers of Lord Śiva, who occupied seats of gold, and were looking like sacrificial fires in their respective altars.

Prthu said:

7. "Oh! What meritorious deeds I must have performed that I have the privilege of seeing you, the abodes of auspicious-ness, who are very difficult to be perceived even by masters of Yoga.

8. What is very difficult to attain here and hereafter to a person unto whom Brāhmaṇaṣ (like you), and gods Śiva and Viṣṇu along with their attendants are gracious!

9. Just as Mahat and other principles (or Brāhma, Manu and other makers of the world)—which are the causes of the universe, do not visualize the Omniscient ātman (Soul), people do not at all see you even though you roam over the world (to help them to attain their puruṣārthas).

10. Verily, blessed are those saintly householders who, though penniless, have in their houses materials for worship such as water, mat of (darbha) grass, accommodation (or floor), the master of the household and his dependants ready (for receiving) the worthies.

11. (Unwelcome) like the trees which are haunted by poisonous serpents, are the houses which, though fully furnished with all kinds of riches, are not hallowed by the holy water used for washing the feet of Viṣṇu's devotees.

12. Welcome is your arrival; Oh preeminent Brāhmaṇaṣ who, determined to secure liberation, have been faithfully and with resolute mind, observing great vows (like lifelong celibacy) since your very childhood. (Or..... Brāhmaṇaṣ whose course of observances of vows is followed by other ignorant persons desirous of Liberation).

13. Oh spiritual Masters! Is there any hope of good for us who regard the (achievement of) objects of senses as the goal of life and who, by our own deeds, have fallen into the saṁsāra, the bed of miseries.

14. The etiquette of enquiring after welfare of the guests is not applicable (or desirable) in the case of your honours, who are absorbed in the bliss of the ātman (Soul), and who are above the thoughts of welfare or otherwise.

15. You are the friends and well-wishers of the distressed. With full faith in you, I, therefore, wish to enquire of you how one can speedily achieve the Summum bonum (Mokṣa) in this Saṁsāra?

16. It is obviously certain that the unborn Lord Nārāyaṇa who shines as the Soul of the self-knowing sages, and who manifests himself (in the heart of the devotees), goes about in the world, in the form of Siddhas (like you), for showering his grace upon his votaries."

Maitreya said:

17. Having heard Prthu’s beautifully worded, logical, deeply significant, brief, melodious speech, Sanatkumāra slightly smiled, and verily replied with pleasure.

Sanatkumāra said:

18. "With the welfare of all beings at your heart, a good enquiry has been made by Your Majesty, even though you know its answer, Oh great King! For such is the nature of the righteous.

19. The meeting of the righteous is highly approved by both (the speakers and the members of the audience) for, their dialogues and enquiries increase the happiness of all.

20. Oh King! Your honour has definitely a constant and abiding love for eulogizing the excellent attributes of the lotus-like feet of Lord Viṣṇu (the enemy of demon Madhu). Such constancy of love is difficult to be found in others. Such love (if generated) completely shakes off the sticky dirt of inner passions and desires in the heart (which is difficult to remove).

21. In the Śāstric texts which have made a thorough enquiry (about the good of beings), it has been positively decided that perfect non-attachment to things other than the Soul (e.g. one’s own body), firm and constant love of attributeless Brahman and the Self—these constitute the means of the final beatitude of men.

22-25. Attachment for attributeless Brahman and non-attachment to the entire non-self material world (un-ātman), both effect and cause are easily generated by intense faith, performance of righteous duties towards the Lord, the desire

96. Patañjali gives the following list of Tamas and niyamas:

(i) Tamas (abstentions)—Abstinence from injuries, from falsehood, from theft, from incontinence and from acceptance of gifts (VSP. ii. 30).

(ii) niyama (observance) : Cleanliness, Contentment, Self-castigation, Study and Devotion to Īśvara (VSP. ii. 32).

VJ. quotes from Yajñavalkya Yoga Sāstra 10 Tamas but as given in ASD 455 the lists include 10 or 12 Yamas according to different authors. ASD 290 quotes the following 10 niyānās:

Śucam iṣya tapo dānam svādhyaayo 'pastha-nigrahaḥ/
Vrata-mauno'pavāsāṁ ca snānam ca niyāmā dala∥ opposite states (such as heat and cold, pleasure and pain); by devotion to Hari that blossomed for the constantly glorifying Lord Hari’s excellences which form the ornaments to the ears of his devotees through faith and deep devotion.

26.* When his attachment and delight in Brahman becomes firmly established, a man seeks a spiritual preceptor. Just as fire ignited from araṇī (a piece of wood of the Śaṅk tree used for kindling fire by friction) consumes its own source (the piece of wood from which it arose), the man, by force of his knowledge and non-attachment burns down his subtle body consisting of five subtle elements\(^{97}\) and enveloping his Soul, in such a way as to render it unrevivable.

27. When the screen or sheath (of the subtle body enveloping the Soul) which, till then intervened between the Super-Soul (Paramātman) and the Soul, is destroyed,\(^{98}\) the

97. Pañcātmakam : (i) Consisting of five klesas viz. avidyā (nescience), ahankāra (ego), rāga (attachment), duṣṭa (hatred) and abhiniveśa (instinctive clinging to worldly life and bodily enjoyment and the fear of being deprived of this—ASD.39) SR. and GD. VC. endorses this view while SD. supports the first interpretation given.

(ii) Consisting of five Koṣas (sheaths) which lying one within the other make the body enshrining the Soul. They are : (1) annamaya, (2) manomaya, (3) Prāṇamaya, (4) bhūtānamaya and (5) dhānadamaya. Sarvopaniṣat-sūtra, however, gives Prāṇamaya Kośa the second place before Manomaya Kośa.

* According to VR., firm fixation of love in Brahman leads to the grace of spiritual preceptor (and not vice versa). With the force of knowledge, renunciation and the love or delight in Brahman, a man burns down the seed of karmas (both merit and sin) which is the cause of the body (and Saṃsāra).

VJ. explains that the heart is an external upādhi (condition or attribute) and its burning does not harm and not the Soul or seed so enveloped by the external sheath.

98. What interrupted the knowledge of the relations between the Supreme Soul and the jīva.

 VJ. differs: When the ‘heart’ and its attributes e.g. knowledge, disappear, the jīva does not perceive any difference—within and without like a blind person. When in the Saṃsāra, there is a screen between the Supreme Lord and the jīva, there exists a semblance of knowledge like doubt, as in a dream. But when the subtle body is lost, the jīva also will disappear. And the Saṃsāra with its modicum of knowledge is preferable to the vanishing of the jīva. Who would then bother about Liberation (Mukti)?
IV.30.22.

person becomes freed from all the attributes⁹⁹ pertaining to the subtle body which has been burnt down. (Thenceforth) he does not perceive (his subjective states of pleasure, pain etc.) which are within him,¹⁰⁰ nor objects (e.g. a pot, a piece of cloth) which are external to him, just as a man awakened from a dream does not see the objects he had been perceiving in his dream.¹⁰¹

28. (It is in the state of wakefulness and dream) while this upādhi (conditioning) of mind continues, that man can perceive himself (the seer), objects of senses and what is beyond them both (viz. ahankāra which establishes relation between them—the seer and the seen), and not otherwise (as in sleep).

29. (For example), if, anywhere, (reflecting) condition—upādhi like water,¹⁰² mirror or such other condition is present, a man can see the difference between himself (the object of reflection) and the other thing (his own reflection) and not in the absence of the reflecting medium.

⁹⁹. The attributes like love, hate which deserve to be shed off (heya-guṇāḥ)—VR.
¹⁰⁰. All internal blemishes, e.g. love, hate etc.—VR.
¹⁰¹. S.R. explains: Just as a person who in a dream sees himself to be a king attended upon by an army of soldiers, sees no more his kingship and the army when the dream is over.
S.D.: In the dream the externals are friend, foe etc. and the internals are the honour, dishonour etc. meted out by them. These disappear when the dream is over.
¹⁰². jātāsau—But VR. reads ṣaṭāsau and interprets: jada is the inert body. When the limiting condition like this inert body continues as interruption, the jīva experiences separateness from his Self and the Supreme Soul. But in Liberated stage this limitation of the body ceases, he sees no such difference between the two.

VC. thinks that this upādhi (limiting condition) is destroyed by knowledge and the jīva, by his powerful love of God enjoys the blissful nature of the Lord.

SD. thinks that the extreme difference between the Soul (ātman) and Brahman is due to ignorance. When real knowledge dawns, he realizes the Brahmashood in ātman (ātmano Brahmanātma tam pāyati).
tellect loses its power of thinking and discrimination, just as the water from a pool is (imperceptibly) sucked up by the roots of a clump of grass.\footnote{103}

31. As a consequence of the loss of the reasoning capacity memory is lost. The loss of memory\footnote{104} results in loss of knowledge and wisdom. The wise people call this loss of wisdom as the covering of the Self through one’s own Self.

32. In this world, there is no worse loss of his self-interest to a man than the loss of his own Self (through himself) for whose sake every other thing in the world becomes dear (lit. on whom depends the dearness of every other thing in the world).\footnote{105}

33. Constantly brooding over wealth and objects of senses leads to the loss of all puruṣārthas (goals to be achieved in life). Having thus lost knowledge of Brahman and worldly knowledge, he enters (= is born in) immobile yonis—births e.g. a vegetable.

34. A person who desires to cross the dense darkness (of Samsāra), should not entertain attachment to anything whatever. For that attachment is extremely harmful to Dharma, Artha, Kāma and Mokṣa (the four puruṣārthas).

35. Even among these objectives of life, Mokṣa (Liberation) is acknowledged as the highest goal of life. For, the remaining goals of life, are always subject to the fear of death.

36. For the jīvas of the higher order (like Brahmā) and lower order like us who are created after the equilibrium of the three guṇas of Prakṛti was disturbed (at the time of creation), there is no security and happiness, as all their blessings and hopes (of attaining their objectives) are ruined by the All-powerful Time.*

* After verse 36, VJ. gives the commentary on 3 verses which are not noted by other commentators. The Bhāgavata Vidyā Peeth, Ahmedabad edition does not give the text of those verses but only the commentary. Hence they are not included here.
37. Therefore, Oh King, you realize that you are (the same as) the Lord (the only existing reality)—the Lord who manifests himself and directly shines everywhere in the Self as antaryāmin (the inner controller) in the hearts of all mobile and immobile jīvas who are covered (i.e. invested) with body, sense-organs, vital airs, intellect and ego (ahāmkāra).

38.* I take shelter with the Supreme Soul who is eternally free, extremely pure, highly enlightened, Reality itself and who has overpowered the Prakṛti (primordial nature) contaminated by Karmas (of various jīvas), and in whom appears this universe of superior and inferior things (or of cause and effect) as Māyā, which disappears due to (the dawn of) discriminating wisdom like (the dispelling of) the misapprehension of a garland of flowers as a serpent.

39. You (therefore) take resort to Lord Vāsudeva as your asylum—Lord Vāsudeva, through devotion (and concentration) on the splendour of petal-like toes of whose lotus-feet the saintly devotees so easily cut the knot of the egoism (ahāmkāra) formed at the heart by karmas, that even recluses and ascetics who have cleared their mind (of all worldly thoughts and kept it vacant) and have controlled their senses, are unable to do so.

* VR. emphasizes the point that the Lord is not directly affected by Karmas, ignorance etc., but it is through the jīva (kṣetrajña) which is his body (as he is the antaryāmin) that he experiences these.

106. *aropam. VD. treats this as a pun: a-rapam who is beyond fight; If you do not resort to Vāsudeva, you will have to battle with your sense-organs which by their brute majority will defeat you.

(ii) VR. treats the last two lines of the verse as qualifying the saintly devotees who meditate on nothing else but the Lord and who control themselves.

(iii) VC.—Viḍāsa-bhaktivā—through the devotion to the ever-increasing beauty of petal-like toes of the lotus feet of Vāsudeva and bhakti i.e. devotion, is both the means and the end.

OR: Through worshipping in a rich way; or Trough meditation over or memory of his toes.
40. There is a great trouble here to those who have not resorted to the Lord as a boat for crossing the ocean of samsāra which is infested with crocodiles in the form of sixfold [passions viz. kāma (desire), krodha (anger), lobha (avarice), mada (con- ceit), moha (delusion), matsara (jealousy) or the mind and five senses]. For they desire to cross it (samsāra) by painful means (e.g. practice of Yoga). You should therefore make the adorable feet of Lord Hari as a boat and reach the other end of this impassable ocean of samsāra easily without any diffi- culty.”

Maitreya said :

41. The king to whom the real nature of ātman (Soul) was thus expounded by Sanatkumāra, the son of god Brahmā, the knower of Brahman, praised him appropriately and enquired.

The king said :

42. Oh venerable Brähmaṇa! Lord Hari is compassionate to the afflicted. He had formerly conferred his grace upon me. You all have now come to consummate it.

43. Your venerable Selves, merciful as you are, you have translated into reality the blessing in its entirety. Everything that I possess, including my own self, belongs to the saintly souls who have graciously returned it to me as a favour. What can I give to you?

44. My life, wife, sons, houses with all their furnishings, kingdom, army, earth, treasury—everything is offered to you although it already belongs to you.

45. And a person who is well-versed in Vedas and Śāstras really deserves to command an army, (to rule over) a kingdom, to direct military operations and to govern all the world.

The duties pertaining to God being the reverse of samsāra, the knot of ahamkāra formed by karmas is very easily cut asunder, while the recluse control their senses—an impossible task, an evidence of their dull-wittedness. It is easy for the righteous Bhaktas to destroy ahamkāra but it is not possible for sannyāsins to achieve, for they being vacant-minded are ‘intellectless’ while the bhaktas have their mind filled with God. Bhaktas enjoy the beauty etc. of God to the full.
46. A Brāhmaṇa eats his own food, wears the clothes belonging to him and offers his own belongings. It is through his (Brāhmaṇa's) grace that Kṣattriyas and others enjoy their own food.

47. You are past-masters in the Vedic lores. In your discourse about ātman (and other spiritual matters), you have succinctly and definitely explained to us the nature of the Lord as above. Abounding in mercy as you are, may you be forever pleased with your action of redeeming the afflicted. Who can return your obligations except by folding his palms in reverence or (become an object of ridicule in his supposed attempts to repay your kindness)."

Maitreya said:

48. Those masters of ātma-yoga (the Yogic path of self-realization) were worshipped by the first monarch Prithu. They appreciated his righteous character and rose up to the heavens while people were looking on (agape).

49. Prithu (the son of Vena), the foremost among great Souls, became firmly established in his Soul due to concentration achieved by their instruction in the spiritual lore. He felt as if he had achieved all his desires in life.

50. It was as an offering to Brahman that he performed all his actions at the proper time, at the proper place, to the best of his ability, according to proper formalities, according to his means and property.

51. Thus with concentrated mind, he consigned the fruit (of his deeds) to Brahman. He remained unattached by regarding his Self as distinct and beyond Prakṛti, a mere witness to all actions.

52. Just as the Sun (remains unattached and unsoiled by the objects on which it shines), the king, though leading the life of a householder and endowed with imperial majesty and splendour, remained free from egotism (aḥamkāra), and hence unattached to the objects of the senses.

53-56. While he was, in this way, doing his prescribed duties properly and in time, with his heart fixed on his ātman (Self), he begot through his queen Arcis five sons who were resembling and agreeable to him. They were Vijitāsva, Dhūmrakeśa, Haryakṣa, Dravīṇa and Vṛka. But Pṛthu was a part of Lord Viṣṇu. For the protection of the created world, only Pṛthu combined in him (and manifested) powers of all loka-pālas (protectors of worlds like Indra, Varuṇa), from time to time as was necessary (according to the exigency of the situation). He bore significantly the title Rājā by delighting his subjects with his thoughts, words and deeds, and pleasing Soma-like (saumya) qualities as if he was another king Soma (the Moon or the Soma—juice—which has rājā as its epithet). Like the Sun (evaporating water from the earth and collecting it in clouds), he levied taxes from the world only to give it back to the people (for their welfare) and governed them (as the Sun gives light and heat to them).

57. By his majestic splendour he was unassailable like Agni (Fire-god); he was unconquerable like the great Indra; in forebearance he was like the earth; he was like the heaven (Swarga) in granting desired objects to his subjects.

58. Like the rain-god he showered to the satisfaction (of his subjects) all that they desired; like the (unfathomable) sea, he was too deep to be understood; in his firmness he was like Meru, the king of mountains.

59. He was comparable to Yama-dharma, in dispensing punishment; in marvellousness (in scenes, findings of ores etc.), he was like the Himālayas. He had rich treasure like Kubera (The god of wealth). He possessed immense undivulged treasures like Varuṇa.

60. In physical strength, force and energy and in his ability to move anywhere he was like Vāyu. In his irresistibility he was comparable to god Śiva.

61. He was a compeer of the god of Love in beauty; in spiritedness he was like a lion; in fatherly affectionateness he was like Manu; while in his lordship over man, he was like god Brahmā.

62. He was Brhaspati in his knowledge of Vedas, while in self-control he was like Lord Hari himself. While he was comparable to himself only in his devotion to cows, Brāhmaṇas, preceptor, votaries of Hari and in qualities like modesty, humility, good nature and work for the benefit of others.
63. As his glory was loudly sung by people everywhere in the three worlds, he reached the ears of women just as Râma entered the ears of the saintly people.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

Prthu’s penance and ascension to Heaven

Maitreya said:

1-3. The self-controlled son of Vena, (Prthu), the protector of subjects, had made the arrangement of fostering his creation, (viz. by founding of agriculture, and of human habitation like cities, villages etc.). He provided for the livelihood of the mobile and immobile creatures. He supported the practice of religion (dharma) by pious people. He carried out the mission of the Lord for which he was created in this world. One day, finding himself to have grown very old, he entrusted to his sons his daughter-like earth which was as if crying due to separation from him. Unattended by any one (servant), he retired to the penance-forest along with his queen while the subjects became depressed in mind and dissipated.

4. Without any interruption in the observance of rules of self-discipline, there too he began to practice a course of austere penance, highly approved by Vânaprasthas with the same zeal and determination which he showed formerly in the conquest of the world.

5. He lived upon bulbous and ordinary roots and fruits, and occasionally on dry leaves. For some fortnights, he took water only, and thereafter, he subsisted on air (only).

6. In the summer, the warrior-sage practised paścâgni sādhana (in which one has to sit in the Sun and in the midst of four burning fires in four directions around). In the rainy season, he exposed himself to the downpour of rain. In the winter he stood immersed in cold water upto the neck and slept on the bare-ground (all through the year).

7. He practised endurance, controlled his speech and sense-organs, he observed celibacy and mastered prāṇāyāma (breath-control). He practised the most austere type of penance with a desire to propitiate Lord Kṛṣṇa.

8. Due to the practice of that austere penance, which gradually reached perfection, his balance of Karmas became exhausted and he became pure in mind. By means of Prāṇāyāma (breath-control), all the six passions were completely subdued and the bondage (of vāsanā) was cut asunder.

9. Prthu, that prominent person, worshipped the Supreme Man by that very highest Yoga which venerable Sanatkumāra explained to him as the best path to ātman.

10. As the righteous king was performing the duties sacred to the Lord and was unceasingly exerting himself with faith, he developed complete devotion to the glorious Brahmāni exclusively.

11. His (Prthu's) mind became purely Śāttvic (without any admixture of other guṇas like rajas and tamas) through adoration and service of the Lord. He attained to knowledge combined with renunciation—knowledge which became sharpened by his devotion which went on increasing continuously through constant remembrance and comprehensive realization of the Lord's greatness. It is with such knowledge that he tore off the sheath called jīva—110—the knot of egotism (ahaṅkāra) in the heart—which is the basis of doubts and misapprehensions.

12. When his concept of self-body identification was dispelled and he realized the real nature of his Soul, he became desireless and disinterested even in the mystic yogic powers (like animā, laghimā etc.) that were acquired by him. He gave up the attempt to attain the knowledge wherewith he

110. Jiva-kosa—the subtle body (liṅga sarīra) with its internal and external organ—VJ.

VC.: To Prthu, whose mind became purely Śāttvic by service of the Lord, the knowledge of the science of Brahman (Brahma vidyā) combined with non-attachment, manifested itself. Real votaries of God are so much attracted by the sweetness of Bhakti that they discard Brahma vidyā which automatically comes to them, and they destroy without any effort their subtle body (liṅga deha) through their intense devotion. It was the impatience of Prthu to go to Lord's region to serve him directly that he accepted Brahma vidyā to destroy his upādhi (limiting condition) of jīva-kosa.
tore off his sheath (called jīva or egotism which is source of doubt). For so long even a recluse (exerting on the path of Yoga) does not feel devotion and attachment for the stories of Lord Kṛṣṇa, he will not cease to be attracted by the Yogic discipline (and mystic powers attained by Yoga).

13. Thus at the time of the end of his life, the great hero concentrated his mind firmly in the Supreme Soul and stabilising himself in Brahman, he cast off his mortal coil.

14. He closely pressed both his heels on his anus. He slowly forced up his vital airs (from the mūlādārā cakra). He held vital airs up (progressively) at the navel and then at heart, chest, the throat and the head, i.e. the place between the eyebrows, (i.e. through the following cakras or mystical plexuses: Manipūra, manas or Solar plexus, anāhata, viśuddha and ājñā).

15-16. By degrees he conducted up his breath up to the crown of his head and made it occupy Brahma-randhra (the aperture in the crown of the head through which the Soul escapes on its leaving the body). Freeing himself from all desires, he merged the wind element in the body with the outer Vāyu element, the earth element (solidity in the body) with the Prthvī (earth) element, the vacuum (in the apertures constituting sense-organ) with the cosmic element ākāśa (ether) and the liquid in the body with the element water—each in its own source. (For his own knowledge) he then contemplated the merger of cosmic elements (as follows: )—earth into water, water into fire, fire into wind and wind into the cosmic ākāśa (which is the product of Tāmasa ahaṁkāra—ego of Tāmasa type). This process is called Laya-cintana contemplation of (the happening of) the process of absorption.

111. kāle—When the fund of his karmas—Prārabdha—was exhausted —VR., VJ.
112. Brahmabhūtaḥ—(i) He became like Brahman by the manifestation of eight attributes—VR.
(ii) He realised that he depended on Brahman—VJ.
113. A mystical plexus situated between the anus and the organ of generation.
114. For details about these cakras vide: Sir John Woodroffe—Serpent Power; and Leadbeater—The Chakras.
17. * He absorbed the mind (implying presiding deities as well) into the senses, the senses into the subtle elements from which they severally emerged. These (the ether, the senses and mind merged into subtle elements as described above) he carried higher still and he contemplated the above objects along with ahankāra (I-ness) as merged in the Mahat tattva (the principle of cosmic intelligence).

18.  He (Prthu) merged the Mahat, the ground of all guṇas (evolutes) into jīva conditioned by Māyā. By the power of his knowledge and renunciation, Prthu—still a jīva conditioned by Māyā—became established in the pure Brahmahood and cast off the conditioning Māyā attached to the Self.

19. His wife, the great queen Arcis, though too delicate to touch the bare ground with her feet, followed him to the penance-forest.

20. Though she (queen Arcis) became extremely emaciated due to her intense devotion in participating in the austere observances (such as sleeping on the bare ground) and religious duties of her husband, by rendering personal services

---

115. For the mind is drawn by the senses in the world of varied experiences and hence it is said to be absorbed in them.

* VJ. interprets this according to the general law of merger (laya) viz. the effects are to be absorbed into the cause. Thus the senses are merged into the Taijasa-ahankāra. Its presiding deities in those of the presiding deities of Vaikūrka ahaṁkāra and their bodies into the Vaikūrka ahaṁkāra. The elements Prthu etc. along with their qualities like smell, touch etc. are absorbed in the Tamasa ahaṁkāra (bhistādi). These three types of ahaṁkāras (along with senses etc.) merge into the Mahattattva (Principle of cosmic intelligence). And Rudra, the presiding deity of ahaṁkāra, is absorbed into god Brahmā, who presides over the Mahat.

 VR: (The last two lines): Prthu who was practically free from the effects of the karmas, realised the Supreme Being in himself. By dint of his knowledge and renunciation, he became free from the remaining karmas. He thus became liberated, established in his own essential nature.

VJ. refutes the idea of Liberation of adasitism. The process of Prthu’s liberation was as follows: Prthu merged Brahmā, the presiding deity of the Mahat into Lakṣmi and the principle Mahat into unintelligent Prakṛti. Lakṣmi with Prakṛti was absorbed into Hari. By force of his knowledge and dispassionateness, Prthu did this and attained the Śāyujja form of Liberation.

VC. : Prthu became a Pārśada (attendant) of the Lord in Vaikuṇṭha.

GD. : Prthu was able to abandon his subtle body (Liṅga-saṅkara).
to him and by leading the sage’s way of life (such as subsisting on roots, fruits etc.). She did not feel any affliction, as she was satisfied with the loving regard and affectionate touch of her beloved husband’s hand.

21. Having observed that the body of the protector of the earth, her own beloved husband, became completely devoid of consciousness, life etc., the pious lady wept for a while and got it placed on the funeral pyre on the ridge of the mountain.

22. She bathed in the waters of the river, performed the prescribed rites. Having given libations of water to the departed Soul of her husband, the performer of noble deeds, she paid obeisance to the celestial gods who had assembled there to witness her self-immolation, she went round the fire three times and meditating on the feet of her husband, entered the burning funeral pyre.

23. Seeing the chaste lady perform self-immolation after her husband, Pṛthu, the great hero, thousands of goddesses who were competent to confer boons, began to praise her, along with their consorts.

24. They showered flowers on that peak of the mount Mandara. While the celestial trumpets were blowing, they spoke (in praise of her) to each other.

Goddesses said:

25. “Oh! What a blessed wife is this who, with all her heart, served her husband, the king of kings, just as Laks̄mī does to the Lord of Sacrifices (Nārāyaṇa).

26. Following her husband Pṛthu, this chaste lady really proceeds to regions higher than ours. Look! Arcis is going up beyond us, by virtue of her noble deed incomprehensible to the unrighteous.

27. What is verily difficult to be achieved by those mortals who, though the span of their life on the earth is uncertain, attain to spiritual knowledge (of actionlessness) leading to the region of the Lord (Liberation).

28. He is definitely deceived—a veritable enemy of his own Self who after great difficulty attains to the life as a human being, capable of leading to Liberation (Mokṣa), is attached to objects of pleasure.”
Maitreya said:

29. While the heavenly damsels (goddesses) were praising her, Arcis (the queen of Prthu) reached the region of her husband—the region which Prthu (the son of Vena) whose mind was concentrated on Lord Viṣṇu (Acyuta), and who was the foremost amongst those who realized the Soul, attained.

30. Of such glory and prowess was king Prthu, the Suprememost mighty monarch. I have described to you the history of the king of noble deeds.

31. He who, with faithful and attentive mind, reads, listens to or recounts this extremely holy life of Prthu, would attain to the region of Prthu.

32. By reading this, a Brāhmaṇa would become pre-eminent in Brahmanic lore, a Kṣattriya, the ruler of the world, a Vaiśya, the leader of his guild and a Śūdra (listening to it) would attain the most preeminent position (like a man of Sūta community).

33-34. After hearing this account thrice with faith and reverence, a man or a woman, if devoid of issue, becomes blessed with the best progeny, and if penniless, he/she becomes the wealthiest; An obscure person, attains good renown; a dull-witted one would become a scholar; this is a means of securing prosperity to men, averting evils and inauspiciousness.

35. It blesses with wealth, glory, longevity, heavenly blessings and removes the impurities of the Kali-age. Those who aspire after full achievement of the four puruṣārthas (goals of life) viz. Dharma (righteousness), Artha (wealth), Kāma (enjoyment of life) and Mokṣa (Liberation), should regularly and with faith listen to this story of Prthu which is the best means of securing puruṣārthas.

36. A king intending to undertake the conquest of the world starts his expedition after listening to this, the kings against whom he marches will receive him with tributes as was done to Prthu.

37. Even though one gets auspicious fruits mentioned above from listening to Prthu’s life, one who gives up all desires and bears pure, motiveless devotions to the Lord, should listen, narrate and read this holy life of Prthu, the son of Vena.
38. Oh Vidura (the son of Vicitravīrya), the story of Prthu which reveals the greatness of the Venerable Lord has been narrated to you. A mortal who devotes his mind to it, attains to the goal achieved by Prthu.

39. A person who devoutly listens to or narrates the story of Prthu everyday, becomes free from attachment and develops intense love and devotion to the Lord whose feet serve as a boat to cross the sea of worldly existence (samsāra).

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

(Pṛthu’s Descendants and the Hymn of Rudra*)

Maitreya said:

1. Vijitāśva, the son of Prthu, was an emperor of great renown. He was affectionate to his brothers. He distributed to each of his younger brothers each direction (of his kingdom to rule).

2. The sovereign gave the eastern quarter to Haryakṣa; assigned the southern direction to Dhūmrakeśa; he appointed

* This chapter gives the following genealogy of Prthu.

Prthu

Vijitāśva alias Antardhāna

Haryakṣa Dhūmrakeśa Vṛka Dravīṇa

Havirdhāna Pāvaka Pavamāna Śuci

Barhiṣad or Gaya Śukla Kṛṣṇa Satya Jita-vrata

Pracīna barhis

Pracetās (10 sons of the same name).

V.P. confirms this genealogy except about the number of Prthu’s sons. According to V.P. 1.14.1, Prthu had only two sons Antardhāna and Vādin. Vṛka and Ajina instead of Satya and Jita-vrata are the brothers of Pracīnabarhis (V.P. 1.14.2). The hymn of Rudra is a new contribution in the Bh.P. and it is not in V.P.
(his) brother named Vṛka to the western quarter, and gave the fourth direction (the North) to Draviṇa.

3. Vijatāśva obtained from Indra the power of making invisible movements and came to be designated as Antardhāna.
He had three sons by (his queen) Śīkhaṇḍinī who were highly beloved by all.

4. They were former firegods by name Pāvaka, Pavamāna and Śuci who were born (as human beings) by the curse of Vasiṣṭha, and who subsequently regained their godly status by practice of Yoga.

5. Antardhāna who did not kill Indra even though he knew that Indra stole the sacrificial horse,116 got Havirdhāna
(a son) by his (another wife) Nabhasvatī.

6. Looking upon kingly duties, such as exacting tributes, inflicting punishment, levying taxes, as harsh and ruthless, he relinquished them under the pretext of undertaking a long sacrificial session.

7. Even there (while engaged in the sacrificial session), the king who realized his Self, worshipped the Supreme Soul who is perfect and annihilates the afflictions of his devotees, and attained to His region, by pure and perfect meditation.

8. From Havirdhāna, (his queen) Havirdhānī begot six sons viz., Barhiṣad, Gaya, Śukla, Kṛṣṇa, Satya and Jita-vrata.

9. Oh descendant Kuru (Vidura) ! Barhiṣad, the eldest son of Havirdhāna, the most fortunate lord of men (Prajā-pati) was a pastmaster in sacrificial lore as well as in the science and practice of Yoga.

10. (He was called Prācinabarhis as) the surface of the whole earth was covered over with Kuśa grass with their ends pointing to the east, for he went on performing sacrifices (successively) one after another, each close to the place reserved (used) for the previous sacrifice.

11. On the advice of Brahmā, the god of gods, he mar-rried Śatadruti, the daughter of the presiding deity of Seas.
She was still a girl but beautiful in every part of the body. In the marriage ceremony, when she went round the fire, beautifully decorated with ornaments, the firegod (himself) became enamoured of her, as he did in the case of Śuki.\textsuperscript{117}

12. Gods, demons, celestial singers (Gandharvas), sages, Siddhas (a tribe of demigods), men and serpents were captivated by the young married girl, with the melodious jingling of her anklets ringing in all directions (while she walked).

13. Prācinabharhis had ten sons called Pracetasas, from Śatadruti. All of them bore the same name, observed the same vows and were equally well-versed in religion (or Dharmaśāstra).

14-15. When ordered by their father to beget children, they entered the ocean to perform penance. They propitiated the Lord of Penances (Hari), by undergoing austere penance for ten thousand years. With perfect self-control, they (all the while) meditated on and worshipped him, repeating (to themselves) what was imparted to them by Lord Śiva, whom they saw (revealed to them) on the way, conferring his grace on them.

\textit{Vidura said}:

16. Please narrate to us, Oh Brāhmaṇa, how the meeting between the Pracetasaś and Lord Śiva took place on the road, and tell us what advice of deep import was he pleased to impart to them (out of his grace).

17. Sages, freeing themselves from all attachments have been meditating on Lord Śiva as their coveted goal. Hence contact with the Lord is very difficult, for embodied beings in this world, Oh Brāhmaṇa sage.

18. Though finding delight in his Self, Venerable Lord Śiva accompanied with his terrible Śakti (power of destruc-

Śuki—According to all commentators, except V.J., this refers to the episode when the seven Sages were conducting a sacrificial session, Fire-god was overcome with passion at the sight of their wife. Svāhā, the wife of Agni (Fire-god) assumed the form of that lady and satisfied him. She then assumed the form of a female parrot (Śuki) and deposited his semen in a clump of grass. V.J. thinks that Śuki was a princess who was abducted by the Fire-god through lust, while she was going round the fire. In the case of Śatadruti, he could not physically do so. Hence he loved her on the mental plane only.
tion) moves about in the world for the proper maintenance of the world-order.

Maitreya said:

19. Receiving their father’s command reverentially (lit. on their heads), the pious Pracetāsas set their minds zealously on practising penance and proceeded towards the West.

20. They saw a very big lake, slightly smaller than the sea in expanse. It was crystal-clean like the mind of the noble Souls, and abounded in happy aquatic beings.

21. It was (as it were) a rich mine of blue and red lilies, lotuses that blossom by night, by day and by twilight and blue lotuses (indīvara). It was resounded with the warblings and notes of (waterbirds like) swans, cranes, ruddy geese and ducks (Kāraṇḍava).

22. It was surrounded by lush growth of trees and creepers which were thrilled with the sweet musical humming of intoxicated bees. It presented (as if) a festive occasion (celebrated) by the winds, by scattering of the pollen from lotuses, in all directions.

23. The Princes were wonderstruck to listen to the celestial, classical vocal music of Gandharvas ravishing the mind—music which followed the playing of instrumental music of tavors (mṛdanga) and Paṇava.

24-25. At that very moment, they noticed Śiva, the foremost among gods, coming out of that lake, along with his attendants. His complexion was like a mass of red-hot gold. His throat was blue-coloured. He had three eyes. His smiling countenance showed his inclination to shower his grace (on his devotees). His glory was being sung by the followers of gods (like Gandharvas and Kinnaras). As curiosity was

118. VR. thinks that the ends of creepers intertwining trees were the hair standing on their ends in the case of the trees which heard the music. While VC. and GD. regard the thick clusters of buds on them as the result of the thrill of the music.

119. marga and dēśi are styles of singing. marga is the classical style (cf. Vālmiki Rāmāyana I.4.36 aghyatad mārgaviddhānasampradāb).

aroused in them, the Princess bowed down to him as soon as they saw him.

26. The Venerable Lord (Śiva) who removes the afflictions of his devotees (seeking his shelter), and who loves righteousness, was pleased with those (Princes) who were experts in religion, possessed high moral characters and who were happy (to see him). He spoke to them.

Śri Rudra said:

27. You are the sons of Vediṣad (Barhiṣad). I know what you intend to do. May you be blessed. (It is) for conferring grace on you that I have revealed myself to you.

28. He is certainly dear to Me, who, completely submitting himself, has directly resorted to Venerable Lord Vāsudeva who is beyond the subtle Prakṛti consisting of the three attributes (Sattva, rajas and tamas) and also the entity called jīva.121

29.* A person conscientiously and firmly devoted to his own righteous duties, attains to the position of god Brahmā after hundred births, and reaches me if possessed of still more excessive merits. But a votary of Lord Viṣṇu, after the end of this mundane body, attains to the region of Lord Viṣṇu which is beyond saṃsāra, just as we (Rudra and other divinities) do after the termination of our office (and dissolution of our subtle bodies).

30. You, votaries of the Venerable Lord (Viṣṇu), are as dear to me as the Lord himself. And to the devotees of the Lord, no body else than me, is more dear anywhere.

31. This is a sacred and highly auspicious hymn leading to the Final Beatitude. This should be constantly repeated

121. : He is superior to the principle known as Lakṣmi designated here as jīva and tāmas.

*VJ. differs ...after enjoyment of the status or region of Brahmā, the jīva goes to Lakṣmi which is not subject to change. It is in the Pralaya stage that all come to the Omniscient Lord.

 Please listen to what I tell you. It should constantly be repeated (to oneself). It explains how the Supreme Soul is distinct from Prakṛti and Puruṣa. Hence it is sacred and auspicious inasmuch as it secures the Puruṣārthas (Dharma, Artha, Kāma) and is a means to Liberation. Hence I am narrating it to you—VR.
secretly (in strict privacy). I shall now relate it to you. Please listen (attentively)

Maitreya said:

32. Lord Śiva whose heart is full of compassion and who is fully devoted to Nārāyaṇa, spoke (the following words) to the Princes who were standing with folded palms before him.

33. "Victory to you, Oh Lord! Your victory is for the attainment of the blessedness of the Self, by the pre-eminent ones among those who have realized the Soul. May I too (thereby) attain to the state of blessedness! You eternally abide in the highest blissful nature. Hence I bow to you, Supreme Soul who is immanent in all.

34.* Salutation to the Lord who has a lotus (constituting the universe) springing up in his navel; who is the controller (lit. Soul) of the subtle elements (sanmātras) and the sense-organs; who is (the first and foremost Vyūha or manifestation of the Lord called) Vāsudeva,¹²² (the presiding principle or the ruler of citta—Reason); who is absolutely tranquil, self-refulgent, the unchangeable Supreme Soul abiding in (and controlling) all beings.

37. I bow to him who is the gateway to the heaven as well as to the Liberation (Mokṣa); who ever abides in pure hearts. I pay obeisance to the Fire-god (whose energy is gold), who is the means of performing sacrificial activities (for which services of four sacrificial priests, viz., Hotā, Adhvaryu, Udgātā and Brahmā are essential) and who promotes the continuity of the (tradition of the) sacrifice.

124. Hṛṣikesendraśātmāne—Master of sense-organs and whatever belongs to Indra who presides over the mind and senses—VJ.
125. āparipakhaṁśāya : (i) One who destroys from himself as well from his devotees the impurities of Karmanas whether merit or sin—VR.
(ii) One who completely removes the doubt of his devotees like Sanaka and others by imparting real knowledge to them—SD.
126. pūrvāya—(i) Who pervades (everything) both internally and externally—VR.
(ii) Who assumed full-fledged incarnations like Nṛsiṁha, Rāma—SD.
127. niḥśrātmāne—One whose all desires are fulfilled or achieved—or—VR.
VR. records a v.l. —nirṛśśātmāne—One who is unaffected by sorrow.
* VC. (2nd half) : Oh Lord, the Soul of the Sun-god! Direct my eyesight to the beauty of your (the Lord’s) personality. May the inherent light of this Sun purify me. I bow to you. Cf. supra III 26.28.
 Just as you direct others to the path of karma, direct my power of speech for performing your kirtana form of devotion.

(ii) Who secures the continuity of the race, or All-pervading—VJ.
38.* Salutation to him who, as Soma is the food of manes (piṭras) and gods, is the Lord of Three Vedas (viz. Rg, Sāman and Yajus), and is the semen (essence) of sacrifice. My obeisance to you who in the form of water, give satisfaction to all jīvas.

39. I bow to him who is the body of all the Souls (ātmans) or living beings; who is in the form of the earth; who forms the Cosmic Body (Virāṭ); who, as the Vāyu—the deity of vital airs and wind—sustains the three worlds, and forms the power of the mind, senses and body.

40. I pay obeisance to him who as ether (through its attribute called Sound) serves as an index (to the existence)

---

* (i) VR.: I bow to him who as an Inner Controller dispenses fruits of karmas; who as the food of Piṭras and gods brings satisfaction to them; who is the protector of three Vedas and is the fruit (seed) of sacrifices; thus he reveals the means of attaining to heaven (Śvarga—including worldly pleasures on the earth) and Mokṣa; who is the giver of pleasures to jīvas from the contact with objects of senses and all kinds of tastes.

(ii) VC: Oh Lord in the form of Soma, the food of Piṭras and gods! By repaying the debt (obligations) to gods, sages and Piṭras, please fix up my heart in devotion (to you) and may the lustre of Soma purify me. Oh Lord in the form of fluids! Please develop in me taste for your essential sweetness. May my tongue and humids in my body be purified. I pay obeisance to you.

(iii) GD: The Lord, in the form of rasa (fluids) is bowed to create proper ability in the tongue to taste the sweetness of divine grace.

 (i) VR.: Salutations to him whom everything insentient and all sentient beings serve as a body; who is gross (Virāṭ) and of the form of Prthivī and its characteristic quality—fragrance.

(ii) VJ: Obeisance to him who abides in everyone as the Soul, thumb-like in stature; and who staying within the earth makes her most important.

(iii) VC: Oh Hari in the form of the Earth! Direct my sense of smell to your divine fragrance and my body to your service. Oh Hari in the form of Vāyu! Make my sense of touch appreciative of the tenderness of your person and make my body, senses and mind capable of worshipping you.

 (i) VJ: Bow to him the correct means of knowing whom is Śāstra or Veda; or who is the cause or source of Puruṣārtha (the highest objective in human life); who is unattached like ākāśa (ether); who sanctifies all; who is light itself; who abides in all deities or who gives sacred regions like Śvarga etc.
of all things and are the basis of the concept of differentiation between the internal and external. I bow to him who forms the regions of great ref fulgence (called Svarga etc. and which are attained by great meritorious acts).

41. I bow to you who are both Pravṛtti karma (acts pertaining to worldly activities or saṁsāra) leading to the region of manes (Pitṛs), and the Nivṛtti karma (the discontinuance of worldly acts) the means of attaining to the region of gods. (Bow to you) who are the god of Death, (which is) the fruit of unrighteousness which causes pain.

42. Salutations to you, Oh Lord! You are the source of all blessings. You are the Manu (or all-knower and the embodiment of Mantras). I bow to you in the form of Kṛṣṇa who is the highest righteousness incarnate and whose intelligence is unobstructed (anywhere); who is the ancient-most Puruṣa (person), the master of the path of knowledge (Sāṅkhya) and of Yoga.

43. You are the Lord Rudra who is the presiding deity of ahamkāra (ego) and who possesses the threefold potencies (of being the doer, the instrument and action). I bow to you (Oh Brahmā!) who are the embodiment of knowledge and action, and who are the source of (four kinds) speech (viz. parā, paṭyanti, madhyamā and vaikhart). My obeisance to you.

44. Be pleased to bless us who are earnestly desirous of seeing you, with your vision which is highly adored and esteemed by the devotees of the venerable Lord (i.e. you). Please reveal to us your beautiful form which is so dearest to your votaries, and which, forming the objects of enjoyment of all senses simultaneously, delights them all (or which delights all senses by its numerous qualities).

45. Your form is lovely, bluish and resplendent like the rainy cloud. With its four long graceful arms and winsome face with beautiful and well-shaped features, it is as if a synthesis (lit. a treasure-house) of beauty in everything.

46. Your form has eyes (charming) like the inner petals of lotus, beautiful eyebrows and shapely nose, excellent rows of teeth, attractive cheeks and mouth with symmetrical ears beautifying it.

(II) VC.: In these verses one's own elements, senses and mind are made prone to the devotion of the Lord. After adoring Lord, the Lord is bowed to as having the form of the Vaikūṭha.

47. With side-long looks as if smiling with love, your form is beautified with flowing locks of hair. It is clad in silken garments, (yellowish) like lotus-filaments, and is adorned with a pair of polished earrings.

48. It is also decorated with a brilliant crown, bracelets, wreaths of pearls, anklets and a girdle. It is extremely magnificent by its conch, discus, mace, lotus, garland of sylvan flowers and excellent jewels (of various kinds).

49. Its shoulders which resembled those of a lion, are shining with lustre of necklace, earrings (and other ornaments). Its neck appears beautiful with the refulgence of the Kaustubha gem. Its bosom on which rests permanently the goddess Śrī (in the form of Śrīvatsa) far outshines the (dark coloured) touchstone bearing a streak of gold on it.

50. Its belly is like the leaf of an aśvattha (Indian fig-tree) in shape, and appears beautiful with its threefold heaving due to his inhalation and exhalation of breath. Its navel is so deep like a whirlpool that it is as if withdrawing again the universe (to its source) through it.

51. On the dark-blue waist (of Your form) the (yellow) silken loin-cloth fastened with a girdle of gold, appears all the more resplendent (by contrast in colours). Your form is extremely handsome to look at due to (its pair of) symmetrical and beautiful feet, shanks, thighs and depressed knees.

52. You dispel the darkness (of ignorance) in our hearts by the rays of light emanating from the nails of your feet(toes) which are beautiful like the petals of autumnal lotus. Pray reveal to us your form, our asylum, which removes the fear (of your devotees). Oh Master! You are the preceptor to guide us who are groping in the dark.

53.* This form of yours should be constantly meditated upon by those who earnestly desire to purify their hearts. For

* (i) VR. : Pray reveal unto us your form as an object of meditation (and not sākṣāt-kāra—perception). The Yoga of meditation leads to the Yoga of devotion.

(ii) VJ. : Self-purification means liberation from sātrīvāra. For this mere performance of our righteous duties according to our varṇa (caste) the path of devotion brings fearlessness (or final beatitude) unto those who perform their respective religious duties.

54. You are difficult to be attained by all embodied beings (who are not your devotees). You are sought after and respected by the ruler of heaven—Śvarga. You are the goal of them who exclusively seek Self-realisation. You are accessible only to them who are full of devotion.

55. You are very difficult to be propitiated. Having propitiated you, with exclusive devotion which is difficult to be found even in the righteous people, who will covet for anything else than an asylum at your feet?

56. Even though the god of death destroys the universe by the movement of his eyebrow—an index of his majestic power and energy—he does not wish (to exercise his authority on) him who has resorted to your feet as shelter.

57. I do not regard the heaven (Śvarga) as well as final Beatitude (Mokṣa) as equivalent to companionship for the duration of half a moment with the devotees attached to the Lord. What of the blessings of mortals.

58. Now, let this be the favour conferred on us: May we be blest with the association of those who have washed away their sins internally by immersing their Souls in the (stream of the) glory of the Lord, and externally by bathing in the sacred waters of the Gaṅgā flowing from the Lord’s holy feet which absolves one of all sins, and who are compassionate to all beings and have their minds free from passions like love, hate etc., and are endowed with virtues like straightforwardness.

59.* The contemplative sage whose mind is completely purified by being blest with the path of devotion (in association and Ātman (stage of life) is not enough. This observance of duties developing into and combining therewith intense devotion leads to Liberation.

(iii) V.C.: Mere knowledge of karmas is not sufficient. Bhakti-yoga is absolutely necessary for those who observe their respective religious duties. A Śādhaka desirous of removing his avidyā, should meditate upon this form till a gets a vision of it.

* V.C.: The mind is specially purified in the association of your devotees. Such pure mind enjoys the beauty of your sports (īlā). The ten defects or ‘offences’ against bhakti (devotion) or nāma (God’s name) do not arise. The goddess of Bhakti confers her blessings and such a contemplative Soul visualises God’s sports in his pure heart.
tion with such devotees of God) and is neither distracted by external objects nor lost in the dark cave of ignorance,¹³⁰ soon perceives your real nature easily and properly.

60.* You are that superbly effulgent Brahman in whom this universe is manifested and who appears shining in everything and who is all-pervading (and unaffected or unattached) like the sky.

61. Oh Lord! Your Māyā assumes various numerous forms. By this (Māyā) you create, sustain and again destroy the world as if it were real. But you remain changeless (all the while). Your Māyā creates the notion of difference (in others), but has no control or effect on you, the Supreme Soul. Hence we know you to be absolutely independent.

62. This form of yours is indicated as their controller by the bhūtas (five elements e.g. Earth, Water, Fire etc.), (conative and cognitive) sense-organs and the mind. Those (karma)—yogins¹³¹ (the followers of the Path of Action), who devotedly worship this very form properly, by means of various ritualistic acts, for the attainment of Siddhi (final emancipation), are verily the past masters in Vedas and Āgama-Śāstra (Tantric-lore).

63. You are the only One, primeval Person with your potency (called Māyā) lying dormant. When it is activated through her, (the three guṇas viz.) sattva, rajas and tamas become differentiated (and combined). From it are evolved this universe (consisting of) (the principle of cosmic intelligence called) Mahat, ahamkāra (ego), (elements such as) the sky, ¹³⁰. VJ. reads differently: Whose mind enters the Soul who abides in cave of the heart.

*VJ: This verse points that Brahman (the support) and the universe are different; that his supreme effulgence shows that he is unaffected by ignorance or nescience and his comparison with the sky indicates his limitlessness.

¹³¹. yoginah—(i) VR.: For Liberation (Mokṣa) the followers of the path of knowledge (jñāna-yoga) devoutly worship this form of the Lord, by performance of righteous duties specifically prescribed for their āśrama and dharma. They do these properly and without any attachment or longing for the fruit of the action.

(ii) Followers of Bhakti-yoga—GD.
wind, fire, water and earth, as well as gods, sages, multitudes of living beings.

64* By a portion of yourself, you have entered the bodies of four types which you have created by your (Māyā) power. It is, therefore, that they call him Puruṣa i.e. one who abides in the body. He is the jīva who through his senses enjoys the (drops of) honey (insignificant pleasures) collected by bees. (This shows his negligible nature.)

65. Though you are as described above, your real nature is inferrable (as its direct perception is not possible). (At the time of the dissolution of the world) you exhibit very terrific velocity sweeping off one element by another; You (ultimately) destroy the world just as a hurricane of irresistible force scatters away and sweeps off a multitude of clouds.

66. Just as an alert serpent, licking (its lips) with hunger, suddenly seizes a rat, you, as vigilant Death, surprisingly catch hold of a person who, absorbed in the anxiety of what to do and how to do, has become extremely negligent, is extremely addicted to sensual pleasure and has grown over-greedy.

67. What wise man who regards his life (lit. body) wasted by disregarding (i.e. not remembering) you, will give up your lotus-like feet—feet which my father Brahmā has been

* VR.: The Lord is known as Puruṣa as he is the antaryāmin of jīva in whom he enters and controls.

VJ.: By a slight portion he enters the bodies of four kinds (e.g. viviparous, oviparous etc.) and through the senses of the jīva he enjoys only the essence of bliss. Hence as he abides in the body, he is known as Puruṣa.

VC.: The word sāragha indicates that the so-called pleasure is really pain (the sting of bees).

SD.: He who enjoys the insignificant pleasures of senses, the fruit of actions, is called jīva and is bound and he who abides in the body and is free, is the Puruṣa.

132. caturvidham: ŚR. enumerates them as follows:—(i) jatāyuja (viviparous); (ii) andaja (oviparous); (iii) svadaja (sweat-born); (iv) udbhija (germinating as a plant). According to VR. they are:—(1) gods; (2) men; (3) subhuman beings; (4) immovables.

adoring through fear (of bondage of samsāra) and which the fourteen Manus have been worshipping without arguments (with implicit belief).

68. Oh Brahman! Oh Supreme Soul! The whole universe is overwhelmed with the fear of Rudra (the destroyer of the universe). To us who are wise, you are our asylum completely free from fear.

69. Oh Prince! While you carry out your righteous duties with a pure heart and with your mind concentrated on the Lord, you repeat this (hymn). May God bless you!

70. (Please do) worship Hari, extolling and contemplating him again and again, as Hari is the Supreme Soul abiding in you as well as in all other beings.

71. Please commit to memory the hymn called * Yogādeśa* which you have received from me. Observing the vows of a sage’s life and concentrating your minds, all of you study this reverentially.

72. With a desire to create the world, the venerable god Brahmā, the Lord of all the progenitors of the universe, formerly taught this (hymn) to us, his sons e.g. Bhrgu and others who were intent on augmenting procreation.

73. When we, all the progenitors of creatures, were urged to create beings, we dispelled our ignorance by (repeating) this hymn and procreated various species of beings.

74. Hence, if a person who is devoted to Vāsudeva, repeats this hymn with faith and concentrated mind, he would before long obtain blissfulness.

75. Knowledge leading to the final beatitude is the highest of all blessings. It is by the boat of knowledge that one easily crosses the impassable sea of misery (i.e. samsāra).

76. He who with perfect devotion and concentration, studies this hymn in praise of the Lord sung by me, propitiates Lord Hari himself who is otherwise so very difficult to be pleased.

77. As the Lord is the sole receptacle of all blessings, a man with a steady mind who highly delights the Lord (by praising him) with this hymn sung by me, immediately gets whatever blessings he likes.
78. A man, who, rising up early at dawn, and with a heart full of devotion, hears this or recites this to others with folded palms, is released from the chains of karmas.

79. Oh princes! By repeating with concentrated mind this praise of the Highest Person, the Supreme Soul, sung by me, you do perform this great penance at the end of which you will obtain your desired object.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

*(The Story of Purāñjana—Introduction)

Maitreya said:

1. Having thus instructed Pracetasa, the sons of Barhiṣad, Lord Śiva who was devoutly worshipped by them, immediately disappeared at that very spot, while the Princes were simply looking on.

2. Repeating the hymn in praise of the venerable Lord, as sung by Rudra, all the Pracetasa princes standing in water, practised penance for ten thousand years.

3. Oh Vidura! In the meanwhile (while Pracetasas were undergoing austere penance) the compassionate Nārada who knew the reality about the Supreme Soul, (visited and) reasoned with (their father) Prācinabarhis who was attached to and was preoccupied in ritualistic Vedic acts, (as follows):

4. "Oh King! What bliss do you attempt to secure by the performance of ritualistic acts? That which removes miseries and secures happiness is (called the real) bliss. And (according to the wise) such beatitude is not expected from the karmas."

* The story of Purāñjana is an allegory on jīva and Paramātman. (Cf. the allegorical reference to the jīva and Śiva as two birds occupying the same tree, one enjoying the fruits and the other staying aloof—Mund. Up. 3.1.1 and Svet. Up. 4.6) The commentators explain the allegory at every step in details.

It is interesting to compare the interpretation of the allegory given by the commentators with that given by the author of the Bh. P. himself in chapter 29 (infra).
The King said:

5. "Oh blessed Sir! My mind is distracted by the ritualistic karmas. I do not know the supreme bliss. Please initiate me in that pure knowledge whereby I can be free from (bonds of all) karmas.

6. In the householder's life which is characterised by deceitfulness, a person looks upon his sons, wife and wealth as the sole objectives in life. Such ignorant persons, wandering in the pathways of saṁsāra (transmigration of the Soul), never attain the Supreme Bliss.

Nārada said*:

7. Oh Lord of men! Have a look at those multitudes of living beings mercilessly slaughtered by you in thousands, as beasts (consecrated) for sacrifice.

8. Remembering your cruelty (to them), they are waiting for you. When you will be dead, they, with their ire aroused, will pierce you (through and through) with their steel-like horns.

9. On this point, I shall narrate to you this ancient legend. Listen to the story of Purañjana as I tell you.

10. Oh King, there was a king of wide fame, by name Purañjana (i.e. Jīva). He had a friend called Avijnāta (i.e. the Supreme Soul) as his activities were unknown.

11. The king wandered over the earth in search of an abode. When he did not find any suitable asylum, he became rather dejected.

12. Seeking after pleasures, he did not approve of any of the cities that existed on the earth as suitable for the realization

* By his Yogic powers Nārada showed to the King the huge multitudes of beasts slaughtered by him for sacrifice—ŚR.

133. Prthivi—This indicates the universe—ŚR., VR. karma-bhumī—VJ.

134. Saranam—Body through which the jīva gets experience in life.

135. Although he (the jīva) gets sensual pleasures in all births, he is not satisfied as non-attachment, which is the means of the Liberation (Mokṣa) is not possible in non-human births. Hence his dejection—GD.
of those pleasures.\textsuperscript{136}

13.* Once upon a time, he saw, on the table land in the southern range of the Himālayas, a city having nine gates and possessing all the characteristics of a good city.

14. It was surrounded by ramparts, gardens, watchtowers, moats, windows, arched gateways. It was crowded on all sides with houses with crests of gold, silver and iron.

15. It appeared resplendent like Bhogavati,\textsuperscript{137} in beauty, with floors of its mansions studded with precious stones like sapphires, crystals, cat's eyes, pearls, emeralds and rubies.

16. It appeared beautiful with assembly halls, courtyards, main roads (highways), gambling houses, markets, resthouses, flags and fluttering banners and platforms built of coral.

17. Outside the city, there was a park full of celestial trees and creepers. There was a lake resounding with warbling sounds of birds and humming of bees.

18. The bank of the lotus pond was richly beautified with trees the foliage and branches of which were fluttering with the cool breeze laden with spray from the cascades and blowing over the flower beds.

19. It was safe and free from molestation as the multitudes of wild animals infesting it were observing ascetic vows (e.g. non-violence etc.). The traveller feels that he is invited there, by the cooing of the cuckoos.

20. In that garden, he (King Purañjana) saw a young \textsuperscript{136} There is no possibility of enjoying all the earthly and heavenly pleasures in non-human species. Hence his disapproval—ŚR. Cf. tābhya gām ānayat tā abruvan na vai no'yam alam etc. Ait. Up. 2.2.

*In Bhāratavarṣa, to the south of the Himālayas, he saw the city (human body) which was free from disabilities and handicaps like blindness, deafness—ŚR.

The limbs or sense-organs of the body are the ramparts etc. The plexuses (cakras like dhiśva etc.) are the houses. The three types of turrets or house-crests are the guṇas viz. satva, rajas and tāmas—ŚR.

\textsuperscript{137} Bhogavati: Literally—a place for enjoyment of pleasures, but it is generally derived from bhoga 'serpent's body'. It is the name of the city of snakes in the lower-regions, famous for its beauty.

The lady is the intelligence (buddhi) and the ten attendants are the conative and cognitive sense-organs and the hundred (i.e. hundreds of) activities or utsīs of each are the wives.—ŚR.
damsel of superb beauty coming there by chance. She was countained by ten servants each of whom was the husband of hundred ladies.

   21. She was guarded on all sides by her bodyguard, a serpent with five hoods.138 She was sixteen years of age, beautiful or capable of assuming any form she liked. She was in search of a husband.

   22. The girl had a shapely nose, beautiful rows of teeth, lovely checks, attractive face and was wearing lustrous earrings in her symmetrical ears.

   23. She put on a reddish-brown garment round her waist with a girdle of gold around it. The dark-complexion-ed139 lady with well formed hips walked with her feet making a tinkling sound with the adorning anklets.

   24. Out of bashfulness, she was (now and then) covering with the end of her garments. her symmetrical, closely knit, round (spherical) breasts indicating the advent of youth.
She was walking (in the stately gait) like an elephant.

   25. Being (as if) wounded with the arrows of her charming side-long glances, shot from the bow of her eyebrows making lively amorous movements, the hero (Purañjana) spoke in soft winsome tones to the girl who looked all the more lovely by her bashful smiles.

   26. "Who are you, Oh beautiful lady with eyes like the lotus-petals? Whose (relative) are you? Whence have you come here? Oh timid lady, please tell me what you desire to do here on the outskirts of the city?"

   27. Who are these ten attendants commanded by the formidable warrior, forming the eleventh? Who are these beautiful damsels? Who is the serpent who goes ahead of you, Oh lady with beautiful eyebrows?

   28. Are you the goddess Hrī, Pārvatī or Sarasvatī
(the goddess of speech) or the goddess Lakṣmī leading the life of a sage in this secluded forest seeking a husband who must have surely got all his wishes fulfilled as your feet are desired

138. This is Prāṇa of five vital functions—ŚR.
139. ŚR. quotes the following from the Chānd. Up. to explain the darkness of complexion: annamayam hi somya mana iti yat kṛṣṇam tad annasya / by him?

29. Oh lady with beautiful thighs, you are surely none of these deities as you touch the earth (with your feet). You should, therefore, adorn this city along with me (who am) an excellent warrior of great exploits, just as goddess Lakṣmī as the consort of Lord Viṣṇu (the Lord of Sacrifices) graces Vaikunṭha (the highest region).

30. Please show favour to me, Oh graceful lady, as the mind-born god of love, prompted by you with the playful movement of your eyebrows and your bashful smile expressing love, is harassing me by piercing my heart with your sidelong looks.

31. Oh lady with bright smiles! Please raise up and show me your sweet speaking face with beautiful eyebrows and eyes of bright, charming pupils—your face which is covered with locks of long dark-blue hair—as it is not turned to me through bashfulness."

Nārada said:

32. Oh warrior! The lady was infatuated with Puraśrijana, the hero who was courting her so impatiently and (in response) greeted him with a smile.

33. "Oh prominent man, we do not know properly who is your or my progenitor. No, do we know the family or the name (by which we are called?)

34. We know that we are here today, now. We do not know beyond that. Nor do we know who created this city which is my abode, Oh warrior.

35. Oh respectful one, these men and women, who are my friends, stay awake while I am asleep. So does this serpent guarding this city.

36. Leave aside the details about my name, family etc. Oh destroyer of enemies, I am glad that you have come.

---

140. According to most commentators: But the alternate explanation "who must... wishes fulfilled as his feet are desired by you" is worth considering.

141. ŠR., presumably reads nāksya and interprets deśīvā (having seen).
God bless you! Whatever sensual pleasures you desire, I shall secure for you with the help of my kinsmen.

37. Please occupy this city of nine gates, enjoying for hundred years all the sense-pleasures which I shall secure for you, Oh Lord.

38. For, whom else than you should I really please—him who is ignorant of erotics or pleasure, void of learning or wisdom, careless about tomorrow’s work (i.e. his life here) and heedless about his life hereafter, a sheer brute.

39. Here (in the life of a householder) one attains to purusārthas called dharma (righteousness), artha (wealth) and kāma (pleasures of the senses). It is here that one gets the joy of getting progeny, immortality (i.e. Liberation—Mokṣa), fame and regions which are free from sins, sorrow—which even recluses do not know.

40. They, the sages of old, say that in this world, the stage of householder’s life is the only asylum for the well-being of manes (piṭris), gods, sages, men and all other beings and of the householder himself.

41. Oh warrior, what girl in my position (lit. like me) would not accept as a husband a famous, munificent, good-looking, loving personage like you.

42. Oh mighty-armed hero! What woman’s heart in this world would not cling to your arms which are (tender yet powerful) like the body of a serpent?—You move about in the world in order to remove the mental anguish of the helpless by your smiling looks full of compassion.”

Nārada said:

43. Oh King (Prācīnabarhis)! In this way the couple entered into a mutual agreement there. They then entered the city and lived in happiness for a hundred years.

44. Sweetly eulogised by bards everywhere, and playing in company of women, he entered the (swimming-) pool in the hot season.

45. For (the convenience of) the movements from and to the outer regions, of whosoever (unknown) was the master of the city there were seven gateways in the upper (i.e. front-) part of the city (viz. two eyes, two ears, two nostrils and a mouth) and two in the lower part (the anus and the penis).

46. There were five doors to the east (front, viz., two eyes, two nostrils and one mouth), one to the South (the right ear), one to the North (the left ear) and two to the west (viz. the penis and the anus). I shall describe to you the names of these, Oh King.

47.* To the East were constructed adjacent a pair of gates called khadyotā (fire-fly) and Āvirmukhī (of manifest face—bright light). Through them he (king Puraṇjana) accompanied by his friend Dyumat, used to visit the country called Vibhrājit.

48. A pair of adjacent gates called Nalinī and Nālinī were also built to the east. Through them he (Puraṇjana) in company of Avadhūta, goes to the region called Saurabha (Fragrance).

49. The fifth gate to the east was called Mukhyā (the main). In association with Rasajña and Vipaṇa, the king of the city goes through the gate to the countries of Āpaṇa and Bahūdana.

50.† On King (Barhisad)! Through the southern gate of the city called Piṭhū, Puraṇjana, in accompaniment of Śrutadhara used to go to the country called Southern Paścāla.

51.†† By the northern gate of the city, known as Devahū, Puraṇjana along with Śrutadhara, used to go to the country called Northern Paścāla.

52. To the west of the city was the gate called Āsurī (pertaining to asuras—people indulging in sensual pleasures). In company of Durmada, Puraṇjana used to go to the country called Grāmaka (low or vulgar pleasures).

* Description of the eyes.

 Description of the nose.

 Herein Āpaṇa signifies speech, and Bahūdana denotes variety of food. Vipaṇa thus stands for the organ of speech and Rasajña, for the capacity of the tongue to taste—ŚR.

†† Devahū is the left ear. It leads to the region of gods by following the Devayāna Path.
53. There was another gate to the West. It was called Nirṛti. Through it Puraṇījana went to the country called Vaiśasa (terrible), in company of Lubdhaka (a miser).

54. Out of the citizens (there were) two viz. Nirvāk (speechless) and Peśaskṛta (possessing no aperture). With these the lord of senses made movements of walking and doing.

55. If he goes to his harem (viz. heart) along with (his friends) Viśūcīna (the chief of attendant in a harem), he experiences delusion, calmness and (excitement of) joy, from wife and children.

56. The unwise king (Puraṇījana) who was thus deeply attached to karmas (action) and whose mind was completely given up to sensual pleasures, was enraptured and whatever the queen wished to do, he acted accordingly.

57. Sometimes when she used to drink wine, he used to drink and get intoxicated. Sometimes when she took meals, he took it with her; when she chewed, he did the same.

58. Sometimes when she sang, he used to sing; sometimes he wept when she shed tears; sometimes he followed her while she laughed; sometimes when she chattered, he prattled.

59. Sometimes when she ran, he ran; he stood when she stood. When she lay in bed, he did so; sometimes when she sat up, he also sat up.

60. Occasionally, when she heard, he heard; when she saw, he also saw it; sometimes she smelt, he also smelt; when she touched, he used to touch.

61. Sometimes when the wife cried in sorrow, he wept after her like a man in distress; when she rejoiced, he rejoiced; on her being delighted, he was delighted.

62. In this way, he was deceived by the queen and lost his original nature (such as non-attachment to everything). The ignorant King though unwilling, simply imitated (the acts of his queen) helplessly like a domesticated monkey kept for amusement.
CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX

Purañjana's Hunting Expedition and His Queen's Wrath Pacified

Nărada said:

1-3.* One day, Purañjana, clad in the armour of gold and equipped with a mighty bow and an inexhaustible quiver (of arrows) and accompanied by his eleventh general, mounted his chariot fit for speedy marches. It was yoked with five horses; had a pair of shafts, two wheels, one axle, three flagstaffs, five cords, only one rein, one charioteer, one seat, two central poles to which yoke is fixed, five covered litters and sevenfold protection, capable of five kinds of movements and provided with instruments of gold. He set out for the forest called Pañca Prastha (Forest of five hills).

*ŚR., VR, SD., GD., GS., BP. regard verses 1-10 as the description of Purañjana in the state of dream. Only VJ. thinks this as a state of wakefulness (jāgrat-avastha-praveśa).

According to ŚR., the allegory becomes clear when we understand the following:
The chariot=His body in the dream.
Five horses=five cognitive senses.
Two shafts=The notions of I-ness and Mine-ness.
Two wheels=merits and sins.
One axle=Pradhāna (Primordial Nature).
Three flagstaffs=Sattva, rajas and tamas.
Five cords=Five vital breaths (Prāṇa, apāna etc.).
One rein=the mind.
One charioteer=The intellect.
One seat=the heart.
Two poles=grief and delusion (Soka-mohav)
Five recesses=Five objects of senses.
Seven-fold protection=Seven constituents of the body.
Five kinds of movements=Five conative organs.
Gold armour=Rajoguna.
The big bow=Attachment.
The inexhaustible quiver=Infinite tendencies associated with ego (ahamkāra).
One general=The Mind.
The Pañca-prastha forest=Five objects of the senses (e.g. sound, smell etc.)

VJ. explains differently (only differences are noted here):
While coming to the state of wakefulness, Purañjana entered the stage through the five senses for the purpose of possessing various objects.
4.* Being carried away by the passion for game, the proud king left behind his wife who did not deserve that treatment. Taking a bow and arrows, he started a-hunting there.

5. Taking to Asura (demonic) way of life, he became hard-hearted and merciless. He killed (all) the wild animals in the jungle with his sharp arrows.

6. Even if a king is extremely fond (of hunting), it is restricted by the Sāstras, that (it is only) on religious occasions like special Śrāddhas as specified in the Sāstras and not for routine Śrāddhas that the king may kill just the required number of sacrificial animals in the jungle (and not more).

7. Oh Chief of Kings! A learned person who does his acts as prescribed by the Sāstras is not thereby affected due to the knowledge arising from the performance of that act.

8. Otherwise a person who does acts (in violation of the restrictions of Sāstras), becomes full of egotism and falls in the stream of guṇas (i.e. saṁsāra). Losing his faculty of discrimination and judgment, he goes down\textsuperscript{141a} (to lower grades of existence).

9. In the forest, there took place destruction of the afflicted animals whose bodies were shattered by arrows with variegated feathers—a sight unbearable to those whose hearts were full of compassion.

10.† After hunting down hares, hogs, buffaloes, bisons, deer, porcupines and many other (animals) irrespective of their fitness for being offered for sacrifice, he got exhausted.

His bow is the sacred syllable OM. The inexhaustible quivers are Pravṛtti and Niśprottī. Puruṣājana is the leader of the army of eleven (10 sense-organs, mind). One axe is the Vāyu—the common 'thread' or force impelling all activities. Five recesses or knots are the nādis or 'tubes' through which five vital breaths (prāṇas) circulate through the body.

*Puruṣājana ignored his reasoning faculty altogether and with a mad attachment to sensual pleasures, indulged in them indiscriminately—ŚR.

The allegory being thus clear, its application to each and every verse is not given here as it is unnecessary. Commentators, however, emphasize the inner meaning minutely rather than the story element.

These show how one should do one's duties without being bound down by their effects and how an ignorant person impelled by passions gets involved in saṁsāra.

\textsuperscript{141a} adha—to hell—VR., GD.
† The hunted animals are the permitted and prohibited pleasures enjoyed by the jīva.
11.* Then being exhausted with hunger and thirst, he retired from hunting and returned to his palace. Having taken bath and proper (sumptuous) meal, he lay on bed and was relieved of fatigue.

12. He got himself beautified with scents, cosmetics, flower garlands etc. Having got his person well adorned, he set his heart on the queen (his intelligence of sāttvīc type).

13. In his youthful pride, the King who was satisfied and in a gay mood, got his mind overcome with the passion of love, he missed his (charming) wife who helped him discharging his duties as a householder.

14. Oh King Prācinabarhis! Being rather frustrated, he asked the ladies in the harem, "Oh beautiful ladies, are all of you and your mistress, the queen, well as before?"

15. The splendour and wealth of the house do not appear as brilliant as before (because) if the house is bereft of the mother or the wife who treats her husband as a god, it is like a broken chariot (without wheels etc.). What wise man will stay in it, like a miserable wretch?

16. Where is that charming lady who, at every step, illuminated my intelligence and lifted me up (by cheering me), while I was being drowned in the sea of miseries?"

*According to ŚR., VR. and others, after describing the state of dream in verses 1-10, the author describes the happy life of a man with sāttvīk buddhi to the end of the chapter.

VJ. regards the remaining chapter as the description of the state of sleep thus: Being thoroughly tired of gross and violent mental activities, he retired from the state of wakefulness to his asylum viz. hṛdaya-nādi. Removing the dust of enjoyments in the stage of wakefulness and eaten his meals (his own blissful nature), the jīva sleeps fully relieved of fatigue.

VJ. : This describes the preparation before going to sleep. Materials of decoration are for the worship of the Lord (the antaryāmin) to whose presence the jīva goes in deep sleep. His thought of the queen is the change from deep sleep to the dream-state.

When the jīva is under the influence of rājast buddhi, he will not find this sāttvīk buddhi—ŚR.

(ii) In the dream-state the jīva does not find the conclusive understanding about Haśi (nīcaya-jñānān na'pāiti)—VJ.
The ladies replied:

17. "Oh King (Lord of men), we do not know what your beloved intends to do. You see (for yourself) that she is lying on the bare ground, Oh destroyer of enemies."

Nārada said:

18. Puraṅjana who had lost all his knowledge (power of discretion and judgment) through his fondness for his wife, became highly agitated and distressed to see her lying stretched (that way) on the ground.

19. With an aching heart, he tried to soothe her with soft, pleasing words. But he did not get any indication (in her behaviour) that it was a feigned anger of his beloved queen towards him (due to love).

20. Being expert in the art of conciliation, the hero gradually cajoled her, touched her feet and seating her on his lap he caressed her.

Puraṅjana said:

21. Really unfortunate are those servants on whom, though they have committed an offence, their masters do not inflict any corrective punishment, thinking that they (servants) are after all under their control, Oh beautiful damsel.

22. Punishment is a supreme grace shown by the master to his servants. Oh slim lady, it is only an intolerant fool who does not understand this as a friendly act.

23. Oh high-Souled lady with beautiful teeth and charming eyebrows! Please show to us who are your own, your face with prominently shapely nose and soft, sweet accentuated speech—face bright with smiling looks, bent down with the weight of love and bashfulness, adorned with bee-like dark locks of hair.

24. Oh queen of a warrior (like me)! I shall instantly inflict punishment on him who has committed any offence against you unless he be an earth-god (Brāhmaṇa) or a devotee of Lord Viṣṇu. Verily I shall see to it that he is not free from fear, much less joyous either in the three worlds or (even) beyond (wherever he may go, he shall die out of fear from me).

25. Never have I seen (before) your face without its tilaka mark (on the forehead) or your countenance so dull, cheerless, terrific with anger, unwashed and gloomy. Nor have I ever noticed your lovely breasts soiled with (tears of) grief and your lips red like Bimba-fruit, bereft of their saffron-colour.

26. Therefore be gracious unto me, who, being mad with the passion for hunting, have committed the offence of going out to hunt as per dictates of his whim (without taking your permission). What woman wishing to have a union would not accept for the proper duties her lover who has always been under her control and who has lost his patience by the vehemence of passion of love.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SEVEN*

(Invasion of Caṇḍavega—The Episode of Kālakanyā)

Nārāda said:

1. In this way, bringing Puraṇjana under her complete control by her womanly charms, Puraṇjani (the queen of Puraṇjana) enjoyed her life, giving delight to her husband, Oh great king.

2. When the queen who took her full bath and beautified herself with auspicious decorations, approached the king fully satisfied and with bright countenance, he hailed her with joy, Oh king (Pracīnabarhis).

3. Embraced by her, he threw his arms about her neck. He lost his reasoning capacity by the amorous sweet words of the queen in privacy. As he was thus possessed by the young lady day and night, he did not grasp the inexorably rapid course of time.

4. The magnanimous prince, being overwhelmed with lustful passion, lay on a very costly couch with the queen’s arm as a pillow. He regarded her as the supreme objective in life (puruṣārtha) and he did not think of his real transcendental self (or Brahman) as he was overpowered with Tamas (ignorance).

---

*This chapter describes the general course of saṃśāra with Puraṇjana as the representative jīva.

148. Or alternatively he did not know what was his and what was another’s.
5. Oh king of kings! While he was enjoying pleasures thus with his mind clouded with passion, his youth passed away as if it were half a minute.

6.* The emperor Purañjana begot through (empress) Purañjani eleven hundred sons. But he lost half of his life then.

7. Oh Lord of creatures! He (also) begot eleven hundred and ten daughters called Purañjanis. They brought glory to their parents and were endowed with qualities like good character and generosity.

8. That king of Pañcālas (Purañjana) got his sons, (all) capable of continuing the race of their forefathers, married to suitable brides and his daughters to proper bridegrooms.

9. And his son had each a hundred sons who have verily propagated the race of Purañjana in the Pañcāla country.

10. By the formation of a strong attachment (lit. sense of mineness) to (sons and grandsons), the shareholders in his property, house treasures and dependants (e.g. ministers, servants), he became firmly attached to the sense-objects.

11. Being prompted by various desires he became consecrated for sacrifices and worshipped gods, manes (pitṛs), Lord of the goblins with sacrifices terrible on account of slaughter of beasts, as your honour has done.

12. In this way, he remained remiss about his duties (spiritually) beneficial to him, and had his mind strongly attached to his family. Verily there came the period of life (old age) which is repellent to persons addicted to women.

13. Oh King Prācīnabarhis! There was a King of Gandharvas, known as Caṇḍavegā (signifying the complete year). The powerful king had a force of three hundred sixty Gandharvas (Gandharvas standing for days).

---

*Here 'eleven' signifies the ten sense organs and the mind. 'Hundreds' means innumerable activities of senses.

Daughters are the mental activities.

Jiva, the Lord of five senses, married his sons i.e. sense-activities to suitable brides, i.e. thoughts about what is beneficial or otherwise. His daughters i.e. mental activities were associated with virtues like modesty or proper objectives of pleasure.
14. Paired to (i.e. wedded to) them were similar (equal number of) Gandharva women (i.e. nights) some dark, some fair or white (according to the fortnights). By their rotational raids, they plundered the city furnished with all desired objects, since its creation.

15. When those attendants of Caṇḍavega began to plunder the city of Purāṇjana, Prajāgara, the serpent-guard resisted them there.

16. That powerful presiding deity of the city of Purāṇjana, single-handedly fought with seven hundred and twenty Gandharvas (male and female) for one hundred years (which is the duration of man’s life).

17. When his relative—the guardian-serpent—began to lose strength by his single-handed fight with many, Purāṇjana, along with kingdom, capital and relations felt very much distressed with great anxiety.

18. In the capital city of Paṇcāla he indulged in drinking and was under the thumb of women. While he used to receive taxes collected by his retainers, he was not aware of the danger.

19. Oh king Barhiṣad (Prācinabarhis)! There was a certain daughter of Kāla (the Time-spirit) who, being desirous of having a husband, toured over the three worlds. But nobody welcomed her.

20. Due to her misfortune she was well-known over the world as Durbhagā (the unfortunate). She was (once) sought after by the royal-sage, Puru, to whom she gave a boon.

21. One day while she was wandering, she met me when I descended from Brahmā’s region (satyaloka) to the earth. Being infatuated with passion, she sought me even though she knew that I had taken a vow of lifelong celibacy.

22. Getting enraged (at my refusal), she gave me an extremely unbearable curse; ‘Oh Sage, as you have set your face against my importunity, you will never stay at one place.'

23. The girl whose desire was so frustrated then followed my advice and approached the king of Yavanas,\textsuperscript{145} by name Bhaya (Fear or Death), and courted him as a husband.

24. "Oh brave warrior! I woo you, the leader of the Yavanas, as my coveted husband. The hope entertained by the creatures in you is never falsified.\textsuperscript{146}

25. Good people feel regret for those two (types of) foolish and perverse natured people who neither give nor accept what is offered without any request and which is worth giving or receiving according to custom or Vedic precept.

26. Therefore, Oh good Sir, accept me who am offering myself to you. Please be gracious to me. It is the bounden duty of man to be compassionate with the afflicted.''

27. Having heard the speech uttered by Kāla-kanyā (the daughter of Kāla), the lord of Yavanas, who desired to carry out the secret work of gods (viz., to bring about the death of living beings)\textsuperscript{147} spoke to her with a smile.

28. "With the help of my Yogic vision born of my power of meditation, I have foreseen and selected a husband for you (even if) this world does not welcome you as you are both disagreeable (undesirable) and inauspicious.

29. Adopting unmanifest and imperceptible way of movement, you enjoy (each and every being in) the world created by karma. You go in company of my army (of diseases and anxieties) and you will bring about the destruction of all living beings.

\textsuperscript{145} Yavanas signify physical pains and mental anguish.

\textsuperscript{146} VCl. takes bhūta as 'the devotee of god' and interprets:

The purpose of the devotees of the Lord is never frustrated'. Nārada intended that the 'Fear' (Bhaya) should grow old and weak by the marriage of Kāla-kanyā with him. His purpose should be achieved by my marrying you.

(ii) As Bhaya means Kāla (Death or Time) VD. adopts the second meaning 'Time' and explains: "A plan or determination made at the opportune (auspicious) time always bears fruit. I court you as you are the giver of fruit (success in undertaking) to all.''

\textsuperscript{147} Death is kept secret by gods, lest people should renounce the world.—Sr.
30. This Prajvāra (Fatal fever created by Viṣṇu) is my brother. You be my sister. Accompanied by both of you and my formidable soldiers (physical and mental ailments) I shall range this world imperceptibly."

CHAPTER TWENTY-EIGHT

(Puraṇjana's Rebirth as a Woman and Attainment of Liberation)

Nārada said:

1. Oh King Barhiṣman (Prācinabarhis)! Those soldiers of king Bhaya (i.e. diseases) who were the agents of fate, roamed over this earth accompanied by Prajvāra and the daughter of Kāla.

2. And all of a sudden, they swooped on the city of Puraṇjana on the D-day (on a certain day) and besieged the city, rich in earthly enjoyments, and guarded by the old serpent (i.e. the Prāṇa in old age whose physical activities became sluggish).

3. The daughter of Kāla also enjoyed perforce the city of Puraṇjana. Whatever man was overpowered by her, would at once become powerless.

4. The Yavanas (i.e. diseases) entered the city through all the gates from all directions and excessively ravished it, while it was being enjoyed by her (the body of the jīva is battered by repeated attacks of various diseases).

5. The city being (thus) devastated, Puraṇjana who identified himself with it as his own Self, and whose mind was troubled by his sense of mine-ness for his family (viz. intelligence, the mind, sense-organs etc.) underwent agonies of various kinds.

6. Clasped in the arms of the daughter of Kāla, bereft of his splendour and affluence, the wretched Puraṇjana whose mind was engrossed in sense-pleasure, lost his power of judgment and was forcibly deprived of his powers (viz. of making physical movements) by Gandharvas and Yavanas.
7. He saw that his capital city was completely razed and found that his sons, grandsons, attendants and ministers were antagonistic and disrespectful to him and his wife had lost love for him.

8. He found that he was in the clutches of the daughter (of Kāla) and that the Pañcālas were infested with enemies. He was lost in boundless anxiety and could not find any remedy against it.

9. The miserable king still hankered after the pleasures which were made stale (due to dyspepsia etc.) by the daughter of Kāla. He lost his affection for his son etc. here and his spiritual position hereafter, and continued in fondling his wife and sons.

10. Very reluctantly did the king proceed to abandon the city which was over-run by Gandharvas and Yavanas and was ravaged by the daughter of Kāla.

11. (At that time) there arrived Prajvāra (i.e. the high fatal fever) the elder brother of Bhaya (the chief of Yavanas). With a desire to render service to his brother, Prajvāra burnt down the entire city. (This indicates high temperature of the body).

12. When the city was aflame, the head of the family (Puraṇjana) along with his wife, children, dependents and citizens was greatly tormented.

13. When the city was occupied by the daughter of Kāla and his own home was surrounded by Yavanas, the guard of the city was greatly distressed when he was attacked by Prajvāra. (When the aged man is about to die, his body is in grip of diseases and the jiva is tormented every moment.)

14. When the serpent Prajāgara was not able to defend the city any longer there, he was violently trembling with severe agonies and he wished to escape from it (like a serpent) from the hollow of a tree ablaze with fire.

15. Oh King! When his limbs became weak and disabled and his prowess was thwarted by Gandharvas and he was surrounded by the inimical Yavanas, he verily wept bitterly.

16-17. The householder (Puraṇjana) entertained a false notion about his house etc. When the time of separation from his wife arrived, he became very miserable. Possessed with egotism and a false sense of mine-ness about his daughters, sons, grandsons, daughters-in-law, sons-in-law, attendants and whatever (little) remained of his house, treasures and belongings, he thought:

18. "When I have departed to the next world, how will this mistress of the family, being bereaved of her lord and lamenting for the children, carry on her life?

19. She is so devoted to me that she does not eat food until I have taken mine; nor does she take her bath till I have bathed. She gets terribly afraid, when I am angry; when reproached by me, she keeps quiet through fear.

20. When I become thoughtless, she brings me round (lit. wakens me) to the proper path. When I proceed on a long journey, she becomes emaciated through grief. True, she is the mother of heroic children. But how will she desire to carry on the householder's life (without me)—she will certainly die.

21. How can my miserable sons or supportless daughters possibly live when I am gone, as they are like unto passengers on a boat broken in the midst of the sea."

22. While he was thus lamenting like a mean-minded fellow which was unbecoming to him (as he was really the Brahman himself, the Yavana king called Bhaya with a determination to capture him, drew near him.

23.* When he was being dragged like a beast to his (destined) place by the Yavanas, his followers being extremely grieved, over-anxious and afflicted ran after him.

24. When the serpent which was blocked (by the Yavanas) escaped from the city to join (his master Purañjana) the city was completely razed and reduced to its elements.

25. Though Purañjana was forcibly dragged by the powerful Yavana, he was so much overpowered with tamas (ignorance) that he did not remember (Avijñāta) who was his former well-wisher and companion.

26. The sacrificial beasts which were ruthlessly slaugtered by him, remembered his cruelty and getting enraged cut him down with axes (or axe-like sharp horns).

27. He sank in bottomless darkness (hell). He lost his memory. Due to his sinful contacts with women, he suffered unbounded afflictions for eternal years.

28.* As he brooded over that very (virtuous) wife at the time of death, he was born later as a most beautiful damsel, the princess of (the pious king) Rājasimha of Vidarbha.

29. The Pāṇḍya king, Malayadhvaja, the conqueror of the cities of enemies, vanquished other kings in the battle and married the princess of Vidarbha who was offered as prize for bravery.

30. He begot from her one daughter of dark-blue eyes, and seven sons younger to her who became the kings of Dra-viḍa countries.

---

* ŚR. and VR. explain that brooding over a woman at the time of death results in birth as a woman. Purañjana thought of his virtuous wife at the time of his death and due to his good merits he was born in the pious family of Rājasimha of Vidarbha and got married to Malayadhvaja, a devotee of Viṣṇu. Both explain the pun on Vidarbha.

This allegory is explained differently by different commentators:

 (i) Purañjana was thus associated with a great devotee of Viṣṇu. For Malayadhvaja signifies an eminent votary in the southern country—Malaya—famous for Vaiṣṇavism. Pāṇḍya means one who deserves Pāṇḍā—intellect capable of deciding the truth.—ŚR., VR.

(ii) Malaya-dhvaja—one whose mind has attained serenity etc. by service of Hari. By means of yama, niyama he defeated and subdued his passionate senses (the imimlic kings). He is Pāṇḍya—one endowed with discriminatory intelligence. Para-purañjaya—conquerors of viṣayas or objects of senses. Vaiḍarbhī—keen intellect. Purañjana and Purāñjani brooded over each other at the time of their death and were born as Pramadottama and Malayadhvaja—VJ.

(iii) SD.: Malayadhvaja—famous in Bhāratavarṣa.
Para-Purañjaya—One who conquers, i.e. attains to Vaikuṇṭha.
Vṛṣṇa-paṇḍam—One available by good merits.

Jīva who was infatuated with Buddha (Intelligence) changed one body after another, once upon a time finds a spiritual preceptor leading to Mokṣa (Liberation).

 Allegory explained:

(i) ŚR., VR., GD.: dīmaja—Liking for the service of Lord Krṣṇa.

Dravida-bhāmi: The Dravida country is protected by devotion of the type of Śravaṇa etc.
31. Oh King, each one of them had hundred million sons, whose descendants will enjoy this earth for one Manvantara and more.

32. Agastya married the first-born daughter who was constant in observance of vows. Through her was born Dr̥ḍhacyuta who had sage Idmavāha as his son.

33. The royal sage Malayadhvaja distributed the land, among his sons. With a desire to propitiate Lord Kṛṣṇa he retired to the Kulācala mountain, viz., Malaya.

34. The Princess of Vidarbha with bewitching eyes abandoned her palaces, sons and pleasures and ran after the Pāṇḍya king (Malayadhvaja) like the moonlight following the Moon.

35. There flow three rivers viz., Candravasā, Tāmraparṇī and Vaṭodakā in that region. Every day he washed off both his internal (mental) and external (bodily) impurities with the holy waters of the rivers.

36. He performed austere penance by subsisting on bulbous roots, seeds, roots, fruits, flowers, leaves, blades of grass and water. (Thereby) his body got gradually emaciated.

37. He conquered the pairs of opposites like cold and heat, wind and rain, hunger and thirst, agreeable and disagree-

In association with devotees of Viṣṇu, a desire to serve him is treated and it is followed with seven kinds of bhakti or devotion viz. Śravaṇa (study of scriptures), Kirtana (singing Lord's praise), Smarana (remembering him—his name), Pādaśvāna (serving his feet) arcaṇa (worshipping him), vandana (laying oneself prostrate before him). The Dravida country is famous for votaries of Viṣṇu.

(ii) V.J. names the seven sons as follows: Virāga (renunciation), Viṇaya (discipline), Dāna (charity), Dhairyā (courage), Asp ardhaṇa (non-jealousy), Vīveka (discrimination), Dama (self control).

148. Different interpretations of the allegory:
Agastya: (i) The mind (ŚR., VC., GD., SD.) (ii) One desirous of Mokṣa VR. (iii) A devotee of Viṣṇu (VJ.).

Dr̥ḍhacyuta: (i) Devoid of any desire for even hereafter such as Satya-loka—ŚR.

(ii) Who has absolutely no attachment for sons etc. (VJ).

(iii) One not attached to any pleasure here and hereafter—VC., SD., GD.

Idmavāha: (i) Desire to worship the feet of the spiritual preceptor for initiation and obtaining the Lord's grace—ŚR., VR.

(11) Desire to be a pupil of a spiritual preceptor—VJ.
able, pleasure and pain, viewing them with equanimity of mind.

38. He burnt down his passions by austerities and knowledge. He conquered his senses, breath (Prāṇa) and mind by observing religious vows and rules of self-discipline called Yama and Niyama. He reflected over the identity of his Soul with Brahman (lit. He united his Soul with Brahman).

39. He sat motionless like a post at one and the same spot for a period of a hundred celestial years. As he bore intense love and devotion to Lord Vāsudeva, he ceased to be conscious of anything else (even of his body).

40.* He realised within himself, the Self as pervading (and illumining) his own body and mental activities and being distinct and different from them. Just as in a dream, one is witness to (and is therefore different from) mental activities (for example the scene of oneself being beheaded in the dream). And hence he verily ceased to participate (in any activities).

41-42. Oh King! By the light of pure knowledge which radiates its light in all directions—knowledge which was imparted to him by venerable Hari as his preceptor—he realized himself as within (i.e. identical with) the Supreme Brahman

---

*(i) Malayadhvaja realized Paramātman, the Seer, to be different due to his pervasiveness and his body as ephemeral as a dream and devoted himself solely to Paramātman—VR.

(ii) He reasoned with himself and realized the Supreme Soul as present within his own Self and as all pervasive yet distinct from everything else. Thus renouncing saṁsāra he became liberated while alive (jīva: muktyavasthām āpa)—VJ.

(iii) Due to smarāṇa-bhakti (constant remembrance of God) he felt deep love for the Lord. And he realized him to be shining everywhere in all directions. But feeling him to be distinct and different from himself, he was overcome with the intense feeling of separateness and was fainted in a swoon—VC.

(iv) He realized his Self as knower and his body etc. as transient. He became unattached to everything else except his Self.

(i) In his religious meditation (upāsanā) he realized that his individual Soul (antarāyāmin) to be identical with the Supreme Brahman. He continued his upāsanā to the end of his life.—VR.

(ii) He set aside the false view about the identity of jīva and Paramātman—VJ.
and the Supreme Brahman within himself that way. Ultimately he lost this consciousness (of identity) and (like a fire, fuel of which is burnt down) he automatically ceased to belong to samsāra (i.e. became liberated).

43. Oh King! At that time the Princess of Vidarbha (Malayadhvaja's queen) who looked upon her husband as a god, renounced all pleasures and affectionately waited upon her husband Malayadhvaja, the knower of the highest form of religion.

44. Clad in dark garments, emaciated by observance of vows and with her hair on the head matted, she appeared in the company of her husband like a smokeless flame near flameless fire (of live charcoals).

45. Not being aware of the expiry of her beloved-most husband who was firm in his sitting posture (even after death), the lady approached him and waited upon him as before.

46. When, while serving the sect of her husband she did not feel any warmth, therein she got terrified in her heart like a doe which has strayed away from her herd.

47. Finding herself miserable and friendless, she was overcome with grief and lamented (her fate). Bathing her breasts in tears, she wept loudly in the jungle.

48. "Arise, Oh royal sage, arise. You should protect the earth engirdled with seas, as she is afraid of robbers and apostate and wicked Kṣatriyas"

49. Lamenting thus loudly, the lady who followed her husband to the forest, fell at his feet wailing and shedding profuse tears.

50. She piled up a funeral pyre of fuel. Placing her husband's body on it, she set it on fire. Weeping (all the while) she determined to follow him in death (by burning herself along with his body).

(iii) He realised that the whole—the Supreme Brahman, comprised of the part (the individual Soul) and vice versa. He (thereby) gave up thoughts about samsāra and became liberated —SD.

(iv) Oh! How wonderful is the power of Bhakti as Mukti (Liberation) is dependent on Bhakti—GD.
51. (At that time) there appeared an old friend of hers, a Brähmana who had mastered his Self. Soothing the lady with sweet consoling words, he spoke to the weeping lady (as follows):

_The Brähmana said:

52. Who are you? Whose (daughter) are you? Who is this man lying down for whom you are weeping? Don’t you recognize me as your friend with whom you used to roam about formerly (before the creation of the universe)?

53. Friend! (Even if you do not recognize me) do you remember yourself as having a friend called Avijnāta and that you being given to earthly pleasures, left me in search of some place.

54.* Oh noble Sir! You and I were swans, friends, living in the Mānasa lake. For a period of one thousand years (while the great deluge lasted), both of us were without any abode.

55. Oh brother? You whose original nature was that, left me and with your heart set on carnal pleasures, you went down to the earth. While roaming there, you saw a place built by a certain woman (Māyā).

56. It was provided with five gardens, nine gates, one guard, three surrounding walls, six families (of merchants), five market places. It was constructed with five materials, and was ruled by a woman.

57. The gardens are the objects of senses; the nine gates are the openings (viz. two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, one mouth, the penis and anus) for Prāṇa (who alone works as a guard). Fire, water and food are the surrounding walls, and the group of five sense organs and the mind are the families (of merchants).

* (i) _Hamsa_ means one who has annihilated all agitations or emotions (_ḥinaṣṭi nirayati vikārān iti hamsaḥ_). They are by nature deathless and untouched by pleasures of senses. Enjoyment of pleasure to _jīva_ is due to _upādhi_ (conditioning)—VR.

(ii) Oh learned one! Both of us are _hamsas_ which are by nature free from all impurities. Our abode is the Mānasa lake (i.e. knowledge). We have lived together for thousands of years. The memory of previous birth is aroused as a result of the accumulated merits. —VJ.

58. The market places were the five conative organs; the five elements constituted the imperishable materials and the power i.e. Intelligence was the ruler. Under her dominance the man who enters this abode loses his Self consciousness in deep sleep.

59. Being overcome with (the charms of) the woman there, you enjoyed yourself in her company and forgot the memory of the previously known fact (your original status of being the Brahman). It is due to your association with her that you have been reduced to this wretched condition, Oh Lord.

60. You are not the daughter of the king of Vidarbha. Nor is this warrior your friend. Nor are you the husband of Purāṇjanī by whom you were interned in the city of nine gates.

61. It is really the illusion created by me that you regard the man (Puraṇjana in the previous birth) as the virtuous woman—(Vaidarbhi in this birth). You are neither. We are hamsas (pure spirits). Please see (realize) our real nature (course).

62. I am identical with you. You are not other than me. Please note that you and I are one. Wise men never see even the slightest difference or distinction between us.

63. Just as a man finds his one Self as divided in two in (his reflection in) the mirror and in the pupils of eyes, similarly is the difference between us two.

64. In this way, the hamsa (swan) from the Mānasa lake i.e. Īśva who was awakened (was made to realize his original state) by his fellow swan, became established in his own real nature. He regained the memory of his original nature which was lost due to his separation from him.

65. Oh Barhişman! This knowledge about the Self has been explained to you in an indirect manner; for the venerable Lord, the creator of the universe, likes to remain beyond the ken of senses.
CHAPTER TWENTY-NINE
(The Purañjana allegory explained)

Prācīna-barhīs said:

1. Oh divine sage! (The implication of) your speech is not clearly understood by us. Sages (with spiritual knowledge may) grasp it (correctly) but not we who are deluded by ritualistic karmas.

Nārada explained:

2. One should understand Purañjana (creator of the city) as the embodied Soul (or jīva); for it is he (jīva) who builds his own city, i.e., body, having one, two, three, four or many feet or no foot at all.

3. The friend of Puruṣa (jīva) who is called Avijnāta (the Unknown) is Īśvara (Himself), for he is not known by men as being endowed with names, actions or attributes.

4. When the jīva desired to enjoy all the attributes of the Prakṛti (i.e. material objects of pleasure) in their entirety, he thought that (out of those bodies) the human body, provided as it was with nine entrances, two hands and two feet, as the most suitable one.

5. One should understand the young damsel Purañjani as the intellect (Buddhi) which creates the notion of I-ness and mine-ness. It is by presiding over (i.e. identifying himself with) Buddhi that the jīva in this body enjoys sense objects by means of sense-organs.

6. The male companions (of Purañjani) are the group of (ten) conative and cognitive sense-organs which bring about knowledge and action. (Her) female friends are the activities of the senses. The (five-hooded) serpent is the Prāṇa (vital breath) with its five-fold activities.

7. One should understand Bhṛdbala (the eleventh powerful hero attending upon Purañjani) as the Mind, the leader (and controller) of both kinds of senses and that the Pāñcālas are the five sense-objects, in the midst of which is situated the city of nine gates.

8. Two eyes, two nostrils, two ears, the penis and the anus are the four pairs of adjacent gates, with the mouth (as the ninth). Out of these Prāṇa goes out (to the particular sense object) in association with (the faculties of that) particular sense-organ.

9. The pairs of eyes, nostrils and the mouth are the five gates in the east (i.e. the front of the head). The right ear is regarded as the south gate and the left ear as the north gate.

10. The two opening gates in the lower parts of this are the western gates and these are called here the anus and the penis. Khadyota and Āvir-mukhī, the two gates that are constructed at the same place adjacently in this city, are (known as) the eyes. By means of the power of seeing possessed by these, the Lord of the body (Puraṇjana or Jīva) perceives forms and colours which are called here the Vibhṛājit country.

11.* Nalini and Nālini are the two nostrils, and smell has been called the Saurabha country. The faculty of smelling is designated Avadhūta (the companion of Puraṇjana). The gate called Mukhyā is the mouth. The organ of speech is (Puraṇjana’s companion) Viṣṇu and the organ of taste is (the name of Puraṇjana’s friend) Rasajña or Rasavid.

12. Āpana or the market signifies here as (the region of) speech activity while Bahudana means the varieties of food. The right ear is the Southern gate known as Pitṛhū and the left the Northern gate is remembered as Devahū.

13. The scriptures (Śāstras) which treat of the path of worldly activities (i.e. ritualistic karmas) and those which deal with abstention from such karmas and renunciation, are designated as the country of Pañcālas. Hearing to these through the faculty of hearing is called here Śrutadhara (the companion of Puraṇjana), the Jīva may proceed by the path of manes (Pitṛs) or of the gods.

14. The organ of generation is the western gate called Āśural; the act of sexual intercourse is the region known as Grāmaka. The procreative ability (in the organ) is spoken of as Durmada (who was Puraṇjaña’s friend). The anus is designated as Nirṛti (the other western gate or the postern passage).

15. The hell is the region called Vaiśasa, while the power of the organ to defecate (through the anus) is called his friend Luddhaka. And now, hear from me who the two blind ones are. They are (the pairs of) hands and feet with the help of which one makes movements and does work.

16. The harem is the heart and the mind is called Viśuci (Viśucina)—the principal officer over the harem. By the mind's attributes (like Sattva etc.), the Jīva attains to the state of infatuation, serenity or joy.

17. According as the Buddhi (intellect) is disturbed (in the dream state) or affects (the senses in the waking state) the Jīva, though (by nature) a mere witness, is tainted with her (Buddhi's) attributes, and is made to feel as if he is affected by those changes (directly).

18. The body is the chariot with horses in the form of senses, yoked to it. It (apparently) moves with the unimpeded speed of the year, though (actually) it is motionless. Good and evil actions are its two wheels. The three attributes (sattva, rajas and tamas) constitute its flagstaffs and the five vital airs (Prānas or asus) are its five cords.

19. The mind is its rein (to control the horses); the Intellect is the charioteer; the heart is the seat; the pairs like pleasure and pain are the poles to which the yoke is rivetted; the objects of five senses are the weapons (for attack); the seven constituents of the body (viz. blood, flesh, fat, bones etc.) are its protective covers.

20. Ākūti (the five organs of actions, e.g. hands, feet, etc.) is its external motion. The Jīva vigorously runs after the mirage (-like objects of pleasure) with his army of eleven sense-organs (five cognitive and five conative sense-organs plus mind—the internal organ). He takes pleasure in five types of slaughter (i.e. wrongful enjoyment of five types of sense-ob-

* These verses echo the following from Katha Up. 1.3.3-4

Ātmānāṁ rathīnāṁ viddhi, tārītāṁ ratam eva ca/
Buddhāṁ hi sārāthīnāṁ viddhi, manāḥ prāraham eva ca //
Indriyāṁ āṅgir āṅguraḥ viṣayaṁ tṣu gocarāṁ/

jects by his five senses). The year which records the passage of time is Gana\textit{\textbar}vega (the king of Gandharvas).

21. Here the three hundred and sixty male Gandharvas under his command are the days and an equal number of female Gandharvas are the nights. By their turns, they take away the life of man by rotation.

22. Kāla-Kanyā is the old age incarnate. People do not greet her. Death, the king of Yavanas, adopted her as his sister for the help in the (destruction of the world).

23. Mental anguishs and physical pains and diseases are his active Yavana soldiers. Prajvāra means the two types of fever (one accompanied with cold and the other with high temperature which is said to have a swift career to harass living beings.

24. Thus for a period of one hundred years, the embodied Jīva, covered as he is by dark ignorance, is being tormented in his body with various types of affictions caused by supernatural agencies, (\textit{\textbar}hidai\textit{\textbar}vika), elements (\textit{\textbar}hībhaustika) and his body (\textit{\textbar}hyātmika).

25. Though he is essentially attributeless, he superimposes on himself the attributes of Prāna (such as hunger, thirst), the qualities of sense-organs (e.g. blindness, deafness) and the attributes of the mind (for example: passions of love, hate etc.). He lies confined to the body brooding over trifling pleasures of the senses and he continues to perform actions under the (influence of the) false notions of I-ness and mine-ness.

26. When the Jīva, though by nature self-luminous (i.e. self-knowing), does not recognise (himself to be) the glorious Supreme Preceptor, the Soul, he gets attached (and bound) to the attributes of Prak\textit{\textbar}ti.

27. Regarding the attributes as referring to his own self, he then helplessly commits actions which are white (\textit{sā\textbar}tvika), black (\textit{tām\textbar}sa) and red (\textit{rā\textbar}asa) and is born in various species of life according to the nature of his actions.

28. By his white (i.e. sā\textbar\textit{\textbar}tvika) actions, he sometimes attains to worlds (like Svarga) which are full of light. Sometimes (by his red, i.e. rā\textbar\textit{\textbar}asa actions) he goes to regions which result in (i.e. lead to) sufferings and require exertion through activities. And sometimes (by tamásika actions), he takes birth in regions which are full of darkness (i.e. ignorance) and grief.

29. This Jīva with blind (i.e. deluded) intelligence is sometimes (born as) a male, a female, an impotent person, a god or a man or as a subhuman being according to his previous actions and the (dominant) attribute of Prakṛti.

30-31. Just as a poor starving dog which goes from door to door, gets (beating with) a stick or cooked rice (according) as destined by fate, the Jīva, with his heart full of desires, wanders, by paths which are high (as prescribed by religion) or low (as prohibited by scriptures), through higher (celestial) worlds, lower (infernal) regions or the middle (human) world and experiences pleasure or pain as ordained by fate.

32. There is no immunity to the Jīva even from one type of miseries which are caused by superhuman agencies like gods (adhi-daivika), by other beings (adhi-bhautika) and these relating to one's body (adhyātmika). Even if the remedy (against them) is sought, it is temporary and is (again) of the nature of misery.149

33. Just as a man carrying a heavy load on his head, places it on his shoulder (for relief), so are all remedies (of the nature of misery itself).

34. Oh sinless King! Mere act (without the knowledge of the truth and accompanied with some desire) cannot be the effective final remedy against (the miseries etc. resulting from) another act (karma) as both are the outcome of avidyā (ignorance). It (such attempt to terminate one karma by another) is like a dream within dream (wherein there is an exchange of dream-consciousness but no termination of dreams as in wakefulness).

35.* Just as a person wandering in the dream-land with his mind which as linga sartra (subtle body) forms the limita-

149. There is no remedy against misery, the only remedy being the worship and contemplation of God—VR.

* VR. : The state of being, a god, a man is not inherent in the nature of the Soul. It is due to the working of the mind that one falsely identifies the Soul with the body and experiences miseries. But they are like dream experiences.
tions of the Soul (and experiences fear, misery etc. till he wakes up from the dream to realize the unreality of that experience), the samsāra (transmigration of the Soul in the miserable world) does not come to an end (while his sleep of ignorance continues) in spite of the non-reality of the phenomenal world.

36. It is ignorance (or Mind—manas) that causes the uninterrupted chain of miseries\(^{150}\) (or transmigration) to the Soul which is essentially the real existence. The chain of samsāra is cut asunder by Supreme devotion\(^{151}\) to the Preceptor (Hari)\(^{152}\).

37. When the Yoga of (self-less, disinterested) devotion to Lord Vāsudeva\(^{153}\) is established in the proper manner\(^{154}\), it (automatically) causes renunciation (of worldly pleasures) and manifests knowledge.

(ii) VJ.: The transmigration of the Soul (samsāti) does not cease to be till one does not realise Hari directly (arthe avidyāmāne) just as dream experiences continue till one awakes (to find that those experiences were unreal.)

As Madhva regards this world as real, VJ. takes pains to explain that the analogy between the dream and the world shall not be stretched too far and that ‘the absence of knowledge of the reality-as-it is’ is the common factor between the experiences in the dream and in the world and not the non-reality of the world. The implication of hi is that, if a person, born in samsāra, does not attain to the real knowledge of Hari, his samsāra is purposeless and fruitless.

(iii) GD.: Just as waking up from sleep is the only remedy against the miseries one experiences in dreams, realization of the Self is the only remedy against avidyā (nescience); other remedies cannot cut the vicious circle of the transmigration of the Soul and consequent miseries which are caused by ‘I-ness’ and ‘mine-ness’.

150. anartha—The illusion about the identity of the body with the Soul—SD.

151. paramayā bhaktyā—Devotion which is superior to austerities, vows, ritualistic acts and even the knowledge of the Soul—SD.

152. Devotion to Hari which generates knowledge should be performed as it terminates Samsāra—VJ.

153. Who is knowledge and renunciation incarnate and is the controller of the universe and giver of knowledge—GD.

154. Sadhrīṣṭena: (i) by burning down all evils in the mind by the fire of Breath-control—VJ.

(ii) By person who is free from worldly desires—VJ.
38. That Bhakti-yoga dependent as it is on the stories of Lord Acyuta, will be mastered before long by him who always listens to those stories with faith or devoutly studies them every day, Oh royal sage.

39. Oh King! (He can listen to those stories) in places where pious and pure-hearted votaries of the Lord narrate and listen to the glorification of the attributes of the Lord with eager hearts.

40. There (to the congregation of the devotees) flow forth from all sides rivers (entirely) of pure nectar (in the form) of stories of Lord Viśṇu (the destroyer of demon Madhu) sweetly sung by noble souls. Oh King! Those who drink those (nectar-like stories) with intent ears and without being surfeited, are never touched (affected) by hunger, thirst, fear, sorrow and delusion.

41. (In the absence of the company of the pious), being always harassed by these natural troubles, the world of beings (i.e. men) does not cherish any real love for the ocean of nectar-like stories of Lord Hari indeed!

42-44. Brahma (the chief among the progenitors) himself, the venerable Lord Śiva (the Lord of mountains), Manu, Dakṣa and other lords of creation, Sanaka and life-long celibates, expounders of the Vedas like Marici, Atri, Aṅgiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kṛatu, Bhṛgu, Vasiṣṭha—these and others ending with me—all masters of speech could not, to this day, see the Supreme Lord, the Seer of all, though (we have been) trying to visualize him by means of penance, upāsanā (worship) and meditation.

45* Those who meticulously study the meaning of the Vedas which are of very great expanse and fathomless in the depth of meaning, and worship him in his limited form (such as Indra etc.) the characteristics of which (viz. yielding a

* (i) VR : The realization of god is possible by worshipping (upāsanā) him only and not by mere knowledge or by karma (ritualist act) only.

(ii) JG. & VC : Persons devoted to ritualistic acts (karmas) only, never realize God.

Vajra etc.) are detailed in the Mantras (Vedic text), do not know the Supreme Lord.

46. When the Lord who is being meditated upon in the heart by a person, shows his grace unto the meditator, the person (so favoured) withdraws his mind, howsoever deeply attached (it may be) to the ways of the world, and to the ritualistic acts prescribed in the Vedas.

47. Oh Barhiśman! Do not therefore look upon as real the acts (ritualistic karmas) which appear as real through ignorance. These acts are pleasant and attractive to listen to, but they do not even touch (i.e. have any relation with) the ultimate Reality.

48. Those whose intellect is occupied with dhūmra-mārga (the path of ritualistic acts like sacrifices etc.) call the Vedas as prescribing the ritualistic acts only. They have not grasped the truth about the Veda. For they have not realized that the Ātman (the Soul) which is their own essential Self, is implicitly intended in the Vedas. These (devotees of the path of Karma) do not know the region where god Viśnu (Janārdana) dwells (much less Jānārdana himself).

49. Having encircled the entire sphere of the earth with darbha-grass by spreading them with their ends to the East, you have become haughty, (and) proud by slaughtering a great many beasts (in sacrifices). You do not know what is karma and what is superior to karma. The act that pleases Hari is the real karma. And the knowledge which leads to the fixation of the mind in Hari is the real knowledge.

50. Hari is the Soul of the embodied beings as well as their Ruler. He is their independent cause (the material cause of the universe). The soles of his feet are the real asylum to all, for in them lies the well-being (and security) of all men here.

51. Verily he is the most beloved one, the Soul (Ātman). By resorting to him, there is not the slightest fear or misery (as in the cases of others). He who knows this, is indeed the learned one. He who is learned is the (real) preceptor and he is (veritable) Hari himself.

155. Or whose intelligence has been smoky and impure—ŚR.
Nārāda said:

52. In this way, your question is completely answered, Oh excellent one among men! Now listen to me carefully as I tell you, a secret yet definitely ascertained truth.

53. Find out the deer which ignoring the blood-thirsty wolves (which are waiting) ahead and unmindful of (the coming of the arrow) shot from behind by a hunter to pierce it, strolls about in a flower-garden enamoured of its female associate, grazing tender grass and with its ears spell bound with the music of humming bees.

54. Oh King! You should look upon yourself as the doomed deer whose heart is pierced with a hidden arrow discharged by the hunter, viz., the god of Death, who chases you unperceived from behind. You who, in the house resorted to by women who are similar to flowers (in their ephemeral youthful charms which fade away very soon), seek after the most insignificant dose of sensual pleasures of taste and sex which are extremely minute like the fragrance and honey in flowers and are the result of ritualistic acts (karmas) performed with a motive, for attaining a particular object. Co-habiting with women and with your mind firmly attached to them, your ears are extremely charmed by the sweet conversation with women and others—conversation which is extremely attractive like the sweet honey of swarms of bees. You are enjoying yourself in the house, completely oblivious of the small components of time amounting to days and nights which, like a pack of wolves ahead of you, prey upon your life.

55. Having carefully considered your own behaviour (as being) like that of the deer (in the above verse), you, who are so conditioned, restrain your mind in the interior of your heart, and the stream-like outgoing tendencies of your ears (and other senses) in your mind. Renounce the householder’s stage of life (lit. women’s house) with its talk about extremely lustful and lascivious gatherings; (Do try to) please the Lord who is the shelter of jīvas (hamsas) and withdraw step by step (from everything else)."
The King said:

56. "Oh Brahman! What Your venerable Lordship has spoken has been heard and reflected over by me. The sacrificial priests do not know this. Would they not have spoken (about it to me) if they had known it?

57. You have thoroughly resolved a great doubt raised by them (my preceptors) in this matter (pertaining to the Soul). (But a doubt still lingers). For even sages are deluded in the realm which is beyond the range of senses, Oh Brähmana sage. (The Vedists say:)

58. Leaving in this world the body with which a person begins to perform acts (karmas), he enjoys the consequent fruits (of those karmas), elsewhere (in the next world) through a different body.

59. This doctrine of the Vedists (the knowers and advocates of Vedic karmas) is heard everywhere. (But how is it possible when the two bodies viz., the performer of an action and the enjoyer of the fruit of that action are different?) (The second doubt is:) As soon as an act prescribed in the Vedas is performed, it disappears and does not become visible. (Thus due to the cessation of an act, its consequent fruit is an impossibility)."

60. A person enjoys the fruits of an act in the next world with the same subtle body with which he performs the act (in this world), and thus, there is no interruption (i.e. change of the subtle body and the mind).*

61. Just as a person (in a dream) forgets his identity with this body (which is) lying and breathing, and experiences (in the dream) impressions of actions recorded in the mind, similarly (he experiences the fruits of his actions committed here) with another body similar (to the previous one) or belonging to another kind (as of a god or of a sub-human being).

62. Whatever body the jīva assumes by saying in his mind that 'these (wife and sons) are mine' and 'I am this body (e.g. a Brähmana) ' he accepts (the responsibility of) the

---

*SR. adds:—Due to the persistence of the subtle mental body even after the destruction of the physical body, there is no logical discrepancy in this.
karmas committed by that body and thereby (he gets) a subsequent birth.

63. Just as (tendencies of) the mind (that direct activities) are inferred by the behaviour and activities of both the conative and cognitive sense-organs so are the acts committed by the body in the previous birth, inferred from the natural inclinations of the mind.

64. What is never and nowhere experienced or seen or heard by this (present) body, is sometimes experienced (in dream etc.) according to the form as it is impressed on the mind (in the previous birth).

65. Therefore, Oh King, definitely believe that the jīva, dependent as he is on his subtle body consisting of vāsanās (karmic impressions left on the mind), had a previous body which has undergone that type of experience. For the mind is incapable of touching (perceiving) an object which is not experienced by it (previously).

66. May you be blessed! It is (the high and low propensities of) the mind which speak of the previous births of man as well as predict whether he will be born in a higher or lower form of life. 156

67. Sometimes some impossibilities 157 with reference to place (e.g. a sea on the mountain top), time (e.g. stars by daylight) and action (e.g. getting one’s self beheaded) are seen or heard in the mind (in dreams). (As these are impossible experiences even in previous births) these are to be inferred to be due to disturbed sleep etc. and these do not contradict the above (statement in verse 65.)

68. All objects which are within the ken of sense-perception enter the mind according to their (particular) order and in groups and disappear (after being so experienced). Hence (it is that) all persons possess a mind (with impressions of the past).

156. nābhāvyataḥ—will not be born again or will be liberated —VC.

157. VJ. explains these impossibilities as due to mixing up of impressions. VC. explains the possibilities of these with reference to other times, places etc. For example: the sea is on the top of (the submerged) mount Mānakā, stars appear in complete solar eclipse, disturbance in the humids or components of the body may give rise to strange dreams.
69. (Normally these objects appear in a serial order but some times all of them present themselves simultaneously).

When the mind is firmly established in pure Sattva (uncontaminated with rajas and tamas) and is in the presence of the venerable Lord (in meditation), the whole universe shines forth united with the Lord, like the dark planet Rāhu appears on the disc of the Moon (at the time of lunar eclipse). (It is the experience of Yogins that sometimes all objects simultaneously flash on the pure mind).

70. (Thus the doubt that the performer of an act and the enjoyer of its fruits are different is dispelled by the proven continuity of the same subtle body) as the notion of ‘I’ and ‘mine’ about the physical body which conditions the jīva, will persist (i.e. will not cease to exist) so long as this beginningless subtle body which is the result of the conglomeration of intellect (Buddhi), mind, the senses (and their) objects and the triad of guṇas (sattva etc.), continues.

71. Due to suspension of the passage of Prāṇa (i.e. of sense-activity) in deep sleep, unconsciousness, extreme anguish (due to bereavement of the near ones), as well as in high fever and at the time of death, the sense of ‘I-ness’ is unmanifest (dormant).

72. Just as the moon (though existent) is not seen in the night of the new-Moon day, due to underdevelopment of senses and organs in the embryonic stage, and even in infancy the notion I-ness does not clearly manifest itself in the eleven sense organs (ten sense-organs plus the internal organ—the mind) as it does in the case of a full-grown youth.

73. Just as (in spite of the unreality of the objects and events in dreams) the unpleasant happenings in the dream do not cease to be (till one is awakened), the sāṁsāra (the cycle of the transmigration of the Soul) does not come to an end in the case of one who broods over the objects of pleasure, even though the objects are (in reality) non-existent.

74. Thus the subtle body (liṅga) is constituted of five subtle elements; is extended by the development of sixteen modifications (viz. 5 Prāṇas+1 mind + 10 Indriyas—sense); is a product of three guṇas (sattva, rajas and tamas).
it is united with consciousness, it (the whole aggregate) is called jīva.

75. It is through the subtle body that the jīva takes over or casts off (different) bodies. And it is by this that he experiences delight, sorrow, fear, misery or happiness.

76. Just as the caterpillar does not go away (from its first foot-hold on the blade of grass) and moves on (only after getting a firm foothold on another blade), the jīva, even while dying, does not let go his identity with its previous body (which he is giving up even at the point of death).

77. While he does not attain to another (i.e. the next) body by the exhaustion of the karmas (which were the cause of the previous dying body), the mind alone is the cause of birth and death (i.e. the samsāra) of beings, Oh King.

78. When, brooding over sensual pleasure (enjoyed by it), the jīva frequently indulges in karmas for achieving them. As a result of those karmas he, being subject to avidyā (nescience or ignorance), gets bound up with karmas of the body and the like.

79. Hence, in order to free yourself from the bondage of avidyā you worship Hari with all your heart, looking upon the universe as identical with him, for everything: the creation, maintenance and withdrawal of the universe is due to him."

Maitreya said:

80. Venerable Nārada, the chief votary of the Lord, explained to him the real nature of the swans (jīva and the Paramātman) and bidding good bye to him, he then went to the realm of the Siddhas.

81. The royal sage Prācinabarhis passed on instructions (to his minister for conveying them) to his sons for the protection of his subjects and retired to the hermitage of Kapila for performing penance.

82. In that hermitage, the warrior, being free from attachment and with thoroughly concentrated mind, worshipped the lotus-like feet of Govinda with earnest devotion and attained a personality similar to the Lord.

83. Oh sinless Vidura, he who will listen to or make others listen to this spiritual allegory sung by the divine sage Nārada, is emancipated from his subtle body.

84. He who gets by heart, while it is being sung, this self-purifying account which was issued from the mouth of a great divine sage and which purifies the world by the glories of Lord Mukunda (Kṛṣṇa) and which brings in the highest reward, becomes free from all bondages and does not wander in the saṁsāra.

85. This is what I understood of this wonderful allegory about the Soul. I have narrated to you about saṁsāra by the allegory of the householder's life and have dispelled the doubt as to how the fruit of karmas is enjoyed in the other world.

CHAPTER THIRTY

(The Story of Pracetasas—Their Marriage with Māriṣā and the birth of Dakṣa)

Vidura said:

1. What well-being did the sons of Prācinabarhis mentioned by you, accomplish by propitiating Hari through repeatedly reciting the hymn sung by Rudra, Oh Brahman.

2. Oh pupil of Bṛhaspati (Maitreyā)! Meeting by a lucky chance god Śiva (the Lord of mount Kailāsa), the Pracetasas who won the grace (lit. became favourite personal attendants of the Lord of Kaivalya or Liberation, must have certainly attained to their highest goal in life (viz. Liberation or Mokṣa). Please tell me: Have they attained it here or hereafter?

Maitreyā said:

3. Pracetasas who wished to carry out the order of their father remained under the waters of the sea (-like lake)\textsuperscript{159} and propitiated the creator of all bodies (i.e. Viṣṇu) by worshipping him with repeated recitation (of the hymn sung by Rudra) and by practising austerities.

4. At the end of (the penance covering) ten thousand years, the Eternal Supreme Man (Lord Viṣṇu) manifested himself to them in a purely sāttvika form, completely pacifying their trouble of penance by his soothing splendour.

5. Like a (dark-blue) cloud on the peak of mount Meru (which is of pure gold) he rode over the shoulders of Garuḍa. He wore a yellow garment and had the Kaustubha gem in his necklace. By his splendour he dispelled the darkness from all directions.

6. His cheeks as well as his entire face appeared refulgent with bright gold ornaments (shedding a spectrum of variegated light of the precious stones set in ornaments). He wore a brilliant crown. He was wielding (lit. was attended upon by) eight weapons\textsuperscript{160} (in his eight hands). He was waited upon by his attendants, sages and prominent gods (like Brahmā); His glory was being sung by the celestial singer Garuḍa with the fluttering of his (Veda-) wings.

7. The First (Ancientmost or Supreme) Man was garlanded with a wreath of forest-flowers (vanamālā) which vied in beauty with the goddess Lākṣmī who beautified the central space (His chest) encircled by His eight long and mighty arms. He looked with compassion at the sons of Bhaŗīṣmat (the Pracetasas) who sought his protection, and addressed to them in deep voice like the rumbling of clouds.

\textbf{The Venerable Lord said:}

8. May you be blessed, Oh Princes! Due to your strong mutual love, you are following the same religious observances. I am highly pleased with you by your brotherly affection. You seek a boon from me.

9. A man who will daily remember you at dusk and \textsuperscript{159} Vide supra 4.24.20; 4.25.2.

\textsuperscript{160} VR. enumerates them: a conch, the disc—Sudarśana, the mace Kaumodakī, a lotus, the Śarāga bow, an arrow, a sword, a shield. He defends the inclusion of a lotus as weapon by chatri-nyāya.
dawn, will love his brothers like his own self and will cherish friendliness to all living beings.

10. I shall bestow whatever boon is desired from me and brilliant intellect as well, to those who every morning and evening praise me with concentrated mind, with the hymn (which Rudra sang).

11. Since you have, with gladness, accepted and carried out the command of your father, your enviable glory will spread all over the worlds.

12. You will have a glorious son who is not inferior to Brahmā (the creator) in excellent attributes and who will fill (i.e. populate) the whole of these three worlds with his progeny.

13. Oh Princes! A lotus-eyed girl was born to (a heavenly nymph called) Pramlocā from (a sage by name) Kaṇḍu. When the girl was abandoned (by her mother) (the presiding deity of) trees took charge of her.

14. When she, being hungry, began to cry, king Soma (the Moon god) who was moved with compassion, put his index finger overflowing with nectar, in her mouth.

15. You are commanded to increase population by your father who is (now) my follower. Therefore, marry that beautiful girl (with fine hips) without delay.

16. All of you are observers of the same vows (e.g. protection of subjects) and are of similar disposition (good-naturedness, high moral character etc.). She will completely dedicate her heart to you all and hence will have the same disposition and observe the same vows. (Hence there will be no conflict). May this beautiful lady (with a slender waist) be your wife.

17. Without any diminution in physical vigour, you will enjoy the earthly and heavenly pleasures through my grace, for a period of one million celestial years.

18. Then through your firm devotion to me, the impurities (such as lust, hate) in your heart will be burnt. Being disgusted with the hell (-like pleasures of this world and the next), you will attain to my abode.

19. Even in the case of those men who enter householder's life, if they dedicate all their actions to me and spend their time in talking and hearing about my stories, the householder’s life does not result in a bondage to them.

20. By listening to the discourses about me, by those who are well-versed in the Vedas, I, the Omniscient Lord, enter the heart of those devotees as if I become new one (every moment). This entry (i.e. my manifestation) into the heart itself is the realization of Brahman, for those who reach me are not deluded, grieved nor are elated.

Maitreya said:

21. When Lord Viṣṇu (Janārdana), the conferrer of the objectives in human life (viz. dharma, artha, kāma and Mokṣa) and the best Friend of all, spoke to them thus, Pracetasas, whose impurities of tamas (ignorance) and rajas (emotions and passions) have been perfectly cleansed at his sight, bowed him with folded hands and addressed to him with their voice choked (with tears).

Pracetasas said:

22. “Many salutations to the Lord who destroys all types of misery and whose excellent attributes and names have been considered (by the Vedas and knowers of the Brahman) as the means of attaining the highest good. Obeisance to him who surpasses the mind and speech in speed\(^{161}\) and whose path is beyond the ken of all the senses.

23. In your own essential nature, you are pure, serene (and joy incarnate). The unreal appearance of duality in you is due to (the function of the) mind. For the creation, sustenance and dissolution of the universe, you have assumed forms (of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva) through the guṇas (attributes viz. Sattva, rajas and tamas) of the Māyā. Our salutations to you.

24. Obeisance to Hari who is essentially pure sattva (unmixed with rajas and tamas), and knowledge about whom terminates the samsāra. Bow to Vāsudeva, Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of all Sātvatas.

25. Hail to you who have a lotus sprouted in the navel. Bow to the Lord, the wearer of a wreath of lotuses. Salutations to the God with lotus-like feet. Obeisance to you, Oh lotus-eyed God!

26. Salutations to you who wear spotless, pure yellow garments like the filaments of the lotus. We bow to you who are the abode of all beings and a seer or witness of them all.

27. You have manifested to us who are afflicted with miseries, your form which annihilates all these kinds of trouble. What more grace could be shown? (This is the highest favour shown to us).

28. Oh destroyer of inauspiciousness! Only this much is to be done by the masters who are kind and compassionate to the poor that they should remember at the proper time, that the indigents are their own. (But in our case you have done much more than that in manifesting yourself to us).

29. Such remembrance (of the poor) brings peace and happiness to beings. Abiding as you are as antaryāmin (Inner Controller) in the hearts of even the most insignificant creatures, how is it that you do not know the blessing desired by us who are your devotees?

30. To us whom you are not only a guide to Liberation but a goal desired by us, the very fact that the Lord is pleased with us, is itself a boon sought by us.

31. We, however, seek a boon from you, Oh Lord, who are beyond the cause of causes i.e. Prakṛti (the prime cause of the universe). As there is no limit to your excellences or glories, you are exulted as Ananta (Infinite).

32. When the Pāṇḍūjī tree is easily found (by a lucky chance), a bee does not resort to any other tree. (Similarly), when we have found shelter at your feet directly, what other things should we seek?

33. So long as we, being dominated by Māyā, are wandering here in the samsāra due to the force of our actions (karmas), may we be blest in every life with the companionship of devotees attached to you.

34. We do not consider (the pleasures in) heaven or even the final beatitude as equivalent to the companionship of

162. Alternatively: (l) Why should we beg for other contemptible things?

(ii) If we are to seek anything there is no end to desires—ŚR.
your devotees (enjoyed even for a single moment). What of blessings like kingdom etc.) coveted by mortal beings?

35. In the company of Your votaries, sweet purifying stories (of the Lord) which pacify the thirst of desire are extolled. There is absence of enmity against all beings. Nor is there any fear to anybody.

36. There (in the company of devotees) the glorious Lord Nārāyaṇa Himself, the goal of Sannyāsins, is again and again extolled through sacred stories, by persons who are free from attachment.

37. Will not the association of your devotees who with a desire to purify the sacred places, move about on foot, be liked by a person afraid (of saṁsāra)?

38. Oh Lord! It is due to a moment’s contact with your friend, god Śiva (Bhava) that we have today attained to you direct—you who are our goal and the best physician who cures the incurable malady of (the cycle of) births and deaths.

39-40. Oh Lord! (we seek the second boon:). Whatever we have properly studied, whatever troubles we have taken for propitiating the preceptors, Brāhmaṇas and elderly people by our compliance, the respects we paid to noble persons, friends, brothers and to all living beings without any jealousy, the austere penances we have performed without food, submerged in water for a very long period—may all this, we beseech you, contribute to the entire satisfaction and pleasure of yours—you who are the Omnipresent, the Supreme Man.

41. Manu, god Brahmā (the self-born), glorious Lord Śiva and others who have purified their hearts with penance and knowledge, praise your greatness even though they could not grasp the fullest extent of your glory. Hence we extol you according to our humble capacity.

42. Obeisance to you, the Supreme Man, who are equal to all and pure (unsoiled by Māyā). Salutation to you, glorious Lord Vāsudeva, who are pure sattva incarnate."

Maṭreya said:

43. Thus extolled by Pracetasa, Hari who is affectionate to his devotees (lit. those who seek his shelter) and is of irresistible prowess, became pleased with them and conferred that boon (saying ‘So be it.’). Even though their eyes were not satiated by looking at him and they did not wish his departure, he returned to his abode.

44. Then the Pracetasas came out from the water of the sea (-like lake). Seeing the earth (wildly) covered with trees that had grown so tall as to obstruct the way to heaven, they flared up with wrath.

45. For rendering the earth tree-less, they then angrily breathed out from their mouth fire and wind, just as Samvan-taka or Kālāgni Rudra does at the time of the dissolution of the universe.

46. Seeing the trees being thus reduced to ashes, god Brahmā appeared and pacified the sons of Barhiṣmat (Pracetasas) by reasoning.

47. Then the surviving trees which were terrified, acted upon the advice of god Brahmā and offered their daughter to Pracetasas.

48. In compliance of the command of god Brahmā, they (Pracetasas) married Māriśā (the daughter of the trees). Dakṣa, the former mind-born son of Brahmā (lit. one born of the unborn Viṣṇu), was born of her, on account of his (Dakṣa’s) insulting the great god Śiva (formerly).

49. At the advent of the Cākṣuṣa Manvantara (the sixth aeon), when the previous creation was annihilated by the force of time\(^\text{163}\) it was this Dakṣa who directed by the Lord, created the progeny as desired by him.

50. While he was being born, he eclipsed with his own splendour the light of all luminous bodies. He came to be called Dakṣa, the competent, on account of his precision and proficiency in the performance of ritualistic acts.

51. (The beginningless) god Brahmā installed him (as a Prajāpati—the protector of the creation) and appointed him to procreate and protect the creation. Dakṣa (in his turn) employed all other Prajāpatis—progenitors of creation—to perform their respective jobs.

\(^{163}\) When Dakṣa’s previous body was destroyed through the force of time (Śr.).
CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE

(The Story of Pracetasas: Their Renunciation and Liberation)

Maitreya said:

1. Then (at the end of one million years of enjoying earthly and heavenly pleasures), superior knowledge dawned on Pracetasas. Remembering the words of Lord Viṣṇu (vide supra 4.30.18), they entrusted their wife to the care of their son (Dakṣa) and immediately left their house (as recluses).

2. On the western sea-shore, at the place where (the sage) Jājali\(^{164}\) attained the final beatitude, they resolved to engage themselves in (the sacrificial session in the form of) the enquiry about the Soul which leads to the realization that the Soul abides in all beings.

3. Nārada who was worthy of being praised by gods and demons (alike), saw them (Pracetasas) who controlled their vital breath, mind, speech and sight. Being the masters of their yogic (bodily) posture, their bodies were firm, unagitated and straight. They concentrated their minds on the Supreme, perfectly pure Brahman (unalloyed with Māyā).

4. Seeing him come, they (respectfully) stood up, bowed to him by lying prostrate before him and received him joyfully. They worshipped him with due formalities. When he was comfortably seated, they addressed to him.

Pracetasas said:

5. "Welcome is your arrival, Oh divine Sage! How glad we are that you have appeared before us today. Oh Brahman, your moving about (in the world) is like the movement of the Sun, for dispelling the fear of the people.

6. Whatever enlightenment was given to us by glorious Śiva and Lord Viṣṇu has been almost forgotten by us due to our strong attachment to house (householder’s life).

\(^{164}\) Jājali—An ancient sage famous for austere penance. When he felt pride about his spiritual attainment, he was directed to go to a merchant named Tulādāhāra. The merchant enlightened him in spiritual matters after which Jājali attained Mokṣa (liberation).

—MBH. Śānti. 261-64; PCK. 371
7. Therefore, please kindle in us the light of the knowledge of the Soul which reveals the reality and by (realizing) which we shall easily cross the impassable sea of samsāra”.

Maitreya said:

8. When enquired thus by Pracetāsas, the venerable sage Nārada whose mind was merged in Lord Viṣṇu (of glorious renown) spoke to those kings.

Nārada said:

9. That life, those acts, that period of time, that mind, that speech of men are of some real worth in the world, if Hari, the Soul and Ruler of the universe is served by them.

10. If Lord Hari, who blesses us with self-realization is not attained, of what benefit is the three-fold birth, viz., through pure sinless parents, initiation ceremony and consecration (for the performance of sacrifice) ? What is the use of the (performance of) ritualistic duties enjoined by the three Vedas or a span of long life like that of gods’ ?

11. Of what avail are the learning, austere penance, eloquent speech or the capacity to attend many things simultaneously ? Of what use is the keen intellectual capacity or physical power, high efficiency of senses ?

12. Of what use are the Yoga (consisting of breath control etc.) the Sāmkhya (the knowledge of non-identity of the Soul and the body), the Sannyāsa (the life of a recluse) and the study of the Vedas and observances of other vows and renunciation.

13. For, as a matter of fact, the Self is the highest of all blessings (as they are liked and desired for the sake of the Self). Lord Hari is the Soul of all living beings. He is Self-giver (i.e. he manifests himself by the removal of avidyā or he gives form, power etc. similar to him to his votaries like Bali). He is dear (as he is by nature the highest bliss).

14. Just as watering the roots of a tree nourishes the trunk, branches, sub-branches (leaves and flowers of a tree, and just as the nourishment of the life (with food etc.) leads to the strengthening of the senses and organs of the body (and not by applying food to those parts), so the worshipping of Acyuta (Lord Viṣṇu) is the worship of all.

15. Just as in the rainy season, waters (rain-drops) emanate from the Sun (the evaporator of waters which form the clouds and are the cause of subsequent rain-fall) and return to it again (as water vapour) in the summer, and just as the bodies of the mobiles and immobiles spring up from the earth and return to it, so does this universe of animate and inanimate things—the stream of guṇas—(emerge from and) merge in Hari.

16. *This universe is the absolute, unconditioned essence of the universal Soul. (It is not different from him as it is

*(I) VR. affirms the reality of the world as the universe has no separate existence except as the body of the Lord. Just as the light of the Sun and the Sun are inseparables, the whole universe is an inseparable attribute—the body of the Supreme Soul. Once, at the time of the creation, the universe appears as gross and at the time of the dissolution it becomes too subtle to be perceptible but its reality of existence persists, like the power of the sense-organs which are active in a waking state and inactive in sleep when illusions regarding the matter (the five elements) and the cognitive and conative sense-organs and one's being god, man etc. are lost.

(II) VJ. reads differently. Briefly stated: Referring to haṁsavo guṇapraṇāhaḥ in the above (15) verse, he refutes that Hari is conditioned by the guṇas or their products. This world wherein Hari dwells and which he has created is quite distinct and cannot condition him—the only relation between Hari and the universe is that of the supporter and the supported or the 'phantom city of Gandharvas' and the sky. Hari is essentially knowledge brilliant like the light of the Sun. And His wisdom dispels all illusions regarding the body (deya), power etc. When due to accumulation of merits, the breath and other Vytti cease to work externally and begin to function internally, and awaken the jīva, and the illusions about the false identity of the Soul and the body, thinking one's self to be an independent doer and that of being the master of one's senses, are removed, the real Form of the Lord is manifested.

(III) SD.: The analogy of the Sun and the water (in the above No. 15—verse) may be misconstrued to show that the universe and the Lord are totally different. This verse refutes that misinterpretation. The relation between the Lord and the world is like—that between the Sun and its light, viz. identity-cum-difference. It is identical yet different. Just as the powers of the sense-organs are manifest in wakefulness and dormant in sleep, so is the creation and dissolution of the universe. How can the jīva be released from the prapātika (universe) so related with Brahman? It is by propitiation of Hari, the Soul of the universe, that illusions causing samsāra, viz. (i) the feeling of I-ness and mine-ness about one's evolved from him) just as the light of the Sun is not different from the Sun in spite of the once (i.e. temporary) appearance of the phantom phenomenon called 'the city of Gandharvas'. Just as the powers of the cognitive and conative organs function during wakefulness and lie dormant during sleep (the universe which appears at the time of the creation from the Lord, dissolves itself in the Lord at the end of Kalpa.). In reality, in the Lord, there is absence of the effects of three types of ego (viz. ego due to matter, action or thought or the types of ego known as tāmasa, taitasa and vaikārika) and the misapprehension of diversity (caused by it).

17* Just as clouds, darkness and light appear in the sky and also disappear in their turn (but do not stick to the sky), similarly, Oh King, the potencies called sattva, rajas and tamas appear in Brahman (without affecting it) and the flow (of creation and destruction of the universe) continues (undisturbed).

18. Therefore, adore (and meditate upon) the Lord directly as being not different from you. Hari is the one undifferentiated Soul of all embodied beings. He is Time (the effibody, house etc. (ii) regarding ritualistic acts leading to heaven as leading to Mokṣa, (iii) wrongly believing in the teachings of Kapila, Kaṇḍa, Buddha as true and leading to salvation.

(IV) GD. explains the position of Brahma rāda as follows: Hari being the material cause of the universe, the latter cannot be different from Hari. At the time of the creation it evolves from the Lord, the Soul of the universe and it is not different from him just as the light of the Sun is not distinct from it. The evanescence of the universe and the eternity of the Lord are not contradictory, for just as the power of the senses functions during the state of wakefulness and becomes dormant in sleep (but the power still persists in both the stages) the world appears at the time of the creation and ceases to be so at the time of dissolution. (It is however not destroyed). The creation of the universe and the supported-supporter relation between the universe and the Lord do not act as his limitations, for the Lord is a cause of extraordinary and miraculous nature and above popular analogies. He is free from the illusory contact of five elements, eleven sense-organs and their presiding deities.

*VR. insists on the reality of the universe: the appearance and disappearance of clouds, darkness and light do not imply their unreality. Similarly, the manifestation and disappearance of sattva, rajas and tamas, the three potencies of Prakṛti with relation to Brahman do not mean that they are unreal.
cient cause), Prakṛti (Primordial Nature, as the material cause), the Supreme Ruler (as the creator). By his own prowess (or lustre) he has destroyed (i.e. remained unaffected by) the flow of guṇas.

19. By compassion to all living beings, and by remaining contented with anything whatever and by pacifying urges of the senses by remaining detached from the objects of the senses, Hari becomes pleased in no time.

20. Hari, the imperishable Lord, is invited by continuously growing contemplation to the pure hearts of pious people who have dispelled all the cravings. He does not wish to move out of the space of the heart, for he remembers his obligations to his devotees.

21. Hari loves the poor people who regard him as their only wealth; for he can appreciate the sweet bliss in their devotion which is motiveless and is solely concentrated on him. Hari does not accept worship from such crooked-minded persons who out of pride for their own scholarship, opulence, parentage and achievements, despise indigent yet righteous people.

22. He is not attached to Śrī (his wife—the goddess of wealth and beauty) even though she (always) waits on him. Nor does he attend to kings and gods who entreat her favours. For he himself is absolutely perfect (bliss etc.). But he is (always) subservient to the will of his servants (devotees). (This being the case) how can anyone with a feeling of gratefulness abandon him?

Maitreya said:

23. In this way, sage Nārada, the son of Brahmā (the Self-born god) narrated (these and) other stories of Lord Hari to Pracetasas and returned to the region of Brahmā.

24. Having heard the glories of Hari as narrated by Nārada, and which remove the sins of the world, they (Pracet- asas) meditated upon his feet and attained to his region.

25. Oh Vidura, I have now narrated to you everything that you requested me to tell, viz. the dialogue between Prace- tasas and Nārada containing the glorification of Hari.
Sri Suka said:

26-27. This dynasty of Uttānapāda, the son of Manu has been described to you, Oh best of Kings! Now listen from me the race of Priyavrata (Uttānapāda’s elder brother) who obtained the spiritual lore from Nārada and who after enjoying (i.e. ruling over) the earth, divided his kingdom among his sons and attained to the Lord’s abode.

28. Having heard this sanctifying story about the invincible Lord Hari, as described by Maitreya (Kauśārava), Vidura was overwhelmed with emotions. With his eyes flowing with tears, he installed the feet of the Lord in his heart and held (i.e. bowed to) the sage’s feet with his head.

Vidura said:

29. Oh great Yogin! Compassionate at heart as you are, you have shown me today the other shore of the ocean of darkness (i.e. ignorance) where dwells Lord Hari who is realized by votaries who are solely devoted to him.

Sri Suka said:

30. Having bowed to him (Maitreya) and taking his leave, Vidura who was desirous of seeing his relatives returned with peaceful mind, to Hastināpura.

31. Oh King! He who would listen to the account of kings who have dedicated their minds to Lord Hari, would be blest with (lit. obtain) longevity, affluence, glory, family-bliss (sons, grandsons etc.), sovereignty and eternal happiness (or godhood).
FIFTH SKANDHA

CHAPTER ONE*

(The Life of Priyavrata)

The king (Parikṣit) said:

1. Priyavrata was a devotee of the glorious Lord. As such he was merged in the highest bliss of the Soul (Ātman). How is it that he took delight in the life of a householder as it is the root of the bondage of karmas, and obscures one's real nature (by diminution of knowledge), Oh omniscient sage?

2. Oh most excellent Brāhmaṇa! It is definitely unbecoming that men like him, who have given up all attachment, should cherish such intense attachment to family life (including Vedic rituals, children, wife etc.).

3. The high-souled persons whose minds have found happiness and delight under the shade of the feet of Lord Viṣṇu of excellent renown, cannot definitely entertain an intense desire for family life, Oh Brāhmaṇa sage!

4. (It is possible that due to the power of fate, some persons who found delight in the Soul, may get attached to family life). But there is my great doubt as to how he (Priyavrata) attached to his wife, home, children etc., could attain Liberation, and could cultivate an unswerving devotion to Lord Kṛṣṇa, Oh Brahman!

---

*This Škandha presents the third characteristic—Sthāna—of this Purāṇa (SD., VD., GD.). At the end of the last Škandha 4.31.26-27 it is mentioned that Priyavrata was at first initiated into spiritual lore by Nārada, but he entered householder's life and after enjoying the kingdom of the earth, he renounced it and attained final beatitude. King Parikṣit asked the question here.

165. chāyā : (i) Which removes (i.e. cools down) hot tormenting passions—ŚR.

(ii) Which removes saṁsāra and three types of misery—VR. VC.

(iii) Shade characterised by knowledge which removes torments of saṁsāra—VJ.
Śrī Suka said:

5. Certainly, what you said is correct. But persons whose mind is possessed by (being soaked in) the honey of the lotus-like feet of the Lord of Śrī, Lord Viṣṇu of excellent renown do not generally abandon their own blessed path of listening to the stories of the Lord, most loved by the great ascetics (paraṁ-hāṁsas) and the votaries of the Lord, even though their path might be temporarily obstructed (by some difficulties).

6. Oh King! It is widely known that Prince Priyavrata was a great devotee of the Lord. By serving the feet of Nārada, he easily got insight into the real nature of the Soul. When he intended to dedicate his whole life to the abstract contemplation of the Supreme Soul, he was called upon by his father (Śvāyambhuva Manu) to protect or to assume the responsibility of governing the world, as he (the Prince) was the sole receptacle of a host of excellent qualities (as pre-requisites of a ruler) as prescribed in the scriptures. By the Yoga of uninterrupted meditation, he (the Prince) had already resigned all the functions of his senses and organs solely to Lord Vāsudeva. He foresaw that by accepting office (of the king), his Self will be obscured by the duties and functions of the government, even though they be (essentially) unreal. Hence, even though the command of the father is not to be disobeyed, he did not welcome the order (to be a king).

7. Thereupon, the Self-born god Brahmā, the first among the gods, who correctly comprehends the intentions and desires of (everybody in) the world by his continuous thinking (and solicitude) for promoting the prosperity of the creation (world) which is the product of (three) guṇas, came down from his region (Satyaloka), surrounded by all the Vedas incarnate, and his retinue (consisting of Marīci and others).

8. During his journey through heavens, he was being worshipped at several points by great gods, riding their celestial cars. On his way through the sky, he was being eulogized by troupes of divine artistes like Gandharvas, Sādhyas, Cāraṇas

166. uttama-loka—Who is glorified by excellent gods like Brahmā—VR. and by Siddhas and sages. Illumining the whole valley of Gandha-mādana by his moon-like splendour, he approached the Prince.

9. (ŚR. asks us to understand that at this time, while Nārada was instructing Priyavrata, Manu also had come to take the Prince to his capital).

There, recognising by the vehicle—swan—that it was his father Lord Hiraṇya-garbha (Brahmā), Nārada rose up hastily and waited upon him with articles of worship, and along with the father and the son (Manu and Priyavrata), and offered prayers to him with folded hands.

10. Oh King Parikṣit (Oh descendant of Bharata), Lord Brahmā, the Primeval Man, who was offered worship (by Nārada), and whose various excellent qualities, arrivals on the earth from Satyaloka (to confer boons), and glorious victories, were highly extolled in appropriate words, cast a smiling look, full of compassion at Priyavrata and spoke:

The Lord (Brahmā) said:

11. Oh Child! Try to understand carefully this truth that I am telling you. You should not find fault with the self-refulgent inscrutable God (who is beyond the ken of intelligence). For, we (I Brahmā, Marici and other sages), god Rudra, your father (Svāyambhuva Manu), this great sage (Nārada)—all of us, being totally under his control, carry out his behests.

12. No embodied being can undo what is decreed by him, through austere penances, knowledge of Śāstras, the power of Yoga (or Yogic powers like anīma, laghīma), his intellectual capacity, wealth, religious acts, or with the help of another (powerful person) or with his own capacity.

13. Dear Priyavrata! All living beings always maintain association with the body which is ordained by the unmanifest Lord, for (undergoing) birth, death, doing actions, (experiencing) sorrow, delusion, fear, pleasure and pain.

14. We are tightly bound together to the cord in the form of his Word (the Vedas), with the unbreakable strings in the form of guntas (like sattva), and actions (suitable for one's own position and stage—varna and ārama—in life), Oh child!
We all offer worship to the Supreme Lord like quadruped animals (controlled) with a string woven through their nostrils, carrying loads for the bipeds (men).

15. For, dear Priyavrata, we accept whatever form of existence (e.g. gods, subhuman beings) is assigned to us by the Lord, according to our attachment to guṇas (sattva etc.), and actions (karmas); experience pleasure or pain (as ordained by him) like the blind led by a person endowed with eye-sight.

16. Even though a person is liberated, he should maintain his body, experiencing the fruits he is destined to reap, but without identifying himself with the body, just as a man, awakened from sleep, remembers the experienced dream (in a detached manner without identifying himself in the dream condition). He does not seek after attributes which lead to next body (birth).

17. (He answers the objection: as there cannot be detachedness in the householder’s life due to one’s indulgence in pleasure, one should renounce it and resort to forests). The fear of saṁsāra (cycle of births and deaths) persists in the case of a person who has not controlled his senses, even though he (leaves his house and) wanders from forest to forest (out of fear of attachment). (For) he stays in the forest beset with his six (internal) enemies (viz. uncontrolled mind and five cognitive senses). On the other hand, what harm can the householder’s life possibly do to a wise man who has subdued his senses and who is absorbed in the bliss of his Soul.

18* He who wishes to subdue his (above-mentioned) six enemies, should first enter the householder’s life, and intensively try to do so, like a king who, resorting to his stronghold, (first) overcomes his powerful enemies. When the enemies have been weakened, the wise man may go about (to another āśrama—stage of life) at will.

*V.J. : A person desirous of subduing his enemies in the form of senses should first stay in the householder’s stage of life. After getting satiated (āśam buddhim prāpya) by enjoying pleasure, he should try for his final beatitude. In the householder’s life, however, he should stay in the stronghold, viz. devotion to the Lord and curb his powerful enemies viz. senses eager for enjoyment, by restraining himself from enjoying pleasures and thus bring the senses under control. When the desire of sense-enjoyment recedes, the wise man may fearlessly proceed (with the Lord’s devotion).
19. But you have already fortified yourself in the castle in the form of the lotus-like feet of Lord Viṣṇu (the god with a lotus sprouting from his navel), and have conquered the six enemies. Therefore, (you should) now enjoy the blessings bestowed upon you by the Supreme Person, and then renouncing all attachment, you should resort to your essential nature (viz. the Self—ātman).

Śrī Suka said:

20. (Priyavrata) the great devotee of the Lord who was thus addressed (by Brahmā), bent his head low, with a sense of his own smallness (before god Brahmā) and respectfully acquiesced in the command of the venerable Preceptor of the three worlds (viz. Brahmā), with the words ‘Yes Sir’.

21. Venerable Brahmā was worshipped with due formalities by Manu. And while Priyavrata and Nārada were looking on calmly (without any rancour for the frustration of their original plans), he retired to his abode, meditating upon the Supreme Brahman, his own asylum, who is beyond the range of speech, mind and actions (avyāvahāyatam).

22. Manu also got his desired object (of retiring to forest after appointing his son to the throne), fulfilled by the great god Brahmā. With the consent of the great divine sage Nārada, he installed his son to protect and stabilise his sway over the whole of earth. As for himself, he (Manu) renounced his desire of householder’s life which is like an unfordable poisonous lake of sensual enjoyments.

23. In this way, it was by the will of the Supreme Lord that Priyavrata, the Lord of the world was invested with powers to execute his duties (of kingship). He burnt down the impurities in his heart, by dint of constant meditation of the pair of feet of the Lord, the Supreme First Person, Whose supreme glory is capable of destroying the bondage of the whole world. Pure as he (Priyavrata) was, he governed the kingdom of the earth in order to show his regard to the great (god Brahmā and others, by carrying out their command to rule).

24. Then, he married the daughter, by name Barhiṣmati, of Viśvakarmā, the Lord of created beings. And as known to all, he got by her, ten sons, all of whom were great like him in character qualities, capacity of work, beauty of form and prowess, and a daughter, youngest of all, by name Īrjasvatī.

25. All of them were named after the fire-god—Agni—(viz.) Agnīdhra, Idhmajihva, Yajñabāhu, Mahāvīra, Hiranyaretas, Ghṛtapṛṣṭha, Savana, Medhātithi, Vīti-hotra, Kavi.

26. Out of these Kavi, Mahāvīra and Savana were lifelong celibates. Since their infancy, they cultivated acquaintance (i.e. took to the study of) the science of the Soul (spiritualism) and adopted the order of Paramahamsas (the highest type of recluses).

27. (While) in that (order of Paramahamsas), those great sages who were habituated to self-control and tranquility, uninterruptedly meditated upon the beautiful lotuslike feet of the venerable Lord Vāsudeva who is the abode of all species of living beings and the place of refuge for those who are afraid (of death or saṁsāra). They realized the Lord within their heart which becomes thoroughly purified by the power of steadfast and supreme Yoga of devotion (born of that ceaseless contemplation). And freeing themselves from the conditioning gross body, they became absolutely identical with the Lord who is Soul of all beings.167

28. By another wife also, he had three sons (named) Uttama, Tāmāsa and Raivata, each of whom ruled over a Manvantara.

29. While (three of) his sons were practising self-control, the Lord of the earth ruled over the world for one hundred and ten million years.168 (During his reign) the enemies of righteousness were deterred by the twang of the bow-string pulled by his mighty pair of arms possessing enormous power whereby all his heroic undertakings became successful without any obstruction. The high-minded king enjoyed (the plea-

167. VR. interprets pratyang as jīva 'individual soul' and bhūta as 'insentient bodies' (a-casthaya-lātrākatam). Thus VR. explains: They (the Princely Sages) realized that the individual Soul (jīvātman) is like a body to and not separable from the Supreme Soul (Paramātman). Thus they attained to a state like him (Sādharmyam).
168. arbuda—Ten crores (1000,000,00) years.
sures of life) as if he had not realised his true Self or had his judgment clouded by queen Barhiṣmati's expression of daily increasing raptures in greeting him with her amorous womanly charms, her smiles and side-glances half-concealed by bashfulness and by witty conversations.

30. (Once he noticed that) even to the extent of the world (upto the Lokāloka mountain), over which the Sun shines during his circumambulation round Mount Meru (the mount of gods), it gives light to half the surface of the earth while leaves the other half to be enveloped in darkness. He did not approve of it. As his super-human power was enhanced by the adoration of the Lord, he decided to turn even the night into the day, by (riding in his) luminous chariot, equaling the Sun in speed. Thus, like a second Sun, he made seven circuits closely following the Sun (on the heels).

31. Verily, the wonderful moat-like tracks left by the fellies of the wheels of his chariot, became the seven seas which divided the earth into seven island continents (dvīpas).

32* They (dvīpas) are called Jambū, Plakṣa, Śālmali, Kuśa, Krauṅca, Śaka and Puṣkara. As regards their dimensions, each succeeding island-continent is double in area as that of the previous one, and is surrounded by an ocean separating it (from the other).

33 The seven oceans are respectively of salt-water, juice of sugar-cane, wine, clarified butter, milk, curds and pure

---

*This concentric division of the earth in seven island-continents is mentioned by Patañjali (2nd cent. A.D.), and is common to Viṣṇu P. (2.4), Mārkaṇḍeya P. (54.6), and with a variation in Matsya P. (121, 122) and Agni P. 108.1.3. The arrangement is briefly as follows: (1) Jambūdvipa surrounded by an ocean of salt water. Beyond this ocean and encircling is Plakṣa-dvīpa which is double the area of Jambūdvipa. (2) Plakṣa-dvīpa is surrounded by the ocean of sugar-cane juice which in turn is engirdled by (3) Śālmalidvipa. The ocean of wine surrounds this dvīpa and is encircled by (4) Kuśadvipa with the ocean of clarified butter around it. (5) Krauṅcadvīpa surrounds this ocean and is itself engirdled by an ocean of milk. (6) Śākadvīpa surrounds the ocean of milk and is itself encircled by ocean of curds (7) Puṣkaradvīpa surrounds this ocean of curds and is encircled by the ocean of fresh (sweet) water.

N. L. De in GDAMI. 179, identifies the seven seas or oceans as follows: (1) Salt water sea—The Indian ocean surrounding Jambūdvīpa or India; (2) Kṣīra (Milk ocean)—Shirwan alias the Caspian Sea; (3) (fresh) water. They serve as moats to each of the island-continent. They are equal in extent to the continent they encircle. Each one of the oceans is in a serial order, the outer boundary of the continent surrounded by it. Priyavrata (the consort of Barhiṣmati) severally installed as ruler, dutiful sons by name Agnīdhra, Idhmajīva, Yajñabāhu, Hiraṇyaretas, Dhrtrapṛṣṭha, Medhātithi, Vītihotra—each being the ruler of one of the continents such as Jambudvīpa and others.

34. He gave his daughter called Ürjasvatī in marriage to Uṣanas (Śukra, the preceptor of demons), and of her was born Devayānī also called Kavya-suta (the daughter of Kavi, i.e., Śukra).

35. Such heroic achievements are not impossible in the case of devout men who, by the (efficacy of the) dust of the feet of Lord Viṣṇu (who as Trivikrama took the universe in his long strides), have conquered the six senses (five cognitive senses and the inner organ—mind) or six anxieties (such as physical hunger and thirst, grief and delusion, old age and death). For if, a man even from the lowest caste, utters but once the name (of god Viṣṇu), he immediately shakes off the shackles of Sāṁsāra.

36. In this way Priyavrata, a possessor of immeasurable strength and prowess, once felt disgusted with himself as he found himself to be dissatisfied with the contact with the product of guṇas (in the form of his kingship and worldly enjoyment) which fell to his lot, even after his resorting to the feet of (the) celestial sage Nārada, and said this (to himself):

Surā (Wine)—a corruption of Sarain or the Caspian Sea forming the south-eastern boundary of Kuśadvīpa; (4) Ghṛta—derived from the Erythraean Sea or the Persian Gulf forming the boundary of Śālmalidvīpa or Chaldia, i.e. Assyria; (5) Ikṣu (sugar cane) a variant of the Oxus. The river is taken as a sea (cf. Sindhu means both the sea and the river). It forms the southern boundary of Paśkaradvīpa or Bhushkara i.e. Bokhara. (6) Dadhi (curds) is a hyper Sanskritisation of Dahi (Dahae)—a scythian tribe living in the upper Jaxartes on the shore of the Aral Sea. Hence Dadhi is the Aral Sea. (7) Svādū (sweet water)—a corruption of Tchan-dun, a river in Mongolia i.e. Plakṣadvīpa. These identifications are still controversial. Vide—Baladeva Upadhyaya—Purāṇa Vimarśa pp. 317-331. D.G. Sircar—Studies in GAMI pp. 17-25.
37. "Alas! What a (terrific) iniquity has been perpetrated by me! I have allowed myself to be pushed by my senses into the dark terrible pit of sensual objects produced by Avidyā. Now enough of this. Fie upon me who became a beast of recreation (i.e. monkey) to this woman" Thus he censured himself.

38. He regained his power of discretion and thinking, by the grace of Hari, the Supreme Deity. (Hence) he divided the earth proportionately among his dutiful sons (as per injunctions of the Dharma Śāstra). He abandoned, like a dead body, his queen with whom he enjoyed pleasures, renounced his great imperial wealth and grandeur. By the power generated by the realization of the stories and pastimes of Hari, he became disgusted (with Samsāra) in his heart, and he followed again the spiritual path shown to him by the divine sage Nārada.

These are verily the verses composed of old to eulogize the glory of Priyavrata:

39. Who else than the Lord Himself can perform the great achievements of Priyavrata who, while dispelling the darkness (of the night by riding in his refulgent chariot), created seven oceans by the deep tracks of fellies of his chariot.

40. For the happiness and convenience of beings he divided the earth (in seven island-continents). He fixed the boundaries (in each dvīpa) by means of rivers, mountains and forests.

41. Devotees of Lord Viṣṇu were dear to him. He regarded as hellish, the glories and affluence acquired in the Pātāla (subterranean world), the celestial world and the human world as well, through powers of karma-yoga.
CHAPTER TWO
(The History of Agnidhra)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. When his father (Priyavrata) was thus absorbed (in the yuga of devotion as advised by Nārada), Agnidhra, who abided by his (father’s) commands, kept the injunctions of Dharma in view, and accordingly protected properly his subjects, the inhabitants of Jambūdvīpa, like his own children.

2. Once upon a time, he, being desirous of attaining to Pitṛloka (the region of manes, by having a son), went to perform penance in the valley of mount Mandāra which was the sporting ground of beautiful celestial damsels. He collected all the articles required for worship, and with concentrated mind, he propitiated the venerable Brahmā, the lord of the progenitors of the universe.

3. Having understood his intention, the glorious First-born god Brahmā, deputed to him a celestial damsel called Pūrvacitti who was a singer in his assembly.

4. And leisurely did she stroll to the garden adjacent to Agnidhra's hermitage. The garden appeared extremely beautiful with its lotus-ponds of crystal-clear water, which were resounded with the variegated sweet warblings of aquatic birds like water fowls Kārandavas (a kind of duck), swans etc. And the water-birds were (in their turn) aroused by the resounding melodious notes of the pairs of herbacious and terrestrial birds, perching on golden creepers which entwined the mass of branches of densely grown forest trees of various kinds.

5. The Prince caught up the sound of the beautiful anklets jingling at every step she wove in a charming, amorous pattern in her graceful advance. He slightly opened the pair of his lotus-bud-like eyes which were till now closed in religious meditation, and perceived her closely.

6. Like a female bee (kissing a flower), the heavenly nymph was enjoying the sweet smell of flowers not far from him. She was making room for the god of Love (the flower-weaponed god) in the minds of men by her gait, sportiveness, bashful and modest glances, sweet voice and charming limbs which profusely delighted the minds and eyes of gods and men (alike).
Her full (pitcher-like) breasts, braids of hair and girdle were slightly agitated by her quickened steps out of fear, when she was assailed by a swarm of bees blind and inebriated with the fragrance of her breath (in the form) of words which dropped from her mouth, and which being accompanied with a smile, were sweet like nectar and intoxicating like wine. Agnidhra fell under the strong influence of the god of love (with a crocodile on his banner), who got an opportunity to enter his heart the very moment he saw her, and like a stupid fellow, he addressed her (as follows):

7. "Oh great sage! Who are you and what do you propose to do on this hill? Are you some indescribable power of the worshipful, Supreme Deity? Oh friend! Do you carry a pair of stringless bows (namely your eyebrows) for your purpose, or do you hunt after careless uncautious beasts (like me who are not self-controlled)?

8. (Referring to her amorous side-glances). These two arrows of your glorious self are winged with lotus-petals (in the form of your eyes). They are gentle, beautiful without feathers, yet of extremely sharp teeth (points). We do not know at whom you wish to aim them in this jungle. May your valour be for the good of dull-witted persons like us.

9. (Referring to the black bees moving about her due to the fragrance of her body). These disciples of your worship are reciting (Vedic hymns) around you, and by incessantly singing the Sama verses with a full understanding of its mystic doctrine they are glorifying the Lord. Just as all sages eagerly resort to their particular (traditional) branch of the Vedas, all these (black bees) eagerly resort to the showers of flowers that are dropped down on all sides from your braid of hair.

10. (Listening to the jingling of the anklets). Oh Brahman! We can hear only the sweet notes of the tittira birds which are encaged (in your anklets), but their form is not visible. Whence did you get the Kadamba-flower-like splendour (of the garment), round your hips which are engirdled by a fire-like shining zone.

11. (Referring to her full conical breasts). Oh Brāhmaṇa

169. He is called stupid as he failed to distinguish between a man and a woman, and addressed the nymph as if she was a man.
(twice-born one) ! What is stored in your beautiful horns which you carry (with difficulty on your bosom), despite your slender waist, and on which my eyesight is firmly resting? The saffron—coloured fragrant paste applied to your horn is such as has filled my hermitage with sweet smell, Oh beautiful one.

12. Oh best friend! Please show me your region, the inhabitants whereof bear on their bosom such wonderful pair of limbs which (delight yet) agitate the minds of ascetics like us, and who have on their countenance such a wonderful treasure of sweet words, amorous gestures, nectar and the like.

13. (Pointing to the betel leaves which she was chewing) What is the food on which you subsist? By eating (chewing) that there blows forth a fragrance like that of an oblation offered into the sacrificial fire, Oh dear friend. You are a part (antā or kalā) of god Viṣṇu, for like Him, there are (ear-rings with) two unwinking crocodiles in your ears. Your countenance is like a lake with its bewildered eyes which are a pair of fish in agitation; with your rows of teeth appearing beautiful like a row of swans and with the mass of curly hair like swarms of black bees moving about you.

14. This ball which, when hit by your lotuslike hands moves about in all directions, makes my eyes roll about. You are not aware of the loosened braids of your curly hair. Alas! The dissolute wind, addicted to licentious pleasure, is taking off your lower garment.

15. Oh ascetic (rich in penance)! Your beauty wrecks the penance of those who are engaged in austerities. By what kind of penance did you secure it (your beauty)? My friend! (Come on) You should perform penance in my company. Or it may be that god Brahmā (who desires to extend creation), has been verily pleased with me (and has sent you to me).

16. I shall not let you go, my beloved, who are conferred on me by god Brahmā. Neither my mind nor even my sight, fixed on you as they are, would like to depart. Oh friend with beautiful horns, be pleased to take (lead) me, your devoted servant, wherever you like. May your faithful companions follow me (Or may the female deer which are the companions in the forest go by the right side—as an auspicious omen).
Sr̥t Śuka said:

17. In this way, Prince Agnīdhra who was highly expert in the art of courting beautiful ladies and was blest with god-like intelligence, thoroughly propitiated the celestial damsel in a language which cleverly expressed his intention.

18. And she whose heart became strongly attached to him on account of the intelligence, noble character, beauty, youth, splendour and liberality of that prominent hero (lit. the lord of warriors), enjoyed in the company of the lord of Jambūdvipa, earthly and heavenly enjoyment for a pretty long time (lit. a period of a myriad of myriad years.)

19. The great king Agnīdhra, they said, got by her nine sons by name Nābhi, Kimpuruṣa, Harivarṣa, Ilāvṛta, Ramyaka, Hiraṇmayā, Kuru, Bhadrāśva, Ketumāla.

20. Having given birth to nine sons, one per year, and leaving them in the palace, Pūrvacitti again rejoined her service with god Brahmā.

21. Those sons of Agnīdhra, from their birth, inherited well-built body and (enormous) strength by the grace of their (heavenly) mother. When the patrimony was duly divided among them by their father, they enjoyed severally (kingship of) the different divisions of Jambūdvipa which were also named after them.\(^{170}\)

22. King Agnīdhra was not still satisfied with enjoyment of pleasures. Everyday he brooded over nothing else but that celestial damsel. By performance of acts prescribed in the Vedas, he attained the same region as hers—a region where departed forefathers enjoy themselves.

23. On the demise of their father, the nine brothers married the nine daughters of Meru, whose names were Merudevi, Pratirūpā, Ugradamśtri, Latā, Ramyā, Śyāmā, Nārī, Bhadrā, Devavīti.

---

\(^{170}\) VR. notes that Bhāratavarṣa is later named after king Bharata. Previously it was known as Ajanābha, after king Nābhi.
CHAPTER THREE

(The History of Nābhi—Incarnation of Rṣabha)

Sri Suka said:

1. Being desirous of progeny, Nābhi, along with childless Merudevi, worshipped the venerable Lord of Sacrifices, with concentrated mind.

2. Although the Lord of charming personality is difficult to be attained to by the use and accomplishments of all the means of sacrifices such as wealth, suitable place, time, appropriate Mantras (incantations), competent sacrificial priests, and payment of liberal sacrificial fees he is affectionate to his devotees. Hence, when he (king Nābhi) was devoutly and with pure heart, performing the sacrifice, his (the Lord’s) heart became eager to accomplish the object desired by his devotee. Although his charming personality is absolutely independent, he manifested his form with beautiful limbs, ravishing the mind and sight, at the time of conducting the Pravargyas (the ceremony preliminary to the Soma Sacrifice).

3. And lo! The Supreme Lord appeared as a self-refulgent personality with two pairs of arms. He was clad in tawny coloured silk garment. He had the splendid Śrī-vatsa mark on his chest. He was characteristically distinct by the great conch (Pāňcajanya), lotus, Vanamālā (a garland of forest flowers), discus, the immortal jewel Kaustubha, mace and others. At this the priests officiating at the sacrifices, the directors of the sacrifice and the sacrificer waited upon him very respectfully with arghya offering water to wash the guest’s hands. They received him bending down their heads respectfully, just as poverty-stricken persons would do when receiving a rich treasure-trove.

The Sacrificial Priests said:

4. “Oh most adorable (God)! (Even though you are perfect in every respect) you be pleased to accept of your own accord, the worship offered (to you) by us, your servants.

171. Marudēvi in Jaina tradition (Hemacandra’s Triṣaṣṭi Śālākā Puruṣa Carita (TSPC)).
We are unable to praise you as your form is incomprehensible. Hence we are taught by the saintly persons to express our obeisance to you again and again. You transcend Prakṛti and Puruṣa. What man, whose mind is absorbed in samsāra, the product of the guṇas of Prakṛti and hence incapable, can describe fully the nature of the Supreme Ruler of Prakṛti and Puruṣa by means of name, form or colour belonging to modern gross creation called samsāra which can hardly touch you).

5. One cannot do anything more than to extol only, a part of those multitudes of the excellent and the most auspicious attributes which destroy the sins of all human beings.

6. You are thoroughly pleased indeed, Oh Supreme One, through worship offered to you lovingly, by Your followers—worship consisting of water, pure white shoots, tender Tulasī leaves and sprouts of dārvā grass, and accompanied by sincere prayer in faltering tone.

7. We do not see if you have to achieve any covetable object of yours through this elaborate sacrifice enriched with a number of component parts (formal rites).

8. You are the highest bliss, the embodiment of all the mutually complementary Puruṣārthas (highest objectives in human life) which flow from yourself uninterruptedly, directly and to an unlimited extent. But Oh Lord, this sacrifice signifies as merely (an inadequate) means of propitiating you in the case of us who covet blessings (of Puruṣārthas.)

9. Oh Supreme Person! You are superior to supreme gods (like Brahmā). We are ignorant. We by ourselves do not know what is our highest good. Nor have we worshipped you properly (with due formalities). But just as others (philosophic teachers approach the laity for enlightening them, even though not duly received), out of your exceedingly profuse compassion, you reveal yourself here to us and bestow upon us your glory known as Final Liberation as well as the objects coveted by us.

10. However, (the very fact) that you have now manifested yourself to the vision of your own people (devotees), at the sacrifice of the royal sage (Nābhi), is itself a veritable boon, Oh most worshipful God, the foremost among those who confer boons!
11. Oh Lord! The description of the host of your excellent attributes is a source of the highest auspiciousness even to sages who have completely burnt down their impurities by the fire of knowledge intensified by non-attachment, and have consequently become similar to you in nature, and enjoy themselves in their Self. (But even such sages have not visualized you). Hence your excellent virtues are continuously (and repeatedly) sung by them.

12. Though we have been favoured with your audience, we seek one boon of you. May your names descriptive of your excellent qualities and annihilating all sins, be ever uttered by us (lit. be within the range of our speech), even when we are unable to remember you, while stumbling, hunger-stricken, falling, yawning and in wretched conditions and even when attacked by fever and at the moment of death as well.

13. Moreover, this royal sage is desirous of progeny. He looks upon progeny as a covetable object in human life. He covets to have progeny like you. Hence, like a beggar approaching Kubera, the Lord of Wealth—for obtaining mere husk, he beseeches you, the Lord who are competent to give all blessings including pleasures in Heaven and Final Beatitude.

14. Is there any such person in this world who has not waited upon the feet of the high-souled ones and still is not overcome by your invincible Māyā of inscrutable ways and whose intellect and understanding has not been clouded by her and whose nature has not been overwhelmed by the vehemence of the poison in the form of sense objects of pleasure?

15. You have been invited here for an insignificant object. This act of ours who are dull-witted enough to regard progeny as the highest object in human life, is really an insult to you who are the Lord of unlimited achievements. Be pleased, Oh God of gods, to forgive us all who are ignorant ones as you are equal (in kindness) to all."

Sri Suka said:

16. The glorious Lord Viṣṇu was thus being praised in a hymn composed in prose. The feet of that foremost of gods were bowed to by the priests who were (in their turn) paid obeisance by (king Nābhi), the ruler of a sub-continent (which later became famous as Bhārata-varṣa). He (the Lord) spoke graciously as follows:

_The Lord said:_

17. "Oh sages! It is admirable that a very embarrassing and difficult boon viz. the son of this (king) should be like unto me, has been sought from me by you whose words are not futile and ineffective. For being matchless (one without a second), I alone am similar to me. Nevertheless, the words of Brāhmaṇas should not prove untrue inasmuch as it is my own mouth that is represented by the race of Brāhmaṇas who are like gods among the twice-born ones.

18. Therefore, no compeer to me being available, I shall exhibit a part of mine by incarnating (on the earth) through (king Nābhi), the son of Agnīdhra."

_Srī Śuka said:_

19. Within the hearing of queen Merudevi the Lord addressed this to her consort and disappeared.

20. Oh king Viṣṇudatta\(^{172}\) (Parīśit) ! The glorious Lord who was thus propitiated by the great sages in that very sacrifice, and who desired to oblige the monarch, descended as the son of Merudevi in the king’s harem. He assumed a white (pure, Sāttvīc) personality with a view to demonstrating to the world the sacred vows to be observed by (niṣide Śramaṇas) or recluse clad with air, performing austerities with a pledge to observe life-long celibacy\(^{172a}\).

CHAPTER FOUR
(The miraculous history of Rṣabha)

Sri Suka said:

1. It is reported that after the incarnation, Lord Rṣabha had all the characteristic marks of the Supreme Lord (such as the marks of thunderbolt, goad etc.) manifest (on the soles of his feet), from his very birth. His majestic splendour was everyday enhanced by qualities like impartiality and equality towards all, control of internal and external senses, non-attachment to sense-pleasures, domination and control over all beings, and possession of great spiritual powers. The king’s counsellors, subjects, god-like Brähmaṇas very eagerly wished to have him as the protector of the earth.

2. On account of his Supreme-most personality which was extolled in laudatory verses by poets, his abundant vigour, physical strength, splendour, glory, dominance and valour, his father significantly named him Rṣabha (the most excellent).

3. The mighty Indra became jealous of him, and did not rain in his continent (Ajanābha, later known as Bhārata-Varṣa). When apprised of it, Rṣabhadeva, the Master of yoga pooh-poohed it with a laughter, and profusely showered rains over his Varṣa (continent) called Ajanābha, by his mystic (yogic) power.

4. Being blessed with a worthy child as desired by him, Nābhi was transported with rapturous joy, and affectionately fondled the glorious Lord, the most ancient Person who, of his own free will had assumed a human form. His (Nābhi’s) mind was overpowered with Māyā. He fondly caressed him with faltering words filled with emotion: ‘Oh child, my daddie’ and felt exceedingly happy.

5. King Nābhi who regarded the mandate of the public as authoritative, came to know the love and loyalty of all, from common man to the minister (commanded by Rṣabha), installed his son for the protection and preservation of the boundaries (standards) of religious conduct. Having entrusted him to the care of Brähmaṇas, he, accompanied by Merudevi,

173. According to Jinasena, Nābhi installed Rṣabha as an emperor when he was grown up and married. MPS (Tri-patī-jātaka Sri Mahā Purāṇa—Satgraha—K.B. Nitwe, Ed. 1899) 16.32.
retreated to Viśālā (Badarikāśrama), where he propitiated the venerable Lord Vāsudeva (alternatively) known as Nara and Nārāyaṇa, through severe penance which caused no trouble to others, and through the yoga of profound meditation. In due course, he attained to his greatness, viz., the state of jīvanmukta (being liberated while alive).

Oh descendant of Pāṇḍavas (king Parīkṣit)! The two following verses are sung in his (Nābhi’s) praise:

6. What other man can perform the righteous deed as done by the royal sage Nābhi, due to the purity and piety of which act, Hari became his child?

7. Who else than Nābhi could be so devoted to Brahmāṇas, who, being propitiated by sacrificial fees, by their spiritual power, made the Lord of Sacrifice manifest himself (to him) in his sacrifice?

8. After his coronation, Lord Rṣabha-deva regarded his own continent as Karma-kṣetra (a land fit to perform acts leading to the Heaven and Liberation), and showed (the model of life) how one should stay in the preceptor’s house (for education). He obtained the permission (to enter householder’s life) from his preceptors who were given boons (as fees) of their choice. For teaching the duties of a householder’s life he married Jayantī who was given (in marriage) by Indra. He performed both types of duties as prescribed in the scriptures (of Śrutis and Smṛtis). He begot through her (queen Jayantī) one hundred sons who were like unto him.

9. Out of those (sons), the eldest was the great yogi, Bharata, who was endowed with highly excellent attributes. It is on account of him that this continent came to be called Bhārata.

174. Jinasena interprets karma-bhūmi as a country in which the order of Agriculture and other six ways of livelihood had been fixed by Rṣabha (MPS 16.249).

175. According to Jinasena, he married Yaśasvatī and Sunandā with the consent of Indra. These two were the Princesses of Kaccha and Mahākaccha (MPS 15.69, 70).

176. Jain tradition confirms the number of sons as 100, but the names are different (MPS 16.4).

177. Jain tradition endorses this derivation:

\[ \text{tas nāmāḥ Bhāratam Vṣram} \]
\[ \text{iti hāṣṭi janaśpadam} / \]

MPS 15.59.
10. After him were born nine sons viz. Kuśāvarta, Ilāvarta, Brahmāvarta, Malayā, Ketu, Bhadrasena, Indra-spraś, Vidarbha and Kīkaṭa—these were the leaders of (other) ninety (sons).

11-12. Kavi, Hari, Antarikṣa, Prabuddha, Pippalāyana, Āvis, Hotra, Drumila, Camasa and Karabhājana—these nine who demonstrated to the world, the sacred duties of votaries of the Lord, were themselves eminent devotees of the glorious Lord. We shall describe to you later on (in Skandha XI) their pious life imbued with the glory of the Lord, and leading a fund of tranquility, in the dialogue of Vasudeva and Nārada.

13. The eightyone younger sons of Jayanti who were obedient to their father, and of great modesty, profound scholars of the Vedic lore, habitual performers of sacrifice and of extremely pious deeds, became Brāhmaṇas (i.e. were given to meditation on Brahman).

14. The venerable Lord called Rṣabha was completely self-dependent. By his nature, he was eternally free from evils. He enjoyed absolute joy. Though he was the Ruler of the universe (God himself), he performed actions as if he were the opposite (an ordinary human being). He taught the ignorant by his behaviour, the traditional righteous duties. He was equal and impartial, friendly and merciful. He laid down the rules of conduct to people in the householder’s stage of life, by his achievement of righteousness, wealth, fame, progeny, (earthly) joy and liberation.

15. Whatever is done by the heads (the leading persons) is followed by the world.178

16. Even though he knew for himself the confidential, esoteric Vedic lore containing the religious duties of all (people), he governed the people by expedients called sāma, (conciliation) dāna (gift or, bribery), dāṇḍa (punishment); bheda (sowing discords) as advised by Brāhmaṇas.

17. As per counsels of Brāhmaṇas, he worshipped the Lord by performing for a hundred times, sacrifices, each provided with all the requisites with reference to the materials, place, time, age (of the sacrificer), faith, (proper) sacrificial priests, and the several gods to be invited.

18. While Lord R̄ṣabha was protecting this continent (Bhārata-varṣa), no man, at any time, desired or expected anything whatsoever from anybody else, as if it was non-existent (and hence beyond desire or expectation); nor did he cast a wistful glance at another’s possession—except the ever-increasing intense love for their Lord.

19. Once upon a time, while touring (through his kingdom) Lord R̄ṣabha came to Brahmāvarta.

With a view to admonishing his sons in that conference of great and prominent Brāhimaṇa sages, he spoke thus to his sons even though they had their minds controlled, and their conduct governed by affection and modesty—he did so, within the sight and hearing of his subjects.

CHAPTER FIVE

(R̄ṣabha’s discourse on the Path of Liberation)

R̄ṣabha said:

1. (My) dear sons! This human body in the world of embodied beings, does not deserve to be devoted to pleasures which lead to misery, and which are fit for animals (like dogs and swine) feeding on excrement. It is fit for penance devoted to the realization of the Lord, and which purifies the mind; and pure mind leads to the infinite bliss of absorption into Brahman.

2. The wise say that service rendered to the great is the gate to final liberation, while association with those who are attached to women, is the entrance to hell (or saṁsāra). They are (really), the great who are of balanced mind, serene and composed, free from anger, friendly and righteous.

3. They (only are the great) who regard love unto me as the highest objective of human life, and who entertain no liking for people who are engrossed in maintaining their bodies only, and have no attraction to houses (householder's life) and are devoid of desire for anything beyond the bare necessities of life (lit. maintenance of the body).

4. When one attempts to gratify one's senses (with their objects of pleasure), one certainly (loses discretion and) becomes wreckless, and commits sins only. I do not approve of (the repetition of) such (sinful) acts which (having been perpetrated in the previous existence) caused the body which, though really (unreal and) transitory, became a source of trouble to the Soul.

5. So long as one does not enquire into the real nature of the soul, it remains obscure due to ignorance. So long as the actions (karmas) are being performed, the mind persists in its disposition to activity (karmas) and a mind so disposed binds down the Soul to the body.

6. In this way, while (the real nature of) the Soul remains obscured by avidyā (nescience), the previous karmas (of man) tend his mind to perform more activities. He is not liberated from the bonds of the body, so long as he does not entertain love and devotion to me (Vāsudeva).

7. When one (the jīva) becomes careless about one's own interest, and even though possessing the power of discrimination does not realise the activities and functions of organs of sense as unreal and unconnected with him, he fails to bear in mind his real nature. Ignorant as he is, he gets into a householder's life (lit. a home with the provision of sexual enjoyment) and undergoes misery (of three types) therein.

8. They (the learned ones) call this stage of matrimonial union of a man with a woman as the knot of their mutual hearts which reciprocally binds them. (This is in addition to the knot of the identification of their body with the Soul,—the knot which exists already in their individual hearts. It is this marital knot that deludes a man to regard the house,

179. Parābhava—The real nature of the soul is dominated over by the body.—ŚR. (2) Is dependent on karma (VC., VD.). (3) Misery.—VS. (4) Involved in Samsāra characterised by the recurrence of birth and death (SD.).

landed property, sons, relatives and wealth as being himself or his own.

9. When this strong knot of the heart, viz., the mind which continues to be hard by the past karmas (of the jīva), becomes loose, (then alone) a man becomes absolved of the (deluding) man-wife relation. He (then) shakes off ahamkāra (ego, the cause of the bondage), becomes free, and attains to the highest position, viz., Mokṣa.

10. Through devotion to me, the pure Self and preceptor; through service unto me; through freedom from thirst (for worldly enjoyment), by endurance of the pairs of opposite states like pleasure and pain; through understanding that the life of jīva is subject to miseries everywhere (even in the other world); through an enquiring spirit (into the nature of the truth); through penance and abstention from karmas (performed) for attainment of desires:

11. By actions done for my sake; by (listening to and recounting) my stories all the time; through association with persons who regard me as the only Deity; only by glorifying my excellent attributes; through freedom from the feeling of enmity, by impartiality and evenmindedness, through tranquillity and self-restraint; and through a desire (and attempt) to dispel the (false) notion of the identity of the Self with the body, house (property etc.), Oh sons.

12. Through proper studies in the scriptures dealing with the Soul (ātman); by living in seclusion; through control of breath, senses, organs and the mind; through absolute faith in the truth (or scriptures and the word of saintly people); through observance of strict celibacy; through eternal vigilance in performance of sacred duties; through control of speech (for abstention from studying the false doctrines and for observing silence).

13. Through clear-sightedness realizing my presence everywhere, through wisdom illumined with Śāstric knowledge and experience; by means of deep concentration, a clever man, endowed with courage, perseverance and discrimination should strive to get rid of the subtle body, the limiting condition known as ego (ahamkāra).

14. One should always remain vigilant and by the means, as taught (by the śāstras or the preceptor) should completely cut asunder the bondage in the form of the knot (of ahamkāra) in the heart which has been caused by Nescience (avidyā); for that (knot) is the reservoir of all (previous) karmas. Having done so, he may cease to adopt these means.

15. A king, a teacher or a father who desires to attain to my region or regards my grace as the highest object in life, should thus instruct his subjects, pupils or sons who are ignorant of the Truth. (If they do not abide by his teaching) he should not get angry with them. Deluded as they are with the path of karma (as the path of real happiness), he should not direct them to perform karmas. What advantage would a man reap by misdirecting the blind (i.e. ignorant ones to perform action (karmas) with a desire to get their fruit) and make them fall into the abyss (of samsāra).

16. People (involved in samsāra) have no insight (to know) in what lies their own (real) good. (Hence) they, being overwhelmed with (a powerful) lust for enjoyment of pleasures, desire for objects of sensual enjoyment. They entertain enmity with each other, for a particle of (insignificant pleasure). Deluded as they are, they have no idea of the unending misery (as a result of such hostility).

17. Seeing an ignorant person steeped in Nescience, what learned and compassionate person who himself knows the Truth, will misdirect him to the wrong path, just as one does not lead astray a blind man who has missed his way.

18. He who would not, or is incompetent to, liberate a person (whether he/she be a pupil, relative, an offspring or a wife or a devotee) from involvement in samsāra, is not a real preceptor (even though he may claim to be so) or a real relative, father or mother or husband or a deity. [ŚR. followed by VC., SD., GD. and BP. explains the implication as follows: If a preceptor would not or is incapable of leading his pupil to Liberation, he should not claim preceptorship and accept anyone as his pupil, and the pupil should disown such a teacher and leave him. Similarly, a man should not procreate a child or a mother should not accept one in her womb if he or she is incompetent to guide the child to Salvation. There is no sin in disowning such a father or mother as was done by Prahlāda in the case of his father and Bharata about his mother Kaikeyi. Such a deity is not a real deity and should not accept worship from a devotee and the devotee should ignore such a deity as was done by Ḫatvāṅga].

19. This body of mine (which, by my free will, appears human in form) is beyond comprehension (as I am not an ordinary human being). For my heart is definitely pure unalloyed sattva wherein abides righteousness (dharma). Since non-righteousness has been already expelled by me far behind, the noble ones call me Rṣabha (the most excellent).

20. All of you are born from my heart (which comprises of nothing but pure sattva). You should, therefore, without entertaining any jealousy, serve your brother, the noble-minded Bharata. That will render service unto me and will be (the real execution of duty of) protecting the subjects.\footnote{Vf. thinks that this is an exhortation to serve Hari. He interprets: You should sincerely resort to Hari who is mightier than the mighty, loves to support the subjects and is the shelter of all. Through your loving devotion to me, Liberation is just on the palm of your hand. Bharata to whom you serve will be serving me who abide in the subjects whom he protects.}

21. Among the (animate and inanimate) created beings, creepers (which spread by themselves) are extremely superior. Higher than these (creepers) are reptiles (and other mobile creatures like insects) which can move from place to place; better than these are beasts which are gifted with intelligence; superior to them are the human beings; higher than men are pramathas (goblins, spirits) to whom are superior Gandharvas (celestial singers) and Siddhas (a demi-god tribe endowed with supernatural power); higher than these are followers of gods (such as Kinnaras).

22. Higher than these are Asuras (demons) to whom gods, whose leader is Indra, are superior; greater than these are Dakṣa and other sons of god Brahmā; among them Bhava (Lord Śiva) is the greatest. Brahmā is superior to god Śiva whose power or birth is derived from Brahmā; I am superior to him (Brahmā, and I regard Brāhmaṇas adorable as my own God.
23. Oh Brāhmaṇas! As I do not regard any other being as comparable equal to Brāhmaṇas, I cannot see any being superior to them. I do not enjoy the oblations offered to the sacrificial fire with that much relish, as I enjoy to the full, the food liberally offered by men to these Brāhmaṇas with faith.

24. It is the Brāhmaṇas who have maintained in this world my glorious, ancient, eternal body (the Vedas). In them are found the eight great excellences such as most sanctifying sattva, tranquillity of the mind, control of senses, Truthfulness, grace, asceticism, the spirit of endurance and knowledge of the reality. (Who can be then superior to Brāhmaṇas?)

25. Though destitute of everything, Brāhmaṇas who cherish deep devotion to me seek nothing of me, although I am superior to the Supreme-most god (Brahmā), possess infinite power etc. and am competent to confer heavenly blessings and Liberation (Mokṣa). How can they crave for any other blessing (like kingdom etc.)!

26. Oh my sons, at every step, you should look upon all mobile and immobile beings as my place of residence. That alone will be my real worship by you whose mind (sight)is unprejudiced by jealousy etc.

27. My propitiation is therefore the dedication of the activities of the mind, speech, sight and other sense-organs to me. Without such propitiation one shall not be able to free himself from the noose of death in the form of great delusion.”

28. The divine Lord whose name was Rśabha and who was the greatest well-wisher of all, exhorted his sons, even though they were well disciplined, as the exhortation was meant for the world as well. Possessor of great power as he was, he exemplified the path. He intended to exemplify the path of the Paramahāmsas (recluses of the highest order) which is characterised by devotion, knowledge and renunciation, of great sages who are habituated to tranquillity and self-control and who have desisted from the path of karma. Having installed on the throne for the protection of the earth, Bharata, the eldest of his hundred sons, who was (himself) a great devotee of the Lord and devoted to the votaries of the Lord as well, retained the possession only of his body and renounced everything else in the house. With the sky as his clothing, and with scattered dishevelled hair like a madman, he enshrined within himself the Āhavanīya fire, and set out from Brahmāvarta.

29. He took a vow of absolute silence and kept quiet even though spoken to by men. Behaving like a stupid, blind, dumb, deaf person or like a ghost or a mad person, he put an appearance of an Avadhūta (a sage who has renounced all worldly attachments and connections) who has lost all the sense of his body.

30. With his mind remaining unperturbed, he wandered all alone over the world. (While wandering) in cities and towns, mines and hamlets, flower gardens and the habitations at the foot of mountains, military camps and cowpens, settlements of cowherds, caravans, hills and forests, hermitages of sages and such other places wherever he went, on every road he was maltreated by the dregs of human society. He was threatened, belaboured, was urinated over, spat at, pelted with stones, showered with dust, subjected to stinking odours and to words of abuse. Like an elephant harassed by flies, he ignored these, as he never assumed any ego-hood as being his own self or as belonging to him the unreal habitat in the form of the body which is wrongly called real. He was established in his own essential glory, realising both being and non-being.

31. His hands, feet and broad chest were very delicate; his long and big arms, shoulders and neck, charming face and other limbs of the body were beautifully disposed. His beautiful face was brightened up with a spontaneous smile as he was by nature charming; he appeared beautiful with his reddish, large and refreshing eyes which were like petals of full blown lotus; his cheeks, ears, neck and nose were shapely and captivating; by the superb gracefulness of his face, he made the god of Love enter into the hearts of the damsels of the town; his face was adorned with profuse ringlets of matted and golden locks of hair overhanging it. His uncared-for body covered with dust (like an avadhūta), he appeared to be possessed by a devil.

32. When the Lord found that this world was opposed to his practice of Yoga, he regarded it reprehensible to offer any resistance to it. He accepted the vow to lead the life like an ajagara (python). It was in a lying position that he ate, drank, chewed, passed urine, execrated till his limbs were daubed with faeces.

33. The wind perfumed with the fragrance of his faeces filled with sweet smell the whole country within a radius of ten yojanas.

34. Similarly, adopting the mode of life of a bull, deer and a crow, he behaved like a bull, a deer and a crow and drank, ate, chewed, urinated while going, staying, sitting or lying down.

35. In this way Lord Ṛṣabha, the dispenser of Liberation, adopted various modes of life useful for the practices of yoga. He had no environment like a physical body to prevent his mind i.e. power of direct cognition. He realised his highest bliss in all-pervading ātman who is Lord Vāsudeva, the inner controller of all beings. He was, by nature, fully possessed of yogic power such as travelling through the space, acquiring the speed of mind, the power of becoming invisible and of entering the body of another, the faculty of seeing objects distant in time and space and such other powers. Oh King, he did not welcome at heart these super-natural powers which came to him unsolicited.

CHAPTER SIX
(Rṣabha quits His body)

The King said:

1. The Yogic powers which accrue unsolicited to persons who realise bliss in their Self and who have burnt down the seeds of their karmas (leading to future bondage), through the fire of knowledge, inflamed and fanned by yoga, do not lead to miseries. (Then why did Ṛṣabha not like them?)

The sage (Śrī Suka) said:

2. Your observation is true. But there are some intelligent persons in this world who are not at all prepared to trust their fickle mind like a wily hunter would do about a deer (even though trapped by him).\textsuperscript{183}

It has also been observed thus:

3. One should never form friendship with (i.e. place trust in) the fickle and changeful mind. It is through such (blind) trust in the mind that the penance of Śiva (at the sight of god Viṣṇu in the Mohini form)\textsuperscript{184} or that of great ascetics (like Saubhārī\textsuperscript{185}) which was accumulated for a long period, was totally lost.

4. Just as a faithless wife would give entry (to her paramours in her husband’s house to get him murdered), the mind of a yogin who has formed friendship with it, always leaves loopholes to lust and other enemies (like anger, delusion etc.) to enter.

5. What wise man would regard his mind as obedient and trustworthy to him, for it is the mind which is the source of lust, anger, pride, greed, sorrow, delusion, fear and which binds him down with karmas?

6. Though he (Lord Rṣabha) was the ornament of all the protective deities of the world, his divine grandeur remained unnoticed due to his strange stupid-like dress, speech and behaviour like an avadhūta (an ascetic who has renounced all worldly attachments and connections). He desired to give up his body with a view to instruct the yogins in the method of quitting this mortal body. He realised that the Supreme Spirit directly abiding in him was absolutely one with him without a second. Being free from the continuity of the vāsanās or effects of past deeds, he became free from his subtle body, shedding off his (conceptual) identification with the liṅga sartra (subtle body).

7. The body of Lord Rṣabha who was free and detached from his subtle body, roamed over the world through the semblance of egotism caused by virtue of the unconscious effects of his yogic powers. As willed by Providence, he traversed Koṅka, Veṅka, Kuṭaka and South Kāṅṭaka\textsuperscript{186} countries. In the jungle near mount Kuṭaka, he holding a piece of stone in his mouth and with dishevelled hair, wandered like a madman.

8. Then a fearful forest conflagration created by the friction of bamboos tossed by the velocity of winds, burnt down the forest along with his body.

9. Verily, in the Kali Age, when unrighteousness will rule supreme, there will be a foolish king named Arhat, ruling over the territories of Koṅka, Veṅka and Kuṭaka. Learning about the strange way of the life of Rṣabha, he will (try to) study and adopt it. As a result of the accumulated sins of the previous life of the people, as fate would have it, he (Arhat) being deluded, will give up the path of his own dharma which is free from fear or danger in every way. Out of his whim, he will propagate the wrong, and absurd way of the heretics.

10. By that (propagation of the heretical creed), in the Kali Age, wretched people, being deluded by the Māyā potency (power of delusion) of God, will (neglect and) be devoid of the purity, cleanliness and good conduct enjoined upon them by their scriptural injunctions. With their intelligence stupefied by the Kali Age wherein unrighteousness predominates, they, of their respective individual free will, will adopt wrong and corrupt vows involving contempt of gods, abstention from bath, ācamana (sipping of water before religious ceremonies etc.), neglect of cleanliness, plucking out hair (from the head instead of shaving) and such others. They will generally condemn the Vedas, Brāhmaṇas, Lord Viṣṇu (the presiding deity of sacrifices) and the world.

11. Believing in the blind tradition about the new way of life chosen by them but which is unsupported by the Vedas, they of their own accord will fall into dark abysmalhell.

12. This incarnation (of Lord Viṣṇu as Rṣabha) was \textsuperscript{186} VR. and VJ. identify Koṅka with Koṅkana, the narrow strip of land between the Western ghats and the Arabian sea. Veṅka is probably Veṅkatādri, the Tirupathi hill.

VJ. states: Rṣabha travelled from the land irrigated by the Bhīmā and Southern Kāṅṭaka to Saurāṣṭra and thence to the east of Nagpur where near the 'Uttara' river there is the Kuṭaka hill. Obviously VJ. is guessing. N. L. De identifies Kuṭaka with Gadag in Dharwar district. GDA. M1. 112.
intended for instructing people (who are) immersed in the Rajoguna, in the way of Liberation.

They (people) sing the (following) verses describing Rṣabha's excellent qualities:

13. Oh! This sub-continent (Bhāratavarṣa) is the sacredmost in all sub-continents (Vṛṣas) and island-continents (dvīpas) of the earth which is engirdled with seven seas; for people hereof sing of the auspicious deeds of Murāri (Lord Viṣṇu, slayer of the demon mura)—deeds associated with his (Viṣṇu's) incarnation.

14. How lucky is the race of Priyavrata of pure and sacred glory! In it (Viṣṇu), the Ancient Person took an incarnation (of Lord Rṣabha). The First Personage observed that path of religion which became the cause of Liberation (lit. non-action).

15. Is there any other yogī who can even mentally follow the direction of this birthless Lord (Rṣabha)? For the yogic powers, to attain which other Yogis strive covetously, were discarded by him as unreal and illusory, even though the powers automatically accrued to him.

16. Thus has been narrated to you the pious (and sanctifying) life of the Lord, by name Rṣabha, who was the most venerable to all the Vedas, the worlds (people), gods Brāhmaṇas and cows. It completely cleanses all impious actions of men (who devoutly listen to or recite it). It is the abode of the highest auspiciousness and supreme bliss. He who, with rapt attention and increasing faith, listens to it or recites it to others, unswerving devotion into venerable Vāsudeva is developed in them.

17. It is in bhakti (devotion and not in yoga etc.) that wise men continuously steep their Soul, tormented as it is with the scorching heat in the form of miseries of the worldly life (sahāśāra) full of manifold sins. They do not at all evince any regard or desire for the final beatitude though it is the highest Purusārtha, (objective in human life), despite its being automatically obtained. For, being worshippers of the Lord, they have ipso facto completely achieved all the Purusārthas (highest objects of human pursuits).

18. Oh King! Of you Pāṇḍavas and Yadus; the venerable Lord is the protector, preceptor, the deity to be worshipped, a friend and well-wisher, the controller of your family, and occasionally even a servant (e.g. an ambassador to the Court of Duryodhana). May it be as it is. But Lord Krsna (Mukunda) awards Liberation to his worshippers, but not loving devotion (to him).

19. Salutation to the venerable Lord Rsabha who is free from desires due to his eternal realization of his own Self, and who, out of compassion for the world, explained the fearless nature of the self to the people (or the world) whose mental capacity is lost in sleep (ignorance) for a long time, as it is engrossed in desires of the body and its property.

CHAPTER SEVEN
(The Life of Bharata)

Sri Suka said:

1. When Bharata, the great devotee of the venerable Lord, was by his volition ordained to protect the earth by Lord Rsabha, he became fully engaged in complying with his will (viz. protection of the world). He married Pañcajanī, the daughter of Viśvarūpa.

2. Just as Ahamkāra (ego, the source of all bhūtas) creates the subtle elements (tattvātmas), through her he begot five sons who were entirely like himself.

3. (They were:) Sumati, Rāṣṭrabhṛt, Sudarṣana, Āvaraṇa and Dhūmraketu. It is after him that this continent (Vṛṣa) which was (erstwhile) called Ajanābhā, came to be designated as Bhārata.

4. The Lord of the earth had a wide knowledge, and like his father and grandfather was devoted to his duties (as a king). Like them, with great (filial) love, he protected the subjects who were engaged in their respective duties.

5. He worshipped the venerable Lord who is of the form of Yajña and Kratu by performing punctually and with ardent faith, sacrifices, both big and small such as Agnihotra, Darśa, Pūrṇamāsa Cāturmāsya and those performed with the offering of a beast as well as with Soma sacrifices in their completely detailed forms as well as their modifications. Being properly authorised he got them performed through the four classes of sacrificial priests, viz., Hotā, Adhvaryu, Udgātā and Brahmā.

6. While different sacrifices were being performed wherein all the accessory rites and actions were being conducted with meticulous care (by Adhvaryaus, with ghee, rice, purodāsā and other oblations in their hands for offering to the fire) Bharata (the sacrificer) mentally dedicated the entire Apūrva189 (the prospective transcendental effect) of the fruit of the sacrificial act which is designated as Dharma, to Lord Vāsudeva, the Lord of the sacrifices. He is the doer, as he is the director and controller of deities (lit. objects) of all the Mantras which are symbols of all the gods. In this way, he cleared the impurities (like love, hate) of his mind by his cleverness and wisdom (of dedicating the fruit of sacrifice to Lord). The sacrificer (Bharata) contemplated the gods who partook the offerings from the hands of the Adhvaryaus, as resting on the various limbs of the Sacrificial deity (viz. Lord Vāsudeva).

7. In this way, in Bharata’s heart, thoroughly purified by such exemplary (faultless) performance of (sacrificial) actions, developed intense devotion which went on increasing

189. Apūrva: (A) Lit. Something new, not known before. It is 'a Force set in motion by the action of sacrifice, this Force being the Direct Instrument whereby, sooner or later, the Action brings about the Result' (G.N. Jha—Pūrva Mimāṃsā in its Sources, p. 291). Jha discusses the details of this (Apūrva) theory and the differences between the Prabhākara and Bhāṭṭa Schools of the Mimāṃsā (ibid., pp. 226-35).

(B). Jhalkikar defines Apūrva as the special potency developed by performance of sacrifice and leading to heaven. (Tāgūdiyaḥ svargādi- janakaḥ Kacana-gupta-viśeṣah Nyāyakośa, p. 48-49). He further states that Prārabdha-karma of Vedāntins, dharmādharma of the Nyāya Schools, adṛṣṭa of the Vaśeṣikas and Puṇya and Pāpa of followers of Purāṇas are the same as apūrva. Śaṅkara criticises this theory that it is non-spiritual and if God is said to act according to apūrva, it becomes identical with the Vedantic view that God acts with reference to the law of Karma (Śārva Bhāṣya 3.2.41).
daily with forceful ardour. The devotion was unto the Supreme Spirit (Brahman) who, within the inner space of Bharata's heart, manifested himself in the form of the Supreme Man, Lord Vāsudeva who was distinguished with the characteristic Śrī Vatsa, the Kaustubha gem, a garland of forest flowers (Vana-mālā), the discus (Sudarśana) and the mace (called Kaumodaki) and others. Lord Vāsudeva who stays steady (as if drawn in portrait) in the heart of his devotees, stood effulgent in Bharata's mind (as well).

8. In this way he spent one thousand myriad (Ten million) years. Having understood that the time of exhaustion of the fund of his karmas (resulting in enjoyment of kingship) had arrived, he proportionately divided the ancestral property and kingdom which was till then enjoyed by him, to his sons. Abandoning his home which was the abode of all kinds of wealth and prosperity, he retired as recluse to the hermitage of Pulaha.¹⁰⁰

9. They say that, out of affection and grace for his votaries who stay there (at Pulahāśrama), Lord Hari, verily even now manifests himself to his devotees in the form desired by them.

10. That eminently holy river called Cakra-nadī (the Gaṇḍak) hallows all the places in that hermitage with wheel-like circular pebbles with navel-like dimples on both the sides.

11. It is indeed said that in a grove adjacent to Pulaha's hermitage, he performed, all alone, the worship of the Lord with different kinds of flowers, tender leaves of various kinds, especially of the Tulasī-plant and with water, and offered to him (as naivedya) bulbous roots, roots and fruits. He ceased to have any desire for objects of senses and cultivated perfect tranquillity of the mind and attained to supreme bliss.

The place is confirmed by Padma P. Pāṭālakhaṇḍa, Ch. 78 and Brahma Vaivasvata, P. 2.13.
12. By such type of uninterrupted worship of the Supreme Man, his heart melted with the pressure of his increasing love for God and became slack in making any efforts (as if hypnotised); due to ecstatic joy, the hair stood on their end all over his body; his eyes became bedimmed with tears of joy which flowed profusely due to his love and solicitude (to realize the Lord). His consciousness and thought activity was drowned in the deep lakelike heart overflowing with supreme joy due to the increasing intensity of devotion caused by his constant contemplation of the red-lotus-like feet of his beloved Lord. And he forgot (even) the worship of the Lord that he was performing.

13. He had thus undertaken the sacred vow of propitiating the Lord. With the deer-skin for his clothing and with his mass of tawny, curly matted hair, wet on account of his ablution in the morning, noon and evening, Bharata appeared charming. He praised the glorious Lord, the golden (Self-effulgent) Supreme Man manifested in the orb of the rising Sun by means of Ṛgvedic hymns addressed to the Sun, thus:

14.* The light of the Sun-god (the Creator of the universe) which dispenses the fruit of actions, is transcendental to

* (i) VR.: We take shelter with the brilliantly luminous form of god Viṣṇu—Viṣṇu who is beyond the sphere of Prakṛti and whose knowledge is ever manifesting, eternal and limitless. He created this universe by His Will (-power). He entered again his own creation, along with Jīva, charged with his power (or it is by his Will-power and knowledge that he entered the universe consisting of the sentients and insentients). He sees (protects) the Jīva who hankers after the objects of senses and who enjoys the fruits of his action by his intelligence leading to the miseries of the cycle of births and deaths.

(ii) VJ.: You transcend (i.e. are superior to and beyond) Prakṛti or are free from rajas. You are the maker of the world. You have perfect knowledge of everything. Being established by the Vedas, you are the offspring of the Vedas. The Lord created this universe by his mental power. By his power, he entered the universe and stayed there as the controller. You put an end to miseries. You are the Lord of all jīvas who are full of cravings (of all kinds). We eulogize you.

(iii) SD.: This verse elucidates the meaning of Gāyatrī. The main idea is: “Lord Vāsudeva is the creator of the universe. To his brilliantly shining golden form, we take shelter.”
Prakṛti (lit. is beyond rajas, is purely Sāttvic unalloyed with rajas and tāmas). It created this (phenomenal universe) by its will (power) only, and having entered it (as the antaryāmin—the Inner Controller), it protects, by its intellectual capacity, the jīva who seeks its help. We resort to that light which actuates our intellect.

CHAPTER EIGHT
(Bharata reborn as a deer)

1. Once upon a time, after finishing the necessary (bodily) acts (e.g. urination), Bharata bathed in the great river (the Gaṇḍakāti) and completed his routine of general and special religious duties. He then sat on the bank of the river, repeating the sacred syllable Om, for a period of three muhūrtas.

2. At that time, Oh King, there approached near the river, a female deer, all alone, to satisfy her thirst.
3. Exactly at that time, while she continued to drink water with avidity, there arose, not far from the place, a terrifically loud cry of a roaring lion, panicking the world.
4. The female deer was timid by nature. Hearing it, with frightened looks, she became panicky at heart, with the

(iv) GD.: This verse brings out the following characteristics of the Lord:
(1) The creator of the universe; (2) the protector of the world; (3) Being a witness—aloof and above the world; (4) Being the inner controller as follows:
(1) His lustre being identical with the Lord’s form created the universe with his mental power. (2) From him does the wealth i.e. the fruit of Karmas, issue. (3) Having re-entered the universe, he, by his cit-sakti (intellectual capacity) sees the Jīva hankering after pleasures. (4) He motivates the intellect, organs of senses and vital airs among beings.

fear of the lion. With her eyes swimming and thirst unquenched, she suddenly leapt across the river through fear.

5. When the doe which was carrying leapt over, the foetus in her which became dislodged through terrific fear, got discharged from her organ of generation and fell into the river.

6. That devoted female companion of a black antelope was afflicted with exhaustion caused by the abortion, (unusually) long jump and fear (of the lion), she strayed away from her herd, rushed into a cave and fell dead.

7. The royal sage Bharata noticed that the helpless young one of the deer was being carried away by the current. Out of compassion, he picked it up, as it was abandoned by its relatives, and took it to his hermitage, as it was motherless.

8. They say that he developed intense attachment for it, feeling the young deer to be his own. Day by day, he got engrossed in its feeding, protection (from wolves etc.), caressing and pleasing it (with scratching etc.). When he got so fondly attached to it in the course of some days, his daily righteous duties along with yamas (moral observances like non-violence—ahimsā etc.), worship of the Supreme Lord and others, became neglected one by one, and soon all of them were abandoned by him.

9. (Bharata said to himself) : “Alas! What a pity! This poor unfortunate young deer has, due to the velocity of the rotation of the wheel of Time, been separated from its kith and kin and friends, and has resorted to me as a shelter. It regards me only as its father, mother, brother and relative and as a companion in its herd. Nor does it know anyone else. It has placed its absolute trust in me. I know the gravity of the sin in letting down a person seeking my protection. Hence it is up to me that I, with envy towards none, should look after the feeding, protection, satisfaction and fondling of this young deer which completely depends on me.”

10. For certainly, self-restrained and tranquil-minded noble worthies who are friendly to the poor and wretched, disregard even their bigger interests for such (compassionate acts).

11. In this way he felt attachment to it. His heart was bound down with affection for the fawn while he was sitting, sleeping, wandering, standing, eating and doing such other acts.

12. When he wanted to bring the (blades of) Kusa grass, flowers, sacrificial sticks, leaves, fruits, roots and water, he went into the forest along with the young one of the deer, as he apprehended danger to the life of the fawn from wolves and dogs.

13. When due to its innocent nature, it became stuck up at various places on the way, he, with his heart overwhelmed with excessive affection, bore it on his shoulder, out of pity for it. In this way, by placing it on his lap, hugging it to his bosom and by fondling it, he derived the highest pleasure.

14. Even during the course of performing his religious duties, he used to rise up frequently at intervals to have a look at it, and with his heart reassured, the Lord of the Bhara varsha continent expressed his blessing with the words, "may you be safe from all sides, my child".

15. On other occasions (when he did not see the fawn), he felt excessively anxious about it like a miser who has lost his wealth. With extreme anxiety and full of tenderness and compassion, his heart was tormented, with the pangs of separation from the fawn. Being overcome with great infatuation and lamenting for the young deer, verily, it is said that he used to lament (lit. express himself) as follows:

16. "Oh! Is it possible? Will that pitiable motherless young one of the deer place its confidence again in me who am, alas! ignoble, of deceitful and cruel nature like a cunning Kirata and who have done no meritorious acts? Will it return (to me) forgetting and forgiving my faults by its inherent goodness and purity of heart like a saintly person?

17. Shall I be able to see it (again), protected by God, and safely grazing tender leaves of grass in the garden of the hermitage?

18. (How strongly I wish) that no wolf, or dog or any other gregarious animal (like boar) or solitary wanderer (like a tiger) eats it.

19. The glorious Lord (the Sun), which rises for the weal of the whole world and which is the Soul of the triad of Vedas (the Ṛg, Yajus and Sāman) is (now) certainly setting. But still the fawn, the charge entrusted to me by the female deer, has not arrived.

20. Would that the princely young deer return and delight me who have done no righteous deed, and remove the anxiety and sorrow of his near and dear ones, by its manifold beautiful, pleasing, sportive fawn-like activities?

21. When in joke, I close my eyes in sham meditation, out of anger resulting from affection, it would approach me hesitatingly with awe. And with the tips of its horns soft like drops of water, it would strike at me.

22. When it is chided by me for polluting (by nibbling) the Kuśa grass on which the sacrificial offerings are placed, it being extremely afraid, immediately desists from its sport (sportiveness) and stays steady without moving its limbs, like a boy-sage with all his senses controlled. Oh! What wonderful penance must have been practised by this fortunate earth!"

23. (After saying the above words, he went out and found the prints of the hooves of the deer and said): "By means of the rows of the imprint of tiny, charming, auspicious-most hoofs of the docile young one of the black-antelope, the earth indicates the track of the treasure-trove (viz. the lost fawn) to me, a wretched person, who am afflicted due to my being deprived of my wealth (the young deer). And having got herself beautified with those foot-prints, she becomes transformed into a sacrificial place\(^{193}\) for the twice-born ones (dvijas) aspiring after Svarga (heaven) and Mokṣa (the final beatitude).

24. (Looking at the Moon that has arisen, he imagined that the deer-like spot on the disc of the Moon was his fawn). Maybe that, out of compassion, the glorious Lord of stars who is kind to the poor and afflicted, protects, from the fear of the lion, this fawn whose mother is dead and which has strayed away from its hermitage (shelter).

25. Or it may be that with its cool, soothing and (due to affection) profusely flowing drivel in the form of rays, the

---

\(^{193}\) Śr. quotes a Smṛti text to support the sanctifying effect of the foot-prints of black antelopes rendering that place fit for performing sacrifices: \textit{yasmin deśe mṛgah kṛpas tasmin dharmān nibodhata/Cf. Manu 2.23.}
Moon soothes me whose land-lotus-like heart is scorched by the flames of the forest conflagration of the fever (torments) of separation from my child (-like fawn), and who, in search of the fawn, am following the young one of the doe.”

26. In this way, the heart of Bharata was overcome with wishes which could not be accomplished. By the force of his own destiny (lit. fruition of his deeds done in previous birth) which appeared in the form of that fawn, Bharata the Yogi and the sage, swerved from the yogic practices and his acts for propitiating the glorious Lord. How else there would be such an intense attachment to the young one of a deer—an animal of a different species—in Bharata who formerly considered his own sons—with whom it is so very difficult to part—as veritable impediments in the attainment of Liberation and separated himself from them. In this way, the practice of Yoga, commenced by the royal sage Bharata, got interrupted. He forgot the real nature of the Soul (or himself) while feeding, protecting, pleasing and caressing the young deer. Meanwhile just as a serpent rushes to the hole of a rat, the inevitable time of death, of terrific speed, arrived.

27. Even at that time, he wistfully fixed his glance on the deer which like unto a son was mourning by his side. With his heart fixed on the fawn, he left this world. He did not lose the memory of his previous life along with his dead body, but like other (ordinary jivas with such obsessions at the time of death*) got the body of (birth as) a deer.

28. Even in that life as a deer, by virtue of his (endeavouring at) propitiation of the Lord (in his previous birth) he remembered the cause of his birth as a deer and being greatly tormented with repentance, he said:

29. “Alas! How painful it is! I strayed away from the path of the knowers of the Supreme Self. With great fortitude I divested myself from attachment of every kind and resorted

---

194. VR. includes under these the three kinds of Yoga viz. Jhāna-yoga, Karma-yoga and Bhakti-yoga and these are regarded as the three kinds of austerities which Bharata practised.

*Cl. yath yat utpī smaran bhūvaṃ yajatyante kalvaram/ tath tam evaiti to a secluded sacred forest. Self-controlled as I was, I completely devoted and concentrated my mind on the venerable Lord Vāsudeva who is the (antaryāmin) inner controller of all, I utilized fully all the time, every moment of which was devoted with energetic efforts to the listening to the excellences of the Lord, reasoning and pondering over them, extolling his virtues, worshipping him, constantly remembering him. That mind of my ignorant self in a moment flowed (was attracted) to a young one of a deer from far afar”.

30. Thus being full of deep remorse, he left his mother-deer. And from Kālaśijara hill (his birth place), he returned again to the hermitage of Pulastya-Pulaha at Śālagrāma, a holy place consecrated to the Lord, a place favourite with sages who have attained self-control and serenity of mind.

31. Even there, he waited for the termination of his life (lit. death). He was so terribly disgusted with attachment that he lived all alone. Subsisting on dry leaves, grass and creepers he was counting (his days) for the exhaustion of (his karma which was) the cause of his birth as a deer. (Ultimately) he cast off his body of a deer immersing half of it in the sacred waters of the Gaṇḍakī.

CHAPTER NINE

(Bharata, reborn as a Brāhmaṇa, saved by Bhadrakāli)

Sri Śūka said:

1. Then (after Bharata’s quitting his body as a deer, the story of Bharata proceeds as follows).

There lived a certain holy Brāhmaṇa, foremost in the clan of Aṅgiras. He was possessed of self-control and tranquility of mind. He was noted for his austerities, study of the Vedas, liberal hospitality, contentment, endurance, modesty, knowledge of rituals, non-jealousy, knowledge of the Supreme Self (as being different from the body) and felicity (as a result of righteousness). (From his elder wife) he got nine sons, all similar to him in scholarship, nobility of character, righteous conduct, handsomeness and liberality. From his younger wife was born a twin—a son and a daughter.

2. They say that the male among the twins was Bharata, the great votary of the Lord, the foremost among royal sages. He cast off the body of a deer and as the last incarnation (before final beatitude) was born as a Brāhmaṇa.

3. In this birth also, he was terribly afraid of attachment to his relatives. He specifically contemplated in his mind the pair of the lotus-feet of the glorious Lord who cuts asunder bondage of Karma of those who listen to, meditate upon and extol the excellences of the Lord. He remembered the series of his previous incarnations through the grace of the Lord and being apprehensive of his fall (as in his previous life), he presented himself to the world as being an insane, stupid, blind and deaf person.

4. With his heart deeply attached to his son through filial affection, the Brāhmaṇa verily performed all the sacred ceremonies (Saṁskāras) up to Samāvartana as prescribed in the Śastra. To his son whose upanayana ceremony (for investiture of the sacred thread for the beginning of the study of the Vedas) was performed, he taught him well the rules of conduct such as the Śāstric way of personal purity of performing ācamaṇa (sipping water before and after meal and while performing sandhyā etc.) and other rules of performing sacred duties, even though they were not to the liking of his son; for (according to Śāstric injunctions) a son must be instructed (in the observance of religious duties) by his father.

5. And he (Bharata) also used to behave in the wrong

196. Samāvartana was originally a ceremonial bath after finishing Veda study. It marked the termination of studenthood. Some texts on dharma Śastra regarded it as a subordinate element (sāga) of marriage. The Brāhmaṇa did not want to get the stupid son married. Hence he completed the purificatory ceremonies up to Samāvartana. For details of this ceremony vide Kāne Hist. of Dharma Śastra, pp. 409-415.
way, contrary to the instructions (of his father) in his father's presence. The father intended to instruct him in the Vedas (in the month of Śrāvaṇa). But in spite of his continuous instructions during the months of the spring ( Caitra and Vaiśākha), and the months of the summer ( Jyeṣṭha and Āṣāḍha) he could hardly teach the boy the three-footed Solar-hymn (known as Gāyatrī mantra), along with Vyāhṛti; (the mystic syllables bhūḥ, bhuvah and suvaḥ) with the sacred syllable OM at the beginning.

6. In this way, the Brähmaṇa's heart was fixed on his son who was his own self. He stuck fast to the false notion that a son must be made learned at all costs. He taught Bharata all the duties of upakuruṣa celibate, viz., cleanliness and purity, Vedic studies, observance of vows, self-discipline, service of the preceptor, worship of the sacrificial fire and others, even though Bharata had no regard for them. But he could not realise his ambition. In the meanwhile, the Brähmaṇa who, due to his attachment to domestic life, remained negligent (about his spiritual good) was taken away by the ever vigilant death.

7. Having entrusted the twin children that were born from her, to the care of her co-wife, the younger pious wife of the Brähmaṇa died after him (by immolating herself on his funeral pyre) and attained to the region of her Lord.

8. When the father died, (Bharata's) brothers who were ignorant of his superhuman power and greatness, and who, being (totally) ignorant of the higher knowledge (viz. that

197. GD.: The word iva implies that whatever a knower of Brahman does, is right and true, though it may appear strange to ordinary people.

198. VC. illustrates: He used to take śacamana before going for urination and not after. GD. explains: the words iva express wonder at the necessity of compliance to his father's request when Bharata had realised Brahman.

199. I.e. in spite of instruction for four months, Bharata could hardly pronounce the following Gāyatrī Mantra:

```
Om, bhūḥ bhuvah suvaḥ tat Savitur vareṇyam / bhargo devasya dhīmahi, dhiyo yo nah praśodayāti //
```

900. upakuruṣa—A Brähmaṇa in a state of pupillage (Brahmacārin) who wishes to pass on to the state of a householder.
of the Self or Brahman), regarded knowledge of the three Vedas (i.e. karma-kāṇḍa enjoined therein) as the highest knowledge, thought him to be dull-witted and desisted from their duty of teaching their brother.

9. When he was addressed by ignorant bi-ped brutes (e.g. men) as madman, a stupid or a deaf fellow, he replied to them suitably (according to the implications of the epithets given by them). When he was made to work according to the will of another person, he worked. He used to partake whatever food he got, in return for wages or forced labour (without wages), by way of begging or unsolicited, whether it be little or plenty, savoury or otherwise, but (he never ate) for the gratification of his senses. For he attained the knowledge of his Self which is not the product of any cause but is self-existent, of the nature of extremely pure bliss; and he never identified himself with his body in pleasure or pain caused by pairs of opposites (like heat, cold, respect, disrespect).

10. Stout and muscular as he was, he wandered about barebodied like a bull, in cold (the winter) and heat (the summer), in stormy winds and showers (the rainy season). He lay down on the bare ground to sleep; had not massaged his body (with oil); nor did he ever take a bath. Under the coating of the dirt (so accumulated on his body), his spiritual glory remained unmanifested just as the brilliance of a big gem is obscured by a coating of dust. His loins were covered with a dirty cloth. With his dirty-most sacred thread, he was (contemptuously) ridiculed as ‘a nominal Brāhmaṇa’, ‘an unworthy Brāhmaṇa’ (a Brāhmaṇa by caste only), by persons ignorant of his real greatness.

11. When, however, he wished to have food (for his livelihood) in return (as wages) for work, from others, he was employed even by his brothers in farm work, on agricultural farms. He did it but he did not (care to) know whether the ground was level or uneven or whether he worked less or more (in proportion to the wages). He swallowed, as if it were nectar, the broken rice, oil cake, husk, worm-eaten grains (called Kulmāṣa), charred rice sticking to the bottom of the boiling pot (offered as remuneration for work).

12. Now, on one occasion, a certain chieftain of robbers
(of Śūdra caste) desirous of having a child, was about to offer a man as a sacrificial beast to goddess Bhadrakāli.

13. The animal (i.e. the man brought for being sacrificed) providentially escaped. The servants of the chieftain who ran in all directions on the track of the (luckily escaped) victim in (the darkness of) the night, could not catch the 'beast', even at midnight owing to thick darkness. By chance (however) they saw the famous scion of the Āṅgirās family in the Vīrāsana posture guarding the fields against deer, boars and other beasts.

14. Observing him to be of defectless limbs and feeling pretty sure that it will serve their master's purpose thereby, they bound him with a rope and brought him to the temple of the goddess Caṇḍikā (Bhadraṅgā), their faces blooming with joy.

15. The Paṇis (robbers) bathed him in their own ritualistic way, covered him with new (unwashed) piece of cloth, decorated him with ornaments, pigments, garlands, a sandalpaste mark on the forehead etc., fed him (to his fill). Taking with them burning incense, lamps (torches), wreaths of flowers, fried grains, tender shoots and sprouts and offerings of fruits according to their traditional ritual of human sacrifice and in accompaniment of loud music, singing of panegyrics and beating of drums and the musical instrument called Paṇava, they made the human (sacrificial) animal sit before the goddess Bhadrakāli.

16. The robber chieftain of the Vṛṣalas (Śūdras) wishing to worship the goddess Bhadrakāli with the wine in the form of human blood of the man sacrificed as a beast, took a very terrible sword charmed with the specific incantation (of Bhadrakāli).

17. The nature of the Vṛṣalas (Śūdras) was dominated by rajas and tamas. Their minds grew haughty due to the rajas, the pride of wealth. In utter disrespect for the family

201. VD. quotes it as follows:

grdhvakāni, virāpāksi, lambo-stavi, mahodari /
hana satrum triśūlena krudhaya pīha jopitaṃ //
He gives an alternate incantation:

Kāli-kāli, Mahā-kāli etc.
of Brāhmaṇas, (who are) the leaders possessing (and preserving) the Vedas, the rays of the venerable Lord, they strayed wilfully on the wrong (sinful) way and sported in acts of violence (as an amusement). The goddess Bhadrakālī noticed the terrible-most act of immolating the son of a Brāhmaṇa sage who had become one with Brahman, and who was above enmity, and a friend of all beings—the killing of whom is not permissible even in (such an) imminent danger wherein violence is allowed. With her body fiercely scorched with the extremely unbearable Brahmanic lustre, the goddess suddenly exploded forth from the image.

18. In extreme wrath and indignation, her terrible face with her branch-like arched eyebrows thrown up in agitation, her dreadful, curved jaws and the movement of her blood-red eyes, showed that she was as if bent on destroying this world. In terrible rage, she roared forth a thunderous laugh. Springing forward, she cut off the heads of those wicked sinners with that very sword (with which the king was to slay Bharata) and drank to her fill, along with attendants, hot wine of the blood gushing forth from their throats. Intoxicated with over-drinking of that blood-wine, she sang at the topmost pitch of her voice in company of her attendants, and danced and played with the ball-like lopped heads.

19. In this way, verily, a malevolent aggressive black magic to kill the great-souled ones totally rebounds against the exorciser.

20. Oh Viṣṇudatta (King Parīkṣit)! It is not a great miracle in the case of the great devotees of the Lord who are free from all attachment to the world (Parama-hamsas) that they remain unperturbed even if the calamity of getting beheaded is impending; for they have resolved the formidable knot in their heart—the knot viz., the identification of their Self with their body—and who are well-wishers of all the beings in their heart and are above all enmity. They have resorted to the feet of the Lord and are protected from all sides by the venerable Lord Himself directly, by the ever-vigilant weapon called the discus of Time and through various forms (like Bhadrakālī here).

202. VD. quotes an Agama text—prohibiting human sacrifices in general and of a Brāhmaṇa in particular. The quotation from the Black Yajurveda indicating human sacrifice does not involve actual killing as explained by the annotator. A.B. Keith, the translator of the Black Yajurveda, also shows that actual human sacrifices were not current in Vedic times. (The Religion & Philosophy of the Veda and Upaniṣads—pp. 347-48).

(Bharata’s Life: King Rahugana accepts discipleship)

Srī Sūka said:

(The following incident took place when Rahugana, a King of Sindhu-Sauvīra, was going to the sage Kapila for instruction in philosophy).

1. One day, while Rahugana, the King of Sindhu-Sauvīra, was proceeding (to Kapila), the captain of the palanquin-bearers who was in search of a palanquin-bearer, providentially found this excellent Brāhmaṇa (viz. Bharata). (He thought that) this stout, young man of sturdy constitution was fit to carry any load like a bull or a donkey. Bharata was taken perforce along with others who were already so employed to carry on the forced labour without remuneration even though he (Bharata) did not deserve it, that exalted personage carried the palanquin.

2. The gait of the great Brāhmaṇa who (in order to avoid injury to others) walked after carefully looking the ground ahead to the length of arrow, did not conform to that of other men (bearing the palanquin) Rahugana felt the jolts of the irregular movement of the palanquin. He spoke to the men (palanquin-bearers), “On bearers, walk properly. Why is the vehicle (palanquin) borne so irregularly?”

203. Sindhu-Suvīra—Names of two adjacent countries, Sindhu and Sauvīra. Ancient Sauvīra was situated to the east of the lower Indus and included Multan on the north. According to Alberuni, Sauvīra included Multan and Jahrawar. Sindhu lay to the west and Sauvīra to the east of the lower Indus. D.C. Sircar GAMI 39 and 113. For other identifications see N.L. De: GDAMI, p. 183.
3. Hearing the taunting words of the master, they, afraid in their minds of the application of the fourth remedy (viz. corporal punishment) to them, humbly submitted to him.

4. "Oh Lord of men! We are not negligent. We are properly carrying (the palanquin) in complete obedience to your majesty’s commands. Though employed just afresh (just now), this (new) fellow does not walk quickly. Hence we are not able to carry the palanquin with him."

5. He (King Rahūgaṇa) realized that the contagious fault (disease) even of one man certainly becomes the fault of all who come in contact with him. Though he had waited upon the elderly (wise) person, his original (Kṣatriya) nature overpowered him. His intelligence was clouded (lit. covered) with rajo-guṇa. Getting slightly enraged, he spoke (sarcastically to Bharata) whose Brähmanic Justre remained unmanifested like fire (covered with ashes).

6. "Alas! What a pity, brother! You are obviously very much exhausted. Your honour alone has carried the palanquin to a great distance for a long time, and these other co-bearers are as good as non-existent. You are neither stout nor possessing a well built body. And you are overcome with old age, oh friend!" Though he was thus severely reproached in an insulting manner, he (Bharata) who had never superimposed the false notion of I-ness and mine-ness on his final body which was created by nescience (avidyā) as a combination of gross matter (five elements), attributes (ten sense organs), (effects of past) actions (merits and sins) and the mind—a unreal configuration of aggregates and who was on the verge of merging into Brahman, silently carried the palanquin as before.

7. Later on, when the palanquin was borne irregularly again, Rahūgaṇa flared up in rage and said, "Oh! What does sanyak prayuktāḥ siddhayeśaḥ dandaḥ tvagatikā gatiḥ //

Tājinałkya Smṛti 1.346

Conciliation or negotiation (sāman), bribery (dāna), sowing dissension (bheda) and punishment (danda) are the stratagems or expedients to deal with enemies (in the case of Kings).

205. Brahma-bhūta—(i) One whose mind is absorbed in Brahman—VJ.
   (ii) One who has realized the identity of his self and Brahman by the cessation of avidyā—GD.
this mean? You are (as good as) dead though alive. Dis-daining me (who am your lord), you transgress the command of your lord. Like unto Yama, (the god with a rod) who metes out punishment to people, I shall administer the corrective remedy to you, a negligent fellow, so that you will come to your senses."

8. The venerable Brähmana who was to be absorbed into the Supreme Spirit (Brahman) was the well-wisher of all beings (even those who offended him), the very self of them al. Totally free from pride, he spoke with a slight smile to Rahügaṇa who indulged in a good deal of irrelevant bragging.
This way Rahügaṇa who was puffed up with the pride of being the lord of men, who being inebriated with arrogance and infatuation born of rajas and tamaś contemptuously disregarded the whole community of the votaries of the Lord (who are beloved of him) by insulting Bharata, who, though (in conceit wrongly) considered himself to be learned, had little knowledge of the modes of behaviour of masters of yoga.

The Brähmana said:

9* What you stated (about fatigue, bearing palanquin alone for a long distance, etc. in 6 above) is a fact. There is no sarcasm (therein) Oh warrior! If there be anything like a burden, and if it be borne by a body called bearer, and if the body has any relation with me, then the taunt would apply to me. (But that is not the case due to the unreality of the burden and the bearer and their non-relation to me—the self). So also if a station is to be reached by the goer, there

* (i) What you spoke is true from the popular point of view. But if there be a burden to the bearer, the consequent fatigue is possible; it however is not applicable to me as I am not carrying anything. If there be some station to be reached there would have been distance to be covered but such movement is obviously non-existent in my case. The epithet ‘fat’ may be applicable to the body which is a conglomeration of bhūtas and not to me in the language of those who have realized the Self (ātman) —VR.

(ii) VJ. endorses the same interpretation in different words.

206. v.l. addha—directly, in the real sense of the term.
would be (the existence of) the way. Only the fools and never the wise, apply the epithet ‘stout’ to the Soul. For this description is applicable to the (body which is) the conglomeration of bhūtas etc. (and not to the Soul).

10. Corpulence and emaciation, (bodily) pains and (mental) worries, hunger and thirst, fear, quarrelsomeness, desire, old age, sleep, attachment, anger, arrogance and griefs—all these apply to one who is born with a body, but not to me (who am the self and not the body).

11. (As for your words, “You are as good as dead though alive”, I say that): Simultaneousness of life and death is the law found applicable to everything that is a product (and hence subject to transformation, and not limited to me) for all products have a beginning and an end. (As for your charge of transgressing your orders), Oh praiseworthy king! If the relation as servant and master were real and permanent, then only would the relation between order and its execution be real. (But if you lose your kingdom and I become a king, the whole relation will be reversed).

12* (If you think that I am a servant so long as you are the king) we do not find the slightest ground for the notion of the difference as king and his servant, except conventional verbal usage. Who is then the ruler and what it is to be governed (servant)? However (if you still entertain the notion of being the ruler) please tell what we should do for you.

207. Just as you concentrate in ruling your kingdom, pay similar attention to what I say—GD.

208. I am by nature the Supreme Soul to which the epithet ‘stout’ is slanderous.—VC.

* (i) VJ. goes out of his way to prove the superiority of Hari to Rudra while explaining this verse:

Master-servant relation is reversible in the case of men but not so in the case of gods. This unchangeable lordship among gods is conferred on Rudra by Hari—the real Ruler. The ignorant subjects of Sindhu call you a ruler. But this is a conventional verbal usage. You are in no way superior to other jivas. However granting that you are the ruler, please tell us what should be done for you.

(ii) GD. waxes eloquent to establish the Śuddhādvaita thesis: The pure Brahman (unsoiled by Māyā etc.) is the reality and not the master-servant relation. He does not differ in the interpretation.
13* (Bharata presents a dilemma to show that the King's threat of punishment is wide of mark. If I be a mukta—beyond bondage of samsāra what purpose and to what extent, can be served by your treatment (punishment) or lessons to me who am established in the self, though appearing like a lunatic, intoxicated or dull-witted person. (If I be not a mukta the proposed punishment or lesson to a person who is obstinate or insane is (as useless as) grinding flour, Oh warrior."

Śrī Śuka said:

14. In this way, Bharata replied (each and every) statement (of the king) after recapitulating them. The great sage was tranquil and self-controlled by nature. Nescience—the cause of false identification of the body with the Soul, had ceased in him. He wanted to exhaust by sufferance (the effect of) the karma that was bearing fruition, and (thence) he continued to bear the vehicle of the king.

15. By the force of his genuine right faith, the king of Sindhu-Sauvīra countries became eligible to enquire into the Truth. Having (carefully) listened to the speech of the Brāhmaṇa which was calculated to resolve the knot (of ignorance) at one's heart and which was approved of (and supported by) many treatises on Yoga (self-knowledge), he got down (from the palanquin) in haste, and prostrated himself (before him) with his head at the sage's feet. Beseeching forgiveness (for his rudeness), and completely free from the pride of his royalty, he said:

16. "Who are you of the great Brāhmaṇas who go about in disguise, as you wear the sacred thread? Who are you among the avadhūtas (like Dattātreya and others, if you be an avadhūta)? Whose son are you? What is your native place? Why have you come here? If you have come for our spiritual well-being, are you not the sage Kapila?

* VJ. : Bharata explains to the king that despite his appearance like a mad person etc., he is totally immersed in Lord Hari; and as such, the punishment proposed is useless; for he has completely detached himself from his corporal body.

209. Your prowess may have been effective elsewhere, but is vain against me.
17. I am not afraid of the thunderbolt of the lord of gods (Indra), of the trident of the three-eyed god (Śiva), or of the rod of Yama (the god of death). I do not fear the missiles of (the fire-god), the Sun-god, the wind-god and the lord of wealth (Kubera). But I am terribly afraid of disrespecting the Brāhmaṇa race.

18. Hence please tell me. You are free from attachment. Though you possess infinite power, you conceal your superior wisdom and prowess, and roam about like a dull-witted person. Oh pious sage, your words are couched in yogic terms (or conveying the advice of great yogis) as such, are not capable of being comprehended by our minds. (Or-Even persons of keen intellect cannot grasp the significance of your speech couched in yogic terms).

19. “What is the true asylum in this Samsāra”? To ask this, I am now proceeding to Kapila who is master of yoga, and the supreme preceptor of sages who have realized the true nature of the Self; who is Hari incarnate and has incarnated in this world by his power of supreme knowledge.

20. It may be that perhaps your honour verily be Kapila himself, who is going about incognito, for observing the condition of the people. How can a person attached to house-(holder’s worldly) life, with intellect blinded (by infatuation), fathom the ways (of behaviour) of the masters of yoga?

21. (The king raises objections to Bharata’s speech given above*).

I have experienced fatigue through activity (e.g. fighting in battle). By inference I presume that your honour must have felt the same when carrying a load while walking. The course of the phenomenal world must be real at the bottom; for, otherwise it is impossible to carry water etc. with a non-existent pitcher.

---

*ŚR. expounds the logic in the king’s speech by detailing the syllogisms as follows:

He who does work, feels exhausted.

e.g., I feel exhausted in fighting etc.

You have carried the burden of my palanquin. Therefore you must have been exhausted. Hence, your statement that you did not feel fatigue (verse 9) is illogical.
22. The heat of fire applied to the vessel is conducted to the water (in the pot); the heat of the water leads to the softening of the grains of rice from inside. Due to the contact with the body, sense-organs and the life-breath and the mind, the state of saṁsāra affects the jīva, as the states of environments affect each other.

23. (As to the impermanence of the master-servant relation mentioned by you:)

The king is (for that particular period at least) the (real) controller and protector of the subjects. He who is the servant of Acyuta does not grind the already ground material flour. (His performance of duties is not wasted). For by carrying out his righteous duties he propitiates Lord Acyuta and gets rid of his sins.

24. Oh friend of the distressed, be pleased, therefore, to cast a friendly glance at me who, out of my intoxicating pride of being the ruler of men, have treated with contempt the best of saints, so that I may be able to cross over the sin of showing disrespect to the the righteous people.

25. (The king refers to Bharata’s words that he was not insulted etc., and says)

There may not be any change (perturbation of mind) in you who are a well-wisher and friend of the universe and who, out of his sense of equality to all, are completely devoid of attachment (even to your body). But a person like me—even though he be Rudra, the bearer of trident, will certainly perish in near future as a result of his showing disrespect to the exalted.”

CHAPTER ELEVEN

(Bharata imparts spiritual knowledge to Raṅgaṇa)

The Brāhmaṇa said:

1. You are (really) ignorant. You (simply) give verbal expression to the arguments (which are apparently similar to those) of the learned. You will not, therefore, be (considered as) pre-eminent (in any way) among those who are supremely wise; for the sages never speak of mundane relations (e.g. the master-servant relation) along with their investigation into the nature of Reality. (You regard master-servant relation as real but the sages do not recognize it as such.

2.* (Similarly the ritualistic way—Karma-Kāṇḍa—described in the Vedas is also not true. In the highly glittering flowery descriptions in the Vedic texts pertaining to the detailed study of the minute rituals connected with the householder’s life, no light is definitely thrown on the exposition of the truth which is pure (i.e. free from the contamination of injury (hīṃsā) etc.) and good (i.e. devoid of passions like love, hate) as a rule (persons who dedicate all their karmas to God are eligible for such exposition of truth).

3. Not even the most authoritative Vedic (Upaniṣadic) texts can directly impart the comprehension of the Truth to a person who on the analogy of (the unreal, evanescent and hence worthless pleasures enjoyed in) a dream does not conclude that the (dreamlike) pleasures in the house-holder’s life (and those in heaven accruing from sacrifices) are by themselves worth casting off.

4. As long as the mind of a man is under the dominating influence of sattva, rajas or tamas, it goes on producing unchecked merit or sin through his sense-organs of perception and action.

5. The mind (which, as an upādhi of ātman, is designated as ātman) is a store-house of impressions unconsciously left by the good or bad actions in the past life; it is attached to objects of pleasures; it is tossed about by guṇas; it is affected by passions; it is the chief among sixteen constituents (elements, sense-organs etc.) of the Liṅga Śarīra (the subtle body). It assumes different forms (man, beast etc.) under different names, and extends (i.e. causes) higher or lower form of life in the various kinds of physical bodies.

* (1) VR.: Persons interested in performance of ritualistic karmas cannot be interested in pure knowledge. And in the former (i.e. karma-kāṇḍa) portion of the Vedas, no decisive conclusion is reached.

(ii) VC.: Mīmāṃsakas do not regard an objective (puruṣṭārtha) higher than heaven attained by karmas. Exposition of truth to such unqualified persons is a waste. For this truth is above the taint of passions and free from injury.
6. The mind, the limiting condition created (and imposed upon the Soul) by Māyā, entices it (the jīva) in the cycle of samsāra. By embracing the Soul associated with it, it subjects the jīva to pleasure, pain and other (viz. delusion), inevitable fruits of karmas at the proper time (of fruition).

7. So long as the mind exists, this phenomenon of waking and dream states manifests itself within the range of perception of the ksetrajña. It is hence that they (the wise ones) say that the mind is the cause of the lower state viz. samsāra (the product of guṇas) and of the higher state viz. Mokṣa (liberation), which is beyond the range of all guṇas.

8. If the mind is attached to objects of senses (which are the products of guṇas) it leads the creature to misery (viz. samsāra). If it is free from and unattached to them, it takes the jīva to eternal happiness (in Mokṣa). Just as a lamp which emanates flames mixed with soot while it consumes its wick soaked in ghee, otherwise (after the consumption of ghee) betakes itself to its original state, the mind, which is attached to objects of senses and (consequent) activities, resorts to various courses and returns to its true original self, when unattached (to them).

9. The courses (of the activities) of the mind are eleven—five in relation to the organs of action, five with reference to the senses of perception and its own sense of I-ness. And they say that conative organs, the subtle elements and the body are (respectively) the eleven grounds (receptacles) for these (courses), Oh Warrior.

10. Smell, form, touch, taste and sound (the five objects of cognitive organs), evacuation (of bowels), copulation, locomotion, verbal expression, and manipulation and the eleventh is the body which is accepted as mine; (And in the case of the ignorant who have completely identified themselves with the body, the I-ness is the twelfth course (of the mind) with the body as its object or bed (In the city viz. body, the jīva sleeps i.e. abides with ahamkāra and is hence called puruṣa).

210. sāmsṛti-cakra-kuṭaḥ—The jīva stands firm like a mountain-top in the whirlpool or cycle of samsāra.

211. V.l. nyatimiśra—a mixture of pleasure and pain.
11* These eleven modifications (tendencies) of the mind multiply into hundreds, thousands and multi-millions with reference to objects, nature of things (the variety of the causes of the products), the effect of previous experience, unmanifested effect of karmas (acts), the agitating factor Time. They owe their existence to the Kṣetrajña (the Supreme Soul) and not to each other or to their own Self. (Or: The Kṣetrajña or jīva, being above changes, these vṛttis do not proceed from jīva; nor do they spring from their mutual action and reaction nor from themselves. Hence all these are mithyā—unreal).

12. The Supreme Soul who is pure and unaffected, stands as a witness to the continuous stream of states of the mind which are sometimes manifest (in the waking and dream states) and sometimes unmanifest (as in deep sleep)—the mind, an upādhi of jīva, a creation of Māyā, and of impure activity.

13. The Supreme Soul is all-pervading, the prime cause of the perfect (in all respects), ever-present, self-luminous (not depending on anything for the proof of its existence), devoid of birth (and death), the Ruler of gods like Brahmā, Nārāyaṇa (the abode of the world of beings), the venerable Lord (of six excellences), Viṣṇudeva (the receptacle of all beings) and Himself the Inner-dweller and Controller of all jīvas by His Māyā power.

14. Just as the air, entering in the from of breath controls both the mobile and the immobile beings, so does the Supreme Lord Viṣṇudeva, the all-pervading Soul, enter this universe (as the Inner Controller).

15. Oh Lord of men! A man continues to wander in the saṃsāra so long as he has not shaken off Māyā, by the dawn of knowledge, and became free from attachments and conquered

* (i) VR. emphasizes that kṣetrajña here should be interpreted as jīva— the individual Soul. He however admits that the interpretation of kṣetrajña as Nārāyaṇa is possible.

(ii) VC: Due to infinite variety of objects (e.g. sandal, saffron) and variety of natures liking these, and differences in mind due to wickedness etc., destiny or fate and stages in life (childhood, youth etc.) these states or vṛttis of mind are infinite. But they owe this variety to God of infinite powers, and not to themselves individually or mutually.
the six enemies (viz. passions like lust, anger, avarice etc.) and has not realized his true Self.

16. (He continues to wander) so long as he does not understand that the mind, the conditioning environment of the Soul, is the field of the miseries of sannāra (the cycle of birth and death), and the source of a continuous series of griefs, delusions, diseases, passions, avarice and hatred and the creator of the feeling of mine-ness.

17. Therefore, being very careful and armed with the missile in the form of the feet of Lord Hari, Who is the preceptor, kill this enemy (in the form of the mind) of formidable power who has grown in strength through your negligence and who, though unreal in itself, is capable of deluding you about (the true nature of) your Soul.

CHAPTER TWELVE

(Dialogue between Bharata and Rahūgaṇa)

Rahūgaṇa said:

1.* Salutations to you again and again—you, who are the Prime Cause of the universe (God himself) who has assumed a human form (for the protection of the world), and who, in the light of supremely blissful self-realization, have regarded your body as insignificant. I bow to you. Oh Master

---

212. Verses 1-4 are an echo of the query made by Rahūgaṇa to Bharata in the same context in V.P. (Viṣṇu Purāṇa) 2.14.2-6.

* VJ. notes that this apparent praise of the Brāhmaṇa is really a eulogy of the antar-yāmin. VR. and others generally echo ŚR., but VR.'s alternative explanation is interesting:

"Salutations ... you who are the Supreme Self incarnate who have assumed human form for the protection of persons like me. In your self-realisation, you have banished hatred against persons (like me) who have offended you, and who have concealed your realization of the Eternal, Supreme Soul under the guise of the contemptuous dress of a depraved Brāhmaṇa".
of Yoga, who have concealed your realization of the Eternal (Supreme Soul) in the guise of a depraved Brähmana.

2. My vision (power of understanding) has been thoroughly poisoned (perverted) by the bite of the serpent in the form of (my) false identification of the self with this worthless body. Your speech acts like a nectarine medicine on me, just as a sweet palatable specific medicine (does) to a patient suffering from high fever or the ice-cold water (or the water of the Gaṅgā (is soothing) to a person scorched by the heat of the summer.

3. I shall, therefore, refer my doubts to your honour later on. My mind is full of curiosity. Now, be pleased to explain to me, in easily intelligible language, your speech which was couched in Yogic terms, about the (knowledge of the) Soul.

4. Oh Lord of Yoga! My mind fails to grasp (in bewilderment, the significance of) your statement that the (actual) act (of carrying a load) and its effect (the resultant fatigue) though visible (directly), are limited to (and not contradicted in) practical life (vyavahāra), but they will not easily stand the test of philosophic investigation.

Brähmana replied:

5. That which has come to be known as ‘this person’ (the palanquin bearer) is a modification of the earth which moves over the earth due to some (inexplicable) cause, Oh King! Above the feet of this (modification of the earth called ‘this person’) are two ankles, two shanks, two knees, two thighs, the waist, the chest, the neck and the two shoulders (one above the other).

6. On the shoulder is the wooden palanquin wherein is seated an (empty) designation called ‘the King of Sauvīras’—which is nothing but another modification of the earth. You identify yourself with it (that modification of the earth). Be-

---

213. Verses 5 and 6 are echoes of VP. 2.13.66-67.

Bhūmāu pāda-yugam tōḍistā janghe pāda-duṣyaśvīṣṭā drooṭ janghe-duṣya-dvasthau tadaddhāraya tathādārayah/66//
Yakṣasthālāh tathāḥ bāhā śkandhau cedara-samadhītehau skandhādriśayaṁ dibikā mama bharo'tra kīṁkṛtah/67//
ing blinded with arrogant pride, you feel that you are the king of the Sindhu country.

7. You are hard-hearted as you caught hold of these pitiable (palanquin-bearers) who are already highly afflicted with hardships and have forced them to labour without remuneration. Still you brag about as being ‘the protector of the people’. Shamelessly insolent as you are, you will not look respectable in the assemblies of the wise.

8. We know that all the mobile and immobile creation is always born out of and re-assimilated into the earth only. The difference in name is due to the difference in its product or functions. Let it be investigated if there be any other real cause or basis deducible from its effect and work (functions).

9. (The substance) that is denoted by the word ‘earth’ is unreal as (will be) explained thus (hereafter). The earth (in its ultimate analysis) disaggregates itself into atoms. The atoms, the aggregates of which combine to form the particular (element viz. the earth) are hypothetical, postulated by mind (of the theorists) through ignorance. (As a matter of fact, they do not exist. Hence the unreality of the earth).

10. Similarly, know that what is thin or fat, small or big, cause or effect, sentient and non-sentient or that which has a second (i.e., all the duality), is brought about by the Māyā (the unborn), under the name of substance (viz five elements), nature (the changeability of the phenomenal world), the inclination (determined by the impressions unconsciously left on the mind by past actions, i.e., vāsanā), the time factor (disturbing the equilibrium of gunas leading to creation) and the destiny (karma).

* VC: We know that all things mobile and immobile are created out of the earth and get disintegrated into the earth. All these modifications are not different from the earth. Please tell us if you have any reasoning or logical argument to show if there be any real cause other than mere verbal designations of its effects and functions.

214. cf. vāsārambhānam vikāro nāmadhyam mṛtiketyeva satyam,—Chāndogya Up. 6.1.4.
11*. Knowledge alone is pure (unsoiled by passion or actions), absolutely real, one (without any difference); devoid of any aspect of in-ness or out-ness, perfect and full, direct (self-manifesting), unchangeable, designated by the appellation Bhagavat (the venerable possessor of six excellences such as Lordship of the Universe etc.). They (the sages) called it ('knowledge') by the term 'Vāsudeva'.

12. Oh Rāhu-gaṇa! This knowledge (or Brahman) is not attained through austere penance, or through Vedic sacrifices or through charitable distribution of food or through performance of duties prescribed for a householder (such as honorary social service) or through the study of the Vedas or through propitiation of (the presiding deities of) water, fire and the Sun, except (i.e. it is attainable only) by being sprinkled over with the dust on the feet of the exalted Souls (while rendering service to them).

13. For here (in the congregation of these exalted persons) the discourses on the excellent attributes of the Lord are always held. These prohibit all talks of vulgar worldly topics. By listening daily to these (holy discourses) the pure mind of the seeker of Liberation is concentrated on Lord Vāsudeva.

14. I was formerly a king called Bharata who, freeing himself from the bondage of attachment to all things seen or

---

* (i) VR.: The Ātman or the Self is knowledge or consciousness. It is unsoiled by Karma (actions) and passions; it is the only highest objective to be attained (by man). It is absolutely one whole with no aspect of inness or outness. It is all-pervading, real, eternal, self-realizing (or direct) unaffected by the six miseries (such as hunger, thirst, sorrow, delusion, old age and death). It is Vāsudeva also called by the appellation bhagavat.

(ii) VJ. regards these as the attributes of Hari, the Supreme Self. He derives the term 'Vāsudeva'—oas—'to dwell', although he concedes the popular etymology 'the son of Vasudeva'.

GD. explains: 'Knowledge' means 'Brahman'. In the path of Bhakti, it is designated as bhagavat, the venerable Lord (the possessor of six excellences) and 'Vāsudeva'. It is essentially existent and of the nature of the highest bliss and consciousness or knowledge. Being direct (being Self-hood by nature) one need not go elsewhere to attain it. It is perfectly serene as it is devoid of birth, death or other troubles. It is 'pure' i.e. absolutely unconnected with any attachment. It is beyond the limitation of space as the states of outness or inness are inapplicable to it.
heard (i.e. objects obtainable here and hereafter) endeavoured the propitiation of the Lord, but was frustrated (in my object of God-realization) through my attachment to a deer and was born as a deer.

15. Due to the efficacy of my devoted worship of Kṛṣṇa that memory (of my previous birth) was not lost even in my form (i.e. birth) of the deer. Oli Warrior! Hence, being unattached to and afraid of association with the society, I roam about without disclosing my real personality.

16. Therefore a man should, in this very world, completely cut off (the ties of) delusion by the sword of knowledge obtained through the blessed company of the great Souls who are free from attachment. Having revived the memory (consciousness about God) by recounting and hearing (meditating upon) the glories of Hari, one reaches the end of this long road of Samsāra and attains to the Lord.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN
(The Samsāra—a forest: An allegory)

The Brāhmaṇa said:

1. Like unto a company of merchants intent on acquisition of wealth, this (well-known) multitude of jīvas desirous of and solely devoted to the attainment of pleasure, was put by the Prakṛti or Māyā, on the path (of Pravṛtti—active worldly life) which is unending and so difficult to traverse. It (the multitude of jīvas) sets its eye (attention) on the activities actuated and dominated by (the attributes) sattva, Rajas and Tamas. While wandering (in search of pleasure) in the forest of Samsāra (worldly existence), it does not find any bliss.

215. BP. artha:—dharma, artha and kāma—the three puruṣārthas (highest ideals in life).

216. VJ.: It (the multitude of jīvas) regards them as its own and identifies them with the Soul.
2.* In that forest these six bandits (viz. sense-organs) perforce rob the caravan captained by an evil-minded leader, Oh king. Just as wolves carry away the sheep, jackals (in the form of relatives), finding entrance into their camp, carry off a careless member (devoid of spiritual outlook).

3. In the forest, impregnable with the dense growth of a mass of creepers, grass, clumps of trees and bushes the caravan was harassed by sharp stinging gnats and mosquitoes (In the householder’s life full of passions and actions, a man is harassed by wicked people). At some places they find the city of Gandharvas in the sky (the phenomenon is fictitious; so is one’s body), while at other places, they witness fleeting spirits in the form of fire brands.

4. Oh (King Rahūgaṇa !) With their intellect (mind) naturally anxious to find some dwelling-place, water and wealth, the company of merchants ran here and there in the jungle. And at some places, with eyes blinded with dust, it does not distinguish the directions darkened with the dust whipped up by whirl-winds (Here the whirl-wind stands for a woman who raises erotic sentiments which blind man to the existence of the dieties presiding over directions who stand witness to his actions).

5. With their ears acutely pained by the shrill cries of unseen crickets (i.e. back-biting by evil-minded persons) and with their minds agitated by the hooting of the owls (i.e. harsh words, scolding directly addressed by enemies, persons in authority), they resort to unholy trees\(^{217}\) (i.e. irreligious persons) when tormented with hunger. At some places (when thirsty) they run after the mirage\(^{218}\) (i.e. fruitless objects of worldly pleasure).

* ŠR., VR., VC., SD., GD., BP., state that although the allegory is explained in the next chapter, they are briefly explaining it for reader's understanding the text of these verses.

\(^{217}\) This refers to the superstition that the shade of the vibhítaka tree (Terminalia Belerica) is inauspicious by day and that of Pippala tree by night and that of the wood apple tree, day and night—VD.

\(^{218}\) i.e. are attracted to the centres of the non-believers in Vedas—pākhaṇḍa āramaṇas—VJ.

(i) beg at the doors of notorious misers—VC.
6. At some place they go towards beds of dry rivers (only to get their limbs bruised by falling, instead of getting water); being short of food they beg it from one another. At some places they approach the forest conflagration only to get scorched; at other places, they find to their despair that they are deprived of their life (like wealth) by Yakṣas.\(^{219}\)

7. At some other places, it, being deprived of its possession by the powerful government officials (or village chiefs expert in robbery) becomes mentally despondent. Overcome with grief and bewildered, it faints away. At some places, it enters an imaginary city of Gandharvas (the company of loving near relatives) and feels overjoyed for a while, as it is really happy.

8. At some places, being desirous of scaling a mountain (i.e. attempting a great undertaking) it proceeds with the soles of its feet pierced with thorns and cut with gravel and sits down depressed in spirit. Tormented at every step by the inner (gastric) fire (or hunger), and with the (unbearable) responsibility of maintaining a large family, it gets angry with its own people.

9. Sometimes being swallowed up by the boa-constrictor (viz. sleep) it lies like a dead body abandoned in a jungle and is not conscious of anything. Sometimes bitten down by fierce venomous snakes, it becomes blind and falling into a well with its mouth hidden with overgrown grass and plants, it lies immersed in darkness (i.e. misery and ignorance).

10. At times (when) it seeks after honey of low quality (i.e. courting another man's wife) it is harassed and humiliated by bees (i.e. is insulted and beaten up by her husbands). If it (caravan members) is successful in that attempt with great difficulty, others rob it perforce, and while it is engaged in fighting with them, others carry off that booty.

11. And sometimes, (at some places), it (the caravan of merchants) sits down incapable of protecting itself against

---

219. Śr. explains: The dry riverbeds are the schools of the non-believers which lead to misery in the other world. The forest-fire is the household where the jīva is tormented with miseries. The Yakṣas and Rākṣasas are the government servants who squeeze out life-like wealth of men.
(lit. warding off) cold, heat, storm and showers of rain; at some other places they sell among themselves whatever they have with them and become enemies of each other by fraudulent money-dealings.

12. Now and then, being destitute of wealth, and devoid of bedding, blanket (to sit on), house and conveyance, they beg it from others. But not getting their desired objects, they cast a coveting glance at another man’s property and get insulted.

13. (Though) they develop hostile relations with each other by mutual (fraudulent) monetary transactions, they enter into marital relations with each other. Thus they proceed along their path, famished through suffering great difficulties, financial losses and other calamities (and feelings of hatred).

14. The caravan of merchants proceeds on its journey leaving behind those that are dead, at various places, and taking with them the new born babes. Nobody has as yet returned to its starting place. Nor does anyone (howsoever powerful) betake to yoga which lies at the terminus (of the road), Oh Warrior.

15. All those resolute and highminded warriors who have conquered the great elephants guarding the eight directions and who, claiming the earth as their own, have contracted hostility (with each other), shall lie dead on the battlefield. But they do not attain to the place (the region of Viṣṇu) where the recluse (the Sāṁnyāsin) who has been free from enmity, reaches,

16. At some places, it (the caravan) clings to the arms (tender shoots) of creepers (i.e. rests on the tender arms of women); it longs to listen to the indistinct chirping of birds which have resorted to them (i.e. listen to the sweet indistinct warbling of children clinging to their mothers). And it feels strongly attached to them. Occasionally, at other places, it is afraid of a multitude of lions and makes friends with cranes, herons and vultures (Being afraid of death, they enter the fold of vile, cruel heretics).

17. Being deceived by them, it (the company of merchants) tries to enter the flock of swans (i.e. knowing the futility of the false faiths, it tries to enter Brāhmanic fold). But not liking their pious way of life (i.e. not finding the Brahmānic way of life to their liking), it approaches the monkeys (i.e. takes to the monkey-like behaviour of depraved people). By the (amorous) sports natural to that species, it (the caravan) gets its senses gratified (with sensual pleasures) and forgets the (approaching) end of life, while looking at the faces of each other.

18. Amusing himself in the trees (i.e. worldly objects observed in life), he fondly loves his children and wife. Being powerless in their own bondage, he becomes void of judgment due to the lust for sexual enjoyment. Sometimes falling into a valley due to inadvertence, he catches hold of a creeper and remains in a hanging position, afraid of elephant (below) (i.e. due to the meritorious acts done in previous life, he continues to live in fear of impending death).

19. If, by a lucky chance, he anyhow overcomes this calamity, he again enters the company of merchants (i.e. takes to the path of pravṛtti or active worldly life), Oh vanquisher of enemies. A person who is set on this path (of Praṇāya) by Māyā (the unborn) continues to wander in saṃsāra. No such person has as yet perceived the highest Puruṣārtha (viz. Mokṣa or liberation).

20. Oh Rāhu! Even you are also set on this track (by Māyā). You lay down your sceptre (or desist from violence to living beings) and make friends with all beings. With your mind unattached to worldly pleasure and arming yourself with the sword of knowledge sharpened by (dedicated) service to Hari, get to the other end of this road (of saṃsāra).

The King said:

21. Oh! The birth as a man is the most glorious of all births in other species. Of what use are other births even in the heaven, where the association with high-souled people like you whose minds are purified by (singing and listening to) the glories of Lord Hṛṣīkeśa (the Ruler of sense-organs—Viṣṇu), is not available to the full?

220. Vṛ. interprets Āśrama as the propitiation of the Lord by observing duties prescribed for one’s caste (varṇa) and stage of life (āśrama) and jñāna as constituting the worship of the Lord.
22. It is no wonder (at all) that pure devotion to Lord Hari is generated in the hearts of those whose sins have been destroyed by the dust of your lotus-like feet (when constantly served for a long time). For my thoughtlessness and ignorance, rooted as it was in fallacious reasoning, has been completely removed by association with you for a short time (a mukūra).

23. (As it is not known in what form the knowers of Brahman move about in the world, the King pays his respects to them all). Salutations to Brāhmaṇas (knowers of Brahman), who are advanced in age, to those (who are) infants, to the youthful ones, to all down to young boys! May (blundering) kings like me receive blessings from Brāhmaṇas who wander over the earth as avadhūtas (ascetics who have renounced all worldly attachment), giving no indication of their greatness.

Śrī Śuka said:

24. Oh Parīkṣit (son of Uttara)! In this way, verily, (Bharata) the son of a Brāhmaṇa sage, who was endowed with the highest glory, explained, out of very great compassion, the real nature of the Self to (Rahūgaṇa) the King of Sindhu, even though he had insulted him. His feet were respectfully bowed by Rahūgaṇa with great remorse. Bharata, whose mind like that of an overful ocean, was unperturbed by waves in the form of senses, wandered over this earth.

25. Even the king of Sauvira (Rahūgaṇa) who realized the real nature of the Supreme Self as taught by a saintly person (like Bharata), repudiated the false notion of identifying the Soul with the body—a notion superimposed on the mind by Nescience (avidyā), Oh King! Such is, therefore, the greatness of those who resort to the devotees of the glorious Lord.

The King Parīkṣit said:

26. Oh great devotee of the Lord! The path in the form of Sāṁśāra of the individual souls has been described in indirect and allegorical language by you who possess very wide and varied knowledge. It will not be easily comprehensible to people who are not of trained mind. Hence, the same (allegory) which is difficult to understand, be pointed out (explained) by using the proper explanation.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

(Explanation of the Allegory of Samsāra—Forest)

He (Śrī Suka) said:

1. Characterised and influenced by special attributes like sattva and others, auspicious, inauspicious and mixed types of karmas (actions) are being committed by jīvas (individual Souls) who wrongly identify the body with the Soul. The group of six senses (five cognitive senses and the mind) act as the portals or media of experience of the beginningless samsāra, consisting of association with and separation from the series of different bodies, created as a result of those karmas.

Just as a caravan of merchants, intent on making money, loses its way to find itself in a wilderness, this company of jīvas (individual Souls) has been set on this difficult path (of samsāra), hard to travel like a mountain pass, by Māyā (the deluding potency of the Lord) which functions under the Supreme Ruler Viśṇu. It (the multitude of jīvas) finds itself in the wilderness of samsāra, in-auspicious-most like a funeral ground. It (i.e. the jīvas), experiences the fruit of their Karmas wrought by means of their bodies. Although all their activities are obstructed by numerous difficulties and rendered fruitless, they do not still betake themselves to the path of bees (votaries of the Lord) who resort to the lotus-like feet of Lord Hari in the form of the preceptor—feet which pacify all the afflictions and agonies of Samsāra. It is in the forest of Samsāra that what are called the six senses (mind and five senses) act as veritable robbers in practice.

2. For whatever little wealth a person acquires through great hardships, should be utilised for the sake of Dharma. The wise say that this Dharma, characterised by the propitiation of the Supreme Person Himself, is conducive to one's beatitude in the other world.

But the wealth of a man of perverted intellect and uncontrolled senses, which should have been used for the sake of this Dharma (worship of God), is wasted in house-holder's life on vulgar pleasures of sight, touch, sound, taste and smell (the five objects of sensual pleasures and in low desires and resolutions (mental tendencies), even as a company of merchants with an unworthy leader of uncontrolled mind is robbed of money.

3. And here (in the wilderness of samsāra) the so-called members of the family such as wife and children, are nothing but wolves and jackals in actions. They carry away the carefully-guarded wealth of the close-fisted householder, despite his watchfulness and unwillingness (to part with his wealth), like a lamb well-protected (in a pen).

4. For just as a field, the seeds (of weeds, grass etc.) in which are not burnt down, again becomes densely over-grown with a thicket of shrubs, grass and creepers at the time of sowing, even though it is (regularly) ploughed annually, in the same way, the householder's life is a field of karmas wherein the seeds of karmas are never destroyed. This householder's life is certainly a box of desires (in which seeds of karmas are never completely annihilated, just as the smell of camphor persists even after the exhaustion of camphor-tablets from the camphor-box).

5. While there, (in the householder's stage of life), his wealth which is the very external life-breath of man, is squeezed (lit. sucked) by vile people comparable to gnats and mosquitoes, and (food-grains) by locusts, birds, thieves, rats and others. At times, wandering on this road (of samsāra), his mind becomes eclipsed with ignorance (avidyā), lust or desires and actions. Hence being possessed of erroneous views, he looks upon the human world which is as unreal as the (optic illusion of) the city of Gandharvas, to be factually real.

6. There (in the samsāra), with a passionate desire for vicious habits of drinking, eating, sexual intercourse and the like, he sometimes pursues mirage-like (unreal) pleasures.
7. Sometimes, just as a man intensely longs for (the warmth of) fire, runs after the fire-goblin—the will of the wisp, he with his mind overpowered with the attribute rajas which is of the same colour as that of gold, ardently yearns to acquire gold which is the abode of all evils and is a kind of excreta of fire.

8. And again, with an earnest desire for dwelling-places, water, wealth and other numerous amenities of life and means of livelihood, it (the company of merchants) runs about here and there in the forest of samsāra.

9. Sometimes (when) placed on her lap, by a bewitching young woman who is like a whirlwind, his mind is instantly enveloped in ignorance, due to the force of rajas, and transgresses the boundaries of virtue. With his eyes filled with the dust of lust, his mind is too much charged with passion to cognize (the existence of) the presiding deities of the directions (who watch him).

10. Occasionally, he perceives spontaneously for a moment the unreality of worldly objects. But as he identifies the Soul with his body, he loses his memory about the nature of the Soul. With his memory (mind) thus led astray, he intensely pursues those very sense-objects which are (illusory) like mirage.

11. Sometimes, its (the company of merchants) ears and heart are intensely troubled by the extremely harsh and fiercely vehement threats administered directly, like hooting of the owls, by king's officers and indirectly (behind one's back) like the shrill cries of crickets, by enemies.

12. When he has exhausted his fund of merit acquired in the previous life, he is (in the process of) dying though nominally alive. He runs after (for help to) those who are as good as dead though living, and whose wealth is not useful to them either in this world (as they do not enjoy themselves with it) or in the next world (as they do not donate it and earn merit), and who are comparable to poisonous trees and creepers like kāraskara, kākatupāda and to wells full of poisonous water.

221. like goblins at night according to v.l. accepted by ŚR., VR.
13. Sometimes, with his mind perverted due to association with evil persons, he takes to the path of heretics which lead him to miseries here and hereafter—(an act which is) like falling into the rocky bed of a waterless river.

14. When he cannot get food for himself even by harassing others, he proceeds to devour those possessing even blades of grass belonging to his father or son or to "eat up" his own father or sons.

15. Sometimes, he reaches home which is like a forest-conflagration—a home devoid of enjoyable objects, full of a series of miseries. There, being scorched with the fire of deep anguish, he becomes extremely depressed in spirits.

16. To him, wealth was dearest—a veritable life itself. Sometimes he is deprived of it by demon-like officers of the king who have turned hostile (to him) through change of time. He falls in a swoon or appears like a dead man devoid of any symptom of life.

17. Sometimes, imagining as real, the unreal appearance of his (deceased) father, grandfather in fulfilment of his desire, he enjoys (a momentary) pleasure as in a dream.

18. Sometimes he desires to ascend (i.e. perform in a thorough manner) the mountain of extensively detailed duties prescribed for the householder's life. But his mind being distracted with worldly miseries, he sinks into despondency and feels afflicted like one entering (and traversing) a tract full of thorns and sharp-edged gravel.

19. Sometimes, his power and energy being sapped by the (gastral) fire (of hunger raging) within his body, he gets angry with the members of his family.

20. Again, being seized (swallowed) by the boa-constrictor in the form of sleep, and sunk in the blinding darkness (of ignorance), he remains asleep, as if in desolate forest, and he is unconscious of anything else like a dead body cast off by the relatives.

21. Sometimes his larger tooth in the form of his egotism is being broken by venomous reptiles, viz. wicked persons. He does not get sleep even for a moment. His consciousness gets dimmer and dimmer as his heart is (deeply) agitated and disturbed. And like a blind man, he falls in a dark, covered well (of ignorance and misery).

22. Sometimes, (he is) on the look out for small drops of honey in the form of sensual pleasure. While he is in attempting to snatch away another man's wife or property, he is beaten to death by the King or the husband or the master (of the property) and falls into the bottomless unsurmountable hell.

23. Hence, sages say, that karman of both forms (whether Vedic or non-Vedic) performed in this (path of Pravṛtti) sows the seeds of future series of births (of the doer).

24. If he (the jīva) escapes the bondage (or punishment) meted out by the King, the woman's husband or the master of the property), one Devadatta wrests the prize away from him and from him (another fellow), one Viṣṇumitra, takes it away and so on endlessly. (None retains permanently the objects of enjoyment.

25. And sometimes being incapable of warding off miserable conditions like biting cold winds and others caused by super-human agencies, or by elements (or created beings) or pertaining to his body, he sinks down despondently in unending anxieties.

26. Sometimes while transacting business among themselves, if he deceitfully takes away a petty amount, say, twenty couries or even less than that, he incurs the enmity of others due to deceitful dealing in money.

27. On this path (of pravṛtti), there are these obstacles (viz. financial losses, difficulties etc. enumerated in Ch. 13.13) and also other ones viz. pleasure and pain, lust and hatred, fear and pride, negligence and madness, delusion and greed, envy and jealousy, insult, hunger and thirst, anxieties and diseases, birth, old age, death and others.

28. Sometimes, (when) embraced with the creeper-like (tender) arms of the woman who is the Māyā (deluding divine potency of the Lord) incarnate, he loses his power of judgment and wisdom. He becomes anxious at heart to construct a pleasure-house for her. His heart becomes transported by the (sweet) speech, (affectionate) looks and (winsome) behaviour of his wife and sons, daughters who resorted to him for protection. Thus, being of uncontrolled mind, he sends himself to the abysmal hell of blinding darkness.

29. Sometimes he gets terrified in his heart at (the thought of) the discus (viz. kāla—Time, death) of the Supreme Ruler, Lord Viṣṇu—the discus is alternatively designated as Time and consists of divisions beginning from the minutest point to the period covering two Parārtha years (the life-span of god Brahmā). With inexorable velocity consisting of ages (childhood, youth, old age), this unwinking (watchful) discus mows down all created beings from god Brahmā down to a clump of grass while they are (helplessly) looking on. But disrespectfully ignoring the Supreme Lord, the presiding Deity of Sacrifice whose weapon is this eternal discus of Time, he on the basis of unauthoritative canon of the heretics, resorts to the deities of the heretics which are no better than kites, vultures, cranes on the banyan trees (in extending protection against death and hence) which are discarded in the religion of Aryas.

30. When he was devastatingly deceived by those heretics who are themselves deluded, he (returns and) stays within the Brāhmanic fold.

He, however, does not like their pious way of life, propitiation of the glorious Lord of Sacrifices with acts prescribed in the Vedas and Smṛtis after performance of the thread investiture ceremony. As he is impure (and hence ineligible) to perform duties enjoined by the Vedas, he resorts to the Śūdra community which like the species of monkeys, indulges in copulation and maintenance of the family.

31. Even in that community, he behaves as he likes, without any restraint. The low-minded fellow forgets the limit of his (span of) life in vulgar gratification of senses such as looking at the faces of each other (mutually by husband and wife).

32. Sometimes he enjoys himself in the householder's life which, like trees, yields pleasures pertaining to this world only. He is fond of children and wife and like a monkey, he delights in sexual enjoyment.

222. GD.: “Just as a monkey addicted to sexual enjoyment, becomes negligent (about his safety) and is caught by the hunter while it is indulging in that enjoyment on the trees and is unable to get himself released.”
33. Enjoying and suffering pleasures and pain on the path (of pravritti), he falls into the veritable dark vale of ailments and other calamities and stays (there) constantly in the fear of the elephant in the form of death.

34. Sometimes, when incapable of protecting himself against innumerable miseries such as heat and cold—miseries caused by supernatural agencies, the elements or creatures or by his own body or mind—he sinks (lit. sits) despondently worrying over endless sense-objects.

35. Sometimes, entering into business transactions among themselves, he acquires some wealth through fraudulent monetary dealings.

36. Sometimes, when his wealth is spent up he becomes destitute of (normal necessities of life such as) a bed, a seat, food etc. He then makes up his mind to snatch away the objects which he covets but has not succeeded to acquire till then. Hence, in due course, he is subjected to insult etc. by the public.

37. Although their mutual hostility is enhanced by their covetousness for wealth, they enter into matrimonial relations or break them according to their tendency resulting from actions to the previous life.

38. On this road of Samsāra, if one is afflicted with innumerable sufferings and obstacles and succumbs to calamities or death, he is definitely abandoned then and there. They take with them the new-born children. They sometimes weep, fall in a swoon, are afraid, quarrel, cry and are overjoyed, sing and are bound down. They are avoided by saintly people and are thus denied pious company. In this way, they continue to go ahead. This caravan of men has not yet returned to the starting point of this journey (viz. God) which the sages say, is the terminus of the road (of Samsāra).

39. For, he who gets knowledge of and takes to the discipline of Yoga, does not definitely return to the universe or samsāra. It is only the meditative persons who have renounced all forms of violence (to all creatures) and are firmly given to self-control (and consequent serenity), and who have detached their minds (from worldly objects), reach the Supreme (Self).
40. Even the royal sages who have conquered the elephants guarding all directions and perform sacrifices, do not attain it. Asserting their claim on the earth that it is their own and entering into hostilities for it (its possession), they lie dead on the battlefield, leaving their bodies on the earth (claimed by them) and depart. (These also do not reach the other end of Samsāra).

41. Supporting themselves by catching hold of the creeper of karma and getting out, with great difficulty, from the miserable hell, he is again present on the way of Samsāra, and rejoins the caravan of men. Similar is the case of men who have gone up to the Heaven.

Thus do they sing of Bharata!

42. Just as a fly cannot, even in its imagination soar up along the path of Garuḍa (high up in the sky), no other King in this world can even mentally follow the path of the high-souled royal sage Bharata, the son of Rṣabha.

43. Even while he was a youth, he longed to serve the Lord of hallowing renown (or of Supreme glory), and abandoned like excreta, his wife and children, friends and kingdom, so endearing to the heart and (hence) so difficult to renounce.

44. It is quite befitting on the part of the king (Bharata) that he did not long for the (kingdom of the) earth, sons, relatives, wealth and wife—so difficult to renounce. Nor did he wish for Śrī (the Goddess of Fortune), coveted by great gods, even though She waited for having a gracious look from him. For in the view of the great (Souls) whose minds are devotedly attached to the service of Viṣṇu, even the Final Emancipation is of little account.

45. "Salutations to Lord Hari who is himself the personified Yajña (sacrifice), the defender of righteousness, punctilious observance of scriptural injunctions, Yoga incarnate, the head (the ultimate, chief principle) of the Sāṅkhya, the controller of the Prakṛti (the personified Will or Māyā of the Almighty), who is the shelter of all created beings)", so nobly praised he, at the time of casting off his body as a deer.

46. One who faithfully listens to, recites or praises the history of the royal sage Bharata whose spotless virtues and pure actions are appreciated and eulogised by devotees of the Lord—the history which brings in good fortune, long life, riches, renown and leads to (the attainment of) the Heaven and Final Beatitude secures all blessings, of his own accord and needs nothing from others.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

1. As already narrated (supra 7.3), Bharata had a son called Sumati. He followed the path of Rṣabha. In the Kali Age, heretics (non-believers in the Vedas) outside the Aryan fold, will set him up, according to their wicked and perverted intelligence, as a deity not described in the Vedic

* The Bharata Dynasty may be conveniently summarised as follows:

1. Bharata
2. Sumati
3. Devatājīt
4. Devadyumna
5. Paramesṭhi
6. Prathīha Prastotā Udgātā
7. Prathīhartā
8. Bhūmā Aja
9. Udgītha
10. Prastāva
11. Vibhu
12. Prithuṣeṇa
13. Nakta
14. Gaya
15. Chitraratha Sugati Avarodhana
16. Samrāṭ
17. Marici
18. Bindumān
19. Madhu
20. Vīravrata
21. Manthu Pramanthu
22. Bhauvana
23. Tvasta
24. Vīraja
25. Śatajīt etc. 100 sons texts. (They will think him to be an incarnation of Lord Buddha).

2. By (queen) Vṛddhasena, he had a son by name Devajit (conqueror of gods).

3. Then, through Āsurī (Devajit’s wife) was born to him a son, Devadyumna; he had by Dhenumatī, a son, called Paramēṣṭhi; and then Paramēṣṭhi begot on Sauvarcalā a son called Pratiha.

4. Having taught the knowledge of ātman (to many), he himself became thoroughly purified, and directly realized the Supreme Soul.

5. From Pratiha, through (his wife, another) Suvarcalā, three sons beginning with Pratihartā were born; all of them were well-versed in the sacrificial lore. Pratihartā begot on (his wife) Stuti, two sons Aja and Bhūman.

6. Bhūman had by Rṣikulyā a son called Udgīthā. He had (a son named) Prastāva from Devakulyā. Prastāva had a son called Vibhu, through (queen) Niyatsā; Vibhu had Pṛthuṣena from Rati; Pṛthuṣena begot Nakta from Ākūti. From Nakta and (his wife) Druti was born the eminent royal sage Gaya of noble reputation. Gaya who attained the status of a Mahāpuruṣa (an exalted personage) by his possession of characteristics (of greatness) such as self-control, was an amīśa (part or ray) of Lord Viṣṇu himself who, for the protection of the world, assumed a form consisting of pure Sattva.

7. He followed his righteous duty as a king by protecting his subjects, supplying them with the means of livelihood, providing them with (amenities of) recreation behaving tenderly with them and by governing them per legal precepts. He dedicated with absolute faith his sacrificial and other pious acts to the glorious great personage viz. the Brahman who is higher than the highest.

By constantly serving the feet of those who have realized Brahman and by cultivating path of devotion to the Lord, his mind and intellect became extremely pure. His mind became completely free from the false identification of the non-Soul (viz. the body and its belongings) with the Soul. Though he realized within him the identification of his Self with Brahman,
8. Oh descendant of Pāṇḍavas! Persons well-versed in Purāṇic history sing the following stanzas about him.

9. "What other king, except the one in whom a ray of the Lord has been manifest, can equal Gaya in his achievements? Who else is there like him, a performer of great sacrifices, so highly respected by all, possessor of extensive scholarship, a defender of religion, one so highly blessed with the Goddess of Fortune, a leader of the assembly of the learned and a devoted servant of the saints.

10. The virtuous daughters of Dakṣa (such as Śraddhā, Maitrī, Dayā) whose blessings always prove true, accompanied the presiding deities of holy rivers (like Gaṅgā) sprinkled him with water (at the time of his coronation) in ecstatic joy. The king, himself was free from desire. But just as the milk begins to flow out of the udders of a cow at the sight of its calf, so at the sight of his excellent virtues, the earth yielded like a cow, milk in the form of the desired objects of his subjects.

11. Though he (Gaya) was above desires, Vedas and the rites prescribed therein blessed him with all enjoyments. (Inimical) kings who were honoured by him with a volley of arrows in the battle, brought him tributes. The Brāhmaṇas who were honoured by him with sumptuous sacrificial fees and donations while performing religious acts, allotted to him one-sixth of their total merit.

12. In his sacrifices, liberal libations of Soma juice were offered. While Indra (the king of gods) became intoxicated (with Soma juice), the glorious Lord who is the Soul of the Sacrifices appeared in person and accepted the fruit of the Sacrifice offered (by the king) in the spirit of unwavering devotion rendered absolutely pure by (unflinching) faith.

13. By pleasing whom (i.e. the Lord) the whole universe from god Brahmā up to gods, men, sub-human beings, creepers and grass, become the Self-same Lord, the very Soul of the universe, who, though ever blissful by nature, became evidently satisfied and delighted at Gaya's performance of sacrifice.
14. Gaya begot on Gayanti three sons, Citraratha, Sugati and Avarodhana. Out of them, Citraratha had by queen Urnā a son called Samrāt.

15. From Samrāt, thorough Utkalā, was born Marici. From Marici and Bindumati was born Bindumān; he had by Saraghā (a son) named Madhu; Madhu begot Viśavrata on Sumanas; from Viśavrata and queen Bhojā were born Manthu and Pramanthu; of Manthu, through Satyā, sprang Bhauvana; of Bhauvana and Dūṣānā was born Tvaṣṭā; from Tvaṣṭā through Virocana came Viraja; and Viraja had by Viṣūci a hundred sons, of whom Satajit was the eldest, and also a daughter.

About Viraja is sung the following stanza:

16. Viraja, the last born son (in the race of Priyavrata) adorned the dynasty of Priyavrata by his glory, even as Viṣṇu embellishes the host of gods.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN*

(Mythological Geography—The Terrestrial Globe)

The King said:

1. The whole extent of the globe of the earth on which the Sun shines and where the Moon with the hosts of stars is visible, has been described by you.

2. Within that area, seven seas were formed by the seven (moat-like) ruts, furrowed by the wheels of (king) Priyavrata’s

* This and the following chapters deal with geography. Most of the material is common to other Purāṇas. Purāṇic geography is not all imagination, vide V.S. Agrawala: M.P.—A Study, pp. 184–215, D. G. Sircar’s SGAMI., pp. 17–118, N. L. De’s GDAMI. The concept of the earth with four continents (catur-dvipā Vasumati) and the details of the lands, mountains, rivers etc. tally a great deal with the details in the East, West and South Asia. —The ‘Greater India’ of to day was regarded not merely an extension of India but a part of one unit separated by seas. (Vide B. Upadhyaya—Purāṇa-Vimarsa, pp. 338–341.
chariot. You have verily suggested, venerable Sir, that the divisions of this earth in seven distinct island-continents is due to those (seas). I am now desirous to know all about the dimensions and characteristics of those continents, in detail.

3. For, the mind, when concentrated on the Lord’s gross form—the physical universe, a product of three guṇas, becomes capable of entering into and fixing on the attributeless, subtle-most, self-refulgent, transcendent Brahmaṇa known as Lord Vāsudeva. Oh Preceptor, may you be pleased to describe to me the same.

The sage (Śri Śuka) said:

4. Oh great King! No human being, even if it be blessed with the longevity of gods, can adequately comprehend even by mind or (can express) by speech, the extent of Lord’s great glories (viz. the universe) displayed through the (product of) three guṇas of His Māyā Potency. We, therefore, shall mainly describe to you the special features of the terrestrial globe, with the names, position, extent and characteristics.

5. As for this (Jambūdvipa) island-continent (in which we live), it forms the central innermost (the seventh) layer of the lotus-like earth. It is one lakh yojanas (eight lakh miles) in extent, and is circular in form like the leaf of a lotus.

6. In this dvipa, there are nine continents (varṣas) each nine thousand yojanas in extent. They are clearly separated from each other, by eight mountain-ranges forming the boundaries of each (of the dvipas).

7. The inner-continent called Ilāvṛta forms the centre of these continents. At the navel (centre) of this (Ilāvṛta) continent stands the all-gold mount Meru, the king of all of mountains. It is as high as the extent of his (Jambū) dvipa. It forms the pericarp of the lotus in the form of the earth. It is thirty-two thousand yojanas in extent at the top, and sixteen thousand yojanas at its foot, and its root lies under the earth’s surface to the same extent viz. sixteen thousand yojanas. (i.e. it is 84000 yojanas in height from the surface of the earth)

8. To the northern side of Ilāvṛta, are three mountain ranges one after the other—viz. Nila, Śveta and Śrīgavān.

223. -Yojana—8 miles.
They form the boundaries between the continents called Ramyaka, Hiraṇmaya and Kuru. They stretch in eastern and western directions up to the salt ocean, and are two thousand yojanas in breadth. Every outer range (of mountains) is shorter only in length by a little over of one tenth of the next interior range (their height and breadth is the same).

9. In this way, to the south of Ilāvṛta, are the mountain ranges Niṣadha, Hemkūṭa and the Himālayas. They run from the east (to the west) and are ten thousand yojanas in height, like Nila and other mountains (mentioned above). They form the boundaries of Harivarṣa, Kimpuruṣa and Bhārata respectively.

10. Similarly, the West and East of Ilāvṛta, up to the mountain Nila and Niṣadha, run the mountain-ranges called Mālyavat and Gandhamādana, each two thousand yojanas in length. These (two mountains) form the boundaries of ketumāla and Bhadrāśva.

11. As side supporters on its four sides to Mount Meru, are the (four) mountain-ranges, Mandāra, Merumandāra, Supārśva and Kumuda---each ten thousand yojanas in length and height.

12. There stand respectively on these four mountain-ranges, four great trees, viz. the Mango, the Jambū (rose apple), the Kadandiba and the Banyan, like the flags of these mountains. They are more than one thousand yojanas in height extending over the same by their branches. The trunk (of each) is one hundred Yojanas in circumference.

13. And there are four lakes, of Milk, honey, sugarcane juice and fresh water (one per mountain). The demigods who drink of these acquire natural yogic powers, Oh prominent Bharata.

14. There are also four celestial gardens (on them), viz. Nandana, Caitraratha, Vaibhrājaka and Sarvato-bhadra.

15. While listening to their eulogies sung by bands of demigods (like Gandhrva, and Kinnara), prominent gods, heading the bevies of celestial beauties, indulge in sports, in those celestial gardens.

16. From the top of the celestial mango tree eleven hundred yojanas in height, fall nectar-like sweet mangoes, as big as mountain peaks, on the upper side of the Mountain Mandāra.

17. A river, named Aruṇodā (a river of deep red water) is formed. It is so called because it carries as water extremely sweet, fragrant, scented abundant reddish juice of the mangoes (falling from the tree and) bursting open. It falls down from the crest of Mount Mandāra and waters the eastern part of Ilāvṛta.

18. When the damsels of Yakṣa tribe, the female attendants of goddess Pārvatī, enjoy the sweet juice of Aruṇodā, their person becomes so fragrant that the breeze coming in contact with them gets charged with perfume, and it diffuses that perfume over an area of ten yojanas (in radius).

19. In this way rose-apples, as big as elephants, and containing very fine seed, fall from a very great height and burst open. The river Jambū formed out of their juice, falls from the peak of Mount Merumandāra, ten thousand yojanas in height, down to the ground and irrigates the whole of Ilāvṛta, lying south of the river.

20. The clay on both the banks of that river gets saturated through and through, with that juice (of rose-apples). With the chemical change wrought by the action of the wind and the Sun (on it), it (the clay) is transmuted into gold known as Jāmbunada and it is always used for ornaments by celestial beings.

21. How wonderful! The gods and other heavenly beings along with their consorts, wear that (variety of) gold in the forms of various ornaments such as crowns and diadems, bangles, girdles and other ornaments.

22. There grows a big Kadamda tree on the Supārśva mountain. From its hollows flow out five currents of honey each five āyama224 in dimension. They fall from the tops of Supārśva, they spread joy to the region of Ilāvṛta lying to the west of those currents.

23. The wind (breath) issuing out of the mouths of those who drink from those currents (of honey), spreads fragrance on an area of one hundred yojanas (in radius).

224. āyama—Vyāma—a measure of length equal to the space between the tips of the fingers of either hands when the arms are extended (Vyāmo bāhoḥ sakarayos tatayos tiryogantaram)—SR.)
24. Similarly, there stands a banyan tree called Śata-vālśa on mount Kumuda. From the branches (lit. arms) of that tree flow forth all streams, capable of yielding whatever one desires, such as milk, curds, honey, clarified butter, raw sugar, (delicious) food, garments, beds, seats or chairs, ornaments and others. These streams fall down from the summits of mount Kumuda and flow in the northern part of Ilāvṛta.

25. Subjects (beings) who make use of these river-waters never suffer afflictions from wrinkles, baldness, fatigue, perspiration, bad odours, old age, diseases and death or from cold, heat, paleness and other troubles. They enjoy the highest bliss all through their life.

26. Like filaments on the seed-vessels in a lotus, around the base of Meru, on all sides, there are twenty mountains viz. Kuraṅga, Kurara, Kusumbha, Vaikaṅka, Trikūṭa, Śīśira, Pataṅga, Rucaka, Niṣadha, Śīni-Vāsa, Kapila, Śaṅkha, Vaidūrya, Jārudhi, Harṣa, Rṣabha, Nāga, Kālañjara, Nārada and others.

27. Mounts Jaṭhara and Devakūṭa are to the east of Meru. They extend to the north for eighteen thousand yojanas in length, and two thousand yojanas in breadth, and in height. Similarly to the west (of Meru) stand two mountain-ranges, Pavana and Pāriyātra. To the south are situated Kailāsa and Karavīra which extend to the east. To the north (of Meru) stand Mount Trśṛṅga and Makara. Enclosed by these eight mountain-ranges, the mountain of gold (Meru) shines like (sacrificial) fire surrounded by blades of Kuśa grass. (to demarcate its boundaries).

28. Those (who are in know) say that on the summit of Meru, at the very centre, is situated Śaṭa-Kumbhi, (the city of gold), the capital of god Brahmā. It covers an area of a ten thousand yojanas and is square in shape.

225. ayuta-yojana-sāhasrīṃ: I followed the text as it is. I doubt the interpretation as the area “a thousand times ten-thousand yojanas”, although some respectable commentators like GD, interpret it this way without suspecting any contradiction between the area of the plateau on Meru and the city built over it, as the area of the plateau on Mount Meru is only 32,000 yojanas, vide Bh. P. Supra verse 7 above, which states Mūrdhāni dvāstrīṃst-sahasra-yojana-vitotah. ŠR. is conscious that the dimen-
29. Surrounding that city (capital of god Brahmā), there are eight suburbs (or cities) of the eight guardian deities of the world (such as Indra, Varuṇa etc.),\textsuperscript{226} They are after the model of Śāta-Kumbhi, and are built in a style befitting their masters, each city being one fourth in extent of Lord Brahmā’s capital.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN
(The Descent of the Gaṅgā)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. In the sacrifice performed by Bali, the Lord (Viṣṇu) himself appeared as Trivikrama.\textsuperscript{227}

Standing there (on the ground, he wanted to measure three feet of land donated to him by Bali. He covered the whole of the earth by his right foot. He raised the left foot to

\textit{katu-daśa sahasrāṇi yojanānāṁ mahāpuri/}
\textit{Maṅgala Mahāpuruṣa śrī rīm prathītā divi/}

This is plausible in view of the area of the plateau on the summit of Meru which is 32,000 yojanas. ŚR’s explanation that the dimensions differ with different Kalpas is not satisfactory. VR. interprets this as \textit{ayuta-yojana-vistarāṁ i.e. ten thousand yojanas in area}. VJ. regards Śatakoṭi as the name of Brahma’s capital. GD. does not suspect any contradiction between the area of the plateau on Meru and the city built over it. He explains: \textit{ayuta-yajna-yānāṁ as ayuta-sahasra-yojana-vistarāṁ but hastens to add, ati bhāgya-yoga-lakṣaṇaṁ yuta-sabda-vartī-sahasrārtha-tvāga bodhyā}.

\textsuperscript{226} GD. and others enumerate the suburbs of Brahmadeva’s capital as follows: To the East, Indra’s capital Amarāvatī, to the South-East, Fire-god’s headquarters Tejovatī, to the South, Yama’s city Samyamini, to the South-West, Kṛṣṇāṅganā of Nirṛtas, to the West, Varuṇa’s capital Śraddhāvatī, to the North-West, Vāyu’s headquarters Gandhavatī, to the North, Kubera’s town Mahodayā, and to the North-East, Lord Śiva’s capital Yaśovatī.

\textsuperscript{227} This refers to Vāmana incarnation of Viṣṇu, vide \textit{infra} 8.18-20 (Skandha VIII. Chs 18-20) measure the heavenly regions) by his foot-step, the upper crust of the shell of the Cosmic egg got cracked by the nail of the big toe of his left foot. Through that opening, rushed in the stream of waters, covering externally the cosmic egg. While washing the lotus-like feet of the Lord, she (the water of the stream) became reddish by the pollen-like dust (on the Lord's feet). She washed away the dirt, in the form of the sins of the whole of the world, by her touch, and yet, herself remained pure (unpolluted by sins). She was, at first, designated directly as Bhagavatpadi (Born from the feet of the Lord) to the exclusion of other epithets e.g. Jāhnavi, Bhāgirathī which may imply any other less important source). After a long period of time measured in thousands of yugas, she descended on the top of the celestial regions which the sages call Viṣṇu-pada.

2. There (at the Viṣṇu-pada), verily, Dhruva (the son of Uttānapāda) of steadfast vows, the great votary of Lord Viṣṇu, even now bears (i.e. sprinkles) on his head her waters, with utmost reverence. "This water flows from the lotus feet of our family deity". (With this feeling) every moment his heart gets deeply saturated with ever-increasing devotion. Overcome with ardent longing (for the Lord), he forgets himself. Tears of pure love flow down from his half-closed lotus-bud-like eyes, and his whole person bristles with hair standing on their ends through ecstasy.

3. Thenceforth (in the next stage), the seven sages (inhabiting the constellation called Ursa Major) who know the greatness of this stream, regard it as the ultimate achievement of their austere penance, and even today, receive it with great reverence on the matted hair (of their heads), as persons desirous of Liberation (Mokṣa) would receive Final Emancipation due to their achievement of unswerving devotion unto the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, the Soul of all beings. They have grown indifferent to other Purusārthas, and even to Self-realization.

4. Later on, it (the stream) descends by the path of gods (i.e. sky), teeming with multitudes of thousands of crores of celestial cars, to the sphere of the Moon. After flooding the lunar sphere, the stream (of the Bhagavatpadi) flows down to the city of Brahmā (on the summit of Mount Meru).

5. There, on mount Meru, it is divided into four branches under four names:—Sitā, Alakanandā, Cakṣu and Bhadrā, and it (i.e., these branches) flows towards four quarters and enters into the ocean, the Lord of big and small rivers.

6. From the city of god Brahmā, the Sitā flows down from the peaks of mountains like mount Kesara and others and descends on the summit of mount Gandhamādana. Flowing through the continent of Bhadrāśva it falls into the salt ocean on the east.

7. In the same way, Cakṣus (the Oxus or Amu-Daria) comes down from the summit of mount Mālyavān. It rushes with unabated velocity towards Ketumāla, and enters the ocean on the west.

8. And to the north, the Bhadrā descends from the peak of Meru. Passing from the summit of one mountain to that of another, it jumps from the peak of mount Śrāgavat. It traverses the Northern Kuru region, and ultimately falls into the ocean on the northern direction.

9. Similarly, the Alakanandā flows down from the south of the city of Brahmā. Passing over from many a mountain peak, one after another, it reaches mount Hemakūta. (Thence) it rolls down, with very great velocity, to peaks of the Himālayas. It flows through Bhāratavarṣa on the south and falls into the sea. Men who come for ablutions in this river, easily acquire the merit of performing great sacrifices like the Aśvamedha, Rājasūya and others, at every step.

10. There are hundreds of other big and small rivers flowing through every continent, all daughters of Meru and other mountains.

11. (There are types of Svargas or celestial places according to their location in the heavens, on the earth and in the subterranean regions. The celestial spots on the earth are mentioned here).

229. Sitā—N.L. De identifies it with the Jaxartes or Sir-Daria (GDAMI, 187). The identification may be correct for the Sitā of the Brahmāṇḍa Purāṇa (ch. 51). But the Sitā in the Bh. P. flows to the east, through China (Bhadrāśva). Hence it is not the same as Sir-Daria.

The wise say that of all these continents (varṣas), Bhārata is the only continent which is a karma-kṣetra\textsuperscript{231} (i.e. a land where men can make or mar their destiny by their actions or a land of religious acts). The remaining eight continents are called celestial spots on the earth which serve as places of enjoyment for celestial beings who return from the heaven with some balance of merit unexhausted.

12. In these continents, the longevity of the inhabitants is ten thousand human years. They are just like gods. They are endowed with the strength of ten thousand elephants; blessed with adamantine frame of the body and power, eternal youth, abundance of sense pleasures and extra-ordinary capacity for conjugal enjoyment, the couples are extremely happy. Their wives show signs of pregnancy only once in the final year of their life of sexual pleasures. In these continents, the Time has characteristic of the Treta Age.\textsuperscript{232}

13. In those continents, verily, the lords of gods who are richly worshipped with sumptuous gifts by the leaders of their respective retinues, enjoy themselves at will, to their heart’s content, in valleys of these mountains dividing the continents (varṣas)—valleys which are teeming with hermitages and mansions and abound in charming forests beautified with creepers and the supporting trees with branches bent low with \textsuperscript{231} The idea that Bhārata-varṣa is a karma-bhūmi or karma kṣetra is common to most purāṇas. MP. 114.6-7 and MKP. 57.60 explain karmabhūmi as a land which contained within it the seeds of all pious actions and their fruits, and people in this land were entitled to go to heaven or Mokṣa or the earth. Other purāṇas repeat the same belief, e.g.

(i) Prithivyāṁ Bhārataṁ varṣam karmabhūmir udāhītā /BRP. 27.2.

(ii) Bhārataṁ nāma yad varṣam . . .

tat karma-bhūmir nāyatra, samrāptiḥ punyapāpayoh /MKP.

55.21-22.

(iii) na tatrāpi Bhārataṁ varṣam karma-kṣetram uṣṇiti ha / Devī Bh. P.

8.7-34.

\textsuperscript{232} According to ŚR. and other commentators, the Tretā Yuga is a period of sensual enjoyment. In the Kṛta Age all are engaged in meditation. In Dvāpara and Kali, people are overwhelmed with miseries.
flowers, bunches of fruit and tender foliage of all seasons. And with their mind and eyes fascinated with the attractive movements, bewitching smiles and sportive glances—all pregnant with love—of the most charming celestial beauties, they (the Lords of gods) amuse themselves at will with aquatic sports and other forms of diversions, in lakes of crystal-clear waters resounding with the warbling and cries of royal swans, waterfowls, ducks (kāraṇḍavas), cranes, rudy geese (cakravākas) and other birds which are delighted by the fragrant lotuses of various kinds, and (waters) resonant with the humming of different species of black-bees.

14. In all the nine continents, Lord Nārāyaṇa, the Supreme Person still maintains his presence in his various manifestations (vyūha) with the object of showering his grace on the inhabitants thereof.

15. In the Ilāvṛta continent, Lord Śiva is the only one male; no other male person who knows of the curse of the goddess Pārvatī enters it. I shall narrate to you later on (Infra IX Skandha) why a male person entering it (Ilāvṛta continent) is transformed into a woman.

16. There, Lord Śiva is served in every respect by one hundred million thousands of female attendants headed by goddess Pārvatī. He (Lord Śiva) is engrossed in the meditation upon the conceptualized image of Saṅkarṣaṇa, his own source, and presiding deity over the attribute tamas, the fourth manifestation of the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, the Supreme Person of Four forms (viz. Vāsudeva, Pradyumna, Aniruddha and Saṅkarṣaṇa). He sings of the following prayer.

17. "Salutations to the Supreme Person, the symbol of Parabrahman, the source of the manifestation of all attributes, (though himself) unmanifested and Infinite. Hail to him.

18. Oh adorable Lord! I take resort to your lotus-like feet which afford shelter to all. You are the Supreme abode

234. anantāya—(i) Śiva meditates upon the serpent Śeṣa along with Viṣṇu who is his inner controller—VJ.

(ii) Above the distinction of time, place etc.—GD.

of all (the six) divine excellences (such as sovereignty over the universe, Omniscience and others). To your devotees you have fully manifested yourself as one who terminates their samsāra (the chain of births and deaths); but you create (i.e. continue) Samsāra (in the case of those who are not devoted to you).

19. What person intent on subduing his senses (and desirous of attaining liberation will not respect you whose vision—unlike that of ours who cannot control the vehemence of anger—is not, even in the slightest degree, affected by the guṇas of Māyā (i.e. worldly objects which are the products of the three attributes or guṇas of Māyā) and by the activities of the mind and sense, while you supervise them for government and control.

20. To a person of wrong perception, 236 you appear, through your Māyā Potency, 237 intoxicated and terrible with eyes reddened under the influence of spirituous liquors (though as a matter of fact, your form is pure, unalloyed sattva, beyond the power of karmas and auspicious). At the touch of your feet, the Nāga damsels get their mind and senses excited and are hence unable to proceed with your worship due to bashfulness (and the feeling that you, the omniscient know their mental agitation).

21. The goddess Lakṣmi and sages or Vedic Mantras declare him (i.e. you) to be the prime cause of the creation, preservation and destruction of this universe but as you are Infinite, you are above these states. You do not feel even like a mustard seed where the sphere of the earth is lying somewhere on one of you—a thousand heads.

22. The principle called Mahat (Cosmic Intelligence) was his (i.e. your) first body (manifestation) constituted of (three) guṇas. It is based on sattva (in the form of citta—reasoning faculty), and is said to be (the same as) the glorious

236. a-sad-driha—(i) Who is strongly attached to this unreal or worthless body as his own Self (VR., BP.).

Brahmā (the deity presiding over it). It is from Brahma that I (Rudra) was born. I create through my power (viz. Aham-kāra—I-ness) consisting of three (guṇas) the deities (presiding over the sense-organs and mind—the sattvika variety of ahamkāra, the gross elements (the tāmasic type) and cognitive and conative sense-organs (the rājasic kind of Ahamkāra).

23. We—these aforesaid Mahat (principle of Cosmic Intelligence), ahamkāra (Ego), vaikārika, (the abovementioned deities), the elements (the principles of ākāśa, vāyu etc.) and the (aforesaid) senses—remain under his control like birds cordoned together with a string and carry on this process of creation through his (your) grace.

24. This person (the jīva) deluded by the world, the product of (three) guṇas, may possibly know Māyā, (his i.e. your) creation, which binds (the jīva) with karmas but it (the jīva) will never easily know the means of getting over it. My salutations to him who comprises within him the creation as well as the dissolution of the universe (and which as such are his form).

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

1. So also, there live in the continent of Bhadrāśva, a son of Dharma, Bhadraśravas by name, and the foremost members of his retinue (who are the heads of important families and great votaries of the Lord). They establish in their hearts, with supreme concentration of mind, the beloved form of the glorious Lord Vāsudeva himself, called Hayasītras who is righteousess incarnate. (While muttering the mantra: Om namo bhagavate dharmāyādīma-viśodhanāya namaḥ. They sing the following prayer:
Bhadragnas and his people pray:

2. "Salutations to the glorious Dharma, the embodiment of righteousness, represented by the sacred syllable OM, the purifier of the mind (and jiva).

3. Oh wonderful! How mysterious and strange are the ways (acts) of the Lord! (Thereby) this world perceives Death, the destroyer of all, and yet fails to cognise it (as such) (For) a man contemplates (to commit) a sin for the enjoyment of insignificant, unreal pleasures and wishes (to continue) to live on the wealth of his father and the son (the old and the young), even after cremating him.

4. The learned persons, assert (on the authority of Sāstras) that the world is evanescent. The masters of spiritual science who have realized the Self within them, see (actually) that it is so. They, however, are deluded by your Māyā (Potency), Oh birthless Lord! (One above the cycle of birth and death). Highly miraculous (and inscrutable) is your working (giving up all the labour of Śāstric studies and meditational processes) I (simply) pay my obeisance to you.

5. The Vedas attribute to you the authorship of the creation, preservation and destruction of the universe, even though you are not the doer, nor conditioned in any way (by Māyā). This is quite reasonable. There is nothing wonderful in your case as (through your Māyā) you are everything, and the cause of all effects, though factually you are essentially different from all things.

6. He (i.e. you) assumed the form of Man-horse (Haya-grīva), and recovered from the nether-worlds the Vedas which were concealed there by the demon (Madhu), at the end of the Yuga (i.e. the time of the dissolution of the universe) and returned them to the suppliant sage Brahmā. I bow to him (you) whose will is never futile."

7. And in (the continent called) Harivarṣa, the Lord abides in the form of Man-lion (Nṛsimha). I shall describe to you the reason of his assumption of that form later (in Skandha VII). That beloved form is propitiated by Prahlāda along with the inhabitants of that continent (Hari-varṣa) —Prahlāda who is the abode of the excellent qualities of exalted Souls, a great devotee of the Lord, whose virtuous character and behaviour purify the race of Daityas and Dānavas, and who is unsurpassed in uninterrupted and undivided devotion (unto the Lord). He (along with the men of that Varṣa), recites the following prayer:

8. "Salutations to Lord Narasiṁha who is denoted by the sacred syllable OM. I bow to the Light of all lights. Oh Lord, manifest yourself completely. Oh Lord of adamantine claws and adamantine fangs, completely burn down our latent deeds and desires. Please swallow up all the darkness (of our ignorance). We offer our worship to you (Om svāhā). Please confer on me the state of absolute fearlessness. Om kṣraum (a mystical syllable sacred to Lord Narasiṁha).

9. May the universe be blissful and happy! May the wicked give up their wickedness and be pure-minded! May all beings wish well of each other! May our mind resort to (the path of) goodness. May our thoughts as well as that of other beings enter into and concentrate on Lord Viṣṇu, without any ulterior motive.

10. May we be unattached to our home, wives, children, wealth and kinsmen. If there be any attachment (at all in us) may it be to the votaries who love the Lord. He who is satisfied with bare means of subsistence, achieves Liberation at no distant future. Not so does one who likes (the objects of) senses.

11* The holy waters remove the external dirt of the body by constant ablutions. But the birthless glorious Lord who enters into the mind through the ears of those who having got into the company of devotees, frequently listen to the extra-ordinary, hallowing exploits of Lord Viṣṇu, removes the impurities of the mind. Who will not then, wait upon such votaries?

* VR. gives an alternative explanation:

The company of his beloved votaries confers the capacity to meditate over the Lord and his extra-ordinary exploits. Those who properly dwell upon his hallowing fame constantly find that the Lord has occupied their minds through the ears (through constant listening to his exploits) and he purifies the mind of (mental) dirt. What man will abstain from listening to and meditating upon Lord Viṣṇu's exploits?
12. Gods with all their excellences (like knowledge, righteousness) abide in the heart of a person whose devotion unto the Lord is not motivated by any desire. How can a person not devoted to Hari possess the qualities of the great Souls, if he runs after worthless external objects of senses, attracted by desires.

13. For the glorious Lord Hari himself is the beloved Soul of all embodied beings just as water being the mainstay of its life is beloved to the fish. Howsoever a person may be otherwise great, if he forgets Hari and is attached to the householder's life, his greatness is like advancedness in age (and not in excellences) as in the case of married couples.

14. Hence, Oh Asuras, you renounce the householder's life which is the root cause (i.e. original source) of passions, attachment, despondency, wrath, pride, desire, fear, humiliation and anguish and which continues the cycle of births and deaths and take shelter at the feet of Lord Narasimha, the abode of fearlessness.

15. Even so in the continent called Ketumāla, the glorious Lord abides in the form of the god of Love, with the desire of pleasing the goddess Lakṣmī (his consort) and the rulers of that continent (Varṣa) viz. the sons (presiding deities of the day) and the daughters (female deities presiding over the night) of Prajāpati, Sanvatsara (a year) whose number equals the days and nights comprising the full span of human life (i.e. 100 years × 360 days per year = 36000). The embryos (of these daughters) are discharged still born at the end of every year as the minds of the daughters are agitated and terrified at the dazzling splendour of the mighty missile (Sudarśana) of the Supreme Being (Viṣṇu).

16. He (Kāmadeva) delights his own senses while bringing ecstatic joy to goddess Lakṣmī with the splendour of his lotuslike face which is enchanting on account of his beautiful brows which are slightly raised, and by his playful glances and winsome gentle smiles, the charmingness of which is heightened by his extremely graceful gait.

17. At night, in the company of the presiding deities of night, the daughters of Prajāpati Sanvatsara and at daytime accompanied with their husbands (the male deities presiding over the day), goddess Rāmā (Lakṣmī) propitiates the blissful form of the Lord, and recites this (the following mantra).

18. “Om! Hrām, Hrīm, Hrūm Om. Salutations to the glorious Lord Hṛṣīkeśa (the Ruler of Senses) symbolised by the sacred syllable Om. You are distinguished by all of your excellent special attributes. You are the Supreme Master of my conative organs and cognitive senses and of my internal organ (consisting of mind, ego, intelligence and understanding) along with their specialities (objects and functions). You are the Ruler of sixteen Kalās (eleven senses and five objects—this is the ‘subtle body’.) You are the Vedas incarnate. You are the food that sustains the body. You are the blissful sumnum bonum itself. You are all-pervading and the source of mental strength, physical potency and power. You are the Beloved Lord, Love personified. I bow to you here and hereafter (with the bija mantra: Om! Hrām, Hrīm Hrūm!).

19. By observing (various) vows, (unmarried) women propitiate you, the Lord of all senses, and beseech from you another person as a protector (i.e. husband). But they (the earthly ‘protectors’ or husbands) are really incapable of protecting their beloved child, wealth or life and are hence themselves poor dependents.

20. He is the real husband or protector who himself is above fear from any quarter, and protects, in all respects, other persons stricken with fear. You alone are such a master. You do not regard anything more joyful than the realization of your own self, (otherwise you would not have any independence, if your happiness depended on someone else). There would be fear from each other (if there were more than one independent rulers).

21. A woman who knows that you are such a Lord and loves to offer worship to your lotus-like feet (without entertaining any desire for something in return), secures all her desired objects. But if you are worshipped and sought for a desired boon, you grant that desired object only. Oh Lord, if, however the sought-for-object (granted by the Lord) is lost or exhausted (in enjoyment), she feels tormented.

22. God Brahmā, Śiva, gods, demons and others whose heart is attached to object of senses, perform austere penance for winning my favour. But no person, except one who is exclusively attached to your feet, attains to me and is favoured by me. For, Oh Invincible one! My heart is set on you (hence, being dependent on you, I glance with favour your devotees only).

23. Oh Acyuta (Lord Viṣṇu)! Your lotus-like hand is lauded as a showerer of desired objects. Be pleased to place that praiseworthy hand of yours on my head—your hand which you have placed, out of grace, on the crown of the head of your devotees. Most excellent Lord! You bear me as an emblem on your chest (which shows that you do not entertain any disrespect for me). But strangely enough you show mere respect to me but extend your highest grace to your votaries). Who can comprehend the working of your divine Māyā ?’’

24. In the Ramyaka continent, its ruler, Vaivasvata Manu, to whom the Lord manifested his beloved Fish incarnation formerly (while he was in the birth of King Satyavrata), even still adores him with intense; constant devotion and praises him as follows:

25. “Salutations to the Divine Lord denoted by (the syllable) Om! I bow to him who is the life-giving principle; is pure Satya incarnate; and is (the fountain head of) the power of the senses, the power of the mind and the strength of the body! I pay my obeisance to the Great Fish 240

26. Though you move about inside (as the vital breath of all beings), and outside (as the atmosphere or wind), making a loud noise (in the form of Vedas), your form is (invisible to and hence) unseen by all the guardian deities of the world. Just as a person controls a wooden doll (by means of strings), you, the Supreme Ruler, have brought this universe under your control, by (the strings in the form of pres-cripizations and prohibitions given under) the designation of Brāhmaṇas.

27. (You, being the vital breath, are the real Protector and Controller of the creation). Discarding you (the vital breath of all), the guardian deities of the world, being feverish with jealousy, tried but could not protect both severally and jointly, the bipeds and quadrupeds, reptiles and the immobiles—in fact whatever is seen in the world.

28. Oh birthless Lord! Piloting this earth, the abode of herbs and creepers, along with me (Manu, then in birth of Satyavrata) you sported enthusiastically and vigorously on the ocean of deluge surging with heavy billows. I bow to you who are the controller of all multitudes of beings in this universe.”

29. In Hiraṇmaya continent also, the Lord abides assuming the form of the Tortoise. Aryaman, the ruler of the manes (departed forefathers), along with the inhabitants of this continent (varṣa) worships this most beloved form (of the Lord) and continuously repeats the following Mantra:

30. “Salutation to the glorious Lord, the (Divine) Tortoise, designated by the symbol Om. Your form is specially characterised by pure Sattva. Your position is beyond perception (due to your submarine activities). Bow to you who are above the limit of Time. Obeisance to you who are Omnipresent and the support of all.

31. This visible objective universe which appears in innumerable forms and which cannot be enumerated due to its being an illusion, is really your own form (inseparable from you and) manifested by your Māyā. I bow to you whose form is thus indescribable.

32. It is you alone that are designated as a mammal, a sweat-born being, an oviparous being, a plant, a mobile or immobile creature, a god, a sage, a departed ancestor (Pitṛ) a goblin, the world as perceived by senses, the celestial region, the sky, the earth, a mountain, a river, an ocean, an island-continent, a planet and a star.

33. The number (viz. twenty-four principles) has been presumed by sages (like Kapila) in you, even though you possess innumerable specialities, names, forms or shapes. In the light of true knowledge, the number (automatically) disappears. I bow to you who are of the nature of real knowledge or the real essence of the Śaṅkhya doctrine."

34. Assuming the form of a boar, the glorious Lord, the presiding deity of Sacrifice, stays in the region called the Northern Kurus. The goddess of the Earth along with the Kurus (the inhabitants of that country) adores him with unwavering devotion. She constantly repeats the following, the most sacred, secret mystical mantra:

35. "I pay obeisance to the Supreme Lord symbolised by the sacred syllable Om—the Lord who can be truly comprehended only through the mantras (Vedic texts); who is of the form of both types of sacrifices—performed with or without the use of sacrificial posts; every limb of whose person is constituted (of different kinds) of great sacrifices (e.g. aśvamedha). Salutations to you, Oh Supreme Person. I bow to him (who as a performer of sacrifices) is of pure actions, and who is called triyuga (manifest in three yugas, due to the absence of sacrifices in the Kṛta Age, or their neglect and discontinuance in the Kali Age.

36* Just as learned experts (in sacrificial lore) ignite fire latent in pieces of (Śamī) wood, by means of friction, so do sages, eager to see you (i.e. your real form) lying concealed in actions and their results (due to their attachment), find you out in (the discipline of) body and the senses which are the product of gunas. They discover you with the help of the churning rod in the form of the discriminative faculty of the mind. I bow to you who manifest your real form this way.

241. VR: Salutation to you who are object of true knowledge which removes the idea of the limited numbers (viz. twentyfour).

242. Om name Bhagavata mantra-tattva-lingāya Yajña-kratau mahā-dhvarāvyavāyā mahā-puruṣāya namaḥ karma-fuklāya triyugāya namaste

243. In explanation of the different limbs of this Lord of Sacrifices VR. quotes: sruṭkundaśīt, sruva śīla nāśīyā tādāre camasāh karma-randhaḥ / Supra Bh.P. 3.13.36.

* Learned persons who know the Reality as propounded in the Vedānta realize, after deep thinking, your real form unmanifest yet the controller of the body and its sense organs, a product of three gunas by means of their mind or reasoning faculty... I salute to you who are designated differently as Indra etc. when invoked in sacrifices—VJ.
37. You, the Supreme Self, are discerned to be an independent absolute reality, distinct from the products of the Māyā, viz. gross matter (elements); sense-activities, the presiding deities of senses, the body, the controller (Tīrtha) and ego, by those whose intellect has been sharpened and discerning through deep contemplation and the practice of the (various) stages of Yoga (Yama, Niyama etc.).

38. By means of its guṇas, Māyā, though inert (jaḍa), brings about the creation, preservation and destruction of the universe through his presence, just as a piece of iron moves about (due to the presence of) a load-stone with its face towards it. This is meant only for the jīvas (by you) and not desired for himself. I bow to you who stand a mere witness to the guṇas and the working of the Māyā.

39. You are the primeval Boar, the cause of the universe. Just as an elephant crushes its rival elephant, you killed the demon (Hiraṇyākṣa) in the battle. Placing me on the tip of your tusk, you emerged from the lowest region in the ocean of deluge, playing (all the while) like an elephant. I pay my obeisance to you the Omnipotent Lord."

CHAPTER NINETEEN

(Description of Kimpuruṣa and Bhārata Varṣas)

Sṛṣṭi Suka said:

1. In the continent called Kimpuruṣa, the greatest votary Hanumān, who feels pleasure and delight in being near the Lord's feet, worships with uninterrupted devotion—along with the Kimpuruṣas (the inhabitants of that continent)—the Primeval Being, the glorious Lord Rāma, the beloved of Sītā and the elder brother of Lakṣmaṇa.

2. (There) he listens with rapt attention the most auspicious story of the glorious Lord, his master, melodiously sung of by Ārṣtinemi and the Gandharvas. And he sings the following to himself:
3. "I bow to the Lord of hallowing reputation who is symbolized by the syllable Om. I salute the Lord who possesses noble qualities, excellent character and conduct. I pay obeisance to him who has perfectly controlled his mind and who is diligent in the service of his subjects. Hail to him who is the touchstone (the utmost limit) of excellent renown. Salutations to the Supreme Person, the king of kings who is a great devotee of Brāhmaṇas.

4. I take shelter with him who is pure consciousness and knowledge incarnate, absolutely one (without a second); who, by his innate divine power, has dispelled (and transcended) all the states (e.g. wakefulness, sleep) caused by the three guṇas (of Māyā) and is (hence) perfectly serene; who is (totally) different from the phenomenal world and is above (all) names and forms; who is not touched by egoism, yet is realizable (as Brahman) by wise persons of pure mind.

5. The incarnation of the Almighty Lord, in a mortal body, in this world, is not merely for extirpating the demon race but for teaching (the ideal way of life) to human beings. Otherwise, how could the omnipotent Ruler who abides in his innate blissful self, seem to be distressed for Sītā.

6. Verily, the glorious Lord Vāsudeva (i.e. Rāma) is not at all attached to anything in the three worlds, (for) he is the Soul and the most intimate friend of the wise people (who have subdued their Self). Hence, he cannot suffer from infatuation for a woman (viz. Sītā). Nor would he exile Lākṣmaṇa (for his technical breach of order by allowing sage Durvāsas for Rāma’s audience).

7. Neither birth (in a noble family) nor beauty nor eloquence nor (brilliant) intelligence, nor the charming personality pleases (lit. is a cause of satisfaction to) him. For the elder brother of Lākṣmaṇa (Rāma) has formed friendship with us, dwellers in the forest who are bereft of these qualities.

8. Hence, whether a god or a demon or a monkey or a human being—whoever he may be—should take shelter with all his heart, with Rāma who is Lord Hari in the human form, and he remembers all good deeds done to him. And he carried (the people) in the Northern Kosala (with him) to Heaven."
9. In the continent of Bhärata also, the Lord under the name Nara-Närāyaṇa, remaining in an unmanifested form, continues to perform penance to the end of the Kalpa. (It is) for compassionately bestowing his grace on self-controlled persons. His penance is such as enhances righteousness, knowledge, renunciation, mystic powers, sense-control, freedom from I-ness (ahāṃkāra) ultimately consummating in self-realization.

10. The revered (sage) Nārada intended to initiate the sage Sāvarṇi (the prospective Manu presiding over the future Manvantara) in the Pañcarātra doctrine (describing the glories of the Lord) along with Sāṅkhya philosophy and practice (or karma-yoga—unattached practice of karmas) as expounded by the Lord (himself). He (Nārada) along with the inhabitants of all classes (varṇas) and stages of life (āśrama) in (this) Bhärata, adores him with the feeling of utmost devotion and sings (mutters) the following (mantra):

11. "I pay respects to the glorious Lord who is symbolised by the sacred syllable OM. (I bow to him) who is perfectly serene by nature and (absolutely) free from ahāṃkāra (ego). Salutations to the foremost sage Nara-Närāyaṇa who is the property of the property-less. I bow again and again to him who is the preceptor of Parama Hamsas (the highest order of recluses) and who is the Master of those (saintly persons) who find delight in the Soul.

12. I bow to him who is (completely) detached and (hence) is not bound by the egotistical feeling of being the creator or even though he is the Master of the creation (etc. of the universe); who is distinct (from the body) for though he resides in the body, he is not affected by the bodily conditions, (and needs like hunger, thirst etc.); who is (an impartial) witness whose vision is not biased by the guṇas like Sattva, rajas and tamas.

13. Oh Lord of Yoga! This is stated to be the highest proficiency in Yoga by revered god Brahmā (Hiranyagarbha) that, at the time of death, one should give up one's (Soul's) identification with this evil body and fix his mind in you who are attributeless (or untouched by the guṇas of Māyā).
14. (It is only) a fool who, being addicted to the pleasures both of this world as well as those in heaven, feels anxiety for his son, wife and wealth (at the time of death). If like (such) a fool, a learned person be afraid of the death of this contemptible body, all his (intensive) studies (in śāstra, of this learned person) is no better than (wasteful and onerous) labour.

15. Therefore, Oh Lord Viṣṇu, confer on us that (bhakti) Yoga—which is your natural attribute—whereby we can quickly cut asunder (and give up) the feeling of identity and mineness felt for this contemptible physical body due to Your Māyā—i.e. a bond very difficult to sever."

16. Even in this continent of Bhārata, there are many rivers and mountains, namely, Malaya, Maṅgalapraṭha, Maināka, Trikūṭa, Rṣabha, Kūṭaka, Kollaka, Sahya, Devagiri, Rṣyamūka, Śri-Saila, Veṅkaṭa, Mahendra, Vāridhāra, Vin-dhya, Śuktimān, Rkṣagiri, Pāriyātra, Drona, Citrakūṭa, Govardhana, Raivātaka, Kakubha, Nīla, Gokāmukha, Indrakila, Kāmagiri and other hundreds and thousands of mountains. There rise in these (mountains) innumerable big and small rivers.244

17. The peoples of Bhārata-varṣa touch with their body (use for their personal needs) the waters of these rivers, the names of which purify them even by pronouncing (their names).

18. The great rivers (in Bhārata varṣa) are: Candrasaṅga, Tāmraparṇi, Avatodā, Kṛtamālā, Vaihāyasī, Kāverī, Veṇī, Payasvini, Śarkarāvarta, Tuṅgabhadra, Kṛṣṇā, Veṇyā, Bhimarathī, Godāvari, Nirvindhya, Payoṣni, Tāpi, Revā, Surasā, Narmadā, Carmanvati, Sindhu; two mighty rivers: Andha (Brahmaputra) and Śoṇa—Mahānadi, Vēdasmṛti, Rṣikulyā, Triśāmā, Kauśikī, Mandākini, Yamunā, Sarasvatī, Drṣadvatī, Gomati, Sarayū, Rodasvatī, Saptavatī, Suṣomā, Śatadru, Candrabhāgā, Marudvṛdhā, Vitastā, Asikṇī, Viśvā and other great rivers.

244. For the identification of these mountains and rivers etc. mentioned here and in the next two verses, vide D.C. Sircar—SGAMI, pp. 48-74 and N.L. Ðe—GDAMI under relevant heads.
19. It is in this very continent only that men who are born here can, through the white (sattvic), red (rājasa), and black (tāmasa) acts commenced by them, attain to the numerous celestial, earthly and hellish existences (births) according to the serial order of their karmas; for all (everyone) get the proper type of birth according to (the nature of) their karmas. And the Liberation is achieved by the (unattached) performance of the duties prescribed for each class of society.

20. Liberation is characterised by Yoga of motiveless devotion solely directed to the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, the Supreme Soul who abides in all beings as their self; is above prejudices and defects (like love, hate), and beyond the range of speech, and not dependent on any other support. It is attainable by intimate association with great personages, viz. devotees of Lord Viṣṇu—association which can be formed when the knot of ignorance which leads to different kinds of births, is cut down completely. For gods sing this very praise of human life as the means of attaining all purusārthas (highest goals in human life).

21. Oh! What (wonderful) meritorious deed has been done by these! Or Lord Hari of his own accord has bestowed his grace on them. In the land of Bharata, these have got birth in the human species which is useful as a means of serving Lord Mukunda. How strongly we yearn for this!

22. Of what use are the performances of sacrifices, austere penances, observances of vows, charitable donations—all so very difficult to perform? Or of what avail is this worthless attainment of heaven (as a result of merits earned) where the remembrance of the lotus-like feet of Nārāyaṇa is wiped out in the excessive enjoyments of sensual pleasures.

23. It is preferable to attain (birth in) the land of Bhārata with its momentary span of life to achieving those regions where beings are blessed with a life span of a Kalpa but whence return to birth (in samsāra) is inevitable. For the wise resolute mortals (in Bhārata-varṣa) dedicate at Hari's feet, their acts in a moment and attain to the region of Hari, free from the fear of Samsāra.

24. The region, even if it be the residence of god Brahmā, the Supreme Controller of gods, is not worth resorting, if there be no river of nectar in the form of discourses on Lord Viṣṇu, flowing, and if there is no saintly votaries of the Lord entirely depending on it²⁴⁵, and where sacrifices in the form of the worship of the Lord of sacrifices, accompanied with the celebration of festivals (like music and dancing based on his episodes) are not performed.

25. But those jīvas, who, even after getting birth here, in the human race, endowed with the power of knowledge and discrimination, the capability of doing actions to attain it, the plentitude of substances necessary for securing it, do not verily exert to attain to Liberation whence there is no return to the mundane existence, enter again into the bondage (of saṁsāra) like forest birds (which after getting freedom from the fowler's net carelessly play on the same tree on which they were formerly caught and thus get into the bondage again).

26. (How blessed are the inhabitants of Bhārata varṣa). When in performing a sacrifice, they (people of Bhārata) set apart for various deities their due share of oblations and with faith offer these oblations to the sacrificial fire in the proper manner, reciting the relevant mantras and offering the substances according to prescriptions laid down, he is the One Lord, perfect in all respects and a bestower of blessings but who, invoked under different names gladly accepts them.

27. It is true that when prayed, the Lord confers the desired object to him who implores him for it. But certainly he does not confer on them the real blessing as they are again brought to the position of a suppliant. But to those who adore him without any ulterior motive, he, of his own accord, offers his foliage-like tender feet which cover (satisfy) all their desires.

28. If after exhausting our merits in enjoying celestial life, there be some balance of merit accruing from a duly performed sacrifice, a religious discourse preached or any other pious act done, we pray for a birth in the continent called Ajanabhā (Bhārata Varṣa) retaining our remembrance of the ²⁴⁵. Or Votaries of the Lord who are the sources (i.e. the participants) of the nectarine discourses on Hari.

Lord. For glorious Lord Hari extends his blessings to those who worship him.*

Śrī Śuka said:

29. Oh King! Some people describe eight minor subcontinents attached to Jambū-dvīpa. They are said to have been created by the sons of Sagara who excavated the earth on all sides in their search for the sacrificial horse.

30. They are as follows: Svarṇa Prastha, Candra-Śukla, Āvartana, Ramaṇaka, Mandārahariṇa, Pāñcajanya, Simhala and Laṅkā.

31. In this way, the divisions of the Jambūdvīpa into continents have been described to you (exactly) as I was taught.

* D.S. Yande’s edition of the Bh.P. gives the following eight verses as additional, recorded in some editions. ŚR. has not commented on them. But they are translated here in case their genuineness be proved in some subsequent critical edition of the Bh. P.

1. Hence even gods desire to be born on this earth in the Bhārata Varṣa with a view to accumulating noble, inexhaustible, pure, auspicious merit.

2. They wish: “When shall we be able to be born in the land of Bhārata? When can we attain to the highest abode of Viṣṇu by (our) great merit?

3. When can we, by charitable donations, performance of various kinds of sacrifices, and austerities, adore Lord Hari who is reposing in the cosmic ocean, and reach his abode which the wise sages visualize (directly).

4. The noble Soul who, by nature, is inclined to sing in praise of Hari, or is dear to his votaries, or who renders service to his great devotees, deserves to be paid respects by us.

5. The great person whose mind is keenly interested in hearing the exposition of the Vedas as well as in listening to the Purāṇas or in the company of the pious persons, deserves our obeisance.

6. After being born in Bhārata, if a person is averse to pious acts, he (is like a person who) discards a pitcher (full) of nectar and desires to have a pot of poison.

7. He who, abandoning the worship of Vāsudeva, indulges in various acts, (is like a person who) neglecting a wish-yielding cow, desires to drink the milk of the ārka plant."

8. In this way, the denizens of heaven eulogize the land of Bhārata. Those who, attaining birth herein, indulge in sensual pleasures, are really deluded by the Māyā of Lord Hari.

a46. Vide infra ix.8. 8-9.
CHAPTER TWENTY

(Description of the remaining six dvīpas)*

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Hereafter the division of Plakṣa and other dvīpas into Varsas is being detailed, with special reference to their dimensions, distinguishing characteristics and relative position.

2. Just as mount Meru is surrounded by Jambūdvipa, this Jambūdvipa is engirdled by the salt sea of the same dimension as the dvīpa itself. Just as a moat is surrounded by an outlying garden, the Salt Sea is enclosed by a dvīpa called Plakṣa, which is double in dimension of the Salt Sea. There stands the great Plakṣa (the Indian fig) tree equal to the Jambū (Rose apple) tree (in Jambūdvipa). It is of gold and it gave its name to the dvīpa. At its foot, dwells the god of fire, of seven tongues. Its ruler is Idmajihva, the son of Priyavrata. He divided his dvīpa into seven continents. Having entrusted them to his sons bearing the same name as that of the Seven Varṣas, he became liberated from saṃsāra by practising union with the Soul.

3. The continents (Varṣas) are called Śiva, Yavasa, Subhadra, Śānta, Kṣema, Amṛta and Abhaya. It is said that there are seven well-known mountains and seven famous rivers in each (continent).

4. The seven mountains forming the borders of the Varṣas are Maṇikūṭa, Vajrakūṭa, Indrāsaṇa, Jyotismān, Suparna, Hiraṇyāṅgīnya and Meghamāla. The principal rivers are Aruṇā Aṅgirasī, Sāvirī, -Suprabhātā, -Rtambarā and Satyambharā. The four classes of people (varṇas), called Harsha, Pataṅga, Urdhvāyana, (and) Satyāṅga use the waters of these rivers and wash away (the effects of) their rajas and tamas. They live a thousand years; their form is (free from fatigue, sweat etc.) like that of gods, and they beget progeny like them. With the rituals prescribed in the three Vedas, they worship the Ātman, the glorious Lord—Sun, the gate of heaven, who is described in the three Vedas.

* Some commentators like GD. seem to have followed a text with different order of verses. Here the text adopted by SR is accepted.
5*. (They meditate upon him as follows:) “We resort to the Sun-god who is the manifestation of the ancient god Viṣṇu; who is the presiding deity of Satya (righteousness to be practised) and Ṛta (the divine law), the Vedas, the dispenser of good and evil fruits.”

6. In the five continents (dvīpas) commencing with Plakṣa, all persons, without any distinction are, from their very birth, blessed with long life, soundness (conative and cognitive) of sense-organs, virility, lustre, physical power, intellectual capacity and bravery.

7. Plakṣa dvīpa is encircled by a sea of sugar-cane juice equal in extent to the (Plakṣa-dvīpa) itself. So also Śālmalī-dvīpa, double in dimension (of the sea of the sugarcane juice) stands shining with the sea of wine equal to Śālmalī dvīpa in width, surrounding it.

8. Here (in Śālmalī-dvīpa) stands the Śālmalī (the silk cotton) tree which has the same dimension as that of the Plakṣa tree. The sages proclaimed that on that tree is the nest (abode) of the worshipful Garuḍa, the King of birds who praises the Lord with his wings consisting of the Vedas. And this tree is regarded as the origin of the name of the dvīpa.

9. The Lord of the dvīpa, Yajñabāhu, the son of Priyavrata, divided the seven subdivisions (Varṣas) of that dvīpa among his seven sons who gave their names severally to the (seven) Varṣas, viz. Surocana, Saumanasya, Ramanaka, Devavarṣa, Pāribhadra Āpyāyana and Avijnāta.

10. In those Varṣas (continents), the continental mountains (forming the boundaries) and the rivers are seven each. (The names of the boundary-mountains are:) Svarasa, Śatasiṅga, Vāmadeva, Kunda, Mukunda, Puṣpa-varṣa and Sahasra-śruti. And names of the rivers are: Anumati, Sinivālī, Sarasvatī, Kuhū, Rajani, Nandā and Rākā.

11. Men in this Varṣa are divided in classes designated as Śrutadhara, Vīryadhara, Vasundhara and Iṣandhara; with

---

* VR. : rīs—meritorious act. mṛtyu and amṛta—Bondage and Liberation. pratiṣṭha—the beginningless cause of the universe. This excludes ītās etc. which have a beginning. Sāsta—unchangeable.

Translation: “We take asylum with the unchangeable Sun-god who forms the body of Viṣṇu who is the beginningless cause of the universe and the cause of bondage and liberation and leads ītās to the course of dharma.”
Vedic hymns they worship the glorious ātman, the Moon-god who is Veda incarnate.

12. "May the Moon-god who, dividing (the month into) dark and bright fortnights, by his rays distributes food to the manes, gods (respectively in the dark and bright fortnight) and to all created beings, be our ruler".47

13. Likewise beyond the Sea of Wine (Suroda) and double its size, lies Kuṣa-dvipa which, like the previous (Śālmalī) dvīpa, is surrounded on the other side by the Ocean of Ghee of dimension equal to it (Kuṣadvīpa). In that dvīpa stands a dump of Kuṣa grass planted therein by the Lord. It has given its name to the dvīpa. It (the clump of Kuṣa grass) is resplendent like another Fire-god, and it illuminates all directions by the lustre of its tender shoots.

14. The (first) ruler of that dvīpa was the son of Priyavrata, Hiraṇyaretas by name. Dividing his dvīpa proportionately (in seven parts) he distributed them to his seven sons namely Vasu, Vasudāna, Dṛḍha-ruci, Nābhi-gupta, Stutyavrata, Vivikta and Vāmadeva, and he himself took to austere penance.

15. In those Varṣas the boundary mountains and rivers are well-known to be severally seven: Cakra, Catuḥśrīga, Kapila, Citrakūṭa, Devānika, Īrdhva-roma, Draviṇa mountains, and the Rasakulyā, Madhukulyā, Mitravindā, Śrutavindā, Devagarbhā, Ghṛtacyutā and Mantramālā rivers.

16. With the waters of these rivers, the inhabitants of Kuṣadvīpa denoted by (the classes—Varṇas) Kuśala, Kovida, 247. (i) VR. emphasizes that but for the division into dark and bright fortnights by the Moon-god, there would have been no food-offerings to the manes and gods. May the Moon-god bring happiness (amṛtam = sukham) to us.

(ii) VJ.: May the inner controller of the Moon-god whose rays are full of nectar, distribute Soma to manes and gods and food to us all in both dark and bright fortnights. May he bring happiness (somam=sukham) to us.

(iii) BP. attributes the division into dark and bright fortnights to the Moon-god. By his rays he distributes food to the manes (in the dark fortnight) and to gods (in the bright fortnight). May that Moon-god be our king and bring us happiness.
Abhiyukta, Kulaka (corresponding to our Varṇas like Brāhmaṇa etc.) worship the glorious Lord in the form of Fire by their proficiency in sacrificial rituals (or skillfulness in work).

17.* (They pray): "Oh Fire-god! You are the carrier of oblations directly to the Supreme Brahma (Lord Hari). Worship the Supreme person by sacrifice (sacrificial oblations) offered to gods who are the limbs of the body of the Cosmic Man (just as what is offered to the part of the body e.g. a hand is as good as given to the person himself)."

18. Similarly, beyond the Sea of Ghee (Ghṛtoda), there is the Krauṇca-dvīpa twice as extensive (as Ghṛtoda) and encircled by the Ocean of Milk (Kṣiroda) equal to it (Krauṇca-dvīpa) in dimension, just like Kuṣa-dvīpa by the Sea of Ghee (Ghṛtoda). Here the chief mountain is called Krauṇca which gives its name to the dvīpa.

19. Though the projecting ridges and bowers were devastated by the weapon (javelin) of Kārṇtikeya, it (Krauṇca) became free from fear as it was sprayed over by the surges of the ocean of Milk and was protected on all sides by god Varuṇa.

20. Even in that Dwīpa was its (first) ruler, a son of Priyavrata, Ghṛtapṛṣṭha by name. He divided his (Krauṇca) dvīpa in seven continents. In those continents bearing the names of his sons, he installed his seven heirs (sons) as the rulers of those Varṇas, and he himself resorted to the lotus-like feet of the glorious Lord Hari (the destroyer of the Bondage of Samsāra) who was his Antarātman (Inner Controller) and whose glory was supremely auspicious.

21. The sons of Ghṛtapṛṣṭha are: Āma, Madhuruha, Meghapṛṣṭha, Sudhāman, Bhrājiṣṭha, Lohitārṇa and Vanas-

*Other interpretations are: (i) VR: "Oh Fire-god! You form a part of the body of the transcendental Brahma. You are the carrier of sacrificial oblations to gods and thereby to the Inner Controller in the bodies of gods. Convey our sacrificial oblations offered to gods who are but limbs of the body of the Supreme Man, to him who is also the Antarātman (Inner Controller)."

(ii) VJ: "Oh Omniscient (Fire-God)! You are the carrier of sacrificial oblations to Śrī Nārāyaṇa as well as to gods who are members of his Person. Staying near us, you make us worship Śrī Hari (called Yajña) by the performance of the act called Sacrifice."
pati. The mountains demarcating the Varṣas are seven, viz. Sukla, Vardhamāna, Bhojana, Upabarhin, Nanda, Nandana, and Sarvatobhadra. And the rivers are known to be seven only, viz. Abhayā, Amṛtaughā, Āryakā, Tirthavati, Vṛttirūpavatī, Pavitravatī and Šuklā.

22. The inhabitants of that Varṣa (classified into Varṇas) called Puruṣa, Rṣabha, Dravina and Devaka (corresponding to the Varṇas such as Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya) use the sacred, purifying waters of those rivers, and propitiate the Lord in the form of water, by offering water with the hollow of their joined palms filled with water.

23. (They pray the waters thus :) “Oh waters! You are endowed with powers by the Supreme God. Hence, you purify the three worlds, viz. the heaven, the earth and the intervening space. As you are naturally capable of destroying all sins, purify our bodies as we touch you.”

24. Similarly beyond the ocean of milk (Kṣṭroda) and surrounding it lies the Śakadvipa, thirtytwo lakh Tojanas in extent. It is encircled by the sea of liquid curds equal to it in length. Herein stands a tree called Śāka which has given its appellation to the dvīpa. And its extremely fragrant smell perfumes the (whole of the) dvīpa.

25. Even of that dvīpa also, a son of Priyavrata named Medhaṭithi is the (first) ruler. He also divided it in seven continents (Varṣas) bearing the names of his sons. In them, he installed, as rulers, his sons, viz. Purojava, Manojava, Pavamāna, Dhūmrānīka, Citrarepha, Bahurūpā, Viśvadhara by name. And concentrating his mind on Lord Ananta, he himself entered Penance-forest (for performing austerities).

26. In these continents, the boundary-mountains and (main) rivers are only seven each. The mountains are Īśāna, Uruśrīga, Balabhadrā, Satakesara, Sahasrasrota, Devapāla and Mahānasa. The rivers are Anaghā, Ayurdā, Ubbhayaprṣṭī, Aparājita, Pañcapadi, Sahasrastuti, Nijadhṛti.

27. The inhabitants of that continent, (classified in Varṇas) called Rṣavrata, Satyavrata, Dānavrata and Anuvrata who have washed off their rajas and tamas by Prāṇāyāma (breath-control) propitiate the glorious Lord in the form of Vāyu through perfect concentration of mind.
28. (They pray as follows:) “May the glorious Lord who is the Inner Controller of all beings, and who, entering (the body in the form of the chief vital breath), sustains all the beings by his five functions of inhalation and exhalation, and under whose control the whole of the universe exists, protect us.’’

29. So also beyond the ocean of (liquid) curds is situated Puṣkaradhvīpa which is double the extent (of the ocean of curds), and which is encircled by the sea of sweet water equal in dimension to it (Puṣkara-dvīpa). Herein grows a gigantic lotus of hundred million petals of burnished gold, shining like the flames of fire. It was intended to be the throne of Lord Brahmā (who has a lotus-flower as his seat).

30. In the middle of the dvīpa, stands only one mountain called Mānasottara. It demarcates the boundary between the eastern and western continents (Vṛṣṇas). It is ten thousand Yojanas in its height and length. Here (on this mountain), in the four directions, are built the four capital cities of Indra (and other) guardians of the world. Over it (the Mānasottara mount) revolves the (other) wheel, in the form of a year (Saṁvatsara) of the chariot of the Sun-god. It goes round mount Meru within the limit of a day and night of gods (each of which consists of six months of human beings).

31. The ruler of that continent was the Prince of Priyavrata, named Vṛtitohtra. He had two sons Ramanāka and Dhātaki by name. He installed them as the rulers and protectors of the Vṛṣṇas, and like his elder brothers, he devoted himself solely to the service (worship) of the Lord.

32. The inhabitants of that continent propitiate the Lord in the form of god Brahmā, with (mental) acts leading to the region of Brahmā (the Sālokya type of liberation), and recite the following (Mantra):

33* “We pay obeisance to that serene glorious Lord who is (regarded as) the fruit of all righteous actions, and a concrete means which leads to (the knowledge of) the Brahman; whom all people should adore (with the master-servant relation); who is established in the one Supreme Reality (Brahman) and is (hence) one without a second."

34. Beyond that sea of sweet water and encircling it, is a ring of mountain-range called Lokāloka which divides the Loka i.e. the region illuminated by the light of the Sun, and the Aloka—the region which gets no light of the Sun.

35. Beyond the ocean of Fresh water, there is a tract of land which is in extent as wide as the distance between the mountains Mānasottara and Meru. Beyond that stretches a land of gold which is (shining) like a sheet of mirror. Nothing that goes or is dropped there ever returns and hence it is avoided by all living beings (as it is reserved for gods).

36. The mountain is called Lokāloka, as this mountain stands between the regions lighted by the Sun (Loka), and those not lighted by him (Aloka).

37. The mountain-chain has been laid beyond and round all the three worlds, by the Almighty Lord. It is so high and extensive that rays of the innumerable heavenly luminaries from the Sun to the Pole-star illuminate only the three worlds on this side (of the mountain), but cannot penetrate to the other side.

38. This much disposition of the world with reference to its (details of) dimensions, characteristics and relative position has been considered by sages. The whole of the terrestrial globe is calculated as fifty crore Yojanas in extent, out of which the land from Meru to the Lokāloka mountain occupies onefourth (i.e. twelve and half crores of Yojanas).

39. The Lords of elephants viz. Rṣabha, Puṣkaracūḍa, Vāmana and Aparājīta have been posted in four cardinal points over (and beyond) that (Lokāloka mountain), by the

(ii) VJ. : Oh Lord! Your form, possessing all auspicious characteristics, is realized by the performance of sacrifices. People adore your being manifested in the form of Brahmā, as distinct from the rest of the world, and absolutely one without a second.

(iii) VC. : asthitā : One whose absolute devotion is in the Lord.
Self-born god (Brahmā), the preceptor (or the eldest one) of the whole of the world. They are the cause of (i.e. have the responsibility of) maintaining the stability and balance of all the worlds.

40. For infusing and increasing the various powers of the elephants and the guardian deities (like Indra) who are (the manifestations of) his own part, and for the welfare of all the worlds around, the glorious Lord, the supremely Exalted Person, the Lord of all great Powers, the Inner Controller (of all), abides on all sides on the great mountain (Lokāloka.) He manifests his form of pure (unalloyed with rajas and tamas) sattva distinguished by (his excellences like) Supreme righteousness, knowledge, renunciation, sovereignty and the great eight-fold mystic powers. With his powerful arms adorned with his superb weapons, he stays surrounded by his prominent attendants like Viśvaksena and others.

41. It seems that the Lord has assumed the above-described form to the end of this Kalpa, for the protection and maintenance of the careers of the different worlds evolved by his Yoga-māyā (mystical creative potency).

42. By the extent of the area falling with (i.e. on this side of) the Lokāloka mountain, the extent of Aloka (regions not receiving solar light) which is beyond the Lokāloka mountain, is explained. The sages say that the extremely holy region lying beyond Aloka can be travelled only by masters of Yoga (as was done by Kṛṣṇa to bring back the dead son of a Brāhmaṇa—vide infra 'Bh. P. X').

43. The Sun is located in the middle position of the great Egg of the universe which is at the centre of the space between the earth and the vault of the sky. The distance between the Sun and the circumference of the universe is twenty-five crore of Yojanas.

44. As the Sun was in this inanimate egg of the universe, he got the epithet Mārtanda. He is also called Hiranya-garbha as he was born of the golden Egg (of the universe).

45. It is by the Sun really, that the cardinal points, the sky, the celestial region, the earth, regions of pleasure (bhūvar-loka and svar-loka) and Liberation, the infernal regions and the nether worlds (e.g. Atala, Vitala etc.) and all others, are divided.

46. The Sun god is the Soul, and the deity presiding over the eyesight of gods, sub-human beings, men, reptiles and plants as well as of all species of living beings.

CHAPTER TWENTYONE

(The Stellar Region) *

Śrī Suka said:

1. To this extent (viz. 50 crore Yojanas diameter and 25 crore Yojanas height) has, the disposition of the terrestrial sphere, been described, with reference to its dimensions and characteristics.

2. Experts in this (science) describe the dimensions (etc.) of the heavenly sphere with reference to this (extent etc. of the sphere of the earth, as being symmetrical in dimensions) just as the size etc. of one of the two halves of beans is known from that of the other half. Between the two (the heavenly sphere and the globe of the earth) is the Antarikṣa (Intermediate region) which is joined by the two (by the earth from below and the heaven from above).

3. Situated in the centre (of the sky), the glorious Lord of luminaries gives warmth to the three worlds with its heat,

* This chapter deals with the old astronomical ideas current at the final redaction of this Purāṇa. It is a popular statement of a scientific subject. We find similar topics discussed in Devī-bhāgavata VIII 5-20, Matsya P. 124-128, VP. II. 8-12 and the astrological aspect in Garuḍa P. 59-64, Agni P. 121 etc. The statements given in these Purāṇas are to be taken broadly, as modern astronomical exactness should not be expected in such works. Thus the increase and decrease in the duration of days and nights and the rate of this variation as given in verse 4 here is roughly correct, though actually it is not so uniform mathematically. Other statements are to be taken in a broad sense. The commentators profusely quote from Purāṇas, Tantras on old astronomy which cannot be summarised here. ... and illumines them with its lustre. It proceeds by slow, rapid and regular movements known by the (technical) terms Uttarāṇa (the period of the Summer Solstice, when the Sun appears moving to the North of equator), Daksināṇa (the period of the winter Solstice, when the Sun moves to the south of equator) and Vaiśuvata (period of Vernal or Autumnal equinoxes), and also in higher, lower and middle positions, according to seasons.

4. When the Sun traverses the signs of Mēṣa (Aries) and Tulā (Libra), the days and nights are of equal duration. When it traverses the five zodiacal signs from Vṛśabha (Taurus) to Kanyā (Virgo), the days go on lengthening and the duration of the night goes on decreasing one ghaṭikā (24 minutes) per month.

5. When it traverses the five signs from Vṛśāṭika (Scorpio) to Mīna (Pisces), days and nights are in the reverse order (and days go on decreasing and nights increasing).

6. Days go on increasing in duration, till the Daksināṇa begins, while nights do the same, till the commencement of Uttarāṇa.

7. The learned say that a distance of nine crores and fifty-one lakh Yojanas is thus traversed by the Sun in its revolution round the Mānasottara mountain. (They say that) on that mountain, to the east of Meru, is situated the capital city of Indra (presiding deity of the eastern direction), called Devadhānī; to the South (of Meru) is the capital of Yama (the presiding deity of the Southern direction) by name Samyamanī; to the West, the city of Varuṇa (the god presiding over the Western quarter), called Nimlocanan; and to the North is the capital of Soma (presiding deity of the northern direction), named Vibhāvarī. When the Sun passes through these cities, there is Sunrise, Midday, Sun-set and Midnight on the four sides of Meru (respectively). These serve as the special time of activity and cessation of activities for living beings.

8. To the dwellers on Mount Meru, it is always the Mid-day. And though the Sun (with its face towards the stellar sphere, actually moves to the eastern direction) with Mount Meru on its left side, it appears (to move to the West and) to keep the Meru on its right (because the wind called Pravaha which always blows with the Meru on its right, forces the stellar spheres including the Sun which goes from east to west to move in the opposite direction.

9. It is said that just on the diametrically opposite side of that point where the Sun rises (or appears in view), it sets (goes out of view). If at any point, it troubles people with heat and makes them perspire, exactly on the opposite side of the point, it makes them sleep (as it is midnight). Those who see it shining (brightly in their place), do not see it when it is at the (diametrically opposite point).

10. When it starts from the capital of Indra, it traverses in fifteen ghatikas (six hours) the distance of two crores and a quarter, twelve lakhs and a half and twenty-five thousand (i.e. 23775000) Yojanas, and arrives at the city of Yama.

11. In this way, it proceeds to the city of Varuna, to that of the Moon-god and then gains to the capital of Indra (all the cities are equidistant). So also, in the stellar region, all planets such as the Moon and others, rise as well as set together along with the stars.

12. In this way, the chariot of the Sun which is the Vedatriad incarnate, covers in a muktha (48 minutes) a distance of thirty-four lakh and eight hundred Yojanas and travels through the four capital cities (in the abovementioned serial order).

13. It is traditionally said that the chariot has one wheel in the form of a year with twelve spokes (i.e. twelve months), six tyres (viz. six seasons) and three navels (three parts of four months each). Its axle-tree is fixed (at one end) to the top of Mount Meru and the other end is placed on the Manasottara mountain. Fixed to it, the wheel of the Sun's chariot rotates like the wheel of an oil mill over the Mount Manasottara.

14. Into that axle, there is another axle-tree measuring one-fourth of the first. It is like the axle of an oilpress with its upper end joined to the Polestar.

248. Naksatrabhimekhatayā svagatāḥ Meruḥ vāmataḥ kuravannapi, pradaksinā-vartapraha-khyā-vāyu-bhrāmyānā-jyotīsakra-valāḥ pratyakṣaḥ daksinatāḥ karoti —ŚR
15. The seat of the chariot is thirty-six lakh Yojanas in extent. The yoke of the Sun's chariot is of the same extent. Yoked to it by Aruṇa, are seven horses bearing the names of (Vedic) metres (viz. Gāyatrī, Brhaṭi, Uśnik, Jagati, Trīṣṭubh Anuṣṭubh and Paṅkti). And they carry the god Āditya (the Sun).

16. They say that, entrusted with the duties of a charioteer, sits Aruṇa in front of the Sun-god, but with his face turned towards the west (i.e. to the Sun-god to show respect).

17. Appointed to sing the Vedic hymns, the sages called Vālakhilyas, sixty thousand in number and of the size of the fourth part of a thumb,—who are placed in front of the Sun—sing the praise of the Sun-god.

18. And other sages, Gandharvas (celestial musicians), Apsarasas (Divine damsels), Nāgas (serpents), Yakṣas (demi-gods), Yātudhānas (demons) and gods—fourteen in all if taken one by one, and seven if taken in pairs—have different and varied names. And they, two at a time, serve the Lord, the Self in the form of the Sun, bearing different names; they perform their several duties and serve the Ātman in the form of the glorious Sun, every month. (For details vide infra 12.11, 33-34).

19. The circumference of the terrestrial sphere is nine crores and fifty lakh yojanas. Out of this, he crosses the distance of two thousand and two yojanas in a moment.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

(Description of the Moon and other Planets)

The King (Parīkṣit) enquired:

1. Your revered Self has described that while the glorious Solar deity, facing the stellar sphere moves forward (through the signs of the zodiac) with Meru and Pole Star to the left but appears to traverse keeping Meru and the Pole-Star on its right side (vide supra 21.8). How are we to reconcile (and understand) that statement?

He (Śrī Śuka) said:

2. When a potter's wheel is rotating, the movement of ants and other (insects etc.) which dwell on it is quite different (and independent from that of the wheel even though they are carried along with it), for they are found in the different parts of the wheel (even while it is in motion). Similarly, (although) the wheel of Time consisting of constellation of stars, signs of zodiac as a whole, revolves with great velocity, keeping Mount Meru and the Pole-Star to the right, the Sun and other planets depending on it (i.e. the Time-Wheel), their course of movement is also different (from that of the Time-Wheel with which they move); for they are observed in conjunction with different constellations of stars and signs of zodiac (at different times).

3. He (the Sun) is the very same glorious Lord Nārāyaṇa, the First Person (the Prime cause of the universe). He is enquired into by learned sages with the help of the Vedas. For the well-being of the people and for the purification (and timely performance) of ritualistic acts, he divided his body which is an embodiment of three Vedas, into twelve parts. He creates the respective characteristics (such as heat, cold) in the six seasons like the spring etc., for enjoying fruits of Karmas.

4. In this world, people who follow the path of duties prescribed for different classes of society (Varṇa) and stages in life (āstrama), in the three Vedas, devoutly worship him through different rituals, high or low, as laid down in the Vedas, and through the practice of Yogic meditation with faith, attain the eternal bliss.

5. Now, this Soul of the worlds\(^{249}\) (or living beings), viz. the Sun moves along the Wheel of Time in the middle of the sky, midway between the earth and the heaven and enjoys twelve months known by the signs of the zodiac as (twelve) divisions of the year. The learned teach that a month consists of two fortnights (one bright and the other dark), or a day and night (of the Pitṛs) or a period required (by the Sun) for traversing two constellations and a quarter in the space

\(^{249}\) Cf. Sūrya atmā jagatas tathuṣaṣṭa/RV.1.115.1
It is (further) instructed that the season (ṛtu) is that period (division) of the year in which the Sun traverses one sixth part (of his orbit).

6. And the period which he (the Sun) takes to traverse one half of his path through the sky is called an Ayana.

7. The learned have laid it down that the period in which the Sun, with his slow, rapid and moderate motions, completes his circuit in the orbit (through the whole extent of the sky) along with heavenly and earthly spheres, is called Saṁvatsara, Pari-vatsara, Iḍāvatsara, Anuvatsara and Vatsara. (Vide Supra 3.11.14).

8. Similarly the Moon is observed to be a hundred thousand Yojanas above the rays (orb) of the Sun. As it is faster in velocity (than the Sun), it goes ahead (of the Sun). It covers in two fortnights the circuit made by the Sun in one (complete) year; in two days and a quarter of that distance which the Sun traverses in a month; and in one day the distance the Sun requires a fortnight to cover.

9. It is by the waxing of its digits in the case of gods and in the waning of its rays in the case of manes that the Moon makes the day and night of gods and manes, by means of its first (bright) and the second (dark) fortnights.250 The Moon (as the king of plant-life and as such a food-giver) is the very life (-breath) of all species of living beings and (hence is called) the life. He is in conjunction with each of the constellation of stars for thirty Muhūrtas (24 hours).

10. And this glorious person comprising of sixteen digits (in his fullness) viz. the Moon, is the presiding deity over

250. The construction of the SK. text is significant. It wants to emphasize the Śruti text:

Tasmād śīryaṇaṁ ṁ pakṣaya jante which enjoins worship etc. of gods in the bright fortnight and the injunction aparā-pakṣe pitraṁ about the suitability of the dark-fortnight for the worship etc. of the manes. GD. points out the contradiction of the statement 'bright and dark fortnights make the day and the night of gods' in the above verse with that of Supra 3.11.12, which states 'the ayanas are called the day and night of the Svarga'. He reconciles by explaining that the bright fortnight is called the day of gods for it is regarded as suitable for the worship etc. of gods and the dark fortnight as the night of gods due to its unsuitability for worship and other functions pertaining to gods.

the mind, the ruler (and giver) of food and an embodiment of nectar. The sages describe him as one with all, as he is, by nature, the nourisher of the life of all gods, manes, men, goblins, beasts, birds, reptiles, plants and creepers.

11. The Almighty god has placed twenty-eight constellations inclusive of Abhijit, three lakh Yojanas above the Moon. They are fixed by him on the Time-Wheel. Hence they revolve with Meru on their right side.

12. Above these (constellations) at a height of two lakh Yojanas, is observed Venus. It revolves with rapid, slow and even velocity like the Sun, and is found either ahead of or at the rear of or along with the Sun. As it (overcrosses the constellation in the serial order and thus) marches rapidly, it generally brings showers of rain and is always favourable to the world. And (in combination with some other constellations) it is observed to counteract the unfavourable influence of planets (like the Mars obstructing rainfall).

13. The Mercury (Budha) becomes described (in its variations of motions etc.) by the description of the Venus. Budha or the Mercury, the son of Soma (the Moon) is observed to be two lakhs of Yojanas above the Venus. It generally sheds beneficent influence. When it surpasses the Sun (and becomes independent), it indicates dangers like stormy winds, cloudy weather, drought and other calamities.

14. Two Lakh Yojanas higher up (than the Mercury) (i.e. eleven lakh Yojanas higher than the earth) is the Mars traversing each sign of the zodiac in three fortnights, it completes its revolution through the twelve signs, unless it takes retrograde course. It is an inauspicious planet in general portending evil.

15. At a height of two lakh Yojanas above the Mars is the glorious Brhaspati (Jupiter). Unless it takes to retrograde course, it moves through each sign of the zodiac in one year. It is generally favourable to Brhmañas.

16. The Sánaiścara (the slow-mover i.e. the Saturn)

251. SR. notes that this constellation is supposed to be on the conjunction of the Uttarásadhā and Śravaṇa constellations. It is supposed to be an independent constellation due to its astrological implications. In his support, he quotes a Śruti passage: Abhijin nāma nakṣatram upariṣṭād Aṣṭādrāṇām adhastrād Śravāṇaḥ is observed to be two lakh Yojanas above Brahaspati (Jupiter). Lingering for thirty months in one house of the zodiac, it takes as many (thirty) years to complete its revolution through all the signs of the zodiac. It generally portends evil and anxiety to all.

17. At a height of eleven lakh Yojanas from the Saturn are seen the (seven) sages (the Ursa Major). Always contemplating (and wishing) the good of the world, they go round the most exalted region of Visnu, keeping it to their right.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

(Description of Visnu-pada—the position of Dhruva and Sismara Cakra)

SrI Suka said:

1. Now at a height of thirteen lakh Yojanas above the Ursa Major, lies what they call the highest abode of Visnu. Here dwells the Supreme Votary of the Lord Dhruva, the son of Uttanapada. The stars presided over by Agni, Indra, Kasypa Prajapati and Dharma respectfully go round him keeping him on their right,—all moving simultaneously (as stars). He is still the support of those whose span of life is upto the end of a Kalpa (till the time of deluge).

2. He (Dhruva) alone shines perpetually as he is decreed by God to support like a post all the hosts of luminaries, planets, constellations of stars, etc. which are set in motion by the ever vigilant almighty Time of incomprehensible velocity.

3. Just as oxen, employed in treading ears of corn, are tied to the post in the middle of the threshing ground, with strings short, long and medium in length, walk round in their respective spheres in three circles (at a distance of short, long and midway between the two according to the length of the string with which they are fastened), similarly posts of celestial bodies, planets etc., fastened to the Wheel of Time in the inner circle or in the outer circle, and impelled by the Wind (called Pravaha in supra 21.8), and with Dhruva (the Polar Star) as their support (central pivot), go on revolving to the end of the Kalpa, in three courses (marked by the periods of Uttarāyana or northerly course, Vaiśuvata i.e. along with the equator and Dakṣināyana or Southward course). Just as clouds and birds like hawks with the support of air and piloted by their past actions move about (afloat) in the sky, similarly, the host of these heavenly luminaries which are jīvas which are favoured with those shining bodies by the union of matter and spirit and whose velocities (and directions of motions) are controlled by their past actions, do not fall to the ground.

4. Some persons describe this system of heavenly luminaries as being supported by the mystical Yogic powers of Lord Vāsudeva who has assumed the form of a Gangetic porpoise.

5. The Pole-star is located at the end of the tail of this porpoise that lies coiled with its head downward. (Just below it) on the tail are located the four stars called Prajāpati (the sage Kaśyapa) Agni (the Fire-god), Indra (the King of gods) and Dharma (the presiding deity of righteousness). At the root of the tail, are fixed the star, Dhātā and Vidhātā, and the Seven Sages (the Ursa Major) on the hip; on the right side of its body which coils from left to right are located the fourteen constellations of Stars (from Abhijit to Punarvasu which mark the northern course (Uttarāyana) and the fourteen constellations marking the Southern Course (Dakṣināyana)—viz. from the Puṣya to Uttarāśāḍhā—are located on its left side. This is just like the porpoise whose coiled body has equal number of members on its either side. (He mentions further details of the positions of the constellations:). On its back is the Ajavithī (the group of constellations called Mūla, Pūrvāśāḍhā and Uttarāśāḍhā) and the heavenly Ganges (the Milky Way) is at its belly.

6. (The constellations) Punarvasu and Puṣya are located on its right and left loins; Ardrā and Aśleṣā on its right and left hind-legs; Abhijit and Uttarāśādha on its right and left nostrils; Śravaṇa and Pūrvāśādha at its right and left eye respectively while Dhanisthā and Mūla are at its right and left ears. (The group of) eight constellations beginning from Maghā, which mark the Southern Course (Daksināyana) are located on the ribs of its left side while the eight constellations from Mrigāśīrṣā (the Orion) and others marking the northern course (Uttarāśādha) are on its ribs on its right side, but in the reverse order (i.e. from Pūrvāśādha to Mrigāśīrṣā). One should locate the remaining two, viz. Śatabhiṣā or Śata-tāraka and Jyeṣṭhā on its right and left shoulders.

7. (One should locate) the star Agasti on its upper chin and (the star called) Yama on its lower chin; the Mars in the mouth and the Saturn on its generative organ and the Jupiter on its hump, the Sun on its chest and Nārāyaṇa at the heart; the Moon in the mind; the Venus in the navel, the pair of Aśvinikumāras on the nipples (of its chest), the Mercury in its inhalation and exhalation, (the shadow-planet) Rāhu at the throat and Ketu at all members of the body and the (remaining) stars all over the hairs of its body.

8. This is verily the manifestation of the form of glorious Lord Viṣṇu consisting of all gods. Silently and with concentration of mind one should watch it every evening and adore it with the following Mantra:

"We bow to the Supreme Personage, the Lord of all gods, (who assumed the form of) the Time Wheel, the support of all heavenly bodies, We meditate upon him."

9. This form of the Supreme God embodying all planets, constellations of stars and other heavenly luminaries washes off the sins of those who repeat the above Mantra three times (morning, mid-day and evening) a day. The sin committed in the past, present and future of a person who bows to him or remembers him three times a day is destroyed immediately.
CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

(Rāhu’s Position and the Subterranean Regions)

1. According to some (experts in Śāstras) at a distance of ten thousand Yojanas below the Sun, Rāhu makes his revolution like a lunar mansion. Though himself a wretched Asura, a son of Simhikā, it was through the grace of the Lord that he attained the status of a planet, even though he did not deserve it. We shall describe his birth and deeds later on (in the VI and VIII Skandhas), Oh child.

2. They say that the sphere of the burning Sun is ten thousand Yojanas and that of Rāhu, thirteen thousand Yojanas. Rāhu continues to entertain a grudge against the Sun and the Moon since their interruption (in his opportunity of drinking nectar by exposing his demonic identity), and attacks them on full-moon and new-moon days.

3. Having come to know of it, the venerable Lord has deployed his favourite missile called Sudarśana by the sides of them both. Rāhu stands for a period of Muhūrta facing the discus of irresistible blazing splendour which constantly revolves round them (the Sun and the Moon). Overcome with sorrow, trembling with his heart full of fear, he goes back even from a distance. It is this occurrence that people call an eclipse.

4. Below that (region of Rāhu), at a distance of the same (ten thousand) Yojanas, lie the regions of Siddhas, Cāraṇas (Heavenly singers) and Vidyādharas (celestial artists).

5. Below these is the space serving as a sporting ground of the hosts of Yakṣas, demons, goblins, spirits (pretas) and ghosts. It ext _ds downwards to the level where the wind blows or the clouds are met with.

6. Below that, at a distance of one hundred yojanas lies this earth up to the height to which the prominent birds such as swans, vultures, hawks, eagles and others are soaring.

7. Description of the earth with respect to its situation and arrangement—(of its continents etc.) has already been given (to you). Below the earth there are seven sub-terranean regions, each at a distance of ten thousand Yojanas from the other, and equally so (ten thousand Yojanas) in length and breadth. (Their names are :) Atala, Vitala, Sutala, Talātala, Mahātala, Rasātala and Pātāla.

8. In these subterranean regions are veritable heavens. Therein reside Daityas, Dānavas and Serpents (sons of Kādrū) in extremely rich mansions, gardens, parks and play-grounds which surpass the heavenly world in their exuberance of sensuous enjoyments, affluence, joy and richness. They are house-holders whose affectionate wives, children, relatives, friends and servants always enjoy a highly delightful life. Their desires are never thwarted even by the lord of gods. They divert themselves with their skills in Māyā (miraculous powers).

9. Oh great King! Maya, (the architect) of miraculous powers has built cities in these regions. They (the cities) shine resplendent with wonderful mansions, defence-walls, gates, town-halls, temples, big quadrangles and houses constructed with excellent precious-stones of various types, and with palatial buildings of the lords of these subterranean regions, the terraces of which are teeming with couples of Nāgas (serpents) and Asuras (demons) and with pigeons, parrots and sārikās.

10. The gardens thereof also superbly excel the splendour of the land of gods, with their glorious beauty, giving delight to minds and senses:—Beauty of trees embraced by tender creepers, the branches of which (trees) are weighed down with clusters of flowers and fruits and lovely foliage of ponds and lakes full of translucent waters teeming with couples of various species of birds; (these are charmingly vocal) with the varied sweet warblings of birds that have made their homes in the beds of lilies, lotuses, Kalhāra—blue and red lotuses—and lotuses with hundred petals, in the water of those lakes (etc.) when they (waters) get agitated by the leaping of fishes—all these provide feast to one’s senses.

11. It is said that here (in this netherworld) no fear is noticed (to have been caused) due to the divisions of time such as day and night.
12. The crest jewels on the hoods of great serpents dispel all the darkness there.

13. Due to the intake of herbs, saps, elixirs, food, drinks and bath of miraculous efficacy, the inhabitants of these regions do not suffer from mental worries and physical ailments. They are immune from wrinkles, grey hair and old age. Nor are they affected by paleness of body complexion, bad bodily odour, perspiration, fatigue, nervousness or bodily changes due to age (from childhood to old age).

14. These blessed souls have no fear of death from any source except from the Lord’s power, called the discus (Sudarśana), the Lord’s might.

15. When it (Sudarśana) enters those regions the embryos in the wombs of Asura women are miscarried or aborted through sheer terror.

16. Now in region called Atala resides the demon Bala, the son of Maya. The learned say that he has verily created ninetysix varieties of Māyā (magical tricks) some of which are still practised by jugglers. As he yawned, three groups of women—svairītis (who enter into sexual intercourse with men of their caste), kāminīs (who copulate with men not belonging to their caste) and Punācalīs (the most fickle minded of the Kāmini group)—came forth from his mouth. They administer a liquid preparation called Hāṭakaras to a man who enters their subterranean region and make him sexually capable. They give him amorous pleasure at their will indeed, by their sportive seductive smiles, lovely conversations, embraces, etc. When the elixir is imbibed, the man feels that he is a veritable god endowed with mystical powers and possessing the physical strength of ten thousand elephants. He goes boasting like one mad (blind) with intoxication.

17. Below that (Atala), in the subterranean region called Vitala, dwells god Śiva, designated as Lord Hāṭakeśvara, surrounded by his retinue, the legions of goblins. With the object of multiplying the creation of Prajāpati (progenitors) he, under the name Bhava (the procreator), remains united with his divine consort, Bhavānt (Pārvati). From him has issued the great river called Hāṭaki which is charged with the energy of them both. There, the Fire kindled by Wind, drinks vigorously that water of the river. What is spit out by Fire is the gold called \textit{Hātaka}. Males and females in the harem of the kings of Asuras wear that gold in the form of ornaments.

18. Below that (\textit{Vītala}), in the region called \textit{Sutala}, lives (the demon king) Bali, the son of Virocana of wide fame and hallowing renown. He was deprived of his sovereignty over the three worlds by Lord Viṣṇu who, with a desire to oblige the great god Indra, was born of Aditi and approached Bali, in the form of a dwarf celibate (\textit{Brahmacārin}). It was by the Lord's grace that he was accommodated here, and is again blest with overflowing wealth and prosperity not possessed by Indra and others. Immune from all fears he even now continues to propitiate the most adorable Lord by performing his righteous duties.

19. It is not at all the direct result (fruit) of the donation of land (\textit{viz. three worlds}) that Bali was blest with the sovereignty and fortune in the subterranean world: the gift that was duly given with absolute faith and devotion, with utmost reverence and perfectly serene mind to the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, the Supreme Soul, the principle of life and the inner controller of all species of living beings, the holiest and the most worthy recipient who has ever approached. Bali's donation was thus a gate-way directly leading to liberation (\textit{Mokṣa}).

20. (The learned sages say) that if a person who while losing his control (and becoming helpless or unconscious) utters but once his name while sneezing, falling or tumbling down or in any such condition, he instantaneously cuts asunder the bonds of Karma, for removing which people desirous of attaining to the Final Beatitude, try various other means (except remembrance of his name and are not successful).

21. The sovereignty, prosperity etc. which implies mere worldly pleasure—\textit{visayānanda}—cannot be the fruit of the bestowal of the Land, \textit{viz. three worlds} on the Lord as it was given to the Lord as being his own Self—the Lord who is the Self of all beings and who dedicates his own Self to his devotees and to those who have realized him.

22. As a matter of fact, the Lord has not really conferred any favour on him\(^{252}\) (i.e. Bali). He extended to him sovereignty, pleasures of senses which are of illusory nature and which, on the contrary, deprive him of the constant remembrance of Himself. (But Viṣṇu's presence near him as a door-keeper is the real fruit).

23. It is quite well-known that when it was found by the Lord that there was no other alternative (to deprive Bali of his sovereignty of the three worlds), He adopted the pretext of begging (three paces of land for sacrifice). When Bali was deprived of the sovereignty of three worlds (and had nothing with him) except his body, and was securely bound down with the cords of Varuṇa and was thrown into a mountain—den, he (Bali) actually exclaimed the following words:

24. "It is a pity that Indra, learned as he is, is certainly incapable of knowing his real interests—This Indra who has appointed the sage Brhaspati as an advisor to counsel him in all matters, ignored him\(^{253}\), and instead of requesting for the service of the Lord (Upendra) begged for himself through the Lord (Vāmana or Upendra) my blessings viz., the sovereignty of the three worlds. (When the Lord is pleased, he is to be sought and not the worthless kingship of three worlds). Of what value is this Lordship of three worlds which terminates at the end of a manvantara which is quite an insignificant part of Time which is of infinite duration.

25. (Only my grand-father Prahlāda knew his real interest) for though after his father's (Hiraṇyakaśipu's) death, he was offered by the Lord (Nṛsiṃha) the throne of his father which had no danger from any quarters (then), my grand-

\(^{252}\) amuya—this vague pronoun has confused the commentators. VC., VD., GD. think that this implies Indra and the translation will be: "Nor did the Lord confer any real favour on Indra, for he extended to him......himself". Though SR. mentions no name after amuya=amum "him", his quotations from Parāśara.

Vāsudeve mano yasya japa-homārcanādiṣu / tasyāntarāyo Maitreya, Devendraśārikam phalam //

probably hints at Indra which VD., VC., SD., GD. endorse. I think that in the present context amuya refers to Bali as interpreted by VR., J.G., & BP. as it is a continuous discussion about Bali. However concede that amuya=Indra is not impossible though rather out of context.

\(^{253}\) VD.: Even that Brhaspati is not clever inasmuch as he did not advise Indra properly and etc.
father (Prahlāda) preferred his service only to the throne as he knew that it was something different from the Lord.

26. He (Prahlāda) was a noble Soul while a person like me has his passions unsubsided, nor is blessed with the grace of the Lord. How can such a person hope to approach the path trodden by him (Prahlāda)?”

27. His (Bali’s) history will be narrated to you in details later on (in the VIII Skandha). At his (Bali’s) door, the glorious Lord Nārāyaṇa, the Preceptor of the whole world (who hence deserves to be adored and not to be made to stand guard), whose heart is full of compassion for his devotees, stands with a mace in his hand. (It was) by him that Rāvaṇa (the ten-headed demon) who came there in the course of his expedition of conquering all the quarters (of the world), was kicked away to a distance of ten crores of Yojanas, simply by his toe.

28. Below that region (Sutala), in Talātala, dwells the king of Dānavas, by name Maya, the Lord of three cities. His three cities having been burnt down by the venerable Lord Śiva (the destroyer of the enemy cities or of the demon Tripura), with the desire to bring about the happiness of three worlds, he secured this position through his (Śiva’s) grace. This great master of all experts in magic is protected in every respect by the great god (Śiva) and hence, being free from the fear of Sudarśana (Viṣṇu’s discus), he is greatly respected (by the inhabitants of Talātala).

29. Below that, in the subterranean region Mahātala, there lives the tribe of many-hooded serpents called Kroddha-vāsa. Their prominent members are Kuhaka, Takṣaka, Kāliya, Suṣeṇa and others, all possessing huge bodies. They, however, live in fear of Garuḍa (the over-Lord of kings of birds), the vehicle of the Supreme Person. It is on a few occasions that they sport in company of their wives, children, friends and members of their families.

30. Lower still, in Rasātala, there dwell the descendants of Diti and Danu (the two wives of Kaśyapa, the progenitor), called Paṇis who are also known as Nivatakasvacaś, Kāleyas and the residents of Hiraṇyapura. These enemies of gods are from their very birth, very powerful and daring in spirit. They live like reptiles in holes as their arrogance of power is subdued only by the refulgent discus Sudarśana of the glorious Lord Hari whose majestic splendour spreads over all worlds. It is traditionally learnt that they are afraid of Indra due to the Vedic text uttered by the female dog, Saramā, the messenger of Indra.²⁵⁴

31. Still lower down is the region called Pātāla. With Vāsuki as their king, there reside the chiefs of the Nāga (Serpent) race like Śaṅkha, Kulika, Mahāśaṅkha, Śveta, Dhanañjaya, Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Śaṅkhacūḍa, Kambala, Aśvatara and others possessing extensive hoods and extremely impetuous by temperament. It is reported that the big effulgent crest jewels on the hoods of serpents possessing five, seven, ten, hundred and thousand heads, dispel by their splendour the mass of darkness in the hollow of the nethermost world (Pātāla).

CHAPTER TWENTYFIVE

(Description of Saṅkarṣaṇa—the Serpent Śeṣa)

Śri Śuka said:

1. At the lowest extreme below Pātāla, at a distance of thirty thousand Yojanas, abides a part-manifestation of the Lord which is dominated by the Tamas only. It is also well-known as Ananta. Followers of the Śātvata School call it Saṅkarṣaṇa as, being characterised by ego and presiding over by ‘I’-ness, it brings about the unification between the subject (the Seer) and the object (the seen).

2. This terrestrial globe, supported on one out of the thousand heads of the Lord who manifested himself as Ananta, appears like a mustard seed.

²⁵⁴ ŠR. mentions the Vedic legend that when the Paṇis stole the cows and concealed them under water, Indra sent the female dog Saramā to trace them. She discovered them but when Paṇis tried to have a treaty type of understanding with her, she cursed them: Hatā Indreṇa Paṇayaḥ Saṇadhvam—"Oh Paṇis! Lie down (dead) slain by Indra!"
3. It is said that when He desires to withdraw (destroy) this world at the (predestined) time, from between his agitated eyebrows knit in wrath, yet charming, was manifested Rudra (god of destruction) called Saṅkarśana (one born of Saṅkarśana). He manifested his eleven forms, each three-eyed and holding a trident.

4. When the kings of serpents along with prominent devotees (Sātvatas) bow down with intense and unswerving devotion (his feet), they certainly look with an overjoyed mind, their most attractive faces with cheeks beautified with the splendour of their refulgent ear-rings, in the reddish, spherical nails, shining like rubies, on his pair of lotus-like feet.

5. Seeking blessings from him only, they say, that unmarried Nāga princesses besmear with pigment of aguru, sandal wood and saffron, his bright, long, fair-complexioned, beautiful, charming arms like silver-pillars, beautifully set up in the sphere of his beautiful body. Their minds being agitated with the touch of his body, they put on winsome smiles as the god of Love stealthily enters their hearts. They really cast bashful glances at his lotus-like face as his reddish eyes swim with inebriation and cast a merciful glance at them.

6. He is that very glorious Lord Ananta, the ocean of infinite excellences, the primeval Deity. Restraining the vehemence of His impetuosity and wrath (as it is inappropriate and unnecessary for the maintenance of the worlds), he abides for the well-being of all the worlds.

7. He is being contemplated upon by hosts of gods, demons, reptiles (Nāgas), Siddhas, Gandharvas, Vidyādhāras and sages. Due to continuous exhilaration under intoxication his eyes were swimming restlessly. He was giving delight (lit. feeding) the leaders of His attendants and gods with his nectar-like winning speech. Clad in blue garments and wearing only one ear-ring, he has placed his blessed, beautiful hand on the top of (his special weapon) the plough. Just as the majestic elephant (Airāvata) of the great Indra is decorated with a girth of gold, the glorious Lord of gracious and beneficent deeds wears his Vanamālā (a wreath of forest flowers) called Vaijayanti, the charm and gracefulness of which was heightend with the melodious humming of the bees inebriated with the sweet scented honey of fresh and new Tulasi blossoms of unfading beauty.

255. Vaijayanti wreath consists of the shoots of the Tulasi (Basil) plant, flowers of Kunda, Mandāra, Pārijāta and lotuses.

8. When this (Sañkarśaṇa) (as traditionally described by one's spiritual guide) is listened to and meditated upon, he enters the hearts of those who seek Liberation (from Saṁśāra). He instantly cuts asunder the knot of ignorance (avidyā), forced at (his devotee's) heart, due to the impressions created in the sub-conscience by the beginningless karmas and consisting of the attributes (or modes of Prakṛti) viz. sattva, rajas and tamas. The venerable sage Nārada, the son of god Brahmā, accompanied by Tumburu (the famous celestial singer), described (in a musical composition his glorious prowess, in the assembly of god Brahmā.

9. Who can comprehend the way (the truth) of the Lord (who is Brahmā himself)—the Lord by whose glance (i.e. desire to create) sattva and other attributes of Prakṛti which are respectively the cause of the creation, preservation and destruction (of the universe) became capable (of executing their function); whose form is eternal (infinite) and beginningless, for One as he is, he contains in himself the universe characterised by many-ness.

10. Out of unlimited grace for us, he assumed a form consisting of (pure) sattva unalloyed with rajas and tamas, wherein appears the unmanifest and manifest universe. The Lord who possesses unbounded energy like a lion, exhibited his faultless sports (e.g. creation of the universe etc.) for attracting the minds of his devotees.

256. vartman—(i) The truth about—ŚR.
(ii) The working of—VJ.
(iii) The reality about or the way of attaining to—VC., GD.

257. VR., BP. note that the factual order implied herein is rajas, sattva and tamas as the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe are mentioned in a series in the text.

258. Sadasad (idam) : (i) Intelligent and unintelligent—VR.
(ii) Subtle and gross—VJ.
(iii) Manifest and unmanifest.
11. Even if a person either in distress or fallen from the righteous path accidentally or in joke utters his name as heard (from the spiritual teacher or any other person), he instantly annihilates completely the sins of 'other men. Hence to whom else than the glorious Lord Śeṣa, will a man desirous of Liberation, resort?

12. On one of the heads of the thousand-headed Lord lies like an atom, the terrestrial globe with all its mountains, rivers, seas and the living beings (inhabiting it), owing to the infiniteness of the immeasurable and innumerable exploits of the Almighty Lord, who can, even if endowed with a thousand tongues, hope to count completely all his herioc acts?

13. Of such prowess is the glorious Lord Ananta. His energy and excellent attributes and potencies are limitless. Unsupported by anyone else, he stays at the bottom of the earth bearing it easily for the preservation and wellbeing of the entire creation.

14. These are, verily, the regions to be attained to by people desirous of enjoying pleasures. These are created to accord with their respective karmas. These are described to you as it was traditionally taught to me (by my preceptor).

15. Oh King! I have described to you according to your queries, these various, high and low regions attained by men as a fruit of the karmas performed by them. On what other topic should I discourse now?

CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX

(Description of Hells)

The King enquired:

1. Oh great Sage! How is it that there is such a diversity (in regions attained to by people) in the word?

The Sage (Śrī Śuka) replied:

2. The courses (and results) of karmas are varied according to the faith of the performer of the action which differs according to the (dominance of) particular mode of Prakṛti (e.g. sattva, rajas and tamas) influencing him. All these are attained (at different times) by everyone (in more or less degree according to the influence of a particular guṇa).

3. Thus in the case of perpetrators of unrighteous acts of a prohibited character, the fruits according to them are of dissimilar nature according to the variety of the faith of the perpetrator. Now we shall describe in details (some prominent states out of) the thousands of hellish states which are the results of the (commission of) prohibited sinful acts committed by those who indulge in desires (of various kinds) due to the influence of avidyā (ignorance) dominating them from time immemorial.

_The King asked_:

4. Are the infernal regions some particular parts of this world? Or are they somewhere outside the worlds or are they somewhere in the space inside these worlds?

_The Sage (Śrī Śuka) replied_:

5. They (the infernal regions) are within the three worlds. They lie in the Southern direction below the earth and above the waters. And in this direction reside the groups of Pitṛs (manes) called Agniśvātta and others. Meditating on God with utmost concentration, they continue to invoke auspicious blessings on their descendants.

6. It is reported that it is really true that the venerable, king of the manes (pitṛ), Yama (son of the Sun-god) who never violates any command of the Lord, dwells here along with his retinue. And to the departed souls brought to his region by his messengers he inflicts punishments in proportion and according to the gravity of the sin committed.

7. Some learned have enumerated that there are twentyone—hellish regions. Oh King, I shall now serially describe them to you according to their name, form (or function) and character (nature of the sin expiated.) They

259. Cf. the characteristics of the sattvic, rājas and tāmasa acts (BG. 18.23-25) and the three types of the performers of acts (BG. 18.26-28).
are as follows: Tāmisra, Andha-tāmisra, Raurava, Mahā-raurava, Kumbhl-pāka, Kāla-sūtra, Asipatra-vana, Sūkramukha, Andha-kūpa, Kṛmi-bhojana, Sandamśa, Tapta-sūrmi, Vajra-kaṭṭaka-sālmali, Vaitaraṇi, Pūyoda, Prāṇa-rodda, Viśasana, Lālābhakṣa, Sārameyādana, Avici and Ayah-pāna. Moreover, (there are seven in addition) viz., Kṣāra-kardama, Rakṣogāna-bhojana, Śulaprotā, Daṇḍaśūka, Avaṭa-nirodhana, Paryāvartana and Sūcinukha. These twenty-eight infernal regions are the places where (jīvas are subjected to) tortures of various kinds.

8. The person who takes away another person’s wealth, children or wife, is certainly bound down with mortal cords of death and is forcibly hurled into the Tāmisra hell by the terrible servants of Yama. In that hell of utter darkness, the being is subjected to various kinds of torment such as denial of food and water, belabouring with cudgels, holding out threats, and ultimately overcome with torment he instantaneously drops down unconscious.

9. In the same way, a person who enjoys the wife (property etc.) of another person by deceiving him, is thrown into the Andhatāmisra hell. Here the embodied being who is subjected to tortures loses his sight and consciousness due to torments, just like a tree the roots of which are being cut down. Hence they call this hell ‘Andha-Tāmisra’ due to its blinding effect.

10. Verily, he who wrongly identifies his body with his Soul and regards his wealth (wife etc.) as his own and every day contributes to the nourishment and comforts of his family by maliciously treating other beings, falls, after leaving his body etc. in this world, into the Raurava hell due to the sin (perpetrated in his malicious dealings).

11. The creatures which have been tortured and killed by him in this world, are born in the world as Rurus and while he (their murderer) undergoes torments inflicted by Yama, kill him in the same way (as done to them by him). Ruru is the name of a creature much more cruel than a serpent. Hence this hell is called Raurava.

12. Similar is the hell called Mahāraurava. He who is given solely to the nourishment of his body by any unscrupu-pulous means etc.) enters this hell. Here the Rurus are Krauyādas (carnivorous, flesh-eaters) which kill him for the sake of his flesh.

13. In the hell, called Kumbhīpāka, the servants of Yama fry in boiling oil that hard-hearted man who cooked living beasts or birds in this world and was censured for his cruelty even by cannibals (or demons).

14. He who bears malice towards his parents, Brāhmaṇas and the Vedas is hurled into the hell called Kālasūtra. It is a plain of a copper-sheet ten thousand Yojana in area. The sheet of copper is heated by fire from below and the Sun from above. The creature is being burnt within and outside his body by hunger-thirst. Due to restlessness, he sometimes sits, sometimes lies down and rolls and sometimes stands up and begins to run about. Thus he suffers for as many thousand years as there are hair on a beast’s body.

15. They (servants of Yama) throw in the hell called Asipatrawana (a forest of trees with sword-like leaves) a person who, while in this world, abandons his Vedic way of life even when there was no calamity and embraces a heretic sect. They strike him with a whip. And while he runs hither and thither (to avoid whipping), all the limbs of his body are cut down by the two-edged sword-like leaves of the palm trees thereof. Crying with excruciating pain, “Alas! I am killed”, he falls in a swoon at every step. A renegade from one’s own faith he reaps the fruit (punishment) suitable for the sin of embracing a heretic creed.

16. In this world, verily, a king or a king’s servant inflicts punishment on those who did not deserve it (being innocent), or subjects a Brāhmaṇa to corporal punishment, that sinful fellow falls into the hell Sūkaramukha in the next world. While his limbs are being crushed with very powerful hands like a sugarcane (in a crusher) in this world, he laments in a piteous tone and sometimes he becomes unconscious like innocent persons confined in jail by him (while) in this world.

17. But a person whose course of life in this world is prescribed by God and who is capable of understanding agony caused to others, causes pains to creatures whose feeding upon human bodies is determined by God but which are incapable of being aware of causing pains to others, falls into the hell Andhakāpa. He is hated and troubled there by beings like beasts, deer, birds, reptiles, mosquitoes, lice, bugs, flies and others. Being harassed on all sides in the darkness, his sleep and mental peace are disturbed. Being devoid of rest, he wanders in darkness even as the jīva, the embodied soul, lives restlessly in a diseased body.

18. A person who, without performing five daily great sacrifices (prescribed for a householder) eats whatever comes to his lot without sharing that with others (stranger-guests, his elders, dependents etc.) is spoken of as (comparable to) a crow. After his death, he falls in the most wretched hell called Kṛmbhokana. There he is born as a worm in a pool of worms, of hundred thousand Yojanas in extent. Being himself preyed upon by worms, he continues to feed himself on worms. He who thus enjoys his earnings without offering (a portion of it) to others or to gods, subjects himself to these torments for as many years (one hundred thousand) as the Yojanas of the extent of that hell or till his sin is expiated.

19. He who, in this world, without being in (a justifiable) emergency or calamity, steals or robs by force the gold, jewels etc., of a Brāhmaṇa or of any other person, gets the skin of his body cut with red-hot iron balls or tongs by the servants of Yama in the other world, Oh King.

20. To a man who indulges in a sexual intercourse with a woman whom he should not have approached or to a woman who does so with a man unworthy of such an approach, the

260. The following are the 'great sacrifices' enumerated in the Manu-smṛti 3.70-71 :

(1) Brahma-yajña—Propitiation of ancient seers-ṛṣis by teaching and learning of the Vedic lore

(2) Pitṛ-yajña—Propitiation of one's forefathers by offering libations of water or Pitṛ-tarpaṇa.

(3) Deva-yajña—Propitiation of gods by offering oblations in sacrificial fire.

(4) Bhūta-yajña—Offering a portion of one's meals to sub-human creatures.

(5) Nyaja—Sharing one's food with a stranger who by chance comes to the door for food or shelter (atithi-pājana).
servants of Yama lash them with a whip and make the man or woman embrace the red-hot iron image of that woman or man respectively.

21. He who (indiscriminately) indulges in sexual intercourse with all (including sub-human beings) is placed on a silk-cotton tree with thorns of adamant in the hell (called Vajra-kaṇṭaka Śālmaṭi) in the next world, and is dragged (down on those thorns).

22. Those persons who are born as Kṣatriyas or officers of king who are of noble descent (and have joined the heretic sect) transgress the bounds of religion, fall into the (river) Vaitaraṇī after death. Those transgressors of the restrictions (laid down) in religion are being bitten (eaten) by the aquatic animals of that river which forms the moat of the infernal regions. They are not disunited with the Soul but are sustained with life by their sins. Remembering the result of their sin, they continue to be tormented in the river which carries a flood of excretion, urine, pus, blood, hair, nails, bones, fat, flesh and marrow.

23. Those who (though born in higher caste but) keep low-caste women, neglect purity, righteous conduct and self-discipline and shamelessly lead a beastlike life, fall after their death in (the hell called Pūyoda which is) a sea full of pus, excretion, urine, phelgm and dirt and eat nothing but these most detestable things.

24. The Brāhmaṇas and others who keep a pack of hounds and donkeys, find delight here in hunting and kill animals on occasions other than those prescribed in the Śāstras, become, after death, targets of the discharge of arrows by the servants of Yama who pierce them with arrows (in the hell named Prāṇa-nirodha).

25. Verily those hypocrites who kill beasts in sham sacrifices in this world, fall in the Vaiṭasa hell in the next world. There the Lords of that hell torture them and finally cut them to pieces.

26. The sinful twice-born (dvija) who, being blind with passion makes his wife of his own caste drink his semen, is thrown in the next world in a stream of semen (in the Lālābhakṣa hell) and is made to drink semen.
27. In this world the dacoits (who loot the property of others), perpetuators of arson and poisoning—be they kings or king’s servants and soldiers—plunder villages or caravans of merchants, servants of Yama (in the form of) seven hundred and twenty hounds with teeth like adamant voraciously eat them up when they die (and enter the Sāramayādāna).

28. Again, a person who utters any lie at the time of depositing evidence, money-transactions (e.g. barter, sale, purchase) or donating a gift, enters after death a supportless hell called Avicimat. In that hell, he is hurled down headlong from a (steep) mountain top one hundred Yojanas in height to a place with rocky surface appearing as water. Hence, it is called avīci-mat (A place with hard surface but appearing like water with ripples). His body is shattered to very small pieces but he does not die. He is again taken up and hurled down.

29. If a Brāhmaṇa or his (Brāhmaṇa) wife or anyone who has taken a sacred vow, drinks wine through mistake or if a Kṣatriya and a Vaishya (who are not eligible to drink Soma) drink the Soma juice, they are taken to the hell (called Ayakhpāna) where, the servants of Yama, pressing a foot on their bosom pour molten iron into their mouth.

30. If a person belonging to the lowest strata of the society does not duly pay respect to those that are superior in birth (heredity), performance of austerities, learning, righteous conduct, caste and stage of life, out of esteem for himself, he is as good as a dead (while alive). After death, he is hurled down with head downwards into the hell called Kṣārakardama where he is subjected to endless tortures.

31. (When) men who, in this world, verily propitiate (gods like Bhairava) by offering human sacrifice and the women eat the human victim so offered, the human beings so sacrificed become a battalion of demons (Rākṣasas) in the region of Yama (in the hell called Rakṣo-gāna-bhojana). There Rākṣasas torture their former slayers in many ways, cut them into slices with their axes like butchers, drink their blood, dance and sing merrily just as those who ate them (as human victims) did on the earth.

32. Those persons who, in this world, attract by means of allurement innocent people in the forests or in villages and inspire confidence in them to come near and then torture them in various ways by transfixing them on an iron pike or by binding them with ropes even though they strongly desire to survive—such (cruel) persons after death, at the time of being tortured by Yama (in the hell called Śulaprote) are transfixied on iron pikes. When they are distressed with hunger and thirst, they are attacked and pecked on all sides by hellish birds like Kaṅka, Vataka of sharp beaks. It is then they remember their own sins.

33. Those people who are of a ferocious nature like serpents, torment other beings in this world, they fall even after death in a hell called Dandaśūka where serpents with five and seven hoods (mouth) approach them and devour them like mice.

34. Those who actually confine living beings in dark holes, granaries or caves in this world, (the servants of Yama) in the other worlds shut them up into similar places (in the Avaṭanirodhana hell) full of poisonous fire and smoke.

35. A householder who in this world often gets angry with and looks with burning eyes at the guests who have arrived at his door, gets his sinful eyes forcibly plucked out by birds of adamantine beaks like vultures, crows, kaṅka Avāṭa.

36. If a person, in this world is proud of his wealth and full of egotism, looks askance at others and is suspicious about all, and if his heart and mouth are withered by the anxiety of the expenditure or loss of that wealth and if, without any peace of mind he guards his treasure like a goblin, after death he becomes transformed into a devil for he accumulates sin in earning, supplementing and preserving wealth. He falls into a hell called Śūcimukha. There the servants of (Yama-) dharma, like tailors, stitch the body of this devil-like protector of wealth, on all sides.

37. Oh Protector of the earth! There are hundreds and thousands of such and the like hells in the abode of Yama. Some of them have been described here and some are not. All persons following an unrighteous path, enter into them in due course. Similarly, those who follow (the path of) religion enter elsewhere (in the heaven). They are again reborn to this world with some balance of sin and merit with them.

38. The path of Nivṛtti (cessation from worldly activities) has been propounded to you in detail at first. Of this extent is the Brahmāṇḍa (egg-shaped universe) which is divided into fourteen regions in the Purāṇas. It is the grossest form of the glorious Lord Nārāyaṇa, the Supreme Person. It comprises of the attributes of his Māyā (viz. sattva, rajas, tamas). He who full of faith and devotion reads, listens to and recites to others this account as narrated by me, begets in him faith, devotion and pure intelligence and realizes the incomprehensible Supreme Self.

39. Having listened to the gross as well as the subtle form of the glorious Lord, a self-controlled person, after successfully concentrating the mind on the gross form, should gradually comprehend the subtle form by his intelligence.

40. Oh King! In this way the disposition of the world with its divisions (dvīpas), sub-divisions (Varṣas), the rivers, mountains, the sky (aerial region), the seas, the nether-world, the subterranean regions, the quarters and the hells as well as the heavenly bodies and various regions have been described to you by me. It is the gross form of the Lord, the asylum of all species of beings.

SIXTH SKANDHA

CHAPTER ONE

(The Story of Ajāmila)

The King (Parikṣit) said:

1. The path of cessation from karmas (niyṛtti) has been already described in detail, by your respectable self, in the beginning. By that path, Brahmā (i.e. the region of Brahmā) is gradually attained through different stages (such as passing through the abode of fire-god etc.). The Liberation is attained along with god Brahmā.

2. And (you have also described in detail)—the path characterised by worldly activities (pravṛtti), the object of which is to attain happiness in heaven and other pleasures which are themselves the product of guṇas and which, in the case of jīvas, not disassociated with Prakṛti, results in constant re-embodiment of the jīvas for repeated enjoyments of such pleasures.

3. The various infernal regions which are characterised by unrighteousness (as their cause) have been described in detail (in the fifth Skandha). And the first period of Manu, (presided over and hence) named after Svāyambhuva Manu, has also been described (in the fourth Skandha).

262. Vide Supra 2.2.24 in Vaiśṇavānām yādī and 3.32.5 in Ye svadharmaṇa dravyanti.

263. Karma-yoga: (i) Through the path of action (Karma), knowledge (Jñāna) and devotion (Bhakti)—VR.

(ii) Remembrance of the Lord, visualization of the various members of the Lord’s Person and visualization of the full divine form—VJ.

(iii) Birth in a good family, residence at a holy place, association with saintly persons (S.D.)

(iv) dhyāna (contemplation), dhāranā (concentration) and samādhi (realization of identity with Brahman.) GD.

266. guṇa-saṅgaḥ—bhogārtham dehārmbha-rūpasya (yo mārgaḥ)—ŚR.
4-5. The dynasty of Priyavrata and Uttanapada and the life-stories of (both of) those kings (have been narrated by you). You have also described the (division of the earth in important) island-continents (dvipas), their subdivisions (varas), oceans, mountains, rivers, gardens, the disposition of this spherical earth with reference to its divisions, their special characteristics and dimensions and also those of heavenly bodies and subterranean regions, as they were created by the Almighty Lord.

6. Oh illustrious holy sage! Now be pleased to explain in detail, the way which may save a man from falling into the infernal regions of various unbearable tortures.

Śrī Śuka said:

7. If a man does not perform expiation (as prescribed in the dharma śāstra), in this very life, for the sin committed by him with his thought, word and deed, it is said that he definitely goes to the hellish regions after death. And those regions of severe torments have been described to your honoured self by me.

8. Hence, before one is overtaken by death and not inincapacitated in body (or while one is not entangled in difficulties) one should immediately (after the commission of the sin), try to atone for the sin, with a controlled mind, according to the gravity or simplicity of the nature of the fault, just as a physician expert in diagnosis of the disease, promptly adopts remedies or dosage of the medicine (according to the nature of the disease).

The King said:

9. In spite of the full knowledge that (commission of) a sin is against his interest as evidenced by what he has seen (viz.
punishment meted out by the king for an offence) and has heard (for example internment in hellish region as described in Purāṇas), he loses the control over himself, commits it repeatedly after the act of expiation. Hence (under these circumstances), how can there be any (real) expiation at all,
if the tendency to commit sins, persists.

10. Sometimes he refrains from committing a sin; on other occasions, he does it again. Hence, I think that the act of expiation is meaningless like the washing of an elephant (which besmears its body with dust again after washing).

_Sri Suka said:_

11. It is not laid down that there is the total and final annihilation of sin by the action of expiation (such as bodily mortification), for only the ignorant (i.e. those who wrongly identify body with the Soul) are eligible for it. (But as the ignorance about the Soul and non-Soul—avidyā—is not dispelled, the particular sin may be atoned for, and the man again relapses into sinful ways). Knowledge (i.e. self-realization) alone is the real expiation (as it removes the ignorance—avidyā which is the real root-cause of the sin).

12. Just as diseases do not attack a person who eats only wholesome food, (on the contrary they recede gradually if they had already affected that person), a person who observes regular spiritual discipline (e.g. penance) becomes, step by step, eligible for the _sumnum bonum_ (which annihilates sin and leads to realization of the self), Oh King.

13-14. Through concentration of the mind and sense-organs, practice of (eightfold) celibacy, the control of the mind and external organs, charitable gifts, truthfulness, purity (both bodily and mental), the vows of non-violence etc. and observances like _japa_ (muttering the sacred syllable OM), the wise (who bear with equanimity the pairs of opposites like pleasure and pain) who understand (real principles of) righteousness and are full of faith, rid themselves of the most grievous sin committed by thought, word or action, just as the fire destroys even a big cluster of bamboos.

15. Just as the Sun completely dispels the mist, a few persons absolutely devoted to Lord Vāsudeva, annihilate their sins thoroughly (from its very root of avidyā) merely through their unswerving devotion to the Lord (without performing penance etc. But the number of such devotees is scarce).

16. Oh King! A sinner is not purified to that extent through performance of penance and expiatory acts as a person who has dedicated his life to Lord Kṛṣṇa (and regards Kṛṣṇa as his last resort, without worrying over the punishment in hell) does so by rendering service to his devotees.

17. Certainly this path (of devotion) is the correct and the best one in this world, as it is blissful (annihilating all miseries), and quite safe (with no danger or fear from anything). Kindly-disposed and desireless devotees of Lord Nārāyaṇa are found on this path (to help one in need, but there is nobody to do so in the paths of knowledge and action).

18. Oh King of Kings! Performance of all acts of expiation do not thoroughly purify a person who has set his face against Lord Nārāyaṇa, even as all the rivers (taken together) cannot purify a pitcher of wine.

19. Those who have even once in their life here, set on the lotus-like feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa, their mind which felt an attachment for (and not knowledge or complete comprehension of) his excellent qualities, have by this (very temporary attachment and devotion) performed all expiatory acts. And they never see Yama (god of death) or his servants with a noose in their hands, even in their dreams.

20. And on this topic, the learned one narrate (by way of illustration) this ancient legend consisting of a conversation between the messengers of Viṣṇu and those of Yama. Listen to it from me.

21. In (the city of) Kāanyakubja (modern Kanauj), there lived a certain Brāhmaṇa called Ajāmila. He married a maid-servant and got polluted through his association with a female slave, and he neglected the pious way of life (including the religious duties prescribed for a Brāhmaṇa).

22. He maintained his family by adopting a reproachful way of life consisting of holding captives for ransom, gambling, committing frauds and thefts. That sinful fellow tortured creatures (before killing).

23. A long period consisting of eighty-eight years of his life thus elapsed in maintaining himself that way, and fondling the children of that Dāsa woman.

24. The old fellow (Ajāmila) had ten sons (by that woman). The youngest of them was a boy named Nārāyaṇa. He was extremely doted over by his parents.
25. He (Ajāmila) had set his heart on that sweet lisping child. The old man was highly delighted while witnessing the child’s plays.

26. Bound by filial love for child, he used to feed it while he was eating, make it drink at the time of his drinking. In this way, the fool did not know that the hour of his death had arrived.

27. Thus, the ignorant Ajāmila led his life. When the time of death actually arrived, he thought of his young son called Nārāyaṇa.

28. (Then) he saw that three extremely terrible male figures with wry faces, and with the hair on their bodies standing erect, and with nooses in their hands, had come to take him away.

29. With his senses greatly agitated, he called out in a prolonged loud voice, his son named Nārāyaṇa who was absorbed in his play-things at a distance.

30. Having heard the repetition of the name of Lord Hari, their master, uttered by the dying man, the servants of Nārāyaṇa immediately rushed forward, Oh great King.

31. Angels of Viṣṇu (intercepted and) forcibly stopped the messengers of Yama who were dragging (the jīva of) Ajāmila, the husband of the maid-servant, from the interior of his heart.

32. Thus prevented (from carrying out their duty) the messengers of Yama demanded, “Who are you who thus defy the order of Yama, the god presiding over righteousness.

33. Whose servants are you? Whence have you come? Why do you prevent his being taken away? Are you gods or demigods or are you some prominent Siddhas?

34. (Please do not get offended for our ignorance about you). All of you have eyes like lotus-petals, wear yellow silken garments and are adorned with diadems, ear-rings and shining lotus garlands.

35. You are all in the full bloom of youth. All of you possess four beautiful arms. (Each of) you appears majestic with (your lustrous) bow, quiver, sword, mace (gadā), conch, discus and lotus.

36. By your personal splendour, you dispel darkness from all quarters and out-shine the lustre of others. Why do you prevent us, the obedient servants of Yama, the protector of the moral law?"

_Sri Ṣuka said:_

37. When the obedient servants (who execute the commands) of Lord Vāsudeva were asked thus by the messengers of Yama, they laughed heartily, and replied as follows to them, in a voice deep like the thunder.

_The Messengers of Viṣṇu replied:_

38. If you are really the executors of the orders of the King of Righteousness, tell us what is the true nature of righteousness and what is the distinguishing character of Dharma.

39. How (on what principles) is punishment given? What (who) is regarded as the proper object? Who deserve punishments? Whether all of them are punishable or some of them?

_Servants of Yama replied:_

40. What is ordained in the Vedas is dharma or righteousness. What is against the prescription of the Vedas is _a-dharma_ (un-righteousness). We have heard it traditionally said that the Vedas are Nārāyaṇa incarnate and they, being the breath (flowing out naturally from the nostrils) of the Lord are self-existent.

41. It is the Lord (Nārāyaṇa) by whom all these living beings which are constituted of the attributes _sattva, rajas_ and _tamas_ and which are severally discriminated and distinguished by their qualities (e.g. quiescence), designations (Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya etc.), activities (study, teaching etc.) and forms (social classes, stages of life—_varṇas_ and āśramas), are supported properly in his own Form (Being).

42. The Sun-god, the Fire-god, the Sky, the Wind-god, cows, the Moon-god, the twilights, days and nights, cardinal points, the presiding deities of Water and the Earth, Time and (the god) Dharma—all these are the witnesses (of the acts) of the embodied beings.

_267. Cf._ _asya mahato bhūtasya nīḥśvasītam etad yad Rgvedah_
43. (Acts of) unrighteousness as evidenced by these is judged to be the proper reason for awarding punishment. All the perpetrators of (evil) actions deserve punishment according to the nature of their acts.

44. Oh sinless ones! Actions, meritorious or sinful are being done by active persons as they are associated with attributes (like rajas, tamas). For nobody invested with a body can be actionless.

45. The same person enjoys the fruit of the same sinful or a meritorious act in the next world in the same manner and to the same extent according to the manner and extent to which that (sinful or meritorious) act has been done by him in this world.

46. Oh great gods! (As you know it by your omniscience) Just as here (in this world) there is found a three-fold variety in living beings due to the diversity in the peculiar qualities (or mixtures of sattva, rajas, and tamas attributes exhibited in their pious, sinful or mixed acts), the same may be inferred about them in the next birth. (Otherwise such a diversity cannot be explained).

47. Just as the present period of time is the index of the characteristics of the other periods that precede and follow it, similarly the present life (of human beings, prognostically) indicates the righteous and sinful actions committed in the past and (likely to be committed) in the future existences as well.

48* Staying in his own capital (Sarñyamini), the god Yama-dharma clearly visualizes by his mental power, the pre-

---

268. ŚR. states that this is the arthāpatti (circumstantial inference) to explain re-birth. He explains the three-fold variety as follows:
1) of quiet, ferocious or dull nature.
2) experiencing a happy, miserable or mixed type of life.
3) of righteous, vicious or mixed nature.

According to VJ., they are the best, worst and middle types of beings according to dominance of gunas—sattva, tamas and rajas.

269. In the next world.—VR.

270. Just as the present season, e.g. the spring indicates the characteristics regarding flowers, fruits etc. of the past and future Spring-seasons.—ŚR., VJ.

* (i) ŚR. : The Inner Controlling Self (antaryāmin) staying in the city in the form of body etc.
(ii) VR. thinks that this verse refers to the Supreme Soul who stays as antaryāmin.
(iii) VJ. : Lord Nārāyaṇa staying in the body of the living beings, sees the past and future form, as also the merits and sins of the Jīva.
vious form (e.g. god, sub-human being or the merits, sins etc.) of the jīva (departed Soul), and deeply reflects what the jīva’s future state should be, by his reasoning capacity; for his Lordship is omniscient like god Brahmā.

49. Just as a sleeping person in the dream-state regards that he is identical with the body manifested in the dream, and does not know his body in the pre-dream state or the body to be assumed in the next dream, similarly the ignorant jīva conditioned by avidyā knows his present body as manifested by the actions of his previous existence and not the previous form assumed in the past incarnation nor the future body (of his future existence) due to the loss of memory of his past lives.

50. With five conative organs, the jīva carries out his (physical) functions (e.g. locomotion, exchange); with five cognitive senses, he perceives (knows) the five objects of senses. The single jīva, the seventeenth, combined with the sixteenth, i.e. the mind\textsuperscript{271} experiences all alone, three-fold objects presented by the cognitive senses, conative organs and the mind.

51. This subtle-body (liṅgam) constituted of the sixteen parts (enumerated above) and possessing three potencies (of the attributes sattva, rajas and tamas) is beginningless. It continues to hold down a man in saṁsāra which gives him joy, grief, fear and sufferings.

52. The ignorant embodied being who has not subdued the group of six (viz. five cognitive senses and the mind is forced (by his subtle body) to perform actions despite his unwillingness. Like a silk-worm covering itself in its cocoon, he covers (entangles) himself in the net of karmas and fails to see the way out.

53. Verily, nobody can ever remain actionless even for a moment; for everyone is helpless and is forced to do some act by passions like attachments etc. born of (the three) attributes (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas) which are the results of the impressions of past actions.\textsuperscript{272}

(iv) SD. : It is the Supreme God (Paramesvara) abiding in the body yet unaffected by birth etc. connected with the physical body, dispenses the fruits of merits and sins through god Yama and he never interferes.

\textsuperscript{271}. And the other fifteen constituents are the ten sense-organs, five subtle bhūtas forming the bases of objects of senses—ŚR.

\textsuperscript{272}. This is verbatim the same as BG. 3.5
54. With anyakta (unmanifested destiny—adṛśta) as the instrumental cause, the gross physical body and the subtle linga-sarīra are formed. According to the powerful impulses of the jīva, he becomes moulded like his mother's form or like his father's personality.

55. This contrary state of the Puruṣa (viz. involvement of the (puruṣa into saṃsāra, miseries suffered despite the Soul's blissful nature, due to his false identity with his body) was due to the contact with Prakṛti. It (this contact) dissolves completely within a short time through his devotion to God.

56. This (Ajāmila) was really studied in the Vedic lore; (was) the very abode of good nature, righteous conduct and virtue; was a strict observer of vows, gentle, self-controlled truthful master of mystical formulae, pure (both in mind and body).

57. He used to serve his preceptors, the sacred fire, the guests and elderly relatives advanced in age. He was untouched by pride (full of humility), a friend to all living beings, a man of few words; he was a saintly person, not jealous of anyone.

58. One day, this Brāhmaṇa who obediently used to carry out his father's orders, went to the forest. He returned therefrom taking with him fruits, flowers, sticks for sacrificial fire and Kuśa grass.

59-60. On his way back, he saw a certain shameless, libidinous Śūdra who had drunk wine (called Maireya—distilled from meal) in the company of a harlot whose eyes were also swimming due to intoxication. With that woman who was standing by him, with the knot of her Sari loosened (hence in a semi-naked condition), the shameless Śūdra was courting, and singing and joking nearby.

61. Seeing her embraced in arms which were erotically painted with unguents, Ajāmila was instantaneously infatuated and succumbed to passionate love.

62. Despite his attempts to control himself with all (the power of) his reasoning capacity and scholarship, he was unable to stabilize his mind and calm down his heart, which was agitated by the god of Love.

63. Being possessed by the devil in the form of passionate desire for her, he lost (the balance of) his mind. Brooding over her in his mind, he desisted from performing his prescribed religious duties.

64. With his entire ancestral property, he tried to propitiate her by vulgar carnal pleasures (appealing to her) so that she may be pleased with him.

65. The sinful fellow whose judgment was paralysed by the side-glances of that wanton woman, soon abandoned his regularly wedded young Brāhmaṇa wife who was born in a good family.

66. This stupid fellow (after squandering his ancestral property) got money from any place, by fair means or foul, and maintained the family of this woman (now his housewife).

67-68. Inasmuch as this fellow violated all the Śāstric injunctions and led a licentious life censured by noble persons, and lived a sinful life for a long time in an impure condition and eating dirty (polluted by a harlot’s touch) food, we (servants of Yama-dharma) shall therefore carry this sinner who did nothing for expiating his sins, to the presence of Yama (the god wielding the rod of punishment). There he will get purified through (undergoing the prescribed) punishment.

CHAPTER TWO

(Exposition of the Bhāgavata Dharma; Efficacy of the Lord’s Name and Ajāmila’s Ascension to Viṣṇu-loka)

Sī Śuka said:

1. Having thus carefully heard the exposition addressed (to them) by the messengers of Yama, the angels of Lord Viṣṇu who were pastmasters in philosophy and ethics, replied to them, Oh King.

The messengers of Viṣṇu said:

2. Oh What a pity! Injustice (or unrighteousness) influences the assembly of those who should see through (the real nature of (righteousness). There, punishment is wrongly inflicted by these (custodians of righteousness) on persons who are not sinners and do not (hence) deserve it.

3. To whom can created beings go for a shelter, if injustice particularly enters into their fatherly protectors and teachers like rulers who are expected to be well-disposed, righteous and impartial?

4* Whatever a superior person does is emulated by other common people. Whatever he sets up as a standard or regards as an authority the masses (ordinary people) follow it.

5. A common man, like unto a brute, does not understand, of his own accord, what is righteousness and unrighteousness. Placing his head confidently on the lap (of a fatherly protector like Yama-dharma), he sleeps resting without any anxiety.

6. How is it proper that if the latter is really deserving of confidence of all beings and has some compassion (and scruples), he can be so treacherous to one who has completely surrendered himself in faith, and cherishes friendship, and is unaware (verging on unconsciousness).

7. That this man (Ajāmila), even in a helpless stage uttered the name of Hari which (not only expiates sins but) leads to the Final Beatitude, has atoned for all the sins committed by him even in crores of his past incarnations.

8. For, by the very act that he uttered the four syllables NĀ—RĀ—YA—NA (while calling his son ‘Oh Nārāyaṇa come’), this sinner has already completely atoned for all his sins.

9-10 A thief, a wine-drinker, perpetrator of treachery to one’s friend, a murderer of a Brāhmaṇa, one who violates his preceptor’s bed (i.e. has illicit relation with one’s preceptor’s wife), the slayer of a woman, a king, a parent or a cow and other types of sinners—to all these sinners, the utterance of the name of Viṣṇu is the most effective expiation, for Lord’s

---

* A verbatim quotation from BG. 3.21.

 VR. and VC. write long discourses on the importance of God’s name which may be read in the original. V.J. points out that the condition precedent is that the name of the Lord is to be uttered with ardent devotion.
mind gets attracted to the sinner uttering his name (or the sinner’s mind is attracted to the Lord).

11. A sinner is not so thoroughly purified to that extent, by performing the expiatory acts and observances of vows prescribed by the masters of the Vedic lore (like Manu and others), as by the utterance of the mere syllables of the names of Hari (without adding ‘I bow to’), as his name is suggestive of the excellences of the glorious Lord. (The effect of Lord’s name does not exhaust and disappear immediately after dispelling the sin as is the case with the penances like Krcchra and Candrayanā.273

12. For if the mind again runs (is attracted) to the evil path even after going through the process of expiation, that act of atonement is not thorough (in destroying sin). For those who desire to annihilate (the effects of) their (sinful) acts, repeatedly extolling the merits (by uttering the names) of Hari is the sure remedy, as it (actually) purifies the mind.

13. Hence, do not carry him (the jiva of Ajāmila) by the wrong way (the sinner’s path leading to Yama’s abode). He has completely expiated all his sins. (When even a syllable of the Lord’s name is sufficient to annihilate all sins), he has uttered the complete name of the Lord when he was about to die (and there is no time and hence possibility of committing a sin after articulating the Lord’s name).

14. (As to the objection that Ajāmila called his son and and not Viṣṇu, Viṣṇu’s messengers explain). The experts in Sāstras say that utterance of the Lord’s name even if taken to denote another person, or in a friendly joke or as an insertion during the recitation of a song, or in (an outward, apparent) disrespect274, completely annihilates all sins.

15. If a person unconsciously (and involuntarily) utters the Lord’s name (Hari or any other) while he falls, tumbles down, gets maimed, is bitten (by a serpent), heated (by fever etc.) and struck (by a stick), he does not deserve to be tortured in hell.

16. (Proportionately) heavy (difficult) and easy processes of atonement for sins of grievous and light natures have

273. VC. adds—This is the omnipotence of the Almighty Lord.
274. But real disrespect for God’s name is a great sin.
been thought over and laid down by the great sages (like Manu and other writers on the Dharma-Śāstra). (But there is no such differentiation in case of Lord’s name, as by merely remembering Lord Viṣṇu, one is absolved of all sins).

17. Those (different kinds of) sins are washed away by the austerities, charitable acts, mutterings (of prayers or mantras) and such other (expiatory) processes. But the heart of the sinner (or the subtle residual forms of the sins called impressions or samskāras) are not thereby purified. Even that is achieved by the service of the feet of the Lord. (All the sins are annihilated by the very name of Hari, but vāsanā or the impressions unconsciously left on the mind by past actions are wiped out by the vision of Lord Viṣṇu—the Great Man etc.).

17a*. This Dharma, characterised by the repetition of the name of the Lord, is the highest and the ancientmost, and has been thus laid down. If practised, it purifies the mind day by day, like clothes washed on every day.

17b*. As the individual soul (jīva) has no independence in relation to the acts he performs, the expiatory acts cannot completely purify the jīva’s mind (due to his dependence on God’s will). Desisting from forbidden acts, he should therefore worship Hari by continuous singing and repetition of his name.

18. Irrespective of a man’s knowledge or ignorance (about the efficacy and potentiality of the Lord’s name for purifying thoroughly all the sins), if Lord Viṣṇu’s name is sung or muttered repeatedly, it burns down all the sins of man, like fire (even though ignorantly thrown by a child on a heap of fuel) burns the fuel completely.

19. Just as a medicinal drug of the highest potency, even though taken by chance, without being aware of its efficacy, is bound to show its remedial effects, similarly the sacred formula (mantra) consisting of the Lord’s name, even when muttered by chance, without knowing its highest purificatory power) shows its efficacy (in annihilating all sins). (Inherent power or potency does not require faith etc. in showing its efficacy).

*17a & 17b are additional verses in VJ’s text.
*19a. Oh messengers (of Yama)! If you still entertain any doubt about the righteousness (of this), you consult (enquire) with your Lord, for the glorious god Yama knows the most secrets of (what is the real) Dharma.

Śrī Śuka said:

20. Oh King! Having thus logically and convincingly explained the path of the Lord (the Bhāgavata dharma) and after liberating him (Ajāmila’s jīva) from the noose of Yama, they (Viṣṇu’s messengers) got him released from (the clutches of) Death.

21. The messengers of Yama who were thus (discomfited and) expelled, approached god Yama and faithfully reported the whole matter to King Yamadharma, Oh vanquisher of enemies!

22. Being completely extricated from the noose of Yama, the Brāhmaṇa overcame his fear, and became his own former normal self.275 Feeling delighted at their sight, he bowed to the servants of Viṣṇu with his head.

23. Perceiving that he was desirous to speak to them, the servants of Lord Viṣṇu instantaneously disappeared on that very spot, while he (Ajāmila) was (simply) looking on, Oh sinless King.

24. Ajāmila also heard separately from the conversation of the messengers of Yama and of Viṣṇu (Kṛṣṇa), the (ritualistic) Dharma as propounded in three Vedas and based on guṇas (as the fruit of this Dharma, viz. celestial pleasures are a product of guṇas), and also the Pure Dharma pertaining to (and consisting of absolute devotion to) the Lord, and transcending the three guṇas.

25. Having heard the great glories of Lord Hari, he immediately conceived earnest devotion to the Lord. Remembering his evil past, he felt deeply remorse.

26. “Alas! How extremely deplorable it was of me who could not subdue my (lower) Self, and procreating myself in the form of sons from a Śūdra woman, I have desecrated my Brahminhood.

* An additional verse in the text of VR. and VJ.
275. Resumed his previous pious way of life.—VJ.
27. Fie upon me who am condemned by good people as a sinful wretch, a dark stigma on my family—I who abandoned my virtuous young wife, and went to an unchaste wench given to drinking.

28. Alas! An ungrateful vile fellow that I am, I have forthwith deserted my supportless, poor, aged, afflicted parents who had no relative to protect them.

29. I, who am of that nature, shall obviously fall into that terrible-most hell wherein lustful violaters of the path of righteousness undergo tortures inflicted by Yama.

30. Was this a dream or was it a reality that I witnessed a miracle here? Where have the noose-bearers who dragged me (out of my body) today, gone now?

31. Again, where have gone those four beautiful-looking Siddhas (demi-gods) who released me while I was being taken noose-bound, down to the subterranean (infernal) regions?

32. In spite of my being a wretched person (in this birth), there must have been some auspicious (deed done in previous birth) inasmuch as I had the vision of those foremost gods and due to which my mind feels serene and peaceful now.

33. Otherwise (but for such auspicious acts in my previous birth) the tongue of an impure, sinner like me who kept a Śūdra woman, could be capable of uttering, at the time of death, the name of Lord Viṣṇu.

34. Oh! What a contrast between a shameless rogue and a sinner like me! I have violated (destroyed) my Brāhmaṇahood and the auspicious name of the Lord ‘Nārāyaṇa’.

35. Though I be such, I who have controlled my mind, cognitive and conative organs and breath, shall endeavour that way whereby I shall not plunge myself in the blinding darkness in the form of transmigration of the Soul.

36. Having freed myself from the bonds (for household and relatives) due to avidyā (wrong identification of the body with the Soul), lust (for enjoyment of pleasures) and actions (binding the doer to this world and the next), I shall be a friend to all beings, serene, friendly, compassionate and self-controlled.

37. I shall liberate myself who am completely possessed by Lord's Māyā in the form of a woman (my Śūdra keep) by whom, wretched as I was, I was made to dance and play like a deer kept for amusement.

38. Having given up the notion of 'I' and 'mine' with reference to my body, (belongings, property etc.) and with my thought concentrated on the real substance, I shall fix my mind on the Lord. My mind has been purified by singing of the name of the Lord (and other modes of bhakti)."

Śrī Śuka said:

39. In this way, through a moment's association with the pious (servants of Viṣṇu), he felt a thorough aversion to worldly life (and its pleasures) and freesing himself from all ties (to his mistress, children and property), he proceeded to Gaṅgādvāra.

40. Settling down in that sacred place (the abode of God), he betook himself to (the path of) Yoga. He withdrew (from worldly pleasures) all his senses and organs, and concentrated his mind on the self.

41. Then, he dissociated his self from (the product of) the guṇas viz. the body, sense-organs etc., and by concentrating his mind, he fixed it on the Supreme Brahman, which is the essential form of the Lord and is the embodiment of consciousness, and bliss.

42. When his mind and intellect were thus (thoroughly) stabilised in the Brahman, the Brāhmaṇa visualized before him those very male figures (messengers of Viṣṇu), and recognizing them as those as having been seen before, he stood up and bowed down his head (to pay respect).

43. After that vision, he cast off his body at the sacred place (Haridvāra) in the Gaṅgā and immediately assumed the (angelic) form of the attendant of the Lord.

44. Along with the servants of Lord Viṣṇu, the Brāhmaṇa ascended the heavenly car made of gold and proceeded through heavens to the abode of the Lord of Śrī (i.e. Viṣṇu).

45. (Ajāmila), the husband of the maid-servant (of a low caste), who had thereby deluged (violated) all religious duties and flouted his vows (of fidelity to his wife etc.) and had (thus) fallen from Brāhmaṇahood by his reprehensible acts (like stealing) and was consequently being hurled into the hell
(by Yama's servants), was released (from the noose of Yama) the very moment he uttered the name of the Lord.

46. There is no better efficacious remedy to cut down the roots of sin, for persons wishing Mokṣa (Liberation from Samsāra) than the continuous chanting of (the glories and) the name of the Lord of hallowing feet (god Viṣṇu). By having recourse to remembrance (and repetition) of the Lord's name, the mind is not attached again to acts (karmas); but by any other (expitiatory) acts (except the chanting of the Lord's name) it becomes tainted with rajas and tamas.

47-48. He who listens with deep faith and reverence this esoteric legend which is capable of destroying (all) sins and he who devoutly recounts it (to others), never, verily, goes to hell, nor is even eyed by the servants of Yama. Howsoever inauspicious (and sinful) the mortal may have been (in this world) he is greatly honoured in the region of Viṣṇu.

49. By (merely) calling out the name of Hari addressed to his son at the time of his own death, (even a sinner like) Ajāmila attained to Lord Viṣṇu's abode. What should be said of a person who takes his name with faith and devotion. (He would certainly ascend to Viṣṇu's abode).

CHAPTER THREE

(Yama explains Viṣṇu's greatness)

The King asked:

1. What did the god Dharmarāja (Yama, the presiding deity of righteousness), to whose authority this world is subject, and whose order was thus flouted by the servants of Viṣṇu (Murāri) reply to his servants, on hearing their report of that incident?

2. Oh Sage! The quashing of the penalty or order of god Yama was never heard of at any time or from any person. It is my firm conviction, Oh Sage, that nobody else than you, can clear this doubt in the popular mind.
Śrī Śuka said (in reply):

3. Oh King! The servants of Yama whose attempts (to execute Yama's order) were foiled by the messengers of Viṣṇu represented to their Lord Yama, the master of the city of Samyamini.

Yama's messengers said:

4. Oh Lord! How many controllers are there of the world of living beings who perform three types of action (meritorious, sinful and mixed)? And how many are there who can dispense (lit. are the cause of the manifestation of) the fruits thereof?

5. If there be a number of rulers invested with the powers to dispense justice (lit. wielding the rod of punishment) who would (i.e. nobody would) suffer death, i.e. the result of sin leading to hell or enjoy nectar (i.e. the fruit of merit conferring celestial happiness) [in case these rulers of the world disagree], and who would not suffer both, i.e., hell and heaven, (in case they agree, one condoning an act and conferring heavenly bliss, and the other condemning the same act and dispensing suffering in hell, and both consenting to each other's decision).

6. (It may be argued that there is no hitch, if several rulers dealing severally with the acts of these large numbers of beings are postulated. But in the case of postulating a plurality of rulers for dealing with vast numbers of beings engaged in multifarious activities, rulership will be (reduced to) nominal formality like that invested in tributary princes under an emperor (the real absolute ruler being different).

7. (Due to the untenability of plurality of controllers) you are, therefore, (according to us) the only one Supreme ruler of all beings including the gods. You are the sole controller and the judge to decide the good and evil actions of beings and the dispenser of reward and punishment (lit. wielder of the rod of justice to award heaven and hell).

8. Such as you are, your authority (lit. awarding of punishment) is null and void and has ceased to exist in the world today; for your order has been superseded (lit. tricked off) by four wonderful Siddhas (demi-gods).
9. While, in compliance of your order, a sinner was being taken by us to the torture-houses (infernal regions), they perforce cut asunder your nooses (fastening the sinner) and liberated him.

10. As soon as the word 'Nārāyaṇa' was uttered (by the sinner), they hastened in saying, "Do not be afraid". So we wish to know from you who they are, if you think it is in our interest to know them (otherwise by showing disrespect to them through ignorance, there may be a trouble to you).

Śrī Śuka said:

11. Thus enquired, god Yama, the controller of all created beings was pleased, and calling upon mentally, the lotus-like feet of Hari, replied to his messengers.

Yama said:

12. Quite different from me is the Supreme Ruler of the mobile and immobile creation. (Who transcends it. As his servant, I control the mobile beings, especially the human beings among them and more especially the sinners among men, while he is the Supreme Ruler of all). Into him the universe lies woven warp and woof, like a piece of cloth. It is from his parts (āntas viz, gods Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra) that the creation, sustenance and destruction of the universe take place. The whole world remains under his perfect control like a bullock controlled by a string pierced through its nostrils.

13. Just as one keeps bullocks tethered together to a long rope, he binds people to his word (viz. the Vedas) by designating them (into classes as Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas etc.) and prescribing to each his respective duties. These people who are thus tightly regulated by their denominations and duties are afraid of him and bear him worship (by scrupulous performance of their prescribed work).

14-15. I (and the guardian deities of other cardinal points like) the great Indra, Nirṛti, Varuṇa, the Moon-god, the Fire-god, God Śiva, the Wind-god, as also the Sun-god, Brahmā, the twelve sons of Aditi (the monthly rotational solar presidents during a year), the Viṣṇe-devas, the (eight) Vasus, demi-gods called Śādhyas, the (fortynine) Wind gods, the group of (eleven) Rudras along with the Siddha tribe of demi-gods, and other progenitors of the universe (like Marici), rulers of gods (i.e. ruler-like highly respected persons like Bṛhaspati), Bṛgu and others who are not tainted with rajas and tāmas—all these though dominated by the attribute sattva but are touched (deluded) with his Māyā do not understand his intentions—What of others? (Others can never fathom it).

16. Jīvas (individuals) verily cannot visualize him or comprehend him by means of their cognitive senses, mental faculties or vital breaths (which actuate the conative organs) or by means of speech (or Śāstras composed of words) even though he exists within their hearts and pervades them all (as the inner controller), even as the forms (which are the objects of the sight) cannot visualize the faculty of vision (which reveals them). He is beyond them all.

17. Generally, the messengers of Hari, the Supreme Soul, the self-dependent Supreme Ruler, the transcendent Lord of the Māyā go about in this world. They have attractive personalities and the same form, attributes and disposition as of their Lord.

18. The messengers of Viṣṇu are worshipped by gods.
Their most wonderful forms cannot be easily perceived. They protect the mortal devotees of Viṣṇu from enemies, from me and from all (sides and people) as well.

19. The (secret of the) doctrine as enunciated by the Lord himself could not be comprehended by (persons dominated by the attribute Sattva like the sages, gods and prominent Siddhas. How can it be understood by demons and men—much less by demi-gods like Vidyādhāras and Cāraṇas.

20-21. We twelve—god Brahmā, (the heavenly sage) Nārada, god Śiva, Sanatkumāra, Kapila (the founder of the Śāṅkhya doctrine), Manu, Prahładā, Janaka, Bhiṣma, the demon Bali, Śuka (the son of Vyāsa) and we ourselves—know the essence of the Dharma (the esoteric doctrine) as expounded by the Lord. It is extremely sacred, pure, secret and difficult to comprehend. One who knows it attains immortality (Final Liberation—Mokṣa).

22. That alone has been remembered (prescribed in the Dharma Śāstra) as the highest Dharma (sacred duty) of all men in this world, viz., that they should cultivate devotion unto the Lord through the utterance of his name (and other forms of bhakti).

23. Look at the great efficacy of the utterance of Hari’s name, my boys. It is due to that, that even (a great sinner like) Ajāmila was rescued from the clutches (lit. noose) of death.

24. That even a great sinner like Ajāmila, while on the point of death (when one’s faculties could not be concentrated on the Lord), simply shrieked out (and not devotionally chanted) for his son (and not for Lord Viṣṇu) as ‘Nārāyaṇa’ and attained Liberation shows that (mere utterance of Lord’s name—nāmābhāsa—is enough to annihilate all sins and that glorification of the Lord’s attributes and deeds and chanting of the Lord’s name—all these are not required for mere destruction of the sins (but they are needed for cleanly wiping out the impressions (vāsanās) left over by sins.

25. (As this esoteric doctrine was grasped by only a dozen persons and remained a great secret to others, these great men) like Manu (most probably did not know that) the (efficacy of Lord’s name) is this (as described above). Alas! Their mind is sufficiently deluded by the goddess Māyā. Their intellect is focussed on (and entangled in) the three Vedas promising in flowery language attractive fruits (of sacrifices and other rituals). And they engage themselves in great exhibitory performances of sacrificial acts. (The exhibitory attraction of sacrifices as contrasted with the chanting of the Lord’s name in a solitary place, or due to their lack of faith in the efficacy of the Lord’s name leads people to performance of sacrifices etc.

26. Having reasoned in this way, persons of good intelligence certainly perform with concentrated mind, acts (such as chanting of the Lord’s name etc.) conducive to the loving devotion to the Lord of infinite attributes. They do not deserve punishment at my hands (as they are sinless). Even if sin is committed (inadvertently) by them, it is destroyed by their singing the glory and chanting the name of the Lord (who is widely sung by the Vedas).
27. Do not (even) approach those good souls who have resorted to the Lord and entertain equal outlook toward all and whose holy stories are (therefore) sung by gods and Siddhas. For they are protected by the mace of Hari and neither we nor the Time-spirit is competent to punish them.

28. Bring (only) those wicked persons who are averse to the sweet fragrant honey of the lotus-feet of Mukunda (Lord Viṣṇu) which is incessantly tasted by multitudes of Paramahamsas (ascetics of the highest order, or noble Swans) who possess nothing of their own and are expert connoisseurs of sweetness (of Lord's lotus-feet). Bring also those who have set their hearts on their households, which is the way to hell.

29. Bring those fellows (to me) whose tongue does not describe the excellent attributes of the Lord or utter his name; whose mind does not remember his lotus-like feet; whose head does not even once bow down to Lord Kṛṣṇa and who have rendered no service to Lord Viṣṇu.

30. May the Venerable Lord Nārāyaṇa, the Ancient-Person, pardon me for the offence committed by my men who are his men. For his devotees who are ignorant, folding of palms in reverence to the great persons is the way of requesting forgiveness. I bow to the perfect Person.”

31. The singing of Viṣṇu’s name and glory is, therefore, auspicious and blissful to the whole world. Oh King of the Kuru race! Please understand this to be a thorough expiation of the greatest of sins.

32. The mind is not purified to that extent by observance of vows (e.g. fasting) as it does by the properly-developed devotion of those who constantly listen to and sing of the great exploits of Lord Viṣṇu.

33. He who has tasted the sweet honey in the lotus-like feet of Lord Kṛṣṇa does not find pleasure again in objects offered by Māyā which he has contemptuously discarded as leading to sin and miseries (of hell). But the other person who is ignorant about the blissfulness of devotion is overcome with passions, desires to wipe out the sin in his heart by performing another \textit{karma} which in its turn leads to (the creation of) another sin (like the proverbial bath of an elephant which covers itself with dust after coming out of water.

276. mahalām—Or ‘Of great persons’. Translate: ‘It deserves to be observed by great persons for the complete expiation of their sins, Oh Parikṣetā.’

34. Oh King! The servants of Yama were not wonder-struck in the mind as they remembered (their realization by personal experience) the greatness of Lord Viśṇu as described to them by their master (Yama). Being afraid of persons who have resorted to Viśṇu (Acyuta) they do not dare even to look at them since that day onwards.

35. The venerable Agastya (the sage born from a pitcher) who was seated (on the peak of) Malaya mountain, worshipping god Viśṇu, narrated to me this secret historical legend.

\section*{CHAPTER FOUR}

\textit{(History of Dakṣa, the son of Pracetas)}

\textit{The King (Parīkṣit) said:}

1. You have briefly described the genesis of gods, Asuras (demons), men, serpents, beasts and birds during the (first) Manvantara period presided over by Svāyambhuva Manu.

2. I desire to know from you the details of that creation (as to) how and with what power the transcendental, glorious Lord brought for the subsequent creation, Oh venerable sage.

\textit{Śūta said:}

3. On hearing this excellent query from the royal sage (Parīkṣit), the great Yogi Śuka, the son of Bādarāyaṇa, expressed his appreciation and spoke unto him, the noblest of sages.

\textit{Śri Śuka said:}

4. When the ten Pracetasas, sons of king Prācīna-barhis emerged from within the sea (-like lake) they saw that the earth was covered with trees.
5. Being enraged at the trees and with their wrath flared up by austere penance, they blew out fire and wind through their mouth, with the intention of burning down the trees.\textsuperscript{277}

6. Finding the trees being reduced to ashes by them both (the fire and the wind), the great Moon-god, the ruler of the vegetable kingdom, addressed them with a view to appeasing their anger.

7. “Oh highly fortunate Princes! It does not be- you to bear enmity to the poor trees. You are regarded as the protectors of the beings the special promotion of whose growth should be your concern and desire.

8. Oh Princes! The immutable glorious Lord Hari, the ruler of progenitors of all creatures has created the trees and the annual plants (cereals) for fruits and food-grains (or the food of the manes and food for gods).

9. The immobile ones (trees, plants etc. i.e. their produce like fruits and flowers) are food for the mobile creatures; the footless (i.e. grass etc.) the food of those having feet; the handless ones (e.g. the fish) are the food of those endowed with hands; and the quadrupeds (e.g. deer, boar etc.) are the food of the bipeds (human beings).

10. Oh sinless ones! Inasmuch as you are commanded by your father (Präcinabarhis) and by the god of gods to procreate beings how is it proper for you to burn down trees (which form the food of creatures).

11. Please follow the path of the righteous which was adopted by your father, grandfather and great-grandfather and control your intensified wrath.

12. The parents are real friends (guardians of interests) of children; the eyelashes are of the eyes; the husband is of a woman; the king is of the subjects; the householder is the true friend of the mendicants and the teacher or the wise person is that of the ignorant. (The protectors of beings are hence the true friends of the creatures; you should not therefore destroy the food or the means of livelihood of your subjects).

13. The Soul that dwells within the bodies of the creatures is Lord Hari, the Supreme Controller; please note \textsuperscript{277} Vide Supra 4.30.44ff.

(carefully) that the entire creation is his abode. Hence, it is thus that he will be propitiated by you.

14. He, who, with a desire to know the real nature of the Soul, controls (within himself) sudden explosion of wrath within the cavity of his heart, goes beyond the gunas which are the cause of the miseries of Samsara.

15. Enough of the helpless trees that are (so far) consumed with fire. (Spare the remaining ones). May the surviving trees and yourselves live in bliss. Here is this excellent girl (Marišā by name) brought up by the trees. May she be accepted by you as your wife."

16. Having pacified them (the Pracetasas) thus and having offered that beautiful daughter (with fine hips) of the Apsaras (Pramlocā) to them in marriage, the king Soma (the Moon-god) returned. They then married her according to religious rites.278

17. Dakṣa, the son of Pracetasas, they say, was born of her from them. The three worlds are fully populated by his progeny (and their descendants).

18. Now listen to me attentively how Dakṣa who was so affectionate to his daughters procreated beings by his mind (mental faculty) as well as with his semen (physical body).

19. In the beginning, it was by his mental faculties that he procreated these beings, viz., gods, demons (Asuras), men and such other creatures dwelling in the sky, on the earth and in the water.

20. Finding that this creation of beings was not growing prolific, the progenitor (of creation) approached the hills near the foot of the Vindhya mountain and performed very austere penance.

21. There was an extremely holy lake efficacious to destroy sins. It was called Aghamarṣaṇa (efficacious to wash off sins). He bathed three times a day (in the morning, midday and evening) in the lake and propitiated Lord Hari with his austere penance.

278. Vide supra 4,30. 13-16. As Soma brought her up by nectar from his index finger, he had the fatherly right to offer her in marriage. As Lord Viṣṇu commanded them all to marry her, religious sanction was automatically received for this polyandric marriage.
22. He praised the glorious Lord Viṣṇu with the Ṣaṁskṛta hymn. I shall now recite that hymn with which Hari was pleased with Dakṣa.

Prajāpati (Dakṣa) said:

23. I pay obeisance to the transcendental Lord whose power of consciousness is not unreal; who is the controller of jīva (the individual Soul as reflected through the three guṇas of Māyā) and the Māyā (the cause or the basis of such reflection); whose form or true nature is invisible to those who look upon guṇas or objects of senses as real; who is beyond all the means of knowledge (e.g. inference etc.) who is beyond limit of time and space, and Self-effulgent.

24. I bow to the Supreme Lord who is the friend of the jīva inhabiting the same city (body) along with him but of whose friendliness (in activating the sense-organs and the mind) the jīva is not aware. He is the seer of the world (and hence unseen by the world) just as a guṇa (the object of cognition) cannot perceive the possessor of the guṇa (viz. the cognitive ability of the cognizing sense).

25. The body, the vital breaths, the senses, the internal organs or mental faculties, the five bhūtas (gross elements) and their tanmātrās (subtle forms e.g. sound, touch etc.) do not know either themselves or the oilers and their presiding deities who are beyond them all (as all these have no consciousness). The jīva (being consciousness by nature) knows all the guṇas (the root cause of the above-mentioned list). But the jīva who knows them (the above) does not know the Omniscient Lord who is Infinite. Him I praise.

26. When the mind which cognizes the world of names and forms ceases to function due to the loss or obsolescence of all cognition and memory, in the state of samādhi or complete absorption in the self, he (the Supreme Brahman) reveals himself through his inherent existence, consciousness and bliss. I offer my salutations to him whose abode is the pure heart.

27. With their purified intellect, the self-controlled, discerning persons discover (and meditate upon) him (as distinct from ahamkāra) as enthroned in the innermost heart, even though he lies unmanifest by his nine powers\textsuperscript{279} (viz. Prakṛti, mahat or cosmic intelligence, ahamkāra or ego, mind and tanmātras (five subtle bhūtas) and (by mind, five gross elements and ten sense-organs) and influenced by three guṇas (viz. Sattva, rajas, and tamas). (The above-mentioned wise persons do so) just as the experts in sacrificial lore separate (by friction) the sacrificial fire latent in the (piece of) wood by reciting the fifteen Sāmidhenī verses\textsuperscript{280} (in the course of churning out fire).

28. He is realized as the highest bliss in meditation by the negation of Māyā which creates all distinctions and differences. Verily he bears every name, and assumes all forms. He possesses within him innumerable potencies which are beyond the power of words to describe. (May the Lord be gracious unto me).

29. Whatever is described in words, concluded (to be true) by the intellect, perceived by the senses or imagined by the mind, is only a phenomenon of the (three) guṇas and cannot be his essential nature; for he is verily characterised by the creation or dissolution of guṇas (i.e. their product, the universe).

30. It is Brahman on which everything depends; from it everything is caused; it has created everything from itself with itself. Everything is for it and belongs to it. Whatever it makes and causes others to make is Brahman. It is the ultimate cause of all causes both earlier (e.g. god Brahmā) or later. As the primary cause, it is known to have preceded all causes. It is one without a second, whether of its own kind or of another category. It is Brahman to whom I bow\textsuperscript{281}.

31. (If Brahman is the cause of the universe, why do the different schools of thoughts like the followers of Mīmāṃsā, Nyāya, indulge in disputation?). It is his potencies (such as Māyā) which have verily become the grounds (causes) for disputations and concurrence for various eloquent theorists (of different schools of thought) and which (in spite of the exhortations of the knowers of the truth to these disputants) delude their minds now and again. I bow to him, the omnipresent Lord of infinite excellences.

\textsuperscript{279} VJ. mentions a different list of nine potencies, viz., Vimalā, Utkarṣaṇī, Jñānokriyā etc. and the three powers (trivṛddhik) are Will, Knowledge and Action (Kriyā).

\textsuperscript{280} Viṣṇu is called the fifteenth Principle (Pāñcadaśya). The remaining fourteen are: Ten sense-organs (indriyas), mind, intelligence (buddhi), vital airs (Prāṇa) and Pradhāna. Viṣṇu controls these—VJ.

\textsuperscript{281} VR. takes the Viśiṣṭādvaita position in which Iśvara is the Soul and jīva and jagat (unintelligent matter) form his body. The different cases in this verse show the intimate relation of Iśvara with others.

32. (Yoga, as a science of divine worship, conceives of God as a cosmic person with Pātāla, subterranean regions, as his feet, while Sāṇkhya which is the Science of Knowledge or self-realization regards him as formless without any hands or feet.) The Yoga and Sāṇkhya systems of philosophy which proclaim faith in one and the same Reality predicate the existence and nonexistence of (two) distinct and mutually contradictory attributes to be subsisting in the same Reality (viz. possession and non-possession of feet etc.). But the common basis on which they agree and (is thus beyond dispute) is the existence of God—a Reality beyond dispute. It is the great thing—Brahman (to whom I bow).

33. May that glorious Supreme Lord of infinite attributes be gracious unto me—the Lord who though above material names and forms, invested himself with (absolutely pure sāttvic) forms by incarnating himself, and assumed names by his (wonderful) deeds, for the sake of bestowing his grace on those who seek shelter at his feet.

34. May that Supreme Ruler grant me my desired object (s)—the Supreme Lord who abiding in all bodies as the (formless) Inner controller, manifests himself in the forms of different deities to people according to the tendencies (formed by impressions of the actions of their previous births) and their paths of worship of recent origin, just as a breeze of wind (though itself devoid of the characteristics of the earth, viz. fragrance or colour) bears different kinds of smells according to the fragrance of the flowers with which it comes into contact or looks whitish, the attribute of dust mixed with it.

Śrī Śuka said:

35. Thus praised (with the hymns), the glorious Lord who is affectionate to his devotees manifested himself to Dakṣa while he was extolling him in the sacred lake called Aghamarśaṇa, oh foremost Kuru.

36. Riding with his feet flung on both the shoulders of Garuḍa, he wielded in his extraordinarily long and mighty arms a discus, a conch, a sword, a shield, an arrow, a noose and a mace (in each respectively).

37. He was clad in yellow silken garment with complexion dark like a cloud, his countenance and eyes were beaming with pleasure and joy. His person was adorned with Vanamālā (a garland of forest-flowers) and bore the mark called Śrīvatsa and the valuable gem Kaustubha.

38. He wore a very costly crown and bracelets and radiant pair of crocodile-shaped ear-rings. He was adorned with zones, rings, bracelets, anklets and armlets.

39. The Lord of the three worlds manifested a beautiful form captivating the three worlds. He was surrounded by Nārada, Nanda and other attendants and by protectors of the worlds (like Indra, Varuṇa). He was eulogized by Siddhas, Gandharvas and cāraṇas (the celestial singers and others) who followed him singing.

40. On seeing that most wonderful form (of the Lord), the progenitor Dakṣa was overcome with awe, but his heart was overjoyed. He lay prostrate before him on the ground (like a rod) and bowed to him.

41. Just as rivers are overflooded by streams, his senses were too full with intense joy to be able to speak. Thus, on account of excessive joy he could not utter a word.

42. Lord Viṣṇu who knows the minds of all created beings spoke thus to the progenitor devotee Dakṣa who had laid himself prostrate that way before him and was desirous of procreating progeny.

The Venerable Lord said:

43. Oh highly fortunate son of Pracetās! You have achieved the objective of your austere penance inasmuch as you have cherished supreme devotion unto me through your unswerving intense faith in me.

44. Oh Lord of created beings! I am pleased with you as the growth of the universe is the aim of your penance. It is also my desire that there should be all round growth and prosperity of all created beings.

45. God Brahmā, Śiva, you all Prajāpatis (Lords of created beings), Manus (progenitors of human beings who preside over certain epochs or Manvantaras) and the foremost deities—all are my special incarnations for the prosperity and procreation of created beings.

46*. Oh Brahman (Dakṣa)! Contemplation (accompanied with disciplines of Yama and niyama) is my heart. The spiritual lore (the internal repetition of Mantras with the specific technique of nyūsa etc. which results in concrete meditation and my realization) is my body. The activities pertaining to contemplation is my form. Accurately performed sacrifices are the limbs of my body. The merit (accruing from the well-performed sacrifices) is my Soul. Gods (the recipients of oblations in the sacrifices) form my very life.

47. At the beginning of creation, I alone existed (without any activity). There was nothing else as internal (the seer or knower) or external (the seen or the object of knowledge). I was pure consciousness and unmanifested. There was (as if) deep sleep (no activity) everywhere.

48. In me who am Infinite and endowed with an infinite number of attributes, there evolved through Māyā (constituted of three gunās) this universe (a product of gunās). At that time the selfborn Brahmā, the First Person (the creator of all) arose (along with the universe).

49. When the great god Brahmā, though supplied with my energy, became engaged in the work of creation, he felt that he was not sufficiently competent for it.

50. Then as per my command, the god Brahmā performed very austere penance. Empowered by it, he created nine progenitors of created beings including you (in your previous birth) in the beginning.

* VR., SD. explain that Lord wants to emphasize the importance of contemplation, sacrifices etc. as they are dear to him.

GD. explains that the Lord reminds Dakṣa of his previous birth and proficiency in sacrifice by calling him ‘Brahman’.
51. Oh dear child! Here is the daughter of the progenitor of creatures, Pańcajana. Her name is Asikni. Accept her as your wife, Oh Lord of created beings.

52. You have to follow the righteous course of sexual union between a duly married couple. You will procreate progeny in large numbers from her who will also observe the same righteous duty (of sexual intercourse between the duly married) like you.

53. All created beings after you will be born through sexual intercourse with women, under the influence of my Māyā and they will offer worship.

Śrī Śuka said:

54. Having addressed him thus, Lord Hari the prime cause of the universe vanished on that very spot like an object seen in a dream, while Dakṣa was looking on.

CHAPTER FIVE

(Dakṣa curses Nārada)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Being imbued with the energy of Viṣṇu, Dakṣa became powerful and begot through that (above-mentioned) Pańcajani ten thousand sons called Haryāśva.

2. Oh King! All those sons of Dakṣa were of the same nature and similarly righteous in conduct. When they were commanded by the father (Dakṣa) to beget children, they went to the western direction.

3. They went to a sacred lake called Nārāyaṇa-saras situated in the area where the river Sindhu meets the sea—a holy place resorted to by a number of sages and Siddhas.

4. At the very touch of that (sacred water of the) lake, their hearts were cleansed of all impurities and they found their mind attracted to the righteous way of life of the Paramahamsas

(the highest order of ascetics).

5. Being restrained by the command of their father for begetting prolific progeny, they practised severe austerities. It is then, they say, that the celestial sage Nārada saw them.

6. And he (Nārada) spoke unto them:

‘Oh Haryaśvas! How is it that without seeing the limits of the earth you want to create children. You are certainly childish (foolish). It is a pity that protectors (of the subjects) as you are, you are really childish.

7-9. Without seeing a kingdom inhabited by only one man, and without knowing the hole with (apparently) invisible outlet, the woman who can assume different forms (at will), and the man who espouses a harlot, a river flowing in both directions, a wonderful house constructed of twenty-five materials, at one place a swan telling miraculous tales, an independent, revolving (strong, sharp) disc made of adamant and razors, and without properly understanding the implication of the command of your omniscient father, how will you proceed with your job of creation?

Śrī Śuka said:

10. Having heard the enigmatic words of the divine sage (Nārada), the Haryaśvas, with their ownborn reasoning capacity, began to investigate with their intelligence.

11. The earth (bhū) is that field (or the liṅga-sātira—the subtle body—which causes pleasure, pain, merit, demerit etc.
like an agricultural farm yielding crop of cereals) designated as jīva. The subtle body is (practically) beginningless (existing from times immemorial) and it acts as a bondage to the Soul. Without seeing how it becomes extinct, what is the use of impious karmas (which do not lead to Mokṣa).

12. The only one (man in the country) stands for the Sole Almighty ruler (of the universe). He is (beyond and) witness to all mental states, viz., viśva, tajasa and prājña) and hence is called the fourth—the omnipresent. He is self-dependent supreme (the cause of everything else). Without seeing that birthless (eternally free) Lord, what purpose can be served by acts not dedicated to him?
13. Just as a person who has gone to the subterranean heaven (pātāla) does not return (to the earth in the same body), a man does not return to saṃsāra after attaining to the self-illuminating Brahman within him. To a man who has not realized (lit. is ignorant of) the Inner Light—Self-effulgent Brahman, worthless karmas (which may lead to heavenly happiness and other transitory pleasures) are of no avail.

14. Like a loose wanton woman wearing various attractive forms and gifted with (many attractive) qualities, the intellect of man assumes shapes of objects of lower type of pleasures (like form, taste and other objects of senses) and is influenced by guṇas (like rajas, tamas). To a person who has not put an end to (i.e. transcended) such a multiple-interested intellect, what can be achieved through hot pursuit of such activities?

15. What can be achieved through acts done without discernment and knowledge by a jīva (man) who does not understand the loss of his independence (and non-attachment) by his association with such (above-mentioned) intellect and is like a husband of a loose wife, follows her ways (characterised by pleasure and pain).

16. What can be gained from activities influenced by Māyā which causes both the creation and destruction (and is like a river flowing both ways). (In order to prevent people fallen in it from reaching the banks) it rushes forth with great velocity (assuming the form of anger, egotism etc.) at the ghats, and its banks (in the form of penance, learning etc.).

17. Puruṣa (the Inner Controller abiding in the body) is a wonderful basis and mirror\textsuperscript{283} reflecting the twentyfive categories (enumerated by Sāṁkhya). Of what use are the acts (done with a false sense of independence) by one who has not realized that he (Puruṣa) presides over the body (the aggregate of the categories—a collection of cause and effect).\textsuperscript{284}

\textsuperscript{283} ŠR. reads adbhuta-darśana ‘One who is of wonderful form’ (āstacara-rūpa).

\textsuperscript{284} Sāṁkhya differ : According to Īśvara-kṛṣṇa, Prakṛti is uncreated (without any cause). The next seven categories from mahat to tanmātrās are both cause (of the next category) and the effect (of the previous category) and the next sixteen: mind, 5 gross elements, 10 sense-organs are effects only. Puruṣa is neither the cause nor effect.—Sāṁkhyaśākārikā 3.
18. (This explains kvacid hamsam citrakatham in verse 8 above). What purpose will be served by acts oriented to the external phenomenal world if one neglects (the study of) the śāstra (philosophic teaching) which establishes the existence of the Almighty Ruler by distinguishing between the intelligent principle (the Soul) and inert matter and shows the (nature of) bondage and (Final) Liberation (like a swan drinking milk only from the mixture of milk and water)?

19. (The explanation of kṣaurapavyam svayam bhramim—verse 8 above).

The wheel of Time which is relentlessly and eternally revolving is sharp like razor-blade. It is absolutely independent (and hence uncontrollable). It destroys the whole creation. To him who does not know this (nature of Time), of what use are the worthless acts (done under the false presumption that their fruits are eternal).

20. (The inner significance of verse 9 above).

How can anyone who does not understand the precept of desisting from worldly activities, given by his father, the śāstra (which gives him the second birth by the upanayana, investiture of the sacred-thread-ceremony and tenders salutary advice) and who entertains faith in the path of worldly activities (Praṇāṭa-mārga) based on guṇas, go ahead with the work of creation? (As Dakṣa ceases to be a father after upanayana, you can disregard his order without incurring a sin if you follow the precept of śāstra, your father, and follow the path of renunciation—Nivṛtti-dharma).

21. (Being convinced by Nārada) Haryāśvas unanimously resolved thus, and circumambulating him (Nārada, by the right side as a mark of respect) went the way (to liberation) from which there is no return, Oh King!

22. The sage Nārada, who has concentrated (lit. entered) his undivided mind in the lotus-like feet of Lord Viṣṇu (Hṛṣīkeśa—the Master of sense-organs) as revealed in Svāra-Brahman (Brahman in the form of notes of the musical scale on his lute), went about (his own way in) the world.

23. Having heard that his sons, so excellent due to their righteous character, have disappeared and are lost to their original duty (of procreating children) due to the advice of Nārada, Dakṣa was tormented with sorrow and lamented that even to have good children can be a source of grief.

24. Being much consoled by god Brahmā, Dakṣa again procreated by Pañcajani a thousand sons called Śabalaśva.

25. Even they (Śabalaśvas) who were commanded by the father to beget progeny, took to religious vows and went to the (sacred) lake Nārāyaṇa where their elder brothers attained perfection (i.e. god-realization).

26. With their minds and hearts perfectly cleansed of all impurities (sins) at the touch of those sacred waters, they practiced austere penance muttering (all the while) the sacred syllable OM (a symbol of the Supreme Brahma).

27. For several months, they subsisted on water, and for many months, on the air only. They propitiated the Lord of all Mantras (the glorious god Viṣṇu), repeating this (following) sacred mantra:

28. “OM. Salutations to Lord Nārāyaṇa, the Indwelling Controller, the Supreme Soul, whose place of manifestation is the extremely pure sāttvic heart and who is absolutely free from all blemishes. We meditate upon him.”

29. The sage Nārada approached even those (sons of Dakṣa) who made up their minds to renew creation and spoke to them the enigmatic words similar to those addressed to their (elder) brothers, Oh King of Kings.

30. “Oh sons of Dakṣa! Listen carefully to the precept as given (lit. addressed) by me. You find out the path followed by your elder brothers (for whom you are so full of affection).

31. A brother who knows the path of righteousness, follows the great path trodden by his brothers and with merit as his friend, he enjoys (celestial) life in the company of the Marut—(wind) gods (noted for their fraternal affection).”

32. Oh noble King! having addressed this much, Nārada whose audience is never unfruitful, departed. They (Śabalaśvas) also followed the (spiritual) path of their (elder) brothers.

33. Having resorted to the exalted and agreeable path attainable to those whose senses and minds are turned within (away from the external world)—the path that leads to the realization of the Supreme Brahman—they, like the nights that have passed, never return to this day.

34. Noticing at this time, a number of evil portents, the Prajāpati Dakṣa came to know that Nārada had ruined his sons.

35. Overwhelmed with grief for his sons, he got enraged with Nārada. (To prevent Dakṣa from turning into a recluse, Nārada approached him). Finding Nārada, he exploded (lit. spoke to him) with his lower lip quivering with rage.

Dakṣa said:

36. Oh wicked fellow donning the garb of holy man! You have done a great harm to good people like us, in showing the path of mendicants to my young (good-natured) children.

37. Oh sinful person! You have deprived (my sons) of the bliss in both the worlds (here and hereafter), as they have not repaid their debts to the sages, gods and manes and have not investigated the nature of karmas.

38. Merciless and prejudicer of the mind of children as you are, you are bringing stigma to the glory of Lord Hari, and shameless as you are, you still move among the attendants of Hari.

39. With the exception of you who are verily a traitor to friends and who sow enmity between friends, all the devotees of Hari are really ever eager to shower grace on living beings.

40. Renunciation cannot in this way be generated in the minds of men by you who have disguised yourself as an Avadhūta even though you have no knowledge. Though you regard that self-control (automatically) severs the bonds of affection (it is wrong).

41. A man cannot realize how objects of sensual pleasures cause painful consequences, without personally experiencing them. Therefore, one does not get disgusted to that extent if his mind is unsettled by others (in that matter), as a person would who has undergone the experience himself.
42. We have tolerated the unbearable wrong you have done to us, householders, who have vowed to perform Vedic karmas with a wish to get heavenly bliss.

43. You are a destroyer of the continuity of my race. As you have again done a wrong to us, you will not get a resting place while wandering through the worlds (Oh fool).

Śrī Śuka said:

44. Nārada who was highly respected by the pious people accepted the curse saying, 'Very well'. He is called really a Sādhu (pious soul) who though competent to retaliate, bears up the wrong done to him.

CHAPTER SIX

(Progeny of Dakṣa's Daughters)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Then comforted by the self-born god Brahmā, Prācetasa Dakṣa begot on Asiknī sixty daughters who were affectionate to their father.

2. He gave ten daughters (in marriage) to Dharma, the presiding deity of righteousness, thirteen to sage Ka (Kaśyapa), twenty-seven to the Moon-god, two each to sages Bhūta, Aṅgiras and Kṛśāśva and the rest to Tārāṣya, another name of Kaśyapa.

3. Now, hear from me their names along with those of their offspring whose children and children's children (descendants) have populated completely the three worlds.

4. (The names of Dharma's wives are) : Bhānu, Lambā, Kakubh, Jāmi, Viśvā, Sādhyā, Marutvati, Vasu, Muhūrtā, Saṅkalpā. Now listen to (the names of the sons).

5. From Bhānu was born Devarśabha. His son was Indrasena. From Lambā was born Vidyota who gave birth to (deities presiding over) cloud.

6. Saṅkaṭa was born from Kakubh. His son was Kīkaṭa, from whom were begotten the spirits presiding over the fortresses on the earth. Svarga was the son of Jāmi. From him was born Nandi.

7. From Viśva were begotten the Viśvedevas who are said to be childless. Sādhyā gave birth to a group of gods known as Sādhyā whose son was Arhasiddhi.

8. From Marutvatī were born (the forty-nine) Maruts (wind-gods) and Jayanta who was a part manifestation of Vāsudeva and whom they know as Upendra.

9. From Muhūrtā were born the race of gods called Mauhūrtikas who verily bestow upon living beings fruit appropriate to the particular period of time (when an act is performed at that time).

10. Saṅkalpā gave birth to Saṅkalpa (the deity presiding over thought process). It is declared that the god of love is born of Saṅkalpa. Vasu gave birth to eight sons called Vasus. Hear from me their names (now).

11. (Their names are): Droṇa, Prāṇa, Dhruva, Arka, Agni, Doṣa, Vasu, Vibhāvasu. Droṇa begot from his wife Abhimati children called Harṣa, Śoka, Bhaya and others (the presiding deities of joy, sorrow, fear etc.).

12. Prāṇa begot Sahas, Āyus, Purojava from his wife Uṛjasvatī. Dharaṇī (the earth), the wife of Dhruva, gave births to various towns and cities.

13. Vāsanā was the wife of Arka (the Sun-god). Their sons like Tarṣa and others were well known. Dharā was the wife of the Vasu called Agni, and their sons were Draviniṇaka and others.

14. And Skanda was the son of Kṛttikā (another wife of Agni). From him were born Viśākha and others. Doṣa had by Śarvari, a son called Śīśumāra (the deity of the stellar sphere) who was an anta (digit) of Hari.

15. From Āṅgirasī, the wife of Vasu, was born Viśvakarmā, the architect of gods. The name of his wife was Ākṛti. From her were born Cāksusa, (the sixth) Manu. Viśvedevas and Sādhyā gods were the sons of Manu.

16. From Vibhāvasu, Uṣā gave birth to Vyuoṣta, Rocīṣa and Ātapa. From Ātapa was born Pañcayāma (the deity presiding over the day-time) who keeps created beings awake and alert to their duties.
17-18. Sarūpā, the wife of Bhūta, gave birth to crores of Rudras (the deities entrusted with the duty of destruction), the chief among them were the eleven, namely, Raivata, Aja, Bhava, Bhima, Vāma, Ugra, Vṛṣākapi, Ajākapāda, Ahirbudhnya, Bahurūpa and Mahān. From Bhūtā, another wife of Bhūta, were born the terrible Bhūtas and evil-spirits (called Vināyakas) who were the attendants of Rudras.

19. Svadhā, the wife of Prajāpati Aṅgiras, gave birth to the manes (Pīṭṭras). Satī, another wife of Aṅgiras, accepted the Veda called Atharva—Aṅgiras—as her son.

20. Krśāśva begot from his wife Arcis, Dhūmrakeśa as the son, and on Dhiśaṇā four sons, viz. Vedaśiras, Devala, Vayuna and Manu.

21-22. Tārkṣya which was another name of the sage Kaśyapa, had four wives, namely, Vinatā, Kadrū, Pataṅgī and Yāmīni. Pataṅgī gave birth to birds; Yāmīni to locusts. Vinatā had a son called Garuḍa who was the vehicle of directly the Lord of Sacrifices (Viṣṇu). She had another son called Aruṇa (the thighless) who is the charioteer of the Sun-god. Kadrū, mothered serpents of various species.

23. Oh descendant of Bharata! The presiding deities of Kṛttikā and other twenty-seven constellations of stars, were wedded to the Moon, but due to the curse of Dakṣa, he was affected by consumption and had no issue from them.

24. Having propitiated Dakṣa again, he regained his digits which decreased in the dark half of the month but had no children. Now, listen to the auspicious names of the mothers of the world (viz. Kaśyapa's wives).

25-26. The following are the names of the wives of Kaśyapa who gave birth to this world; Aditi, Diti, Danu, Kāṣṭhā, Ariṣṭā, Surasā, Ilā, Muni, Krodhaśa, Tāmrā, Surabhi, Saramā and Timi. From Timi were born aquatic beings; from Saramā, tiger and other carnivorous animals.

27. From Surabhi, were created buffalo, cow and other beasts with cloven hooves; from Tāmrā, hawks, vultures and other birds of prey; from Muni, the bevy of celestial demsels.

28. Oh King! Serpents like Dandaśūka and others were the offspring of Krodhaśā; the vegetable kingdom, of Ilā, and the Yakṣas and Rakṣasas of Surasā.
29. The Gandharvas (celestial singers) were born of Ariṣṭā; beasts with uncloven feet (e.g. horses, donkeys etc.), of Kāṣṭhā; Danu had sixty-one sons. Listen to the names of the prominent ones in them:

30-31. (They are :) Dvimūrdhan, Śambara, Ariṣṭa, Hayagrīva, Vibhāvasu, Ayomukha, Śaṅkusīras, Svarbhānu, Kapila, Aruṇa, Puloman, Vṛṣaparvan, Ekacakra, Anutāpāna, Dhūmrakesa, Virūpākṣa, Vipracitti and Durjaya.

32. As is reported, Namuci married Suprabhā, the daughter of Svarbhānu. The mighty Yayāti, the son of Nahuṣa, was wedded to Šarmiṣṭhā, the daughter of Vṛṣaparvan.

33. Danu’s son Vaiśvānara had four daughters who were very beautiful to look at. They are: Upadānavī, Hayāśirā, Pulomā and Kālakā.

34. Out of them, Upadānavī was married to Hiranyākṣa and Hayāśirā to Kratu. Oh King, Kaśyapa married Pulomā and Kālakā, the two daughters of Vaiśvānara.

35. The great sage Kaśyapa married them as he was directed to do so by god Brahmā. The sons of Pulomā were the Dānavaś known as Kālakeyas who were famous for their warlike nature.

36. Out of them, sixty-thousand sons known as Nivātaka-vacas who used to disturb sacrifices, were killed by your father’s father single-handedly, while he paid a visit to Svarga and wanted to please Indra.

37. Vipracitti begot on his wife Simhikā one hundred and one sons. The eldest of them was Rāhu who got a position in the planetary system, along with the remaining hundred sons who were named Ketu.

38. Now, listen from me in due sequence, the details of the race of Aditi wherein the Almighty God Nārāyaṇa incarnated by his own antā (digit).

39. The sons of Aditi were: Vivasvān, Aryaman, Pūṣan, Tvaṣṭr, Savitṛ, Bhaga, Dhātri, Vidhātri, Varuṇa, Mitra, Indra and Trivikrama (Vāmana). (These are the presiding deities of the orb of the Sun each month).

40. The highly fortunate Śaṃjñā, the wife of Vivasvat, gave birth to Śrāddhadeva, the Manu and a twin called the
VI.7.6. 813

Yama god and (his sister) Yami. That very Saṁjñā became a female horse and gave birth to the twin gods Aśvinikumāras, on this earth.

41. Chāyā (another wife of Vivasvat) gave birth to Śanaiścara, the presiding deity of the planet Saturn, and Sāvarṇi Manu. She gave birth to a daughter also called Tapatī who chose in marriage Saṁvaraṇa as her husband.

42. Mātṛkā was the wife of Aryaman. Their sons were called Carṣaṇī (for they possessed wisdom of what should and what should not be done). From them were evolved the human kind by god Brahmā.

43. Puṣan was childless. He got his teeth broken formerly as he exhibited his teeth in laughing at Śiva when he was enraged at Dakṣa, and Puṣan had to subsist on flour.

44. The girl Racaṇā, the younger sister of the Daityas, became the spouse of Tvaṣṭṛ. From them were born sons namely Saṁśīvaṇa and the mighty Viśvarūpa.

45. The host of gods selected him (for preceptorship) even though he was the nephew (sister's son) of their enemies, as they were forsaken by their preceptor Bṛhaspati who was insulted by them.

CHAPTER SEVEN

(Bṛhaspati's Insult and his abandonment of Preceptorship)

The King said:

1. Please tell me, Oh venerable sir, why the gods were forsaken by their own preceptor and what was the fault of the disciples (gods) against their teacher.

Śri Śuka said:

2-6. Indra transgressed the path followed by the good, due to his arrogance of overlordship of the three worlds. (Once) surrounded by Maruts, Vasu, Rudras, Ādityas, Ṡrīḥus, Viṣvedevas, Śāḍhyas and the Aśvinikumāras, and attended upon and praised and sweetly extolled by Siddhas, Cāraṇas, Gandharvas, by sages, the knowers of Brahman, Vidyādharas, heavenly damsels, Kinnaras, birds and Nāgas (serpents), he (Indra) was seated on the throne equipped with a white umbrella, beautiful like the orb of the full Moon, and with chowries, fans and other insignia of supreme royalty. He looked extremely splendid with (his wife) Śacī occupying half the throne.

7-9. When he did not welcome the great preceptor of gods and of himself, by offering him due formalities of respect such as standing up, offering a seat, on his arrival; he (Indra) did not rise at all from his seat, even though he saw the great sage Brāhaspati who was adorable both to gods and demons, coming to his assembly; the wise and powerful descended of Āṅgiras (Brāhaspati) who understood that the violation of good manners is due to the arrogance of affluence and power, came out of the assembly and quietly returned to his house.

10. At that very moment, Indra became aware of the disrespect shown by him to his preceptor, and he, of his own accord, censured himself publicly in the assembly.

11. "Oh what a pity! What an unrighteous and wicked deed has been committed by me, of poor intellect: being intoxicated with the arrogance of wealth and power, my preceptor has been disrespectfully treated in this assembly.

12. Who will covet for the prosperity and wealth of the Lord of the celestial regions, if he be wise? for I who am the Lord of gods of sāttvic nature was dragged into the demonic state of egotism by that prosperity.

13. Those who lay down that the occupants of the highest position should not rise to receive anyone, do not know the highest code of conduct.

14. Those who believe in the words of those who show the wrong course and themselves sink in the dark infernal regions, verily, go down (to the abysmal depth of hell) by boarding a raft of granite rock, as it were.

15. Now with all my crookedness shed off and touching with my head the feet of that Brāhmaṇa, the preceptor of gods, and possessor of unfathomable intelligence, I shall propitiate him."
16. While Indra was musing thus, the venerable Brāhaspati went out of his mansion and disappeared with his superb spiritual power.

17. The glorious Lord of the celestial region, looked on all sides for the whereabouts of his preceptor, but could not trace him. Anxiously considering (what will happen to them all, in the absence of the protection of the preceptor) Indra, though he commanded the loyalty of all gods, did not get the peace of mind.

18. As soon as all the demons got the report of it (the desertion of gods’ side by Brāhaspati), they followed the advice of Śukra. Haughty as they were, they carried a war against gods with their arms raised.

19. Gods whose heads, thighs and arms were deeply wounded by the sharp arrows discharged by the demons, went along with Indra, with their heads lowered in humility, to god Brahmā for protection.

20. The venerable birthless self-born god Brahmā saw them afflicted and harassed that way. Consoling them, the god spoke out to them in his supreme grace.

God Brahmā said:

21. What a pity it is, Oh great gods! Out of arrogance of power and wealth you have certainly committed a very unjust and inauspicious deed in not respectfully welcoming a self-controlled Brāhmaṇa who was imbued with the spirit of Brahman.

22. It is the result of your unrighteousness that you gods, rich and powerful as you are, are defeated at the hands of your enemies who were extremely weak.

23. Oh Indra! Look at your enemies who became extremely powerless due to disrespect shown by them to their preceptor, have again grown in strength due to their devoted propitiation of their preceptor Śukra. They, who regard Śukra as their deity, may capture even my abode (Brahma-loka).

24. The demons who are well instructed in their objectives by Śukra and whose secret designs are not divulged, have the slightest regard for the celestial region. (They can easily conquer it). Inauspicious results do not befall kings who are protected by Brāhmaṇas, Lord Viṣṇu and cows.

25. Therefore, take resort to Viśvarūpa immediately. That Brāhmaṇa, the son of Tvaṣṭṛ, possesses self-control and (a wealth of) penance. If respectfully treated by you, he will accomplish your objects, if you put up with (some of) his acts (of partiality to demons).

Sri Suka said:

26. Oh King! Gods who were thus advised by god Brahmā, were relieved of their feverish anxiety. They approached the sage Viśvarūpa, the son of Tvaṣṭṛ, embraced him and addressed him thus.

Gods said:

27. We have approached your hermitage as unexpected guests. May you be blessed, Oh child. Please accomplish the wish of your elders (uncles) as demanded by the occasion.

28. It is the highest duty of virtuous sons to serve their parents, even though the sons themselves have got children. It is much more so in the case of celibates, Oh Brahman.

29. The preceptor who invests the sacred thread and initiates in the Vedas, is the embodiment of the Vedas. Father is god Brahmā (the creator) incarnate. A brother is as if an image of Indra, the chief of gods. The mother is a veritable earth personified.

30. A sister is the embodiment of tenderness. An unexpected visitor is the soul of dharma (the god of righteousness). And the guest staying with us is the god of Fire incarnate and all beings are the representations of the Supreme Soul of Lord Viṣṇu. (Therefore, one should look upon all beings like himself).

31. Oh child, you should carry out our request and remove by your penance the afflictions of us, your elders, who are suffering from defeat at the hands of our enemies.

32. We select you, who are possessed of Brahmanic power, and a Brāhmaṇa deserving respect, as our preceptor, so that we shall easily and thoroughly vanquish our enemies by the virtue of your spiritual power.
33. They (the wise) do not censure the act of bowing at the feet of younger persons for the accomplishment of their objects. Mere age is not the ground of superiority when one is wanting in Vedic knowledge.

_The Sage (Śuka) said:_

34. The great sage Viśvarūpa who was so earnestly entertained by the gods for accepting priesthood, became pleased and spoke to them in soft words.

_Viśvarūpa said:_

35. Priesthood has been condemned by the righteous ones as leading to the loss of spiritual power. But, Oh masters, how a person like me who deserves to be commanded by Lords of worlds like you, can refuse your request, for compliance (of your orders) is in my real interest.

36. To those who decide not to possess anything, grain that is gleaned after the removal of corn from the fields and the grains of corn found after the market-day is over, form the wealth. I have performed my righteous duties with that wealth. Oh suzerine Lords, how should I accept the reproachful priesthood which pleases only those who are wretched in intellect.

37. I, however, do not refuse what has been requested by elders like you. Whatever insignificant is desired by you, I shall accomplish it, at the cost of my life and means.

_Sri Śuka said:_

38. The great ascetic Viśvarūpa who was thus solicited for accepting priesthood promised them (the gods) thus, and carried out his duties of priesthood, with perfect concentration.

39. The (spiritually) powerful sage snatched the fortune of the enemies of gods even though it was protected by the incantations and spells of Śukra, and by the prayer (lore) of Viṣṇu, i.e. by _Nārāyaṇa Kavaca_, gave it to Indra.

40. The noble-minded Viśvarūpa initiated Mahendra in that lore, and Indra, the thousand-eyed god, became powerful and protected by that lore, vanquished the armies of demons.
41.* Indra, the leader of all gods, entered the spiritual coat of armour called Nārāyaṇa Kavaca and always scored victories over the demons, like a lion over ordinary beasts, Oh child.

CHAPTER EIGHT
(The Nārāyaṇa-Kavaca explained)

The King enquired:

1-2: Oh venerable Sir, please teach me the protective prayer of Nārāyaṇa which serves as an armour, and protected by which, Indra, the god with thousand eyes, sportfully but thoroughly vanquished the soldiers of the enemies with their horses and chariots, and enjoyed the sovereignty of the three worlds, and protected by which he conquered his enemies who attacked him with raised arms, in the battle.

Śrī Śuka replied:

3: The priest Viśvarūpa, the son of Tvaśṭṛ, when solicited, explained to the great Indra, the protective prayer called Nārāyaṇa Kavaca. Listen to it with concentrated mind.

4-6. "When a danger is impending, a person should wash his hands and feet, and sip water as ācamana. He should put on a ring of the Kuśa grass round his finger, and sit with his face turned to the North. Thus purified and observing silence, he should perform Nyāsa, consecrating the various parts of the body and hands with the mantras or sacred formulae (one of eight syllables viz. Oṁ namo Nārāyaṇaṁ and the other of twelve syllables, viz. Oṁ namo bhagavate Vāsudevaṁ). He should put on the armour (protective covering) sacred to lord Nārāyaṇa, by contemplating the Lord (with the eight-syllabled mantra—Oṁ namo Nārāyaṇaṁ) located in the feet, in the knee-joints, the thighs, the stomach, the heart and the chest, the mouth, the crown of the head (thus spiritualizing the whole body with the protective mantra of Nārāyaṇa) or perform the same in the reverse order (technically known as Samhāra Nyāsa).

7. He should then perform the karanyāsa—the spiritualization of the hands—with the secret incantation or mantra consisting of twelve syllables (Om namo bhagavate Vāsudevāya). He should deposit spiritual power beginning with the sacred syllable Om and ending with ya in his fingers and joints of the thumbs.

(The method of spiritual insulation against dangers with the mantra Om Viṣṇave namaḥ is explained).

8. He should deposit OM (the first syllable of the mantra Om Viṣṇave namaḥ) in the heart, vi on the crown of the head, s in the middle of the eyebrows, and na in the tuft of the hair on the head.

9-10. The syllable ne should be used (to spiritualize) the two eyes and na be deposited in all joints (of the body). He should contemplate the syllable ma as the missile. He should direct in all (the ten) directions the syllable maḥ (ma with a visarga), and ending with the sound phaṭ (for casting the spiritual protection on all sides, to shut out evil spirits—the words to be used while snapping the middle finger and the thumb are maḥ astrāya phaṭ). Thus a wise man becomes the mantra Om Viṣṇave namaḥ incarnate.

11. He should then meditate on the Supreme Lord endowed with six potencies (viz. sovereignty of the universe, righteousness, glory, affluence, supreme knowledge and detachment from the world) and should contemplate himself as identical with him. He should then repeat the following mantra viz., Nārāyaṇa kavaco as the embodiment of learning, energy and penance.

12. May Hari, designated by the sacred syllable OM, afford me protection on all sides and in every respect—Hari who has placed his lotus-like feet on the back of the king of birds, viz., Gāruḍa; who possesses eight spiritual powers (siddhis-ānimā etc.) and who is endowed with eight arms in which he wields eight weapons, viz. conch, discus, a shield, sword, mace, arrows, bow and a noose.

13. May Viṣṇu in the form of the Fish (Incarnation) protect me from aquatic animals and the noose of Varuṇa in waters. May Vāmana who has assumed the form of a young boy by his magic power protect me on land. May Trivikrama who has assumed the cosmic form protect me in the skies.

14. May the mighty Lord Nṛśirnha (the Man-Lion form of Viṣṇu), the vanquisher of the king of demon-forces (Hiraṇyakaśipu), at the release of whose tremendous peals of roaring laughter, the cardinal points reverberated violently, and the embryos (from the wombs of Asura women) were discharged, protect me, in dangerous situations like jungles, battle-fronts and others.

15. May the boar-incarnation of Lord Hari, who uplifted the sphere of the earth with his tusk, and who is the embodiment of Sacrifice (yajña) protect me on the road (while travelling). May Parāśurāma shield me (from dangers) on mountain-peaks and may Rāma, the elder brother of Bharata, along with Lakṣmaṇa, protect me in long journeys (or foreign lands).

16. May Lord Nārāyaṇa shield me from black magic and commissions of mistakes of all kinds. May the sage Nara protect (me) from pride; Datta, the Lord of yoga, guard me against pitfalls in the practice of yoga. May Kapila, the controller of (sattva, rajas and tamas) gunas protect me from the bondage of karma.

17. May Sanatkumāra save me from the god of Love; May the horseheaded God (Viṣṇu), from (neglecting in payment of obeisance to (images of) gods situated on the way. May the prominent divine sage Nārada, from the (thirty-two)\textsuperscript{285}

\textsuperscript{285} VD. quotes from Pañcarātra, the list of 32 transgressions in the worship of god Viṣṇu. They may be translated as follows:—

(1) To enter a temple in a vehicle or without removing even wooden sandals; (2) to neglect serving in celebrations (the utsavas) of gods; (3) to fail to bow to an image of god after seeing it; (4) to bow to god in an impure condition (as in the mourning period); (5) to salute with one hand (instead of folding both the hands); (6) merely to circumambulate the image of the deity without stopping to bow to it, after completing each circle; (7) to sit with legs stretched before god’s image; (8) to squat raising one knee and encircling them with hands before the deity; (9) to take meals in front of the deity; (10) to sleep before deity; (11) to tell a lie in the deity’s presence; (12) to talk loudly; (13) to speak between each other; (14) to cry loudly and (15) to quarrel before the god’s transgressions in worshipping the Supreme person. May Hari in the Tortoise-form save me from all kinds of hells.

18. May Lord Dhanvantari (the physician incarnation) protect me from unwholesome food; may Lord Rṣabha, the subduer of his mind, from the pairs of opposites (pleasure-pain, heat-cold) and from fear; may Yajña, from the censure of the world; Balabhadra, from the death and violence at the hands of others (or from Yama); Lord Šeṣa, the king of serpents, from the revengeful race of serpents (called Krodhavaśa).

19. May venerable Vyāsa (Dvaipāyana) guard me against ignorance, Lord Buddha save me from heretical doctrines and negligence of duties; may Kalki who has specially taken this noble incarnation for the protection of Dharma (righteousness), protect me from the Kali age, the dirtiest of all aeons.

20. May Lord Keśava protect me with his mace in the morning (the 1st sixth part of the day); may Kṛṣṇa who has taken a flute in his hands, protect me in the Saṅgava period (next sixth part of the day); may Nārāyaṇa with his javelin held up (protect me) in the forenoon; may Viṣṇu with the discus Sudarśana in his hand, shield me at mid-day.

21. May god Madhusūdana, the wielder of the terrible bow, protect me in the afternoon; may god Mādhava of three forms (Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra), in the evening. May Hṛṣikeśa protect me in the first sixth part of the night; and Padmanābha alone during the second part and even at midnight.
22. May the Supreme Ruler bearing the Śrī-Vatsa mark protect me in the latter part of the night, and god Janārdana, carrying the sword, at about dawn (the fifth part of the night); may god Dāmodara at dawn; and Viṣṇu the Lord of the universe who manifested himself as Time (or the destroyer of all) protect me during twilights.

23. The discus Sudarśana, the rim of which is fierce like fire raging at the time of the destruction of the universe, whirls about when discharged by the Lord. Oh Sudarśana do completely and thoroughly burn down the inimical forces to ashes just as fire, helped by the friendly (favourable) wind, immediately consumes (heaps of) dry grass.

24. Oh mace (Kaumodakī)! You are dear to the invincible Lord. The sparks discharged by you are as formidable as the blow of Indra’s Vajra (or thunderbolt), thoroughly crush down to powder all the evil spirits like Kūśmāṇḍa, Vināyaka, Yakṣas and Rākṣasas, goblins and grahas (spirits harassing children). Reduce to powder all my enemies.

25. Oh excellent Conch Pāṇcajanya: Blown by Lord Kṛṣṇa you, by your terrific blast, shock the hearts of enemies with convulsions of fear. May you drive away demonic spirits like Yātudhānas, Pramathas, ghosts, Mātrkā (female spirits posing as mothers) Piśācas, Brahma-rākṣasas, and other evil-eyed spirits.

26. Oh sharp-edged excellent sword Nandaka! When directed by the Lord cut down to pieces all the army of my enemies. Oh shield brilliant like hundred Moons (decked with hundred moon-like buttons), cover up the eyes of the enemies, destroy the sight of the evil-eyed enemies.

27-28. May all the grahas (planets) and comets, Ketu, human beings, reptiles, carnivorous animals, Bhūtas (goblins), and sins which caused us fear, who stood in the way of our welfare, go immediately to utter destruction through the missile in the form of the utterance of the Divine name and form.

29. May the mighty Lord Garuḍa who is the embodiment of the Veda and who is extolled in Bhad, Rathantara and other Śāma hymns and Viṣvaksena protect us from all dangers with (utterance of) their names.

30. May all the names, forms, vehicles, arms of Lord
Hari protect us from all dangers. May his excellent attendants guard our intellect, Indriyas (cognitive and conative powers), mind and vital airs.

31. The glorious Lord himself factually constitutes everything gross and subtle, with or without forms. By the force of this truth may all our troubles come to an end.

32. To those who have realised the identity of the Lord with themselves, the Lord himself stands undifferentiated. But he with his own Māyā wields powers known as ornaments, weapons and insignia.

33. On the strength of the same factual reality, may the omniscient glorious Lord Hari protect us everywhere at all times, with all his manifestations, as he is omnipresent.

34. May the glorious Lord Narasimha who dispels the fear of the world by his roar and who eclipses the brightness of all luminaries by his all-absorbing brilliance and splendour, protect us in all directions, in the corners of directions, in the upward and downward directions, on all sides, from within and from without.

35. Oh Indra, this spiritual armour imbued with the power and spirit of Nārāyaṇa has been taught to you. Equipped with this spiritual armour, you will easily conquer the leaders of the Asura hosts.

36. Whomsoever does the wearer of this (Nārāyaṇa Kavaca) see with his eyes or touch with his feet, he is instantaneously freed from fear.

37. From no quarter does fear affect him who possesses this mantra. Neither from kings, robbers, evil planets (and such other wicked powers) nor from ferocious animals like tigers has he anything to fear.

38. In ancient times, there was a Brāhmaṇa of Kuśika gotra who had this sacred mantra mastered by him. He cast off his body by yogic process in a desert.

39. Once upon a time Citraratha, the Lord of Gandharvas, surrounded by ladies crossed in his aerial car the place of the death of the Brāhmaṇa.

40. Immediately he fell down along with his heavenly car with his head downwards. On the advice of sage Vāla-khilya, he collected together the bones of the Brāhmaṇa and immersed them in the Sarasvatī where it bends to the East. He took his bath and returned home amazed (at this instance).

Śrī Śuka said:

41. He who listens to this Kavaca at the opportune time (of fear, danger etc.) and devoutly fixes his mind on this Mantra becomes free from fear in every respect, and is reverentially respected by living beings.

42. Indra, the performer of hundred sacrifices, learnt this sacred lore (Nārāyaṇa Kavaca) from Viśvarūpa. He conquered the demons in the battle and enjoyed the sovereignty of the three worlds.

CHAPTER NINE

(Viśvarūpa killed. Gods defeated by Vṛtra, advised to approach Dāhkīśi)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Oh Parīkṣit (the scion of the Bharata race), we have heard the report that Viśvarūpa had three heads, one used to drink Soma, the other wine, and the third used to eat food.

2. They say that in sacrifices, he directly offered the share of gods to them with due respect declaring loudly their names (e.g. Indrāya idam—this is the share of Indra), for gods were his forefathers.

3. Himself being the sacrificer, he managed secretly to offer the share in the sacrifices to the Asuras also, for due to his affection to his mother, he oblated some share to them.

4. Indra, the king of gods, noticed his contempt and faithlessness to gods and his sham righteousness. Being afraid (lest Asuras should be powerful) he immediately cut down his (Viśvarūpa’s) heads in wrath.

5. The head that used to drink Soma became the bird Kapiṇjala; the head drinking wine, a sparrow (Kalaviṅka); the head eating food became the Tittiri bird.
6. Even though Indra was powerful enough, he accepted the sin of assassinating a Brāhmaṇa with both his hands folded. But at the end of the year for self-purification of the elements constituting himself, he distributed that sin proportionately in four parts to the earth, water, trees and young women.

7. They say that the earth accepted the fourth part of the sin on condition that pits excavated in it are (automatically) filled up (in due course). Barren soil is the form of the Brahmahatyā which became manifested in the earth.

8. The trees accepted one-fourth of the sin on condition of the boon that a chopped part of the trees will grow with greater force. Brahmahatyā is seen exhibited in trees in the form of gum.

9. Women took over one-fourth of the sin on condition of getting the boon that they would ever cherish the passion of love (even during pregnancy). This sin (of killing a Brāhmaṇa) appears in the form of menstrual discharge from month to month in them.

10. The waters accepted the (remaining) one-fourth of the sin on condition of increasing the quantity of the substance with which it is mixed. The sin appears in the form of bubbles and foam on the water. He who throws away the bubbles etc. removes that sin from water.

11. Tvasṭr whose son was slain (by Indra) then performed a sacrifice for the birth of an enemy, the killer of Indra: "Oh enemy of Indra grow in strength and kill the enemy (Indra) without delay" (prayed Tvasṭr).

12. Then arose from Dakṣiṇāgni or Anvahārya-pacana, a demon terrific in appearance like the god of death, at the end of the destruction of the worlds, at the end of Yugas.

13. Everyday he increased in size, in all directions, to the extent of the distance covered by the shot of an arrow. He looked like the burnt top of a mountain and was bright like the mass of evening clouds.

14. His hair of the head and beard was red like heated copper and his eyes were fierce like the mid-day Sun.

15. He, as it were, held the vault of the heaven pierced with his brilliant trident. He was dancing and roaring and was shaking the earth by his gait.

16. By his deep valley-like mouth he was as if drinking the surface of the sky, and was licking the stars with his tongue, and was as it were swallowing the three worlds.

17. He was now and then yawning his mouth which displayed his terrible tusks—seeing him people were stricken with panic and ran away to all the ten directions.

18. That most ferocious wicked demon was called Vṛtra as he, the son of Tvaṣṭṛ, covered the whole world with the darkness, by the shadow of his person.

19. The prominent leaders of gods, along with their armies, attacked him, and discharged at him streams of their respective divine missiles and arms. But he swallowed them up completely.

20. The gods were thereby amazed. All of them got despondent. With their splendour eclipsed, they approached Nārāyaṇa, with their minds composed, as he is the antaryāmin, the inner controller.

21. May we get protection from him (the Supreme Lord) of whom even the god of Death (or the god presiding over Time) is afraid—the god of death to whom the five elements (constituting the universe) viz., the wind, the sky, the fire, the water and the earth, and three worlds (along with their denizens) and (the rulers of the worlds like) god Brahmā and others and we (ordinary) gods pay homage out of great fear.

22. Like an ignorantous person desiring to cross the sea with the help of a dog’s tail, is he who approaches for protection to someone else than him (the Supreme Lord) who is absolutely free from egotism (or curiosity), perfectly serene and passionless, all whose wishes are fulfilled through the reali-ization of his own blissful self and is unconditioned by limitations.

23. The same god, in his fish incarnation, to whose broad big horn Manu fastened his boat in the form of the earth and crossed the danger of deluge, will certainly protect us, his dependants, from the danger caused by Vṛtra, the son of Tvaṣṭṛ—a danger which is difficult to be got over.
24. Formerly (at the beginning of the creation of the universe) god Brahmā, the self-born deity, was all alone. He was all but fallen from his lotus (-abode, growing out of the navel of Viṣṇu) in the terrible waters of the deluge, by the roars of the heavy billows whipped up by stormy winds. But he got over from that danger by (the grace of) Viṣṇu. May the same God be our protector.

25. That Supreme Sovereign, though all alone, has created us by his Māyā. It is through his grace and by imitating him that we carry on the work of creation. We each being proud as independent rulers, cannot see his form, though he is present before us.

26. When he finds that we are excessively harassed by our enemies, he, though eternally existent, by his Māyā takes incarnation by assuming forms of gods (e. g. Vāmana), sages (e. g. Parāsūrāma), sub-human beings (e. g. Varāha, Nṛsiṁha), and human beings (Rāma, Kṛṣṇa) in every yuga-period and protects us, regarding us as his own.

27. To that God alone we shall all resort for asylum as he is worthy of it. He is our own Deity (object of worship). He manifests himself as the universe and yet is different from it. As the ultimate cause of it, he is himself both Pradhāna and Puruṣa. The Supreme Soul will positively confer happiness and prosperity on us who are his devotees.

Śrī Śuka said:

28. While they were praying thus, Oh great King, the Lord revealed himself in their hearts, as wielding a conch, disc and a mace.

29-30. On seeing the Lord whose eyes were like full-blown autumnal lotus, and waited upon on all sides by sixteen attendants (like Sunanda and others) who were just like himself (wielding conchs, discs etc.) with the exception of Śṛvatsa mark and the Kaustubha gem, all of them were overwhelmed with joy, and lay prostrate before him on the ground like a stick, and rising slowly, began to praise him.
The gods said:

31.* Salutations to you whose power (to confer Svarga and other blessings) is (revealed in) the sacrificial performance. Hail to you who are our Age (The Time-Spirit) defining the time limit of the fruits of sacrifices etc. to be enjoyed. Bows to you who hurl your disc (at our enemies to destroy them). We salute you who are addressed with a number of blessed epithets.

32. Oh Lord! One who is born posterior to the Creation (of the universe) is incapable of knowing the highest nature which transcends the guṇas. We can merely bow to you who are the controller of the three courses of guṇas (or the modes of existence as gods, human and sub-human beings).

33. Bow to you, Oh Lord, who are designated by the syllable OM! Oh Nārāyaṇa (occupant of Cosmic Waters), Vāsudeva (the Abode of the worlds), the most ancient person, the supreme person, possessor of supreme glory and auspiciousness, the supremely blessed and merciful, the absolute (one without a second), the support of the world, the only protector of the universe, the ruler of all, consort of Lakṣmī (the goddess of fortune and bliss)!

When the ascetics of the highest paramahāṁsa order deeply meditate upon you by means of the highest concentration of the mind through eight-fold yogic processes the real dharma of the Paramahāṁsas, viz., the adoration of the Lord, becomes manifest and realized in their pure hearts. Thereby the door of darkness of their hearts is broken open and you stand revealed as the inherent bliss of the Soul, in the regions of their hearts.

* VR.: Hail to you who have empowered sacrifices and made them the cause of creation, and who bless (us) with longevity for performance of sacrifices and other forms of worship. You wield the disc Sudarśana for the protection of your devotees and the remembrance of whose glorious name is efficacious enough to ward off danger immediately.

VJ.: We salute you who are the creator of sacrifices. You keep jīvas bound in samsāra. You continue the cycle of creation and destruction again and again. You incarnated as Sudarśana (for the protection of the world). You are addressed with various sanctifying names. (We bow to you).
34. You create, protect and destroy this universe constituted of (sattva, rajas and tamas) gunas though you yourself are without any support, body or form, without any expectation of cooperation and help from us (the divinities presiding over various organs etc.) and without undergoing any transformation (within yourself). The cause of this sport of yours is simply beyond (our) comprehension.

35. Moreover, we do not properly understand whether your worship, like Devadatta (an ordinary person who builds a house and helplessly experiences joys and sorrows while staying therein) enters (as an antaryāmin) the various bodies (which are the products of gunas) and depending upon other (karmic) forces helplessly reap the fruit of good or bad actions or whether you are an unconcerned witness (of such happenings) remaining delighted in yourself and naturally unruffled with your spiritual essence undiminished.

36. As a matter of fact, there is no contradiction in both the positions which are compatible in Your Lordship who are endowed with infinite variation of excellences, the absolute ruler of unfathomable greatness. You are far beyond the range of controversies of modern disputants who are strongly prejudiced as their minds are bewildered by the study of heretic scriptures teeming with doubts, (false) reasoning, wrong conclusions, (untrustworthy) authorities and bad logic. Your real essential Self is absolute, transcending all the products of Māyā. What is there that cannot be predicated of you, who, remaining concealed under Māyā, make the Māyā create any impossibility and your real self is free from both the above (contradictory) propositions. (There is no contradiction as there is no duality in you).

37. Just as a piece of rope appears to be a serpent (garland etc.) to those whose minds are prepossessed with the false notion of a serpent etc., (but appears factually a piece of rope to the right thinking men), you show yourself according to the views of the right-thinking persons or of prejudiced wrong-thinkers.

38. Again, the Lord is certainly the real essence of every existing thing and abides in all things. He is the ruler of all. He is the cause of all the causes (Prakṛti or Brahma) of the whole of the universe. The illuminating power of the objects (intellect, senses) indicates the jīva but not him as he abides in all, as the Inner Controller (Sarvāntaryāmin). He is the only true existence conclusively left over (proved) by the process of elimination of double negation (neti neti).

39. Oh slayer of (the demon) Madhu! By tasting but once a small drop of the nectar-like sweet ocean of your glories, incessant stream of rapturous joy begins to flow uninterruptedly in the heart of great devotees. It makes them forget the apparent trifling bits of pleasures of senses actually seen (enjoyed on the earth) or heard (of as available in the heaven)—the devotees whose hearts find incessant and ecstatic delight in the Lord who is beloved friend of all beings and is the Soul (the Inner Controller—antaryāmin) of the entire universe. Under these circumstances, how is it that the saintly persons (devoid of love, hate etc.) who are skillful in achieving their high purpose (viz. Liberation) and who look upon you as their dear friend and a well-wisher, give up the service of your lotus-like feet whereby there is no return to the Saṁsāra, the transmigration of the Soul.

40. Oh Lord whose manifestation and mansion are the three worlds (or Oh Soul and the abode of the three worlds)! Oh God who dominate the three worlds (or who covered the universe in three steps)! Oh Guide of the three worlds whose majestic charm captivates (the minds of) the worlds! Even the demons like the sons of Diti and Danu and others are your glorious forms. Considering (however) that this is not the appropriate time for (giving free rein to) their (destructive) activities, you as a wielder of the rod (of punishment), dispense punishment (to them) proportionate to (the gravity of) their offence by assuming, through your Māyā Power, forms of gods (e.g. Vāmana), men (e.g. Rāma, Kṛṣṇa), beasts (such as Boar or Varāha), half-man half-beast (e.g. Narasimha, Hayagrīva), aquatic animal (e.g. the Fish or the Tortoise). In the same way, Oh glorious Lord, if you deem it fit, kill this son of Tvaṣṭr (viz. Vṛtra).

41. Oh Father! (Nay) Oh grand-father! Since we are yours and have completely submitted to you, and since our heart has been firmly attached (lit. fettered) with the bond of love (evolved) through (our) meditation on the pair of your lotus-like feet, and as you have accepted us as your own by the revelation of your person, be pleased to cure the fever (torments) of our hearts, by your bright, charming, soothing, smiling looks which are rendered still more gracious by your compassion and with the nectarine drops in the form of sweet words proceeding from your lips, Oh Faultless one!

42. Oh glorious Lord! To what extent can we respectfully communicate to you our specific entreaty any more than the sparks of fire (which emit little light) can bring illumination to the god of Fire? (as a matter of fact, it is superfluous). For you indulge in your pastime with the divine Māyā which is the instrumental cause of the creation, maintenance and the destruction of the whole world, and you, as Brahman as well as Antaryāmin (the Inner Controller of bodies) reside within the hearts of all the multitudes of beings, and from without as Pradhāna (the Primordial matter) you are their material cause, and thus experience the peculiarities of the place, time, body and conditions (of all beings). With your body (untouched and untainted) like the sky, you are a detached witness of the thoughts of all. You are the transcendental Brahman, the Supreme Soul.

43. (You are omniscient). Hence please accomplish for us of your own accord (without waiting for being requested for it by us) that object (of ours) desiring which we have resorted to you and have sought refuge under the shade of your lotus-like feet which removes the fatigue of the transmigration of the Soul resulting from various sins. And you are the glorious Lord and the Supreme Teacher.

44. Therefore, Oh Lord, kill Vṛtra who has already swallowed up our powers as well as missiles, Oh Kṛṣṇa, and is now devouring the three worlds.

45. Salutations to you Hari, the reliever of sufferings—to Hari who is absolutely pure and abides in the cavity of heart remaining witness to the intellect etc. You are the eternal Bliss incarnate. Your glory is resplendent. You are beginningless and are cherished as a treasure by the virtuous. To wanderers in Samsāra seeking refuge with you, you are the final destination to be reached at the end of Samsāra, the excellent fruit to be coveted.

46. Oh King! Being thus reverentially and earnestly praised by gods, Lord Hari listened to the prayer offered to him and being highly pleased, he addressed them (as follows):

_The Lord said:_

47. I am highly pleased with you, Oh great gods, for the knowledge enshrined in your eulogy which will awaken the memory of transcendental nature of their real Self among the beings and engender in them devotion unto me.

48. What is difficult to be attained when I am pleased, Oh great gods? But he who knows the truth and cherishes devotion to me, does not covet for anything else than Myself.

49. The miserly fool who looks upon the products of the guṇas as real, does not know what is really good for himself and he who confers those objects (products of guṇas) on them at their request is of the same description (is equally ignorant).

50. A wise man, knowing for himself what the highest good is, does not prescribe the (path of) _Karma_ (ritualistic actions) to the ignorant, just as an excellent physician does not allow the ailing patient unwholesome food even if he (the patient) may desire it.

51. May good betide you, Oh Indra! Without delay you all go to Dadhyaṇ (Dadhīca or Dadhīci), the foremost of sages and beg of him his body which has been reinforced by _Brahma-Vidyā_, observance of vows and austerities.

52. Dadhyaṇ has completely realized his identity with Pure Brahman (untainted by Māyā or has mastered the _Pra-vargya_). He initiated the gods Āśvinikumāras in that knowledge which came to be called _Aśva-siras_—horse headed (as at the time of imparting the knowledge, the sage Dadhyaṇ had a horse’s head instead of a human one).²⁸⁶ That Brahma-lore conferred immortality (_mokṣa_ while alive) on those gods.

²⁸⁶ Purānic quotations in the commentaries of ŠR., VR. etc. give the story as follows:

When Āśvinikumāras sought initiation in _Brahma-vidyā_ from Dadhyaṇ, the sage was engaged in some religious rites. He told them to see him on
53. Dadhyān, the son of Atharvan, taught the impregnable protective armour (called the Nārāyaṇa kavaca) full of my essence and imparted it to Tvaṣṭṛ. Tvaṣṭṛ gave it to his son Viśvarūpa who in turn taught it to you.

54. The sage is well-versed in Dharma (righteousness). When begged by Āśvinikumāras (your physicians) he will offer his body (i.e. the limbs of the body) to you. Then with the (bones of the requisite) limbs, the most powerful weapon will be forged by Viśvakarman (your artisan). With that weapon imbued with my power, you will cut the head of Vṛtra.

55. When he (Vṛtra) is killed, you will regain your former glory, missiles, weapons and wealth. May you be happy! Nobody can trouble or destroy those who are devoted to me.

CHAPTER TEN*

(With Vajra forged, Indra fights)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. The glorious Hari, the protector of the universe, thus instructed Indra and disappeared at that very spot, while the gods, with unwinking eyes, were simply gazing.

2. Oh Bhārata (Parīkṣit)! Solicited by gods thus (as per instructions of the Lord), the great-hearted sage of some other occasion as he was then busy. In the meanwhile, Indra came to the sage and advised him not to impart Brahma-vidyā to Āśvins as they were merely physicians and hence unqualified. He further threatened to behead him, in case he initiated them in that lore. When Āśvinikumāras approached the sage and learnt of Indra’s threat, they proposed a surgical operation in which the sage’s head would be replaced by a horse’s head and requested him to teach through the horse’s mouth. In case Indra beheaded the horse’s head, they would substitute his original human head. The sage preferred to keep his word and not his head. He allowed the Āśvins to perform the operation and imparted to them the Brahmavidyā with a horse’s head on his shoulders.

* JG—No commentary on this chapter.
Atharvan Clan was delighted and addressed them jokingly (with a smile), as follows:

3. "Oh gods! (Presiding deities of the senses as you are) can you not imagine the excruciating and unbearable pain caused to embodied beings at the time of death—a pain that deprives them of consciousness.

4. In this world, (one's own) body is the dearest thing coveted by living beings who have a desire to live. Who can dare to donate it even to Viśṇu, should he beg for it?"

Gods said:

5. Oh Brahman! Is there anything which is difficult to part with in the case of great persons like your honour, who are compassionate to all beings, and whose noble deeds are worthy of being praised by people with hallowing reputation.

6. There is no doubt that persons who are solely devoted to achieve their own objects, do not (care to) understand the danger faced by others (the donors). If they could realize it, they would not beg for it. (In the same way, the donor also does not appreciate the difficulty of the seeker of his help). If the donor were (aware of the seeker's danger and) capable of granting it, he would never say "No". (Hence understand our danger and grant our request).

The sage said:

7. It is with a desire to hear from you the (exposition of) Dharma (righteousness) that you were replied that way (by me). Here I cast off my body which is dear to you (due to its utility) as (some day) it is sure to leave me.

8. Oh Lords! A person who does not desire to earn religious merits out of compassion to living beings or aspire after glory by means of this ephemeral body, deserves to be pitied even by immobile creatures.

9. That one should sympathetically feel sorrow or delight at the grief or joy of other beings, is the eternal law of righteousness (Dharma) practised by persons with holy renown.

10. Alas! What a pity! that a mortal does not show benevolence (by helping others) with his wealth, sons and relatives and his body—all of which are transient, of no use to him and (actually) belong to others.
Sri Suka said:

11. In this way, Dadhyaś, the scion of the Atharvan Clan, made up his mind and uniting his individual Soul with the glorious transcendental Brahman, gave up his ghost.

12. He controlled his senses, vital airs, mind and intellect and fixed his gaze on the Reality. He severed all bonds and established himself in union with the Brahman, and (in the process) was not aware of the falling away of his body.

13. Then Indra was equipped with Vajra (the thunderbolt) forged out of the bones of the sage, by Viśvakarman (the chief artisan of gods). He (Indra) was endowed with the Lord’s power and felt himself mighty.

14. Surrounded by all the hosts of gods and eulogised by assemblies of sages, he shone riding his excellent elephant (Airāvata), to the delight of the three worlds.

15. In order to cut him down, Oh King! he attacked vehemently Vṛtra who was surrounded by the leaders of Asura forces, just as wrathful Rudra does in the case of the god of Death (at the end of the world).

16. Then ensued the most ferocious fight between the gods and the demons, on the bank of the Narmadā, at the beginning of the Tretā Age (in the first round of four yugas in this manvantara).

17-18. The demons, headed by Vṛtra, did not tolerate the sight of Indra armed with Vajra and resplendent in his original glory and surrounded by Rudras, Vasus, Ādityas, Aśvinikumāras, manes, Fire-gods, Wind-gods, Ṛbhus, Sādhyas, and Viśvedevas, on the battle-field.

19-21. Namuci, Śambara, Anarvā, Dvimūrdhā (a two-headed demon), Rṣabha, Ambara Hayagrīva (a demon with horse’s head), Śaṅkusīras, Vipracitti, Ayomukha, Puloman, Vṛṣaparvan, Praheti, Heti, Utkala, and the sons of Diti and Danu and Yakṣas, Ogres in their thousands, of whom Sumāli and Māli were prominent—all armoured and decorated with gold ornaments—resisted the vanguard of Indra’s army which was unapproachable even to the god of Death.

22-23. The haughty and furious demons were fearless and unbewildered. With a lion-like roar, they attacked gods with maces, iron bars, arrows, barbed shafts and javelins.
They covered the leaders of gods with volleys of weapons and missiles like pikes, axes, swords, Sataghnis (cylindrical pieces of wood, 4 cubits long and studded with iron spikes) and Bhutundis (a Sataghni-like weapon with iron spikes, one exceeding the other in length), on all sides.

24. The gods, covered with net-like volleys of arrows showered on all sides with one arrow closely following the other, were rendered invisible like luminaries behind the screen of clouds in the sky.

25. The streams of the volleys of missiles and weapons did not reach or touch the soldiers in the army of gods, for they were cut down to pieces in thousands on their way in the sky, by gods with quick hands.

26. When their stock of missiles and weapons was exhausted, they showered the army of gods with mountain peaks, trees and stones, and the gods cut them to pieces as before.

27. Finding that the gods were unhurt and safe despite the volleys of weapons and missiles, and unaffected by trees, shower of stones and different mountain peaks, the demons led by Vṛtra were filled with consternation.

28. Just as abusive language employed by the vulgar against the exalted persons does not disturb them, all the efforts repeatedly made against the army of gods by the demons became ineffectual, as Lord Viṣṇu was favourable to them.

29. The demons who were not devoted to Hari, had their arrogance and pride of fighting crushed, when they found that all their efforts had become infructuous. With their morale deeply affected, they thought of fleeing from the battlefield deserting their leader at the initial stage of fighting.

30. The self-possessed warrior Vṛtra saw that his followers are running away. Finding his army broken through terror and fleeing, he laughed loudly and spoke.

31. The heroic person spoke the following words appropriate to the occasion and agreeable to the high-minded souls:

"Oh Vipracitti, Namuci, Puloman, Maya, Anarvan, Šambara, listen to me."
32. This death is inevitable to whoever is born. No escape from any side from this, has been devised (by any one).
If the attainment of heaven and glory could follow death, who would not court such a desirable and welcome end?

33. Two modes of death are approved of (by the great), but they do not easily come to one's lot, namely, (1) he who,
engaged in the Yogic process, controls his vital airs, concentrates himself on Brahman and casts off his body and (2) one who, in the fore-front of battle, gives up his body on the battlefield (the bed of warriors), without turning his back."

CHAPTER ELEVEN

(Vṛtra, Hari's devotee, fights)

Sri Suka said:

1. Oh King, while he (Vṛtra) was explaining the course of righteousness to the demons, they were struck with terror, and were bent on fleeing, and hence paid no heed to the words of their leader.

2-3. The great Asura, found his army of demons being shattered and scattered like a leaderless mob by gods to whom time was favourable and got enraged. The enemy of Indra, being indignant, was deeply pained, and warding the gods off,
he spoke to them scoldingly, Oh King.

4. "What are you gaining by striking on the back of the fleeing soldiers who are no better than the excreta of their mothers? The slaughter of the cowards does not contribute to the glory or lead to heaven those who pride themselves as valiant.

5. Oh insignificant fellows, if at all you have faith in fighting or some courage at heart and have no longing for sensual vulgar pleasures, try to stand before me at least."

6. The wrathful demon possessed of vast strength and formidable figure, threatened the army of the gods thus and gave out a loud roar which made people lose their consciousness.
7. By that terrible roar of Vṛtra all the hosts of gods verily fell unconscious on the ground as if struck down by a thunderbolt.

8. Just as a leader of a herd of elephants in the period of his youthful madness, tramples over a bed of lotuses, Vṛtra of irrepressible passion for fighting, shaking the earth by his might and with his trident raised, trampled under his feet the army of gods which was terrified and lying with closed eyes.

9. Indra, the wielder of Vajra, saw him and got extremely enraged. He hurled his heavy mace at his enemy who was rushing towards him. But Vṛtra sportively caught it in his left hand while it was coming with irresistible force.

10. The enemy of Indra, possessing terrible prowess, was extremely enraged and by that very mace, he struck the vehicle of the great Indra, viz., the elephant Airāvata on its forehead (its temples). All present in the battlefield warmly appreciated this feat (of Vṛtra).

11. Airāvata which was smitten down by Vṛtra’s mace, reeled down like a mountain struck by a thunderbolt. With blood coming out of its mouth, it retreated along with Indra for a distance of seven bows, as it was extremely afflicted with its mouth deeply wounded.

12. The great-souled Vṛtra did not hurl his mace against Indra who was deeply dejected in spirits as his vehicle, viz., the elephant was stunned. Indra whose wounded elephant recovered from its pain, by the touch of Indra’s hand dripping with nectar, again took his stand (against Vṛtra).

13. Oh King of kings, seeing Indra, his enemy the murderer of his brother, armed with the Vajra (thunderbolt) itching for a fight, he remembered Indra’s wicked sinful deed (the murder of his brother) and filled with grief and infatuation he laughed and spoke.

Vṛtra said:

14. How glad I am that you, my enemy, the murderer of a Brāhmaṇa, the slayer of your own preceptor and my brother, have stood before me. Oh most wicked fellow, how lucky is it that I shall discharge my debt by piercing your stony heart with my trident within a short time.
15. Just as a sacrificer desirous of heaven mercilessly lops off the head of a sacrificial beast, you cut off the heads of our innocent elder brother who had realized his Self, was a Brähmana and your preceptor, and who, reposing full confidence in you about his safety, was engaged in a sacrifice.

16. Being destitute of shame, grace, mercy and glory, you are fit to be censured by man-eaters for your misdeed. With your body painfully torn up by my trident and uncremated the vultures will devour you.

17. I shall propitiate the lords of goblins (Bhairavas) along with their retinue, by piercing the necks with my sharpened trident, of those ignorant followers who obey a wicked fellow like you, and who attack me with their missiles raised.

18. Oh valiant Indra, if you will cut off by force my head with the Vajra, I shall have discharged the debt of all beings (by my body) and shall attain to the regions (lit. the dust of the feet) of the high-souled ones.

19. Oh Lord of gods, why do you not hurl your unfailing Vajra on your enemy who is stationed before you. Do not entertain any doubt that like your mace, the Vajra will be ineffectual like a request made to a miserly fellow.

20. Oh Śakra, this Vajra of yours is sharpened and strengthened with the power of Lord Viṣṇu and the austerities of Dadhīci. Kill your enemy by that thunderbolt which is prompted by Viṣṇu’s power, because where there is Hari, victory, fortune and excellences are to that side.

21. Concentrating my mind on the lotus-like feet of Lord Saṅkarṣaṇa as directed by him, with the ties of attachment to sensual pleasures cut asunder by the force of your Vajra, I shall cast off my body and attain to the region of sages.

22. He does not confer on persons whose minds are absolutely devoted to him, the wealth and affluence of heaven, the earth, and the netherworlds as it engenders passions, fear, anxiety, arrogance, discord, misery and physical pain.

23. Oh Indra, our Master causes obstructions in the efforts for attaining the three objects of human life, (viz, Dharma, Artha and Kāma). The grace of the Lord is to be inferred from such obstructions, for it is the lot of those votaries who have given up everything for him (and have nothing of their own). This is extremely rare in the case of others.

24. (Contemplating over the Lord, Hari, Vṛtra addresses:) Oh Lord Hari, let me be again the servant of the servants of your devotees whose sole refuge is your feet. May my mind ponder over the excellences of the Lord of my life. May my speech extol them and may my body render service to you.

25. Oh treasury of Bliss and Grace! I do not aspire after the post of Dhruva which is above the heaven; nor the position of god Brahmā, nor absolute sovereignty over the whole world or the overlordship of a subterranean region, nor do I covet for supernatural yogic powers nor for Liberation (which terminates the cycle of births and deaths)—if it means separation from you.

26. Oh lotus-eyed God, my mind eagerly yearns to see you, just as the unfledged young ones of birds anxiously wait for their mother or young calves tormented with hunger wish for the milk from the udders (of the mother cow) or a beloved lady dejected due to the absence of her lord who has gone to a distant country (waits for her beloved).

27. Bless me with friendship with the devotee of the Lord of excellent renown, while I am wandering in the cycle of Samsāra (transmigration of the Soul) as an effect of my karma (deeds). I may not form friendship with people whose minds are attached to their bodies, children, wife and house (property) due to the force of your Māyā.

CHAPTER TWELVE

(Vṛtra slain by Indra)

The Sage (Suka) said:

1. In this way, Vṛtra who was eager to lay down his life (body) in the battle, and who thought death preferable to victory, seized his trident and attacked the Chief of gods, just as the demon Kaitabha did against the Almighty Lord Vishnu, on the Cosmic waters of the deluge, Oh King.

2. Then, whirling with force his trident with prongs, dazzling like the fire of Pralaya (the dissolution of the universe), he hurled it at the great Indra. The valiant Vrtra roared aloud and exclaimed in wrath, "Killed are you Oh wicked fellow".

3. Seeing that (trident) darting through the sky with a whirling motion, and unbearable to look at like a dazzling planet or meteor, Indra remained unperturbed. The wielder of thunderbolt i.e. Indra cut it with his Vajra of hundred joints, along with Vrtra's arm which was long and stout like the body of the serpent lord Vasuki.

4. Vrtra whose arm was cut, became extremely enraged and dashing at Indra, he dealt a blow both to Indra and his elephant on the cheek. And the bolt slipped down from the hand of Indra.

5. Gods, demons, the companies of Cārānas and Siddhas applauded the most marvellous feat of Vrtra, but seeing the critical plight of Indra, they shouted loudly in great anxiety, "Alas, Alas".

6. Being very much ashamed, Indra did not pick up his bolt which slipped from his hand in the presence of the enemy. To him Vrtra said, "Oh Indra, take up your Vajra and kill your enemy. This is not the time for despondency".

7. With the exception of the Omniscient, beginningless, Eternal Person, the Controller of the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe, victory does not always favour the belligerents equipped with weapons anywhere, as there are some occasions when their bodies are controlled by others (destiny).

8. It is due to the control of God (in the form of Time) that the worlds along with their guardian deities live and act, in spite of their will, like birds caught in a net. Hence it is the Time-spirit alone which is the cause of victory and defeat.

9. Not knowing that the Time (or god) is the cause of the power of the mind, the potency of the sense organs, physical strength, vital breaths, immortality or Liberation and death that people regard this gross body of theirs as the cause (of victory).
10. Just as a wooden doll or a mechanical toy-deer is controlled by the showman or the mechanism, similarly all the bhūtas (beings or elements) are subject to the control of god.

11. In the absence of his grace, neither the individual Soul, nor Prakṛti (primordial matter), nor Mahat (cosmic intelligence), nor ego, nor elements, nor the cognitive and conative organs or the mind is individually or aggregatively capable of the creative and other activities (pertaining to the universe).

12. He who is ignorant of this, regards his incapable Self as capable of doing this. But it is really the Lord who creates or evolves beings or elements from Bhūtas, and devours them through carnivorous beasts or withdraws the elements at his own sweet will.

13. It is at the favourable time that length of life, affluence, glory, power and blessings fall to the lot of man. They are reversed against them even against his will.

14. Therefore, one should be balanced, irrespective of glory and infamy, victory or defeat, pleasure or pain, life or death.

15. He who knows that Sattva, Rajas, and Tamas are the modes of Prakṛti and not the qualities of the Soul, and that the individual Soul is merely the witness of their working, is not subjected to the bondage of Samsāra.

16. Oh Indra, look at me. I am defeated and deprived of the weapon and my arm in the battle. I am however endeavouring to the best of my ability to take your life.

17. This battle-field is like a gambling house where life is the stake, arrows are the dice and the vehicles like horses, elephants etc. are the board. Here it is not known who will be triumphant and who is defeated (to the last of the fight).

Sri Suka said:

18. Having heard the straightforward and guileless speech of Vṛtra, Indra expressed his respect. Picking up his Vajra and overcoming astonishment (at his charitable disposition), he laughed heartily and spoke.
Indra said:

19. Oh son of Danu, you are really a Siddha (one who has attained enlightenment) as your tenor of thought is such. You are a real devotee, with all your being, of the Lord, a friend of the universe.

20. Your respectable self has verily crossed the Māyā (deluding power) of Viṣṇu which infatuates the world, as your honourable self has given up his demonic nature and attained the level of exalted Souls.

21. It is certainly a great wonder that you who are Rājasic by nature, entertain unflinching faith and devotion in the glorious Lord Vāsudeva who is the embodiment of Sattva.

22. He who cherishes devotion to the glorious Hari, the bestower of Mokṣa, has as if sported in the ocean of nectar. Of what account are to him waters of the ditches and the pools (i.e. pleasures in the heaven)?

Śrī Śuka said:

23. Oh King, discoursing this way with a desire to ascertain the nature of Dharma (righteousness), those two leading veterans in fight, Indra and Vṛtra, possessed of extraordinary prowess, fought on.

24. Vṛtra, the vanquisher of enemies, whirlèd his terrible bludgeon made of black iron and hurled that dreadful weapon with his left hand at Indra, Oh noble king.

25. But the god with his bolt of hundred joints, simultaneously cut down that iron bludgeon as well as Vṛtra’s hand which was like the trunk of an elephant.

26. The demon with both of his arms cut at the roots and streaming forth profuse blood shone like a mountain with wings chopped, and dislodged from the sky by being struck down by the wielder of thunderbolt.

27-29. With his lower jaw touching the earth and his upper jaw brushing the heavens, and with his mouth deep like the sky and with his lusty serpent-like tongue and with his large teeth looking like the god of Death, he was as it were swallowing the three worlds. With his extremely gigantic body he was shaking the mountains with his violent motion, and like a big mountain moving on feet, he was pounding the earth. He thus assailed Indra and swallowed him up along with his vehicle namely the elephant Airāvata.

30. (Vṛtra swallowed them) as a big serpent of immense strength and indomitable power swallows up an elephant. Gods along with the protectors of the worlds and great sages observed Indra being swallowed up by Vṛtra and wailed despondently "Alas, how unfortunate!"

31. Though Indra was swallowed up by the chief of demons, he entered Vṛtra's belly. Protected as he was by the armour of the Supreme Person (Nārāyaṇa Kavaca) and by his Yogic powers and Māya, he did not die.

32. Ripping open the abdomen of Vṛtra by his Vajra, the powerful vanquisher of Bala, came out of it and by his power lopped off the enemy's head, like the peak of a mountain, by his Vajra.

33. Whirling very rapidly and cutting on all sides the neck of Vṛtra, Vajra felled it on the ground at the proper time of Vṛtra's death in as many days (360) as are required for the heavenly bodies like the Sun for two Ayanas (the apparent motions of the Sun from the northernmost to the southernmost point and vice versa.

34. At that time kettle-drums were sounded in the sky, Gandharvas, Siddhas along with companies of great sages, joyously showered flowers on Indra glorifying him with panegyrics describing his great feat of killing Vṛtra.

35. Oh vanquisher of the enemies, while all people were looking on, from the body of Vṛtra there came forth a light (his effulgent Soul) and merged in the Supreme Being, transcending the universe.
CHAPTER THIRTEEN
(The Triumph of Indra)

Sri Suka said:

1. When Vṛtra was killed, all the three worlds along with their guardian deities, with the exception of Indra, became immediately free from feverish anxiety and felt felicitous at heart.

2. Without bidding good-bye to Indra, gods, sages, manes, Bhūtas, demons and the followers of gods returned to their respective regions. Then dispersed Brahmā, Rudra, Indra and others. [According to GS, Indra did not return to Svarga. The very moment he killed Vṛtra, the sin of killing a Brāhmaṇa (Brahma-hatyā) assailed him and Indra had to fly away hurriedly and hide himself in the Mānasa lake. Indra’s restoration took place after his performance of a horse sacrifice].

The King said:

3. Oh Sage, I wish to hear the cause of Indra’s unhappiness whereby gods became happy, while Indra suffered agony.

Sri Suka said:

4. All gods along with sages who were agitated over the prowess of Vṛtra, begged Indra to slay him, but Indra being afraid of Brahma-hatyā did not wish to do so.

Indra said:

5. The sin of killing Viśvarūpa, a Brāhmaṇa, was graciously shared by women, the earth, the water and trees. Where can I wipe off the sin of killing Vṛtra, another Brāhmaṇa?

Sri Suka said:

6. Having listened to him, the sages assured him, “May good betide you! We shall help you in performing a horse-sacrifice. Please do not get afraid (of Brahma-hatyā).

7. Worshipping Lord Nārāyaṇa, the Supreme Man, the universal Soul and the Controller of the Universe, by performance of the Horse-sacrifice, you will be absolved of the sin of massacring the world. What of one Brāhmaṇa like Vṛtra.

8. By singing the Lord’s name, a person who slays a Brāhmaṇa or his own father, or a cow, or his own mother, or a preceptor, a sinner who eats a dog, or is of the lowest caste, becomes purified.

9. If with faith and reverence, the great sacrifice called Āsvamedha (Horse-sacrifice) be performed with our co-operation, you will not be affected by sin, even if you kill all the mobile and immobile creation along with Brahmā. Then what of killing a wicked demon like Vṛtra?

Śrī Śuka said:

10. Thus strongly impelled by Brāhmaṇas, Indra killed his enemy Vṛtra. As soon as Vṛtra was killed, the sin of slaying a Brāhmaṇa attacked Indra.

11. Indra suffered agonies by that and did not get any peace of mind, for to self-respecting persons, excellences like sovereignty do not give any pleasure if they bring censure.

12-13. He saw the Brahma-hatyā chasing after him. She was like a Cāṇḍāla woman in form. Her body was trembling with age and she was a victim of consumption. She put on blood-stained garments. With her grey hair scattered, she was asking Indra to stop and stand. She was polluting the atmosphere on the road with her breath stinking like rotten fish.

14. The thousand-eyed god ran in all directions in the sky, Oh Lord of the earth. He speedily rushed to the north-east and entered the Mānasā lake, Oh king.

15. He stayed within the fibres of a lotus therein without getting any subsistence, for he had the fire-god as his purveyor of food.²⁸⁷ He remained unperceived in the water for one thousand years, pondering over his absolution from the sin of Brahma-hatyā.

16. During that period (of Indra’s absence), Nahuṣa who possessed the capacity of a ruler due to his knowledge, ²⁸⁷ ŠR. points out the impossibility of fire-god’s entry into water. VC. & GS. attribute his non-entry to the guards of Rudra, for Agni surveys oblations of Varuṇa.

austerities and strength of yoga, governed the third heaven. But as his intelligence became blind by the arrogance of affluence, and power was reduced to the state of sub-human being (boa constrictor) by Indra's wife, Śacī. 288

17. Then Indra whose sin was warded off by meditation over the protector of Truth, namely, Lord Viṣṇu, returned as he was invited by Brāhmaṇas. His sin of Brahma-hatyā was deprived of its power by Rudra, the god of that direction, and it did not assail him as he was protected by Lakṣmī, spouse of Viṣṇu.

18. The Brāhmaṇa sages approached him and consecrated him according to religious formalities for the performance of the Horse-Sacrifice by which Hari is propitiated.

19-20. When the Supreme Person who embodies within himself all the divinities, was thus worshipped by the great Indra, in the Horse-Sacrifice which was performed duly through the Brāhmaṇas who were expositors of the Veda, the huge mass of sin of slaying Vṛtra the son of Tvaṣṭṛ was reduced to naught by that very worship of the Lord just as the frost is evaporated by the Sun.

21. By performance of the Horse-sacrifice according to scriptural injunctions through sages like Marīci who conducted it on proper lines, Indra worshipped the ancient Supreme Person, the presiding deity of sacrifices and thus being completely free from sin (of Brahma-Hatyā), became as great as before.

22. This great narrative which celebrates the glory of Lord Viṣṇu of hallowed feet, absolves one of all sins. It extols the virtues of devotion and the greatness of the devotees of the Lord, and describes the purification of the great Indra from Brahma-hatyā and his final victory.

288. Nahuṣa thought that as he was Indra, former Indra's wife would be ipso facto his own. When Śacī received an invitation from Nahuṣa, she, as per advice of Brhaspati, requested him to come to her in a palanquin borne by sages like Agastya. Nahuṣa while being borne thus, in his eagerness, touched Agastya with his leg and asked him to hasten (Sarpa, Sarpa). Agastya being thus insulted cursed him to be a serpent.
23. Wise persons should always read this narrative. They should listen to it on the days of Parvams e.g. the new-moon-day and the full-moon-day. It contributes to the prosperity and glory, removes sins, bestows victories over enemies, is conducive to auspiciousness and confers long life.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN
(The Previous Birth of Vṛtra—King Citraketu)

Parikṣit said:

1. Oh Brāhmaṇa sage, how is it that the sinful Vṛtra who, by nature, was predominated by Rajas and Tamas, entertained unflinching devotion to the glorious Lord Nārāyaṇa.

2. Even in the case of gods who are constituted of pure Sattva and in that of pure-souled sages, generally devotion to the feet of Viṣṇu is not engendered.

3. In this world there are beings which are as numerous as the particles of dust. Among them, it is very few like the human beings who can practise righteousness.

4. Oh best of the Brāhmaṇas, there are generally very few among them who seek Liberation from Samsāra. Out of thousands of seekers of Mokṣa, it is only one who can get rid of attachment (to sensual pleasures etc.) and attain liberation.

5. Out of the crores of Siddhas who are free from attachment and have realized the Self, a person who is absolutely devoted to Nārāyaṇa and of serene mind is very difficult to find, Oh great sage.

6. But how is it that Vṛtra, the fiend incarnate, the tormentor of all the worlds, was thus so steadfast in devotion to Kṛṣṇa (Lord Viṣṇu) in the heat of fierce battle.

7. On this point, we entertain a great doubt and wish to hear eagerly about it, Oh Master, for he gratified god Indra by his heroism on the battlefield (and did not remember God out of Indra’s fear).
Śūta said:

8. The venerable Śuka welcomed the relevant and interesting query of the devout king Parikṣit and replied as follows:

Śrī Śuka said:

9. Oh King, listen attentively to this legendary history as heard by me from the mouth of Vyāsa, Nārada and even of Devala.

10. It is traditionally reported, Oh King, that there was a sovereign ruler of the world called Citraketu, in the country called Śūrasena. To him the earth yielded whatever he desired.

11. He had ten million wives. Though he was capable of procreation, he did not get any issue from them.

12. Though he was endowed with handsomeness, generosity, youth, noble lineage, deep learning sovereignty, affluence and other excellences, the husband of barren ladies was overweighed with anxiety.

13. Neither his affluence nor his queens of beautiful eyes or the universal sovereignty of the earth became a source of delight to him.

14. Once upon a time, the glorious sage Aṅgiras, during his course of wandering over the world, arrived by chance to his palace.

15. The king honoured him with due formalities such as respectfully standing, offering articles of worship, and with a collected mind, he sat near the sage who was fully entertained as a guest and was seated comfortably.

16. The great sage respectfully showed every courtesy to the king who was sitting near him on the ground and bowing down modestly. Addressing him as ‘Mahārāja’ (Oh great King), he spoke to him as follows:

Aṅgiras said:

17. Are you in good health? Are your subjects and yourself well? Just as the individual Soul (man) is protected by seven constituents (viz. Mahat, Ahaṁkāra—ego and the five subtle elements), the king is protected by the constituent elements of the state, namely ministers, allies, treasures, territories, fortifications, and militia and his own office of kingship.

18. By placing oneself under the control of Prakṛtis, the king should enjoy sovereignty and regal prosperity. Similarly the Prakṛtis (ministers, subjects etc.), with their grievances removed, become enriched and benefited by king.

19. Are your wives, subjects, ministers, servants, members of trade guilds, councillors, citizens, country people, tributary princes, and sons obedient to you?

20. He who has controlled his mind has all these (mentioned above) obedient to him. All the worlds along with the guardian deities offer to him dutifully due honour and worship.

21. It appears that your mind is not pleased with you or with others. I find that your countenance is overshadowed with anxiety as you presumably have not achieved your object or desire.

22. The king who was thus subjected to various alternative questions by the sage who knew (everything) by intuition, bent down with modesty, and then addressed the sage, with a desire for progeny, Oh King.

Citraketu said:

23. Oh worshipful sage! What is not known to yogins (like you) who have destroyed their sins, what lies within and without embodied beings, by means of their penance, spiritual knowledge and concentration?

24. But as I am prompted by your worship who knows what is weighing on my mind, it is with your permission that I am speaking it to you.

25. (My) sovereign power and affluence which are covetable even to the guardians of the world, do not give me any delight. Childless as I am, these are like other things (such as garlands, sandal-paste etc.) to a person overwhelmed with hunger and thirst.

26. Oh highly blessed one, kindly therefore protect me who along with my ancestors, am on the verge of falling into a dark abysmal hell. Please do that unto us whereby we shall cross this hell which is difficult, by blessing us with progeny.
Sri Suka said:

27. The venerable, merciful son of Brahmā who was thus entreated, caused _caru_ (rice cooked in milk) to be prepared for Tvaśṭr and worshipped Tvaśṭr with its oblations.

28. The seniormost queen both in age and status among the queens, was Kṛtadyuti, by name. The Brāhmaṇa gave the remainder of the sacrificial offerings to her.

29. Then the son of Brahmā told the king, "Oh king, one son will be born to you. He will give you both joy and grief". Saying thus, he departed.

30. Queen Kṛtadyuti conceived a son through Citraketu by the eating of that _caru_, just as (the constellation) Kṛttikā bore a son to the Fire-god.

31. Her foetus which was begotten by the king of Śūrasena gradually developed every day, just as the Moon waxes in the bright half of the month.

32. In due course, after the arrival of the proper time, a son was born, giving great joy to the inhabitants of Śūrasena who heard the news.

33. The king who was overjoyed, purified himself by taking a bath and adorned himself. He made the Brāhmaṇas pronounce pious benedictions and caused them to perform the _jātakarma_ ceremony.

34. He gave them gold, silver, garments, ornaments, villages, horses, elephants and six crores of cows.

35. Like a showering rain-cloud, the noble-minded king showered other persons with objects desired by them for the future affluence, glory and longevity of the prince.

36. Just as a penniless person develops love for his hard-earned money, the father, a royal sage, developed, day after day, great affection for his son who was got after great difficulty.

37. To the mother Kṛtadyuti, the affection caused by infatuation developed into intense love, but it created feverish desire for a child in her co-wives.

38. By fondling the child every day, Citraketu showed so much intensive love to his wife who gave birth to a child, that he ignored others.
39. Those co-wives tormented and reproached themselves out of envy, the misery of childlessness and the indifference of the king.

40. Fie on the childless accursed woman who is not loved in the house of her husband and is treated with contempt, like a maid-servant, by other co-wives blessed with children.

41. What agony can there be to maid servants who are constantly waiting upon their master and whose services are appreciated by him? We are unfortunate like the maid-servant of maid-servants.

42. The co-wives, in this way, developed intense hatred, as they were burning due to the wealth in the form of child to their co-wife and their very existence being not approved by the king.

43. The women who lost their good sense through hatred and became cruel-hearted administered poison to the prince, in their unappeasable hatred for the king.

44. Kṛtadyuti was quite innocent about the grievous sin committed by her co-wives. Looking at him (her son) she thought him to be asleep and went about in the house.

45. The clever woman realizing that the child had slept for a pretty long time ordered the nurse, “Oh auspicious lady bring the son to me”.

46. The nurse approached the sleeping child and saw him with the pupils of his eyes turned upwards and bereft of breathing, senses and life. (She cried out) “Oh I am undone” and fell down on the ground.

47. Then hearing her painful shriek and violent beating of the breasts with her hands, the queen entered in haste and approaching the child, she saw that it had met with sudden death.

48. Overpowered with grief, she fell on the ground and with her hair and garments in disorder, she lost her consciousness.

49. Then all the men and women who were in the harem of the king heard the wailing. Coming there, they equally shared her grief and became extremely distressed and even those who perpetrated that heinous crime pretended to weep.
50. Hearing that his son died from an unknown cause, the king lost his eye-sight. He staggered with faltering steps on the way. The king who was surrounded by his ministers and Brāhmaṇas fell in deep swoon, due to his grief which was infinitely intensified by love.

51. The king fell at the feet of his dead son. His (king's) hair and garments fell in disorder. He heaved heavy sighs. His throat was choked with tears and he was not able to speak.

52. Observing that her husband was overwhelmed with grief as the son, the only scion of the family, was dead, the virtuous queen burst out into lamentations of various sorts enhancing the afflictions of the subjects and the ministers.

53. Bathing her breasts decorated with paintings of saffron and sandal-paste, by means of tears mixed with collyrium, and with her dishevelled hair dropping flowers (used for hair decoration), she cried out loudly and in diverse tones like a female osprey.

54. "Oh Creator, you are extremely foolish, for you act contrary to your (process of) creation, because here the elderly people survive when the young ones die. If you are of a contrary nature, then you must be an eternal enemy of all creatures.

55. If there be no order in the birth and death of embodied beings, it may be due to their own Karmas. But the tie of affection which you have engendered for the growth of your creation, is cut asunder by you, due to the death of the child.

56. (Addressing the child) Oh dear child! It is not proper for you to abandon a wretched and helpless (mother like) me. Please have a look at your father who is tormented with grief. It is through you that we shall easily cross the dark hell which is impassable for childless persons. Please do not go far away, with the merciless god of Death.

57. Oh child, get up. These young children, your friends, are calling you to play. Oh Prince, you have slept for too long a period. You must have been famished with hunger. Enjoy breast-feeding and remove the grief of our relatives.

58. Unfortunate as I am, I have not (as usual) seen your lotuslike face with cheerful looks and innocent smile, Oh child. Or is it that you are taken away by the merciless (Yama) and have gone to the other world from which there is no return, for I do not hear your sweet words."

Śrī Śuka said:

59. While she was bewailing her dead son through such various laments, Citraketu became extremely tormented with grief and cried at the top of his voice.

60. While the husband and wife were thus lamenting, the subjects, both men and women, who were devoted to them verily wept aloud and everything was lifeless.

61. Knowing that everybody was reduced to such wretched plight and lost all consciousness and were leaderless (for consolation) the sage Aṅgiras came along with Nārada.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

(Consolation of Citraketu)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Bringing back to consciousness the king, with their soft and wise words, the sages Aṅgiras and Nārada spoke to the king who was overpowered with grief, and was lying like a dead person by the side of the dead child.

2. "What can be your relationship, in the previous and the present birth, Oh great King, with the child whom you are mourning? How was he related to you in the previous birth, the present birth and will be related in the future one?

3. Just as the grains of sand come together and separate by the force of the stream of water, so are embodied beings brought together and separated by Time.

4. Just as seeds may or may not produce corn, similarly Bhūtas prompted by God's Māyā may or may not produce Bhūtas.

5. We, you, the mobile and immobile creatures which are contemporaneous with us, were not so before the present birth nor are so in the present birth, nor shall be so after death. (Due to the nonexistence of these before and after, they are unsubstantial or unreal like dreams).

6. The Lord of Bhūtas who is himself unborn (and therefore imperishable) and has no purpose to achieve, like a playful boy, creates, protects and destroys the Bhūtas by means of Bhūtas which are created by him and hence dependent on him.

7. Oh King, the body of a son is born from the body (of the mother) through another body (namely that of the father) just as a seed sprouts forth from another seed. But the occupant of the body is eternal like earth and other principles.

8. It is from eternity that this (above-mentioned) distinction between a body and the occupant of the body (the Soul) has been presumed through ignorance, as the distinction between the class or the generic property (jāti) and the individuality of a thing (vyakti) is conceived as existing in the thing itself (such distinction between interdependants like jāti and vyakti are untenable).*

Śrī Suka said:

9. When king Citraketu was thus consoled by the words of the Brāhmaṇa sages, he wiped out with his hand, his

* After verse No. 8, the text before VJ. adds four verses.

1) Just as the difference or changes due to fuel are wrongly attributed to the fire, similarly the conditions affecting the body, viz., difference, birth, decline, growth and destruction are wrongly attributed to the Jīva who is distinct from the body. This misconception is due to Karma.

2) It is due to Jiva’s intimate relation to the body and the false identification of the body with the Soul, that the above-mentioned conditions (of the body) appear to be the conditions of the Jīva as in a dream. As everything else is a source of fear, one should not ponder over anything leading to evil consequences.

3) Just as the appearance of a serpent or a tiger or another (frightening) object like it, in a dream, causes fear, as the dream appearance is identified with the reality in a wakeful condition, so is the Samsāra due to the misconception grown since eternity.

4) The idea of the world of sons (or relatives) and other possessions depends on the mind. It is due to the influence of the Ego which creates likes and dislikes in the mind and leads to merits and demerits. One should clear away the ignorance in the form of the notions like me and mine, and fix one’s mind on the all-powerful Omnipresent Lord Vāsudeva.
face which was withered through grief for his son, and addressed them thus.

The king (Citraketu) said:

10. Who are you both so full of spiritual knowledge, the most worshipful ones among the adorables who have come here disguised as Avadhūtas?

11. For persons who have realized Brahman and who are dear to the glorious Lord, range over the world in the guise of mad persons, for guiding and counselling sensually-minded people like me.

12. (For example) Sanatkumāra, Nārada, Rbhu, Aṅgiras, Devala, Amita, Apāntarātma, Vyāsa, Mārkenḍeya and Gautama.

13. Vasiṣṭha, the glorious Parāśurāma, Kapila, Bādara-yaṇī (Śuka), Durvāsas, Yājñavalkya, Jātukarṇya and Āruṇi.

14. Romaśa, Cyavana, Datta, Patañjali, Āsuri, the sage Vedaśīras, the sage Bodhya, and Paṇcaśīras.

15. Hiranyanābha, Kausalya, Śrutadeva, Ṛtadhvaja—these and other masters of spiritual powers go about in the world with the object of imparting spiritual knowledge.

16. Therefore, you both are the masters of a stupid and ignorant brute like me. Enlighten me with the lamp of your knowledge—me who am plunged into the blinding darkness of ignorance.

Aṅgiras said:

17. Oh King, I am Aṅgiras who blessed you with a son as you longed for one. This is the veritable son of Brahmā, the worshipful divine sage Nārada.

18-19. Finding you, a devotee of the Supreme Person, plunged in the deep impassable darkness of grief for the son, though you are not fit to be so affected, we have arrived here to help you out of it, with our grace. For, you are dear to Brāhmanaś and votary of the Lord and thus do not deserve to be so despondent.

20. When I visited your house, at that very time (of our first meeting), I would have imparted to you spiritual knowledge. But knowing your insistence and longing for something else (viz, the birth of a son), I blessed you with a son.

21-22. Now, you experience the agony suffered by persons having sons. In the same way (are the agonies of persons who have) wives, houses, wealth, power and prosperity of various kinds, objects of enjoyment like sound etc., fleeting powers of sovereignty, the earth, kingdom, the army, the treasury, servants, ministers, friends and relations.

23. Oh King Śūrasena, all these are the sources of grief, delusion, fear and affliction, for they are momentary like (the proverbial) city of Gandharvas in the sky, and unreal like a dream, delusion and fancies.

24. They are mental images, for they are perceived without being real or substantial and disappear the next moment. For a man brooding over objects through the force of tendencies of actions (karma) in the previous birth, various activities proceed from the mind.

25. In fact, this body of embodied beings is constituted of gross elements, conative and cognitive senses. It is said, by the knowers of the reality, to be the cause of various afflictions and torments to the Jīva who identifies itself with its body.

26. Therefore, examining carefully the real nature of the Soul and with concentration of mind, give up the belief in the permanence of the objective world as it implies duality. Betake yourself to renunciation and serenity of the mind*.

* Additional verses in VJ.'s text of the Bh. P.:

1) A king named Bhoja dreamt that he subsisted on the remnant of the food (out of the dishes) of his enemy. He was therefore overcome with nausea, grief, delusion, fear and distress and became utterly miserable.

2) In the dream some (of his enemies) who nursed age-old animosity and vengeance, carried away the objects he enjoyed; some killed his dependents; some abducted his wives while others beheaded him.

3) Awaking from this dream overflooded with unending miseries, he reflected deeply over it. He got disgusted and renounced his house (worldly life).

4) Externally appearing as insane, he visualized the Supreme Soul within his heart, free from attachments. Overcoming conflicting states of the mind he established it in the Supreme Brahman called Śrī Nārāyaṇa, untouched by the conditioning perishable body. In this absorbed state of meditation (in a-samprajñāta-samādhi), he totally forgot that he was conditioned by the body.
Nārada said:

27. After purifying yourself (i.e. after disposing of the dead body of the child and taking a bath thereafter) accept from me the Mantropaniṣad (Vide Iṣṭa Ch. XVI, 18-25). By bearing this in mind and meditating over it, you will visualize Lord Saṅkarsana within seven nights.

28. Oh great King, by resorting to the feet of Saṅkarsana, ancient votaries of the Lord like god Śiva and others, gave up the illusion of this world which implies duality and attained immediately to his greatness which was neither equaled by nor surpassed by anyone else. You will also attain to that eminence within a short time.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

(Citraketu's Realization of Lord Ananta)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Then, Oh King, the divine sage Nārada (by his yogic powers) showed the spirit of the departed prince to the relatives who were mourning and spoke to the spirit.

Nārada said:

2. Oh Jīva, God bless you. Have a look at your mother, father, friends and relatives who are deeply afflicted with grief for you.

3. Please enter this body of yours. Surrounded by your friends enjoy pleasures throughout the remaining period of your life—pleasures provided to you by your father and ascend the royal throne.

Jīva said:

4. In what life were these my father and mother, while I was revolving in the cycle of births in the species of gods, subhuman beings and human beings by my karmas.
5. For, all persons are by turns related to others as relatives, cousins, enemies, mediators, friends, indifferent men and bitter adversaries.

6. Just as commodities like gold and other articles change hand from one customer to another and one place to another, similarly a Jīva wanders from one species of existence to another.

7. Even during the life-time of a person, the relation even of men with animals is temporary. The attachment of mineness lasts so long as the particular relation exists.

8. In the same way, the relation of a Jīva who has entered the womb of a particular species is transient. For, by himself, Jīva is eternal and as such unrelated to his body and is therefore without attachment (as a son etc.). The sense of belongingness lasts so long as and only with him, with whom he is associated due to his karma (and not after death. Therefore grief for me is unnecessary).

9. This Ātman is eternal. He is not subject to decay or change. He is subtle and free from birth. He is the basic support (as the material cause of the universe) of all. He is self-illuminating. Being all-powerful he manifests himself as the universe by the guṇas of his Māyā.

10. To him no one is very dear, nor anyone hateful. He has no kith or kin or an alien. He is one, the witness of the working of the minds of friends and foes (who do good or evil).

11. The Ātman does not accept (experience) the good or evil (i.e. pleasure or pain) nor is he the recipient of the fruit of karmas (namely kingship). He is a dispassionate witness of cause and effect and not their enjoyer. He is thus unconditioned by body and is independent.

Śrī Sūka said:

12. After explaining thus the spirit departed. The relatives of that Jīva then became wonderstruck. They cut asunder their bonds of affection to him and gave up sorrow.

289. VJ. explains: The Jīva is eternally related with Hari who by the guṇas of his Māyā creates his universe. Hari is eternally connected with all. He is eternal, not conditioned by change or decay, subtle but absolutely one. He perceives everything as he is the Lord of all. Thus the relation of a Jīva with any person is temporary.
13. The relatives took away the dead body and performed the suitable obsequies. They set aside their affection which is so difficult to be rid of, and which causes grief, delusion, fear and distress.

14. The queens who killed the child and whose charms waned due to the infanticide, became ashamed. They performed the expiation for infanticide as enunciated to them by the Brāhmaṇas on the bank of the Yamunā, remembering what the Brāhmaṇas have explained to them, Oh Mahārāja.

15. Citraketu who was thus spiritually awakened by the words (of advice) by the Brāhmaṇa sages, came out of the dark deceptive well in the form of domestic life, just as an elephant extricates himself out of the mire in the lake.

16. Having taken ablution in the Yamunā according to the sacred precepts, and having poured out oblations of water (to the Piṭas), he, with his senses properly controlled, bowed to the two sons of god Brahmā (viz. Nārada and Aṅgiras) in silence.

17. The venerable sage Nārada gladly taught this great lore to the king who was their devotee and who resorted to them for protection and had fully controlled his mind.

18. "OM! Salutation unto you, Oh glorious Lord Vāsudeva. We contemplate (mentally pay obeisance to) you. We bow to Pradyumna, Aniruddha and Saṅkarṣaṇa (all the vyāhas of the Lord).

19. Obeisance to You who are pure, absolute knowledge, the very embodiment of supreme bliss, delighted with yourself, serene and above the notion of duality.

20. Hail to you who, through realization of your blissful character, kept yourself above the waves (the feelings of love, hate etc.) caused by Māyā. Salutation to the great Hṛṣikeśa (the Supreme Master of Senses) whose body is the universe.

21. May he protect us—he who shines alone by himself and is beyond the reach of speech and other senses and the mind; who is pure consciousness and has no name or form and who is the cause of the law of causation (and hence above it).
22. Bow to you Supreme Brahman on whom the universe (the product of cause and effect) is based, from whom it evolves and in whom it dissolves and thus pervades everything in the universe, just as products of earth do with reference to the earth.

23. I salute the Brahman which pervades everything from within and without like the sky but to whom the Prāṇas (organs of activity) do not touch (by their conative force) nor do the mind, intellect and cognitive senses comprehend him (by their power of cognition).

24. It is only when these—body, senses, vital airs, mind and intellect—are charged by his part or presence (aṁśa) that these carry out their functions and not otherwise, just as an unheated piece of iron (does not emit heat or light.) What is called the ‘spectator’ is another designation of yours in the state of wakefulness (of the Jiva. He has no independent existence apart from you).

25. Salutations to you the Supreme Person, designated by the sacred symbol OM, the possessor of Supreme Might, whose lotus-like feet are adored in great love with the lotus-bud-like joined palms by all the great Sātvatas (votaries of the Lord). I reverentially bow to you, the most excellent controller of all.”

Śrī Śuka said :

26. Having taught this prayer-lore to his devotee who sought his protection, Nārada along with Aṅgiras, went to the region of god Brahmā, Oh King.

27. Citraketu observed the course of that lore (of meditation and prayer) with perfect concentration as per instructions of Nārada. For one week he subsisted on water only.

28. Then at the end of the seventh night, the king attained to permanent overlordship of Vidyādharas through the practice of that lore.

29. Then after some days, his mental power became illumined through the practice and repetition of the same lore, and he went near the feet of Śeṣa, the God of gods.

30. He saw the Lord Śeṣa white like a lotus fibre, clad in blue garments and adorned with brilliant crown, armlets, girdle and wristlets, and with gracious countenance and reddish eyes, attended upon by multitudes of great Siddhas.

31. All his sins having been destroyed at the sight of the Lord, the sage Citraketu whose heart became cleansed of all impurities, approached the Most Ancient Person in silence. Due to surging devotion, his eyes were flowing with tears of love and his hair were standing on ends due to ecstasy, he prostrated himself before him.

32. Repeatedly moistening with his tears of love the altar under the lotus-like feet of the glorious Lord, and his power of expression was being choked up by his overpowering love and devotion, he was not for a long time able to praise him properly.

33. Then, composing his mind by the force of reason and having restrained the senses from going out to external objects, he addressed the following words to the father of the world, the embodiment of the Sātvata Šāstra, i.e. Pañcarātra (or whose body stood described in the Pañcarātra scriptures).

Citraketu said:

34. Oh unconquered Lord! (Despite your unconquerable) you have been vanquished by self-controlled righteous persons of impartial and unruffled minds. They, in their turn, are conquered by You. You are so very gracious that you bestow your own self upon your devotees whose minds are completely free from desires.

35. Oh glorious Lord! The creation, preservation and destruction of the universe is your prowess—a sport. The (so-called) creators of the universe are merely the portion of your portions. They, however, regard themselves severally as creators and vainly vie with one another.

36. You are at the creation, destruction as well as during the intervening period of the subllest atom as well as (of the universe) of the largest dimensions. But you are (yourself) devoid of this triad of limitation. You are that unchanging constant who exist at the beginning and end as well as in the interim of all created things.

37. The egg of the universe is enveloped by seven sheaths of the earth and other elements etc., each outer envelop being ten times the extent of the enclosure inner to it. This egg-like universe together with millions and millions of other universes appears just like an atom on your head. Hence, you are called Ananta, the infinite.

38. Oh Controller of the universe! Those persons are really beasts who, in their thirst for objects of pleasure propitiate the deities concerned (like Indra, who are but your parts only) and not you—for, the blessings (so conferred upon them) come to an end with the extinction of the deities, just as the good fortunes of the followers of a king perish with the fall of that royal house.

39. Oh Supreme Lord! Even if worldly desires are entreated of you who are pure knowledge and consciousness and not a product of guṇas, they do not grow like the fried seeds (which cannot sprout forth). For all the pairs of opposites (e.g. love—hate, leading to rebirth) are the result of guṇas (and you are above them).

40. Oh unconquerable one! When you propounded the pure Bhāgavata Dharma (the righteous path leading to the realization of the glorious Lord), you have conquered all (made all your own). For sinless sages (like Sanat-kumāra) who are possessionless and free of desires and find delight in the Supreme Soul, resort to that Dharma (or to you) for Liberation.

41. Here in the Bhāgavata Dharma men do not cherish crooked, differential notions such as 'I', 'you', 'mine' and 'yours', (as is in other cults, as that of sacrifice). Whatever (act) is performed with the notion of such differences is impure, perishable and full of sin, (like himsā).

42. What good to one's own self or to another can accrue from a dharma (path of religion) or what benefit can be gained through a dharma which is harmful to oneself and to others. It is irreligion, for pain is caused to oneself through self-mortification and sin is committed by offending others.

43. Your vision by which you expounded the Bhāgavata-dharma never goes astray from reality. Hence, the noble Souls who do not regard the multitudes of the mobile and immobile being as different from you follow that dharma, Oh Lord.

44. It is no miracle that all the sins committed by men are annihilated at your sight, for even an outcaste like a Cāndāla becomes liberated from the cycle of birth and death, by hearing your name once only, Oh glorious Lord.

45. Oh Lord, we have got our heart cleansed of all the impurities by your very sight. How could that which the divine sage, your own devotee, has said, turn out to be untrue?

46. Oh Infinite Lord! As you are the Soul of the world, you know everything that is done in this world by people. You are the Creator and Preceptor of the world. There is nothing new to be specially made known to you, as there is nothing to be revealed to the Sun by the fire-flies.

47. Salutations to you, Oh glorious Lord, who are the master and controller of the creation, sustenance and destruction of all the worlds. You are the purest of the pure (Parama-hamsa). Your real nature is incomprehensible to bad yogins who entertain the notion of difference.

48. The creators of the world (e.g. god Brahmā and other gods who preside over the conative organs) (are activated) when you breathe (become active). When you (wish to) see, the gods (like the Sun who preside over the cognitive organs,) are able to get perception. The globe of this earth is (insignificant) like a mustard seed on your head. My Salutations to you, Oh glorious Lord of a thousand heads.

Sri Suka said:

49. Lord Ananta who was thus eulogised, was pleased with him. He spoke out to Citraketu the king of Vidyā-dharas, Oh scion of the Kuru family (Parikṣit).

The glorious Lord said:

50. Oh King, it is by the precept (of the means of propitiating me) taught to you by Nārada and Anāgirās and by the practice of that spiritual lore and by my sight that you have fully achieved your purpose.

51. I am verily all the created beings, their Soul and their support. I am the Veda the Supreme Brahma and both of these are my eternal form.

52. One should understand that his own Self is pervading the whole of the universe (as the subject of experience) and that the universe is resting on the Ātman (i.e. is superimposed on the Soul) and that both (one’s own Self and the universe) are pervaded by me (as the prime cause).

53. Just as in a state of profound slumber, one sees the universe (i.e. the various objects in it) in his own Self, and waking up from the dream, he finds himself alone and in a particular place (of sleeping such as a bed-room).

54. Similarly wakefulness etc. are the conditions of Jiva and are the products of Māyā with reference to Ātman. Therefore, one should remember that Paramātman is only a witness.

55. Recognize me to be that Ātman or Brahman through whom the Jiva in a sleeping condition, regards himself as in deep sleep. I am absolute bliss beyond the range of guṇas or the senses.

56. That knowledge is the Supreme Brahma—knowledge which is found in a person who remembers his experiences during sleep and wakefulness—a connecting link as well as the differentia between the two states of experience.

57. When the Jiva forgets my real nature, he regards himself as different from me and this is the cause of his Sam-sāra, in which he goes from birth after birth and suffers death after death.

58. Having attained birth in the human species here, where the knowledge of the Self (as detailed in scriptures) and the wisdom, i.e. direct knowledge and perception of the Self, can be developed, he who does not realize me, can never find peace and happiness.

59. Remembering that in the Pravṛtti Mārga (i.e. the path of karma) there are great afflictions and contrary results (of the expected fruit), and there is fearlessness, i.e. Liberation (Mokṣa) in the Nivṛtti-Mārga (the path of cessation of activities), a wise man should desist from the path of karma.

60. A pair of husband and wife perform (ritualistic) acts for getting pleasure and avoidance of misery. But there is no escape from misery nor the attainment of happiness, as a result of ritualistic performance.

61-62. Having thus realized that the consequences go contrary to expectation of persons who in their pride regard themselves to be clever, and having realized the subtle nature of the Ātman which transcends the three states (viz. state of awareness, dream and deep sleep), and being completely free (from the desire) for the pleasures of this world and the next, through one's power of discrimination and finding satisfaction and pleasure in one's knowledge and wisdom, a person should devote himself to me (completely).

63. Realization of the unity of the individual spirit and the Supreme Soul is the real objective to be attained through all possible means by yogins whose intellect and power have acquired acuteness through yogic meditation.

64. If you bear in mind my advice and bring that into practice carefully, you will soon be blessed with knowledge and wisdom and attain Liberation, Oh King.

Śrī Śuka said:

65. Having comforted Citraketu in this way, the glorious Lord Hari, the father and the preceptor of the world, and the Soul of the universe, immediately disappeared there while Citraketu was looking on.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

(Citraketu cursed by Pārvatī)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Having bowed to the direction in which Lord Ananta disappeared, Citraketu, the Vidyādhara, the sky-ranger went his own way (in the sky).

2-3. Possessed of indefatigable physical power and undiminished acuteness of senses, and eulogised by sages, Siddhas and Cārānas as a great Yogi, he (Citraketu), for a period of 1,000 million years, sported in the caverns of the great Kulācala (sumeru) (the boundary mountain), which automatically supplies the desired objects to the occupants. He made the Vidyādhara ladies chant the glories of Lord Hari.
4-5. Once upon a time, while he was going by his resplendent aerial car, gifted to him by Viṣṇu, he saw Lord Śiva surrounded by Siddhas and Cāraṇas and having embraced in his arm the goddess Pārvatī seated on his lap, in the assembly of sages. Approaching near her, he laughed loudly and spoke out within the hearing of the goddess.

Citraketu said:

6. (Look here), here is the preceptor of the world himself, the expounder of Dharma to all embodied beings, the head of the assembly (of sages etc.), sits in a posture coupled with his wife.

7. He has matted hair on his head and performs austere penance. He is the president of the assembly of sages well versed in Vedas, but he sits with his wife on his lap, like a shameless vulgar fellow.

8. Generally, even ordinary people embrace a woman in secluded places, but this observer of great vows indulges in dalliance with his wife, in an open assembly.

Śrī Sūka said:

9. Even Lord Śiva of unfathomable mind laughed out heartily on hearing it, and kept quiet in that assemblage. The members of the assembly also followed his example.

10. The goddess angrily spoke to the impudent Citraketu who was proud of his own self-control, and who passed unbecoming remarks against Lord Śiva, about whose irresistible powers he was ignorant.

Pārvatī said:

11. Is this now the ruler of the world and the punisher thereof? Is he competent to mete out punishment to wicked and shameless fellows like us?

12. Neither god Brahmā nor the sons of Brahmā like Brṛgu, Nārada and others, neither Sanatkumāra nor Kapila and Manu comprehended Dharma (righteousness), for they raised no objection to Hara’s transgression of dharma.

13. This impertinent wretched Kṣatriya insults wise gods and sages, and reproves this preceptor and father of the world whose lotus-like feet are meditated upon by the above-mentioned (great personages), and who is the very embodiment of the highest dharma. Therefore, this fellow should be punished.

14. This haughty self-conceited person does not deserve to be allowed to approach the feet of Lord Viṣṇu which are reverently worshipped by pious sages.

15. Oh wicked fellow! Go forth hence to the most wicked demonic existence of Asuras so that you may not again speak ill of the great, Oh child.

Śrī Śuka said:

16. Citraketu who was thus imprecated, got down from the aerial car, and propitiated Saṭī (Goddess Pārvatī) paying her obeisance with his head bent low, Oh Parīkṣit.

Citraketu said:

17. I accept your curse with my folded palms, Oh Mother. Whatever is pronounced by gods about mortal being is something predestined for him.

18. In this whirling wheel of Samsāra, a creature, being deluded by ignorance, wanders experiencing pleasure and pain, everywhere, at all times.

19. Neither one's self nor another is the creator of pleasure and pain. It is only the unwise who regards himself or another person as the author of pleasure and pain.

20. (All this Samsāra is the product of Guṇas). In this stream of Guṇas, what is the distinction between a curse and grace? What is the heaven or the hell? And what is the difference between pleasure and pain?

21. It is the glorious Lord alone who creates all beings by dint of his Māyā power. To these are ordained bondage and liberation, pleasure and pain, but he himself is above them all.

22. To him none is dear or hateful; none a cousin or a relation; none is friend or an enemy; he is equal to all.

290. GS. explains that Pārvatī was really sympathetic towards Citraketu, but the curse was a reproof against his audacity.
everywhere and absolutely pure. He has no attachment for pleasure. How can there be wrath in him?

23. It is however the outflow of his energy called Māyā manifested in meritorious or sinful acts, that becomes the cause of pleasure and pain, good and bad, bondage and liberation. birth and death of embodied beings, and causes transmigration of the Soul.

24. Therefore, Oh wrathful Goddess, I do not propitiate you for relieving me from your curse. But Oh Sati (Pārvatī), please forgive me for what you consider as an unrighteous expression from me.

Śuka said:

25. Having propitiated Lord Śiva and goddess Pārvatī in this way, Citraketu left by his aerial car, while they looked wondering.

26. Then the glorious god Rudra (Śiva) spoke to Pārvatī while gods, sages, Siddhas and his attendants were listening (reverentially).

Rudra said:

27. Oh beautiful lady (possessor of dainty waist), you have seen the nobleness of the high-souled servants of servants of Hari of miraculous deeds and how they are free from desires (of any kind).

28. All who are devoted to Nārāyaṇa are not afraid of anybody for they see the same Reality in Svarga, Mokṣa and even in hells.

29. It is through the sporting activities of the Lord that the Soul is invested with a body and experiences pairs of opposites like pleasure and pain, birth and death, grace and curse, through contact with the physical body.

30. The notion of desirability and undesirability with reference to pleasure and pain is certainly illusory and false, and it is the result of man’s lack of discrimination and knowledge. For it is like the difference (between the experience of pleasure or pain by seeing oneself to have become a prince or a pauper in a dream) felt within oneself or the impuration of the notion of a serpent on a garland of flowers (while one is awake).*

31. To persons who are bearing intense devotion to venerable Lord Vāsudeva and whose power lies in spiritual knowledge and renunciation, no object is worth seeking or resorting in this world.

32. Neither I, nor god Brahmā, nor Sanatkumāra or Nārada or the sons of God Brahmā, sages, nor the great gods who are but parts of his parts comprehend his intention. We do not know his real nature though we regard ourselves as independent rulers.

33. To him nobody is beloved or hateful, nobody is his own or an alien. Hari being the Ātman (inner controller) of all beings is the beloved of them all.

34. This highly blessed Citraketu is a beloved follower of the Lord. He looks upon all as equal and is serene. I am also beloved of Lord Viṣṇu. Therefore, I did not get angry with him.

35. You need not, therefore, wonder about (the behaviour of) high-souled men who are devotees of the Supreme person Viṣṇu—the votaries who are tranquil by nature, and regard all beings as equal.

Śrī Śuka said:

36. Having heard the explanatory speech of the glorious Lord Śiva, the goddess Pārvatī got over her feeling of wonder and became appeased and calm in mind, Oh King.

37. Even though the votary of Viṣṇu, Citraketu, was most competent to retaliate the Devi’s curse by counter-curse, he accepted it bowing down his head (with great respect and humility)—which is the characteristic of righteousness.

38. Assuming the body of a Dānava, Citraketu was born in the Dāksiṇāgni of Tvaṣṭṛ, and became famous as Vṛtra. He was, however, endowed with spiritual knowledge and wisdom (despite his birth as a demon).

* VR. : The Jīva is an individual constituted of pure consciousness. The difference as a god or man or a sub-human being with reference to Jīva and the desirable and undesirable states (e.g. pleasure and pain, birth and death, grace and curse) are due to the lack of discrimination. It is caused by eternal Karma and induces one to identify oneself with the physical body. Moreover, this notion of difference is like pleasant and unpleasant sights in a dream.

39. In this way I have narrated to you everything which you enquired about the cause of Vṛtra’s birth as a demon, and his devotion to Hari.

40. Hearing this sacred history of the noble-minded Citraketu and the glory and greatness of votaries of Viṣṇu, one becomes liberated from the bondage (of Sāṃsāra).

41. He who gets up early in the morning and recites this episode with reverence, and observing silence, meditates on Lord Hari, attains to the highest region (Mokṣa).

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN*

(The Birth of the Maruts)

Śrī Śuka said:

1. Pṛśni, the wife of Savitṛ (the fifth son of Aditi) gave birth to three daughters, namely, Sāvitṛi, Vyāhṛti and Trayā and (nine sons, namely,) Agnihotra, Paśu, Soma, Cāturmāsya and the five great sacrifices.

* In the introduction of this chapter, ŚR. states that this chapter is in continuation of the first six chapters in which the progeny of the first four sons of Aditi has been enumerated. He underscores the allegorical significance of this chapter by explaining what deities are described here.

291. The deity presiding over the holy Gāyatrī Mantra.
292. The deity presiding over the three mystical syllables, viz., Bhūḥ, Bhūvah and Svār usually repeated after OM. These are prefixed to the Gāyatrī Mantra. They stand for the earth, the intermediate region and the heaven.
293. The deity presiding over the three Vedas, viz., Rgveda, Yajurveda and Sāmaveda.
294. The deity presiding over the acts of offering oblations into the sacred fire.
295. The presiding deity of animal sacrifices.
296. The deity presiding over the Soma Sacrifice.
297. The presiding deity over the three Cāturmāsya sacrifices performed at the beginning of the three main seasons, viz., the summer, the rainy season and the winter.
298. The names of the five great sacrifices (Mahāmakha) are as follows:
2. Oh dear Parīkṣit! Siddhi, the wife of Bhaga (the sixth son of Aditi), brought forth three sons, namely, Mahiman, Vibhu and Prabhu, and a beautiful pious daughter called Aṣis.

3. Out of the four wives of Dhāti (the seventh son of Aditi) Kuhū bore Sāyam; Sinivāli; Darśa; Rākā Prātar; Anumati Pūrṇamāsa respectively.

4. Samanantara or Vidhāti (the eighth son of Aditi) begot on Kriyā the Fire-gods called Purīṣya. Carṣaṇī was the spouse of Varuṇa (the ninth son of Aditi. He is the deity presiding over water). To her was reborn Bhṛgu (the son of Brahmā).

5-6. Vālmīki, another son of Varuṇa, was a great Yogi. They say that he was born from an ant-hill. The sages Agastya and Vasiṣṭha were born of Mitra and Varuṇa who, in a jar, deposited their semen that was discharged at the sight of and in the vicinity of the celestial damsel Urvasī. Mitra (the 10th son of Aditi) begot through Revatī three sons, namely, Utsarga, Arīṣṭa, and Pippala.

7. We are told that the king of gods, Indra, (the 11th

---

1) Brahmajajña: Propitiation of the ancient sages. It consists of teaching and chanting the Vedas.

2) Pitṛajajña: Grateful acknowledgement of our debt to our departed forefathers. This includes tarpana or pouring water as oblations in their memory and for their gratification.

3) Deśajajña: Propitiation of gods through homa (pouring oblations in the sacred fire uttering their names).

4) Bhūtajajña: Offering a portion of our food to all sub-human beings in acknowledgement of our debt to them.

5) Nṛyajajña: Worship of our fellow beings. It consists of offering food and shelter to an atithi (A traveller staying for only one day).

These five daily sacrifices are binding on every householder (Vide Manu 3.70-71).

299. The deity presiding over the last night of a dark fortnight.
300. The presiding deity over the evening.
301. The deity presiding over the 14th night of a dark fortnight.
302. The presiding deity over the last day of a dark fortnight.
303. The presiding deity of the last night of the bright fortnight.
304. The presiding deity of the morning.
305. The deity presiding over the 14th night of a bright fortnight.
306. The deity presiding over the last day of a bright fortnight.
307. The five deities presiding over the sacred fires known as Purīṣya.
son of Aditi) procreated through Paulomi or Śacī three sons, namely, Jayanta, Rṣabha and the third Mīḍhas, Oh child!

8. Urukrama who was god Viṣṇu who appeared as Vāmana through his own divine Māyā (and who was the 12th son of Aditi) begot on his wife Kīrti, a son called Bṛhacchloka who was the father of Saubhaga and other sons.

9. We shall narrate in detail later (in Skandha VIII) the feats, excellences and the deeds of the high-souled son of Kaśyapa, namely, Vāmana, and also how he incarnated as the son of Aditi.

10. Now, I shall describe to you the sons of the sage Kaśyapa from his spouse Diti. Among them were born the great devotees of Viṣṇu, namely, the glorious Prahlāda and Bali.

11. Diti had two sons, namely, Hiraṇyakaśipu and Hiraṇyākṣa who were respected by Daityas and Dānavas. They were described (formerly in Skandha III).

12-15. The wife of Hiraṇyakaśipu was a Dānava lady called Kayādhu. She was the daughter of Jambha and was given in marriage to Hiraṇyakaśipu. She gave birth to four sons, namely, Samhrāda the eldest, and Anuhrāda, Hrāda and Prahlāda. Their sister was Śimhikā by name. She got from Vipracittia son called Rāhu whose head was lopped off by Hari with his disc (Sudarśana) while he (Rāhu) was drinking ambrosia. Kṛti the wife of Samhrāda gave birth to Pañcajana. Dhamani the wife of Hrāda bore Vātāpi and Ilvala. It was Ilvala who cooked Vātāpi for the celebrated guest Agastya.

16. Anuhrāda brought forth through his wife Śūrmyā two sons Bāṣkala and Mahiṣa. The son of Prahlāda was Virocana who had from his spouse Devī, a son called Bali.

17. From Bali, a hundred sons out of whom Bāna was the eldest, were born to (Bali’s queen) Āsana. We shall recount later on (in Skandha VIII) the glory of Bali which deserves celebration.

18. Having propitiated god Śiva, Bāna attained the first place among his attendants. The glorious god Śiva is by his side and He is still guarding his capital city.

19. Diti had sons called Maruts. They were fortynine in number. All of them were childless and they were brought over by Indra and were converted to his own class of gods.
The King (Parīksit) said:

20. Oh Preceptor, how did Indra convert their inborn demonic nature to godhood? What obligations did they render to Indra which made him convert them into gods.

21. Oh worshipful sage, these other sages along with me, earnestly desire to know the details. You should therefore expound that to us.

Śūta said:

22. Oh Śaunaka, having heard that speech of Viśurāta (king Parīksit), Śuka, the son of sage Bādarāyaṇa (Vyāsa), greeted it with heart full of joy, as it was full of earnestness and was brief yet pregnant with significance. The Omniscient Śuka spoke as follows:

Śrī Śuka said:

23. Diti whose sons were slain by Viśnu as the ally of Indra, in the background, was burning with wrath enkindled by grief and she began to ponder.

24. “When can I get happy sleep after bringing about the death of the hard-hearted wicked sensual Indra, the cruel murderer of his brothers.

25. The body which is addressed as “A Lord or a Ruler”, goes also under the name of worms (becomes full of worms after burial), excrement (if the body is eaten up by carnivorous animals or birds of prey), and ashes (if it is cremated). He (Indra) who seeks to injure other beings for such a body, does not know self-interest, for it leads to hell.

26. By what means can I get a son who will quell the pride of Indra who wrongly presumes that this body is eternal and who is very arrogant (of unrestrained heart)?”

27-28. With this object in view, she many times served what was wished by her husband. By her service, affection, modesty, self-control, intense devotion, by her charming sweet words as well as by her winning smiles and side glances, she who was intimate with the knowledge of human nature, captivated his heart.

29. Thus enchanted by the sly, clever woman, Kaśyapa, though learned, became powerless (against her charms). He succumbed to her and acquiesced in her request. Such stupefaction by women is not to be wondered at.

30. At the beginning of creation, Prajāpati found that beings entertained no attachment (and the work of creation was not possible), god Brahmā (then) converted half of his body into a woman who leads astray the judgments of men.

31. The worshipful Kaśyapa who was thus waited upon by his wife, was highly pleased with Diti. With a hearty laugh, he greeted Diti with delight (and said).

Kaśyapa said:

32. Ask for a boon Oh beautiful lady with shapely thighs. Oh faultless one, I am pleased with you. When husband is pleased with his wife, what object in this or in the next world, is unattainable?

33-34. It has been declared that the husband alone is the supreme deity in the case of women.

For the glorious Lord Vāsudeva, the husband of the goddess Śrī, who is in the heart of all beings, is worshipped in the guise of different deities by men who ascribe to him different names (e.g. Indra, Vaṭuṇa) and forms (wielder of the Vajra, or of a noose). But he is worshipped by women in the form of their husbands.

35. Therefore, Oh lady of beautiful waist, chaste women who are desirous of their welfare, worship with unswerving devotion their husband as the image of god and the Soul of the world.

36. I who am worshipped by you with so much devotion and with such superb faith, shall accomplish for you your desired object, Oh blessed lady—an object which is very difficult to be attained by unchaste women.

Diti said:

37. "Oh Brāhmaṇa sage, if you are conferring a boon on me, I pray for an immortal son who will slay Indra, for he (Indra) caused both of my sons killed and I have become a lady whose sons are dead."

38. Hearing her speech, the Brāhmaṇa became dispirited and repented (as follows): "Alas! What a great unrighteousness and sin have overtaken me today!

39. Alas! Today I have fallen a victim to sense gratification. I allowed my heart to be captivated by Māyā (deluding power) in the form of a woman. Vile as I am, I shall certainly fall in the abysmal hell.

40. What fault is there in the case of the woman who followed the natural tendencies of women? Alas! Fie upon me who am ignorant about my self-interest and lost the control of my senses.

41. Who can fathom the motives of the actions of women whose countenance is beautiful like the fully bloomed autumnal lotus, whose speech is like ambrosia to the ear but whose heart is sharp like a razor-blade.

42. Women whose minds are determined to achieve their own objective have no one really dear. For serving their own purpose, they will kill or cause to be killed their husband, son or brother.

43. I have promised that I shall give her a son. That promise should not prove untrue. But Indra does not deserve death. Under these circumstances the following expedient appears proper.

44. Oh descendant of the Kurus! Considering thus, the worshipful son of Marīci (Kaśyapa) showed some indignation and condemning himself said.

Kaśyapa said:

45. Oh blessed lady, if you carefully observe this vow for one complete year, a son will be born to you who will be the slayer of Indra, or a friend of gods (if this vow is not properly observed).

Diti said:

46. Oh Brāhmaṇa sage! I hereby undertake to observe the vow. Explain to me what acts are obligatory and what are prohibited for me, and also the acts which (are neither obligatory nor prohibitive but which) do not violate the vow.
Kāśyapa said:

47. You should not injure any of the living beings. You should not curse or tell a lie. You should not pare your nails or cut your hair. You should not touch an impure and inauspicious thing.

48. You should not take bath into water by plunging in it. You should not get angry or speak with wicked men. You should not put on unwashed garments nor should wear a garland worn by others.

49. You should not eat food which has remained after being eaten by others; nor food offered to the goddess Bhadrakāli or to seven Mātrkās or eaten by ants. You should not eat nonvegetarian food or food brought by a Śūdra. You should not take food which is seen by a woman in monthly course. You should not drink water with your folded palms.

50. You must not go out with remnants of food sticking in the mouth or without rinsing the mouth with water. You should not stir out in the evening with dishevelled hair, unadorned or without the upper garment. You should not be unrestrained in speech.

51. You should not sleep without washing your feet or in an impure condition or with wet feet. (You should not go to bed) with your head to the North or to the West. You should not sleep with others or without any clothes. You should not remain asleep at dawn and dusk.

52. Putting on washed garments, always pure and furnished with all auspicious things, you should worship god Viṣṇu, goddess Śrī, cows and Brāhmaṇas before you take breakfast in the morning.

53. You should worship women whose husbands are alive, by offering them garlands, sandal-paste, food and ornaments. Having worshipped your husband, you should wait upon him and contemplate that your husband's energy is present in your womb.

54. If you will observe this vow called Purāṇavāna (yielder of a son) for the period of one year without any flaw, you will beget a son who will be the slayer of Indra.

55. Diti agreed to that. She conceived from Kāśyapa and strictly (began to) observe the vow, Oh king.
56. Having come to know the intention of his maternal aunt the sly foresighted Indra waited upon Diti who was staying in a hermitage, (under the pretext of) rendering service to her.

57. At the appointed time he always brought flowers, fruits, sacred sticks, kuśagrass, leaves, shoots, earth and water from the forest.

58. Oh King, in this way the crooked Indra, desiring to find out some flaw in the course of the observance of vows of the lady who had undertaken them, served her like a hunter who puts on the guise of a deer.

59. Indra who was intent on detecting a weak point in her observance of vows, could not find it. He became intensely anxious as to how he could succeed (in securing his good).

60. Once in the evening, Diti who was fatigued with the observance of that austere vow and deluded by fate, slept with the remnants of food in the mouth (without rinsing her mouth with water), and with unwashed feet.

61. Getting this opportunity, Indra who was expert in Yoga entered the womb of Diti by his deluding power of Yoga, while Diti was unconscious in sleep.

62. With his Vajra he cut in seven parts the foetus which was brilliant like gold. While it was crying he said "Don’t cry," and cut each of that piece into seven again.

63. While they were being rent, all of them folded their palms and appealed to him "Oh Indra, we are Maruts, your brothers. Why do you wish to kill us?"

64. "Don’t be afraid, Brothers, you are for me", said Indra to the Maruts who as a class had unswerving loyalty to him as his attendants.

65. The foetus in the womb of Diti did not die through the grace of Lord Viṣṇu even though it was repeatedly hacked with Vajra," just as you were saved from the missile of Aśvatthāman.

66. If a person worships but once the Ancient Person Viṣṇu, he attains to the self-same form as that of Viṣṇu, whereas the great god Hari was worshipped by Diti for a period slightly less than one year.
67. Along with Indra the Maruts became in all fifty gods. Removing the stigma of maternal heredity, they were made participants in Soma-drinking by Indra.

68. After getting up, Diti saw her sons brilliant like fire in the company of Indra. The faultless lady felt highly gratified.

69. She asked Indra, “Child, desiring a son which would strike terror in the sons of Aditi, I observed this vow which was most difficult.

70. I expected to have one son. How is it that I got seven times seven (fortynine)? Oh Son, if the truth is known to you, please tell me, but don’t tell a lie.”

Indra said:

71. Oh mother, having learnt about your determination, I approached you. Detecting a flaw in the observance of your vow, I who did not care for righteousness and was bent on achieving my object, slashed the foetus.

72. I hacked the foetus in seven ways and there were seven sons. Each of them was cut in seven; but they did not die.

73. Having seen that greatest miracle, I came to the conclusion that this must be some indescribable incidental Siddhi achieved through the worship of Lord Viṣṇu.

74. Those who without entertaining any blessings propitiate the Lord, do not wish the attainment of even Mokṣa, are declared as clever in accomplishing their objects.

75. After propitiating the Ruler of the World who is one’s own Soul and is a bestower of his own Self, what wise man would seek contact with guṇas (worldly objects)? For (the products) the guṇas are available even in hell.

76. Therefore, Oh Mother, it behoves you to forgive this act of wickedness on my part which I, as a fool, committed to the worshipful ones. Fortunately the foetus has become alive again (after death).

Sri Suka said:

77. Indra, the god of heaven, was permitted (to go) by her who was sincerely pleased with him. He, along with Maruts, bowed to her and went to the heaven.
78. In this way, I have narrated to you in details what you had asked me, namely, the auspicious birth of the Maruts. Now tell me what else I should relate to you.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

(The Details of the Vow called Puṁsavana)

The King (Parikṣit) asked:

1. I wish to know, Oh Brāhmaṇa Sage, the details of the vow called Puṁsavana which you have mentioned, as Lord Viṣṇu is propitiated thereby.

Śrī Śuka said:

2. With the permission and consent of her husband a woman should begin on the 1st day of the bright half of Mārgaśīrṣa this observance of vow which is calculated to confer all desires on one.

3. She should listen to the narrative about the birth of Maruts and consult the Brāhmaṇas. Cleansing her teeth white and having taken a bath, she should put on two white garments. Adorning herself with ornaments, she should worship Lord Viṣṇu along with Śrī in the morning, before taking the breakfast.

4. (She should pray as follows:) "Oh Lord of accomplished desires, I bow to you who, being endowed with enough of all things, are (hence) above wants and expectations. Salutations to you, the Lord of Lakṣmī, the master of all mystic powers.

5. Oh Lord! Possessor of excellences like supreme grace, fortune, prowess, glory, energy and other divine attributes as you are, you are the real omnipotent Supreme Ruler of the world.

6. Oh Divine consort of Viṣṇu, the supreme deluding power of the Lord, you possess the same characteristics as those of the Supreme Person Viṣṇu. Be propitious unto me, Oh Almighty Goddess. Oh Mother of the universe, I bow to you.
7. I offer worship to the glorious Lord designated by the sacred syllable OM, the Lord who is the Supreme Person, most mighty, the Lord of Mahālakṣī, along with his highest potencies.

Invoking daily god Viṣṇu by chanting the aforesaid mantra, one should offer, with concentrated mind, articles of worship such as water for washing his (Viṣṇu’s) hands and feet, and rinse his (Viṣṇu’s) mouth and water for taking bath, silken garments, the sacred thread, ornaments, sandal-paste, flowers, incense, light, food and other articles.

8. Out of the food left after offering it to Viṣṇu, twelve oblations of that food should be offered to the fire with the mantra “Salutation to the glorious Supreme Person (Viṣṇu) of unlimited powers and denoted by the sacred syllable OM. I offer these oblations to you along with Lakṣī.”

9. Ifone is desirous of securing all worldly prosperity, one should always devoutly worship goddess Lakṣī and Lord Viṣṇu who confer boons and both of whom are the fountainheads of all blessings.

10. She should prostrate herself before them just like a rod on the ground, with her heart submissive in devotion. She should repeat the (above-mentioned) mantra for ten times and sing (the following) Hymn:

11. “Both of you are the Lords of the universe, the ultimate cause of the world. This is verily the subtle Prakṛti, your deluding potency (Māyā) too formidable to be overcome.

12. You are directly her Supreme Ruler, the Supreme Person. You are the embodiment of all sacrifices while she is the sacrificial performance. She is activity itself while you are the enjoier of the fruit thereof.

13. This goddess is the manifestation of guṇas, while you are the cause of that manifestation and the enjoier of the guṇas. You are the Soul, the inner controller of all embodied beings, while Śrī is the body, senses and the inner organ. The glorious Lakṣī represents the name and form, while you are their support and their illuminator.

14. Inasmuch as both of you Supreme Rulers confer boons on the three worlds, Oh Lord of hallowing renown, may my great desires be fulfilled.”
15. Eulogizing thus the Lord of Śrī along with Śrī who confers boons, one should remove all articles used in worship. Having offered water to rinse the mouth (to the deities), one should continue to worship. (known as uttara-pūjā)

16. She should then praise with the above hymn, with her mind merged in devotion. Smelling the remnants of the offerings to fire, she should again worship Hari.

17. Identifying with great devotion her husband with Lord Viṣṇu, she should serve him with various objects dear to him. The husband who is loving by nature, should himself help in all the activities of his wife, whether they be great or small, pertaining to the worship of God.

18. It is enough if this vow is observed by one of the couple (husband and wife). If the wife is incapable (for reasons of health) or disqualified (due to monthly course), the husband should observe it with concentrated mind.

19. This vow pertaining to Viṣṇu, if once undertaken, should not be violated under any circumstances. Every day she should worship with devotion Brāhmaṇas and women whose husbands are alive, by offering them wreaths of flowers, sandalpaste, food and ornaments, and should also worship Lord Viṣṇu.

20. After requesting the deity to retire to his abode, one should eat what was offered to the deity, for self-purification and attainment of all desires.

21. After performing such process of worship for a period of twelve months, the pious lady should observe fast on the last day of the month of Kārttika.

22. When the morrow dawns, she should touch water (take bath) and duly worship Lord Kṛṣṇa as before. The husband should offer twelve oblations according to pārvaṇa-sthāli-pāka vidhāna (a kind of sacrificial performance) of rice cooked in milk and mixed with ghee, (in the sacrificial fire).*

23. Having reverentially accepted the blessings pronounced by the Brāhmaṇas who are pleased, and having devoutly

* The text of the Bh.P. used by VR. adds:

"Looking upon Brāhmaṇas as the embodiments or forms of the Supreme Soul, she should serve meals to them with devotion and should give to them sesame seeds coated with jaggery and fried grains, and drinking vessels full of water."
paid obeisance to them by bowing the head, she should take meals with their permission.

24. After feeding the preceptor first along with the relatives, the husband, with his speech restrained, should give the remnants of the caru, which is capable of conferring good progeny and ensuring good fortune, to his wife.

25 A man who observes this vow of the Almighty God with due formalities, gets his desired object. A woman who observes this will get good fortune, wealth, progeny, longevity to her husband (throughout her life), glory and a good house.

26-27. An unmarried girl will get a husband possessing all good characteristics. A widow will be rid of her sins and attain to Liberation. A woman who loses her children in death) will get long-lived children. A woman if ill-fated in spite of wealthy condition, becomes blessed with good fortune and if ugly looking, becomes beautiful. A chronic patient of long period gets free from disease, and becomes energetic and virile in his senses and activities. If it is repeated at the time of auspicious ceremonies, it gives eternal and infinite satisfaction to forefathers and divinities.

28. If the Fire-God, the goddess Lakṣmī and Lord Viṣṇu are pleased after the completion of Homa (sacrifice), they confer all desired objects. Oh King, I have narrated to you the auspicious story of the birth of Maruts and the great vow observed by Diti.

CHAPTER ONE

Conversation between Yudhiṣṭhira and Nārada:
Jaya and Vijaya cursed

The King (Parikṣit) said:

1. How is it that the glorious Lord who is by nature impartial and friendly to all beings, killed Daityas for the sake of Indra, as if He was impelled by partiality, Oh Brāhmaṇa sage?

2. Being transcendental to Guṇas (He is above love and hate). He is the very embodiment of perfect bliss. He has no selfish ends to be served from the host of gods, nor does He entertain any fear from Asuras and nor does He cherish any hatred towards them.

3. Oh highly fortunate one, this has been our great doubt about the excellences of Lord Nārāyaṇa. Your Worship should please dispel it.

Sri Śuka said:

4. Oh great King, you have asked a good question. The life of Hari is miraculous and mysterious. It contains the glories of the devotees of the Lord and promotes devotion unto Him intensely.

5. The legendary story of Hari which is highly meritorious is sung by sages like Nārada and others. After paying obeisance to Kṛṣṇa-Dvaipāyana Vyāsa, I shall narrate to you that.

6. Though the Lord who is transcendental to Prakṛti, attributeless, unborn and unmanifest, enters into the guṇas of his own Māyā. He assumed the role of the chastiser to those who deserved punishment (i.e. became the cause of enmity between gods and demons).

7. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas are the attributes of Prakṛti and not of the Ātman, nor is there a synchronous increase or decrease of them.
8. During the period of the ascendancy of Sattva, he enters into the bodies of celestials and sages, and He thus intensifies their power. During the preponderance of Rajas, he does so for Asuras. During the dominance of Tamas, he fosters Yakṣas and Rākṣasas. It is in conformance with the Time-spirit that this happens. (Not that God is partial).

9. Like fire (in the wood), space i.e. Ākāśa (in a pitcher), he appears in many forms or bodies without being distinguished from the body occupied by him. It is only the discerning who, after meticulous investigation (by introspection) into the Ātman as residing in themselves, realize Him (as being distinct from guṇas and their products).

10. When the Supreme Self desires to create cities, i.e. bodies, for enjoyment of the Jīva, he creates separately Rajas (which was in a state of equilibrium) and impels it to act with dominant force. When the Lord desires to sport Himself in multifarious bodies, he makes the Sattva act. When he desires to go to sleep, i.e. to withdraw the universe within himself, he sets in motion the Tamas.

11. Oh King, this infallible Creator and Controller of the universe, through the instrumentality of Prakṛti and Puruṣa, creates the Present Time which acts as their supporting associate. The entity that is designated as Time, promotes the power of Sattva. Due to the fostering of Sattva by Time, the Lord of extensive fame, the Controller of Time, appears as a friend of gods (whose dominant characteristic is Sattva) and destroys the enemies of gods who are dominated by Rajas and Tamas. (It is due to his presence that Time has the potency to achieve this).*

12. Oh King, on this very topic was narrated a legend by the divine sage Nārada, when he was respectfully questioned by Yudhiṣṭhira formerly, in the great Rājasūya Sacrifice.

13-14. Having seen the most marvellous absorption of Sītāpāla, the king of Cedi, in Lord Vāsudeva at the great

* VR.: Supreme Soul creates the Present Time which, being pervaded by Him, is like His body. He then brings forth Prakṛti and Puruṣa—the sentient and the insentient phenomena. When it is the time for protection through Sattva guṇa, the Lord impels the Time to increase the power of gods only and defeat the Asuras who are dominated by Rajas and Tamas.
sacrifice called Rājasūya the king Yudhiṣṭhira, the son of Pāṇḍu, became astonished in his mind, and asked the divine sage who was sitting there, in the presence of the sages.

_Yudhiṣṭhira said:_

15. Oh, it is extremely marvellous that Śiśupāla, the hater of Vāsudeva was absorbed into Vāsudeva, the Supreme Reality, as such merger is very difficult even to those who are exclusively devoted to Him.

16. Oh Sage, all of us are solicitous to know (the explanation of) this mystery, for Vena who used to revile the Lord was cursed to hell\(^1\) by Brāhmaṇas.

17. The wicked son of Damaghoṣa, Śiśupāla was wrathful and jealous about Kṛṣṇa since his childhood-lisping up to this time. Even so was the wicked Dantavakra.

18. Why is it that the tongue of those who constantly blasphem ed Viṣṇu who is the immutable transcendental Brahman, was not affected with white leprosy or that they did not enter the blinding darkness of hell?

19. How is it that they were so easily absorbed into his Lordship of incomprehensible nature, even while all people were looking on?\(^2\)

20. This (miracle) confuses my intellect and makes it unsteady like the flame of a lamp flickering before the wind. Your worshipful self should please explain to me the reason of this most wonderful event.

_Sūrya said:_

21. Hearing that speech (query) of the king, the worshipful sage Nārada was pleased, and addressing to him, he recounted the episodes connected with this event while the members of the assembly were listening

_Nārada said:_

22. Censure and eulogy, respectful and disrespectful treatments are meant for this body which is brought forth

1. GS. explains that Vena was killed. He did not go to hell.

2. SR. points out that though Dantavakra was not absorbed at that time, his future merger with Vāsudeva was astrologically predicted and is hence treated as a _fait accompli_, by Nārada.
through want of discrimination and ignorance between Prakṛti and Purusa, Oh King.

23. By the false notion of identity between the body and the Soul, arises the misapprehension of one’s being different from others. It leads to the concept of individual distinctness expressed by the words “I” and “Mine” and (gives rise to) the feeling of pain under punishment and harsh words.

24. The killing of creatures is the destruction of the body which they have identified with the Soul and the notion of individuality (i.e. ‘I’ and ‘Mine’). But the Lord is without a second and the Soul of all. Being absolute, he has no such attachment (or the sense of individuality), he chastises the wicked for their good and not out of malice. How could harmlessness (Himśā) be attributed to Him?

25. Therefore one should concentrate one’s mind on Him either through constant hostility or through devotion characterised by absence of malice or enmity or through fear or love. By this concentration, a person will perceive nothing else but the Lord.

26. It is my definite conclusion that just as a mortal being attains identification and concentration with the Lord by cherishing enmity, he does not (with that intensity and to that extent) attain absorption through devotion.¹

27. A worm shut up by a wasp (in its hole or nest) on a wall, broods over it (the wasp) so intensely and continuously through hatred and fear that it gets transformed into a form like a wasp.

28. Thus those who cherish enmity against the glorious Supreme Ruler Kṛṣṇa who appears a human being through his Māyā power, attain to him as their sins are washed off by their constant meditation upon him through hatred or fear.

29. Many persons have attained unto union with the Supreme Lord after being purified of all the impiety by concentrating their mind on the Lord through love, hatred, fear, affection and devotion.

30. Gopis (wives of cowherds) through love, Kamsa through fear, Śisupāla and other kings through hatred, Vṛṣṇis

¹. VJ. & VC. point out that this verse does not advocate hatred as the best form of devotion, though superficially it appears to do so.
through kinship, you Pāṇḍavas through friendship and affection, and we sages through devotion (attained identity with him), Oh King.

31. Vena does not fall under any of the five categories of devotees of the Supreme Man. One should therefore fix one’s mind on Kṛṣṇa by any one of the means (detailed above).

32. Oh Pāṇḍava, Śiśupāla and Dantavaktra, the sons of your maternal aunt, were the foremost attendants of Viṣṇu; but they fell down from that position through the curse of a Brāhmaṇa.

Yudhiṣṭhira said:

33. It appears certainly incredible that those who are exclusively devoted to Hari, were compelled to be born again. Therefore (please tell us) whose curse it was and what was the nature of the imprecation which overpowered the servants of Hari.

34. The residents of the city or region called Vaikuṇṭha are of pure sattvic form and are devoid of material body, senses and the like. You should narrate to us how it led to the assumption of corporeal existence (in the case of such residents of Vaikuṇṭha).

Nārada said:

35. Once upon a time, Sanandana and others (Sanaka etc.) the sons of Brahmā, went to the region of Viṣṇu, by chance, while they were ranging at will, through the three worlds.

36. Though they were born earlier than elders like Brahmā’s sons (such as Marici and others), they looked like children of five or six years in age. All of them had no garments (and were completely nude). Thinking them to be kiddies those two door-keepers (of Viṣṇu) prevented them (from entering).

37. Being enraged at this, they cursed, “Both of you (doorkeepers) are fools. You do not deserve to live near the feet of Lord Viṣṇu (much less to serve him) as his feet are completely free from Rajas and Tamas. Hence, immediately turn into the most sinful form of Asuras.”
38. While both of them were falling down from their place due to this curse, they were addressed by the merciful sages, “Both of you will be fit to return to your region (Vaikunṭha) after three births”.

39. Both of them were born as the sons of Diti. The elder was Hiraṇyakaśipu and the younger brother was Hiraṇyākṣa. Both of them were respected by Daityas and Dānavas.

40. Hiraṇyakaśipu was killed by Hari assuming the Man-Lion form. Hiraṇyākṣa was killed by Viṣṇu incarnating in a boar form while lifting up the earth (sunken into the cosmic waters).

41. Hiraṇyakaśipu adopted various devices to torture his son Prahlāda to death, as he wished to kill him for his (Prahlāda’s) love and devotion to Viṣṇu.

42. Despite his endeavours to kill Prahlāda, he could not do so, as Prahlāda identified himself with the soul of all beings; was serene and looked upon all as being Brahman (and therefore equal). He was also surcharged and covered with Lord Viṣṇu’s power.

43. Thereafter, both of them were born as Rākṣasas as the sons of Keśinī and Viśravas. They were Rāvana and Kumbhakarna, the tormentors of all the worlds.

44. Even in that incarnation, Viṣṇu became Rāma, the descendant of Raghu, and killed them for redeeming them from the curse. You will hear the prowess of Rāma from the lips of Mārkaṇḍeya, Oh King.

45. That very pair was born as Kṣatriya, as the sons of your maternal aunt. Now (not they but) their sins (and their present body, as the consequence of the curse) being destroyed by Sudarśana disc of Kṛṣṇa, they are now rescued from the curse.

46. Both of them were led to absorption in Kṛṣṇa (Acyuta), through their contemplation (of Kṛṣṇa) intensified by the bitterest enmity. They have again returned to Hari’s presence, as attendants of Viṣṇu.

Kṣadhisṭhira asked:

47. How is it that Hiraṇyakaśipu came to cherish hatred towards his high-souled beloved son? And how did Prahlāda happen to devote his mind exclusively to Hari? Please tell me this in detail. Oh worshipful sage.

CHAPTER TWO

_Hiranyakashipu consoles his mother and kinsmen_

Nārada narrated:

1. When Hari, who had assumed the form of a boar, thus killed his brother Hiranyaḥkṣa (out of partiality to gods), Hiranyakashipu was agitated with wrath and grief, Oh King.

2. Trembling with rage, biting his lips, and with eyes fiercely blazing with anger, he looked at the sky which appeared full of smoke; he spoke thus.

3. Looking fierce with his terrible big teeth, frowning look, and terrific looking face with knit eyebrows, he raised his trident in the assembly of Dānavas and addressed them as follows.

4-5. “Oh Dānavas and Daityas, Oh Dvimūrdhan (two-headed demon), Oh three-eyed one, Śambara, hundred-armed one, horse-headed one, Namuci, Pāka, Ilvala, Vipracitti, Puloman, Śakuna and others! Listen to my words and then immediately execute them. Do not delay.

6. My beloved brother was killed by insignificant enemies through Hari who, though impartial, sided with them through their services (to Him).

7. He (Viṣṇu) was originally pure and impartial but through his assumption of the form of a boar by his Māyā, he has fallen away from his original nature. Like a child, he sides with him who serves him. His mind is unstable.

8. I shall satisfy my brother who is thirsting for blood, with the profuse blood (of Viṣṇu) with his neck cut off by my trident, and thus I shall relieve my grief.

9. -When the crafty adversary (whose actions are inscrutable) is destroyed, the residents of heavens (gods) whose very life is Viṣṇu, will wither away like branches of a tree the roots of which are cut.

10. (While I am accomplishing this), you immediately repair to the earth which has been made prosperous by Brāhmaṇas and Kṣattriyas. Slaughter down those who are engaged in austere penance, sacrifice, Vedic studies, observance of religious vows and acts of charity.

11. Viṣṇu owes his existence to (lit. has for his roots in) the religious performance of Brāhmaṇas, for he Himself is the sacrifice and personified righteousness. He is the ultimate resort of gods, sages, manes and beings.

12. Repair to those regions wherein dwell the Brāhmaṇas, cows, (recitation of) Vedas, (proper observance of the duties of) Vānas and Āśramas. Devastate that country with fire, and cut down (the trees etc. useful for sacrifice)."

13. In this way, they respectfully accepted the order of their master, bending their heads. Being innately disposed to indulge in harassment of others, they wrought havoc among subjects (on the earth).

14. They set fire to towns, villages, cow-pens, gardens, parks and fields, hermitages and mines, farmers' settlements, villages at the foot of mountains, cow-herd settlements and even capital cities.

15. Some knocked down and dismantled with spades bridges, ramparts and towers. Some with an axe in hand cut down fruit-bearing trees (serving as food to others). Some set on fire the houses of the people with flaming torches.

16. When people were thus constantly harassed by the followers of Hiraṇyakaśipu, the king of the demons, (sacrifices could not be performed and) gods (who starved due to non-receipt of their share in sacrificial oblations) deserted heaven, and wandered over the earth unperceived.

17-18. (Though himself deeply aggrieved, Hiraṇyakaśipu offered oblations of water to the spirit of his deceased brother, and performed other funeral rites. He consoled the sons of his brothers, viz., Śakuni, Śambara, Dhṛṣṭa, Bhūta-Santāpana, Vṛka, Kālanābha, Mahānābha, Hariśmaśru, Utkaca.

19. Hiraṇyakaśipu who knew what was appropriate for a particular occasion and situation (lit. place and time), addressed the following in soothing words to his nephews (mentioned above) and to their mother (his sister-in-law) Ruṣabhānu and to his own mother Diti, Oh ruler of men.

_Hiranyakaśipu said:_

20. Mother dear! Oh daughter (-in law)! Oh sons! You ought not to lament (the death of) a hero. Praiseworthy and covetable is the death of the brave, while facing the enemy (on the battle-field).

21. The sojourn of beings in this world is like the get-together of travellers in a shed of water-jars (kept on the roadside for travellers to drink), Oh virtuous lady. Similarly, it is by the Providence that creatures are severally brought and are separated by their respective _karmas._

22.* The Soul is eternal (deathless), immutable, pure, omnipresent, omniscient, the cause of everything, yet distinct from the body, (hence you should not lament for Hiranyākṣa thinking him to be dead, separate etc.). Through his Māyā, he creates _gūnas_ (such as various species of bodies, pleasure, pain) and assumes various forms.

23-24. Just as even the (reflection of) trees (in water appears to) move when the waters move, or the earth appears to revolve when one's eyes are swimming, the same way, when the mind gets agitated and conditioned by the _gūnas_, the Perfect Person appears similarly conditioned and invested with a material body, even though he is bodiless.

25-26. It is the perversity of the Soul to presume its identification with the material body which does not exist. By this identification and attachment, are caused one's union with the undesirable and separation from the dear ones, and _vice

* As usual, VR. sets forth the Viśiṣṭādvaita theory of the Soul, viz. Ātman that is _jīva_ pervades the whole body that he occupies (_sarvagā_) through his knowledge. To enjoy the fruit of his _karma_ (whether merit or sin), he activates the _gūnas_ (e.g. Sattva). The association of and separation from the body of each _jīva_ is due to his _karma_.

But VR. does not explain the get-together and dispersal of several _jīvas_ as required by the text of the Bh. P.

VJ. points out that the _jīva_'s relation with his body etc. is temporary, but with that of the Lord is constant. It is the Lord who bestows the _jīva_ with the mind, senses etc. Hari is the real support of the _jīva._
versa, karmas, and entrance into various species of beings, birth and death, sorrows of various kinds, lack of discernment and discrimination (between the matter and the spirit), brooding over the (objects of senses), forgetfulness about the discrimination between the Soul and the body.

27. In this context, the wise people give as an illustration, the following ancient legend, in the form of a conversation between Yama (the god of death) and the kinsmen of a dead person. Listen to that dialogue carefully.

28. In the country called Uśinara, there lived a famous king by name Suyajña. When he was killed in the battle by his enemies his kinsmen stood around him.

29-30. He lay on the battlefield with his armour studded with jewels shattered, his ornaments and wreaths of flowers fallen away from his body. His heart was pierced with arrows and his body lay weltering in blood, the hair of the head dishevelled and scattered. His eyes were blown and lips were bitten with rage. His lotus-like face was covered with dust, and his weapons and arms were cut into pieces.

31. Observing their husband, the king of Uśinaras, reduced to that plight by Fate, the queens were deeply grieved.
Screaming out ‘We are undone, Oh Lord’, they violently beat their breasts with their hands now and then, and fell at his feet.

32. Bewailing loudly and bathing the lotus-like feet of their (dead) husband with tears tinted reddish with saffron paste on their breasts, and their hair and ornaments dishe-velled and scattered, they wailed so piteously and loudly as to cause heartrending grief in the hearts of the listening persons.

33. “Alas ! Your majesty has been transported to a stage of existence beyond the range of our sight, by the merciless Destiny, Oh Lord. You who were once the giver of livelihood (and happiness) to the people of Uśinara country, have now been made the cause of their increasing grief, by it.

34. Oh Lord of the earth! How can we live without you, our best friend and appreciator of merits? Permit us who are desirous of serving your feet, to follow you wherever you will go (i.e. to die after you).”

35. While they were lamenting thus clasping their dead husband, and unwilling to allow him to be removed for cremation, the Sun set in the sky.

36. Having heard the wailings of the relatives of the dead (even while he was in his capital), Yama (the god of death) himself approached them, in the form of a boy, and spoke to them.

_Yama said_.

37. Oh! How astonishing is the folly of these elderly people who have been daily observing the course of the world (viz. the death of everyone who is born). Though themselves of the same (mortal) nature as that of the dead person, they bewail in vain the man who has returned to the (unmanifest) state from which he has come (originally).\(^1\)

38. Oh! How blessed-most we are that though abandoned by parents in this world, we do not feel any anxiety. Weak as we are, we are not devoured by (carnivorous animals like) wolves and others. (We feel confident that) he who protects us while (we were) in the womb, shall protect us (in this world).

39. Oh ladies! The imperishable Lord, at his sweet will, creates, protects and destroys the universe. The wise people call the mobiles and immobiles as mere toys. It is the Lord alone, who is powerful (enough) to preserve and destroy it.

40. Protected by the Lord, one survives even if abandoned by the roadside. If ignored by Him, one meets death even while staying at home. A helpless creature can stay alive even in a jungle, if looked after by Him; while a person if destined by Him to die, shall never live even if protected at home (by the use of medicines, incantations etc.).

41. Bodies of all species (including those of gods, subhuman and human beings) come into existence and perish at a particular time according to the _karmas_ depending on the subtle body. But the Soul though it inhabits the Prākṛti (the corporal body), is not affected by the attributes of the Prākṛti (body) as he is different from it.

1. Cf. _avyaktādīni bhūtāni vyaktamadhyāni Bhārata/ ayaktanidhanāyeva tatra kā paridevanā // B.G. 2.28._
42. This corporal body of Puruṣa (the Soul or Spirit) is caused by delusion, and being made of bhūtas, is different from the Soul, just as a house is different from its dweller. Like bubbles constituted of atoms of water, pots made of earth, gold ornaments made of (solidified) fire, this body formed (out of elements) by Time, undergoes modification and perishes.

43. Just as fire remaining latent in the pieces of wood is distinct from them, or the vital breath existing in the body remains different from it, or the sky pervading all things does not stick to anything, similarly the Soul, the supporter of all the guṇas, i.e. their product, e.g. the body, sense organs or who dwells in them, is distinct from them.¹

44. You fools! This (body called) Suyajña whom you are lamenting, is lying here. He who heard you and then replied, could never be seen by you.

45. Not even the great vital air (mukhya-prāṇa) in the body which is called life, is the listener or the speaker. The principle, which is the master and controller of senses, is the real ātman, and it is distinct from the body and the life-breath mukhya prāṇa).

46. This all-pervasive principle ātman, though distinct, assumes different bodies (celestial, human and sub-human), consisting of five elements (bhūtas), senses and mind, and regards himself as one with them; and by dint of his power and wisdom, he casts them off (as well).

47. So long as its association with Māyā continues, the ātman identifies itself with the subtle body (liṅga-tārīra) and feels attachment for it. The bondage of karma holds sway over him. It leads to the perversion of the Soul, resulting into misery.

48. It is a false notion and attachment to look upon and speak of (products of) guṇas (such as pleasure, pain) as real. Like our fanciful desires and dreams, all sense-experience is unreal.

¹ According to V. verses 42-43 emphasize the distinction of Paramātman from Jīva. In 43, the presence of the Paramātman in the body is not the effect of delusion, and as such he is not affected by the guṇas.
49. Hence, the knowers of the reality do not grieve for what is eternal (the Soul) or what is transient (e.g. body, sense-organs, objects of pleasure). But the nature of those who are given to grieving, cannot be changed (as they have not imbibed the knowledge of reality).

50. A fowler, created as the destroyer of birds (by God) spread his net in the forest, placing allurements at different places.

51. A pair of Kulinga birds (sparrows) was seen flying over it. Out of them, the female sparrow was soon allured by the fowler.

52. The queen-bird, being dragged by Time (Destiny), was enmeshed in the net. Seeing her in that miserable condition, the male partner was extremely afflicted. The pitiable mate, being helpless (to rescue her and to control his own grief), lamented over his miserable companion, out of affection:

53. "Oh! What that merciless yet almighty Providence is going to do with my wife, who herself is pitiable and helpless in every respect, is lamenting for me.

54. May the Deity be pleased to take me also. Of what use is to me the survival of the one (male) half leading a miserable life, after being separated from my better half?

55. How can I maintain those unfledged motherless young ones? Those unfortunate children of mine must be waiting for the arrival of their mother."

56. While the male bird, who was grieved at the separation from his wife, was thus lamenting with his voice choked with tears, the fowler, as if impelled by fate, concealed himself close by, and hit the bird with an arrow.

57. So, you foolish ladies who do not foresee your own destruction (death) will never get back your husband, even if you bewail for hundreds of years."

Hiranyakasipu said:

58. While the child was thus admonishing, all the kinsmen (of Suyajña) became astonished, and realized that everything is transient and unreal.
59. Having exhorted them thus, Yama also disappeared at that very spot. The relatives of Suyajña performed his funeral rites.

60. Hence you need not grieve for yourself or for others. In the case of ignorant beings, the differentiation between one’s own self and another or what belongs to one’s own self and another, is due to the false notion of distinction between one’s own self from another (and the consequent attachment for one’s own body and property)."

Nārada said:

61. Having heard the speech of the king of Daityas (Hiranyakaśipu) Diti, along with her daughter-in-law, immediately stopped sorrowing for her son and steadied her heart by fixing it on Reality.

CHAPTER THREE

Hiranyakaśipu’s Penance—Brahmā grants Boons

Nārada said:

1. Oh King (Yudhiṣṭhira)! Hiranyakaśipu wished to be invincible, unaffected by old age and death, unrivalled and the absolute ruler of all the worlds.

2. With his arms stretched upwards, eyes fixed in the sky and (all the while) standing on the tips of his big toes, Hiranyakaśipu (with the abovementioned desire) performed penance of a severe type, in the valley of Mount Mandara.

3. Like the Sun radiating fiery rays at the time of the destruction of the world, he shone with the brilliant splendour of his matted hair. While he was thus engaged in austerities, gods (who disappeared out of fear) returned to their (former) abodes (in heaven).

4. As a result of his (severe) penance, smoky fire emanated from the crown of his head. It spread in all directions and scorched the higher, middle and lower regions of the universe.

5. Rivers and oceans were agitated; the earth along with its continents and mountains quaked (violently); planets and stars fell down (from their orbits); all the ten directions were ablaze.

6-7 Being scorched (with that fire), gods deserted the heaven and went to the region of god Brahmā, and implored to the creator of the world: "Oh god of gods, Lord of the universe! Being burnt (severely afflicted) with the penance of Hiraṇyakaśipu, the king of Daityas, we are unable to stay in the Heaven. Oh great god! If it pleases you, please bring about its pacification (extinction) before all the people (or regions) who worship you, are not destroyed, Oh Supreme Lord!

8. Do you not know his intention of performing this severely austere penance? (If not) be pleased to listen to it as reported by us.

9-10 Having created this universe of mobiles and immobiles by dint of his penance and Yogic meditation, the creator of the universe occupies his throne (position) exalted over all regions. I too will attain a similar high position for me, by my ever-increasing devotion to asceticism and Yogic concentration. For Time and Soul are eternal.

11. Otherwise, by the power of my penance, I shall reverse the old order of the universe and make it as it was not before (making sins result in happiness, meritorious deeds lead to miseries. The Asuras will be exalted to Svarga and gods and sages driven to Pātāla). What have I to do with the positions of Dhruva, Viṣṇu and others which are abolished by Time, at the end of a Kalpa?¹

12. We heard it reported that, it is with that determination, he (Hiraṇyakaśipu) undertook those rigorous religious austerities. Oh Lord of the three worlds! Now you may please do promptly whatever is proper.

13. Your exalted position as Parameśthi promotes the growth, welfare, prosperity, good fortune and victory of the twice-born ones and cows, Oh Lord of the universe."

¹. The realm of Viṣṇu is eternal. But Hiraṇyakaśipu being of demonic and Tāmasa intellect thought it to be perishable.
14. Thus respectfully requested by gods, Brahmā, the glorious, self-originated god, accompanied by Bhṛgu, Dakṣa and others, went to the hermitage of the king of Daityas.

15. But (at first) they could not find him as he was covered with an ant hill, grass and bamboos and as his skin, fat, flesh and blood were eaten up on all sides, by ants.

16. Brahmā (the swan-riding god) was surprised on seeing Hiraṇyakaśipu tormenting the world with his religious austerities (while lying concealed thus) like the Sun (scorching the world though) covered with clouds. Laughing aloud, he spoke:

Brahmā said:

17. Arise, arise, Oh Son of Kaśyapa! May good betide you! You have accomplished the purpose of your penance. I, the bestower of boons, have come here (to confer any boon you ask of me). Ask for any boon desired by you.

18. I have seen your extremely wonderful fortitude and patience. Though your body is eaten up by gnats, your life resides in your bony skeleton only.

19. None of the sages of yore has performed such austere penance, nor shall others do it in future. Who can verily sustain his life without (drinking a drop of) water for a hundred celestial years?¹

20. By this resoluteness of yours which is hard to practise even by those (great sages) who control their mind, and by your firmness in austere penance, I am conquered by you, Oh son of Diti.

21. I shall bestow on you, Oh leader of Asuras, all the blessings. The sight of an immortal god like me will not be unfructuous and in vain for you (who are but) a mortal.

Nārada said:

22. Having spoken to him (Hiraṇyakaśipu) thus, the first-born god Brahmā sprinkled on the body (of Hiraṇyakaśipu) which was eaten up by ants, celestial water from his Kamanḍalu (earthen or wooden water pot) charged with un-failing potency.

23. From the ant-hill covered with bamboos, there arose, like fire from fuel, a youth of adamantine frame of the body, perfect in all limbs, endowed with energy and power, and with complexion like molten gold.

24. Finding god Brahmā seated on his swan, and stationed in the sky, he was transported with joy at this sight, and reverentially touched the ground with his head.

25. Rising up, he saw the god Brahmā with his own eyes. Reverentially he folded his hands in a suppliant position. With his eyes full of tears of joy, and with his hair standing on their ends, he expressed the following prayer with his voice choked with tears of joy.

Hiranyakaśipu said:

26-27.* "Bow to the all-pervading Supreme Lord, the support of the guṇas—sattva, rajas and tamas, who, being self-luminous, manifested by his own splendour (power), this universe which was enveloped in intense tamas (not darkness), produced by Time, at the time of the periodic destruction of the universe (at the end of each Kalpa), and who, assuming the three guṇas of Prakṛti creates, protects and destroys this universe.

28 Salutations to the Primary Cause (the instrumental cause of the universe who is knowledge and wisdom incarnate, and who (as the material cause) becomes manifest through the modifications, viz., vital airs (prāṇa), senses (indriya), mind and intellect.

29. You govern the mobiles and immobiles through the chief Prāṇa (chief of the five vital airs) and hence, you are the protector of all the creatures, the controller of the mind, and

* VR. notes that due to the tāmasa nature of Hiranyakaśipu, he wrongly thinks god Brahmā to be the Almighty Lord. VJ. also points out that the attributes used here are inapplicable to the four-faced god Brahmā but are proper for Hari who, as an antaryāmin, dwells in all and controls Brahmā.

 VJ. shows that the attributes mentioned herein are applicable both to the Supreme Lord and to god Brahmā.
life principles, of the heart and the sense-organs. You are the mahat (and) as such the ruler of the elements (bhūtas), their guṇas (objects such as sound, touch etc.) as well as their vāsanās (sense-impressions).

30. Through your body consisting of the three Vedas, and the sacrificial lore, requiring four officiating priests (viz. Hoṭṛ, Adhvaryu, Udgāṭr and Brahmā), you perform the seven types of sacrifices (such as Agnisoma, Atyagnisoma, Uktha, Śoḍaśi, Atirātra, Āptoryāma and Vājapeya). You are the Soul of all living beings. You are indivisible, without a beginning and end, and unlimited by time and place, the Omniscient Indwelling Soul and Controller.

31. You alone are the unwinking Time. You reduce the duration of the life of men by units of time called lava, nimesa and others. You are the immutable Soul, the occupant of the most exalted position, the birthless, all-pervading principle, the supporter and controller of all living beings.

32* Neither cause nor effect, or neither mobiles nor immobiles are apart from you. All the branches of knowledge (viz. Vedas and upa-Vedas) and arts (auxiliaries of Vedic studies e.g. phonetics, grammar, prosody etc.) it, this shining are your forms. You are the great Brahmā containing within egg of the universe. You are beyond (transcendental to) Prakṛti consisting of three guṇas.

33 Oh all-pervading Lord! This gross manifested universe is your body through which you enjoy the objects of

* VJ. points out that the attributes in this verse are applicable to the Supreme Lord and this verse is a eulogy of the Inner Controller (antar-yādīn).

“*No mobiles and immobiles of the past, present and future can stand outside and unsupported by you. Both the parā and aparā vidyās abide in your body and are the means of knowing you. You are perfect and beyond the reach of the three stages, viz. wakefulness, sleep and dream.*

 This verse sums up both the gross and subtle forms of Brahmā —VR.

VJ. The words hiranya-garbha etc. show that the universe is Hari’s gross form, in which he enjoys supreme bliss and not misery, or pain like Īśvara-Dhṛtarāṣṭra (an ordinary man).

As usual VJ. gives two interpretations, one applicable to Hari and the other to Brahmā—senses, life-breath (vital energy) and the mind, remaining all the while established in your original most exalted state. You are the unmanifest (subtle) ātman and the most ancient Supreme Person.

34. Salutation to the glorious Lord who has pervaded the whole of the universe by His infinite, unmanifest form and who is possessed of powers called cit or vidyā and acit or māyā.

35. Oh greatest among the bestowers of boons! If you are to confer on me my desired boons, may my death not take place at the hands of any being created by You, Oh Lord.

36-37. Let me not meet death indoors or out of doors; during night or at day time, by the hand of any other (being created by you) or by means of weapons; let there be no death to me either on the earth or in the sky, either by men or beasts; by gods, demons and big serpents; by beings whether living or dead. Grant me matchlessness in fight and the sole absolute rulership of all embodied beings.

38. (Lastly) confer on me the great position and power you enjoy among all the guardians of the world. Kindly grant me the undiminishing glory and unfailing mystical powers enjoyed by those whose power lies in asceticism and Yoga.”

CHAPTER FOUR

Oppression of Hiranyakāśipu and Description of Prahlāda’s devotion

Nārada said:

1. Thus solicited, Brahmā who was extremely pleased with the austere penance of Hiranyakāśipu, granted on him the boons which are very rarely obtained by anyone.

(1) “Oh Hari, you are the most ancient person in Vaikuṇṭha.
This gross manifested universe” etc.

(2) “Oh god Brahmā, you are the Soul (purāṇa—one bound to the body) The four-faced god who does ‘not incarnate (avyakta)’, the rest as above.
Brahma said:

2. "My dear child! These boons that you seek of me are very rarely to be obtained by men. I, however, confer them on you, even though they are very difficult to be secured."

3. Then the glorious almighty god of unfailing grace, who was worshipped by the king of Asuras, departed while being extolled by lords of creation (Prajapatis like Marici and others).

4. The demon who was thus blessed with the boons, assumed a resplendent golden body. Constantly remembering the killing of his brother (by Visnu), he cherished hatred towards the glorious Lord.

5-7. The great Asura subjugated and brought under his control all directions, the three worlds, gods, Asuras, the kings of men, Gandharvas, Garuda-like birds, serpents, demi-gods (like Siddhas, Carena, Vidyadharas); (he subdued) sages, Lords of manes (Pitrs), Manus, Yakshas, Rakshasas, chiefs of Piisacas, Pretas and bhutas (goblins, evil spirits etc.); having vanquished and brought under his sway all the chiefs of living beings, the conqueror of the universe forcibly usurped the regions (and offices) of the protectors of the world, along with their glory.

8-11. He established himself in the celestial region which was beautified with the charming heavenly pleasure-garden (Nandana). He took up his residence in the palace of the great Indra, (which was) constructed by Visvakarman, as the very centre of affluence, wealth and prosperity of the three worlds (OR the abode of the Laksmi of the three worlds). There, the flight of steps are built of coral, the pavement consists of precious emeralds, the walls of crystals and the rows of columns were of lapis lazuli. The canopies are of artistic workmanship; the seats were wrought with rubies; beddings white as the foam of milk, were fringed with wreaths of pearls; the heavenly damsels (of pearl-like teeth) filling the mansion here and there (everywhere), with the sweet jingling sound of their anklets (nupuras), see the reflections of their faces on the floors of precious stones.

In that palace of Mahendra, the mighty, proud yet amimous Hiraanyakashipu, the vanquisher and the absolute ruler of the world, enjoyed himself. He ruled with a strong iron hand, making the oppressed gods and others worship his feet respectfully.

13. With the exception of the three gods (Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva) all the Lokapālas (guardians of the world like Indra), with tributes and presents in their hands, waited upon him (Hiraṇyakaśipu) who was (always) intoxicated with strong-flavoured wines and had his reddish eyes rolling due to inebriation, yet who was the receptacle of penance, Yoga, power and energy, Oh King.

14. Viśvāvasu, Tumburu, I and others (had to) give musical performance in the presence of him who had forcibly established himself on the throne of Mahendra. Gandharvas, Siddhas, sages, Vidyādharas, and celestial nymphs eulogised him, Oh descendant of Pāṇḍu.

15. By his majestic lustre, he alone appropriated the portions of oblations offered in sacrifices with generous sacrificial gifts, performed by persons of various Varnas (classes of society) and āśramas (stages in life).

16. The earth with all the seven continents yielded harvest without ploughing (and other agricultural operations). The heaven offered him whatever he desired, and the sky presented him various wonderful objects.

17. Oceans (lit. mines of precious stones) full of salt water, wine, clarified butter, sugarcane juice, curds, milk and nectar-like (sweet) water, along with their wives (rivers falling in them) bore, on the crest of their waves, heaps of jewels.

18. Mountains along with their caverns afforded him pleasure-grounds. Trees bore fruits and flowers in all seasons. Singly he combined in himself all the different functions of Lokapālas (such as showering, burning, evaporating etc.).

19. He who became the sole, absolute ruler of the world after vanquishing all the directions, enjoyed as much as he liked, pleasures dear to him. But having no control over senses, he was not satiated thereby.

20. In this way, a long period (of more than seventy-one Yugas) passed. With the imprecation of a Brāhmaṇa (Sanaka) hanging over his head, he became inebriated with power and pelf. In his arrogance, he violated the injunctions of the śāstras.

21. Being extremely afraid of his harsh punishments and stern rule, all the inhabitants of the world, along with their protective deities, sought shelter with the unfailing Lord Viṣṇu, as they got no protection anywhere else.

22. (They prayed) "Salutation to that direction where resides Hari, the Soul and sovereign ruler of the universe—the direction (region) after reaching which, pure and tranquil recluses do not return (to the mundane existence)."

23*. Having thus controlled their minds and meditating over the Lord with concentrated attention, they shed off their sins. Foregoing their sleep and subsisting on air only, they prayed Lord Viṣṇu.

23-A (Additional verse in VJ.'s text).

24. A voice emanating from no visible form, deep like the rumbling of clouds and completely filling all the quarters of heaven with its reverberations, was heard by them, assuring protection to the righteous.

25. They heard: "Oh foremost among the gods! Be not afraid. Good betide you all. A sight of myself (as well as the hearing of my voice) is the means to attain all blessings to all creatures.

26. The wickedness and oppression of this wretched Daitya is already known (to me). I shall mete out a suitable pacification (death) to him. Wait till that period.

27. When a person cherishes hatred to gods, the Vedas, cows, Brāhmaṇas, the righteous people, religion and Me, he verily perishes in no time.

* VJ. : In this way, feeling confident in mind that the Lord will protect them and with concentrated attention (thus controlling their external and internal senses) and subsisting on air (and controlling the vital breath—prāṇa) and foregoing sleep (thus controlling their bodies), they repeated the following mantra.

A (1) Hail to the Supreme Person endowed with six excellences, who is the Inner Controller of all, Omniscient and extremely merciful and who is absolute knowledge and bliss incarnate, a resort affording protection.
28. When he (Hiranyakashipu) will maliciously seek to injure his own son, the serene high-souled Prahlāda who cherishes no enmity against anyone, I shall slay him despite his power derived from Brahmā’s boons.”

Nārada said:

29. Thus assured (addressed) by the Father (and the protector) of the world, the inhabitants of heaven (gods) bowed down to him. With all their anxieties allayed, they returned, deeming that the demon is (as good as) killed.

30. The king of Daityas had four extremely marvellous sons. Prahlāda who was the worshipper of the Exalted Being was preeminent amongst them by his virtues.

31. He was full of reverence to Brāhmaṇas and was possessed of noble character, true to his word, self-controlled, and like Paramātman, he was the best friend and well-wisher of all.

32. Like a servant, he bowed at the feet of noble Souls. Like a father he was kind to the poor and needy. With equals, he was affectionate like a brother. He looked upon his elders as his masters. Though he was highly endowed with learning, munificence, personal charms and high lineage, he was completely free from pride and arrogance.

33. In dangers and calamities, his mind (always) remained unruffled. He cherished no desire for enjoyments, heard (as obtainable in the next world) or seen (in this world), as he regarded them to be unreal. He had controlled his senses, vital airs (the life-breath), body and intellect. He completely controlled his desires and kept his mind calm and serene. Though he was a demon by birth, he was devoid of demonic characteristics.

34. Oh King! The excellent qualities of the Lord or of his devotees are now and again extolled by the wise. Even now they are not obscured as is the case with the excellences of the Lord.

35. In assemblies, where the discourses on the appreciation of the righteous take place, gods, Prahlāda’s sworn enemies, cite him as a model (of piety and righteousness). What to speak about the devotees of Viṣṇu like you?
36. Prahlāda had a natural love and devotion to the glorious Lord Vāsudeva. Hence it is impossible to describe his innumerable qualities. The description of his nobleness of Soul (and greatness) is only suggestive (and not exhaustive).

37. Even as a child, he set aside his toys. His mind being completely absorbed in the Lord, he appeared as a dunce. As his Soul (mind) was possessed by Kṛṣṇa, as though like a spirit, its coveted treasure, he did not know the matter-of-fact world (as known to ordinary persons, but was full of his presence). (His Soul was completely absorbed in the contemplation of Kṛṣṇa who was his only object of attraction).

38. Being folded in the embrace of Viṣṇu (i.e. finding himself fully identified with the Lord), he was not conscious of his acts such as sitting, walking, eating, sleeping, drinking or speaking.

39. Sometimes his consciousness would get mixed with anxiety for the Lord, and being agitated, he cried. Sometimes he would laugh in the excitement of his meditation about him; sometimes he would sing loudly.

40. Sometimes he shouted at the top of his voice. Sometimes, banishing all the sense of bashfulness, he would dance about. Sometimes, being filled with thoughts about him and feeling absorbed in him completely, he would imitate him.

41. Sometimes, with his hair standing on end, he would sit silent as if (deeply) satisfied with the Divine touch. (as if the Lord manifested himself in his heart and touched him with his hand). Sometimes, his eyes were half-closed and steady, with tears of joy and love flowing out.

42. By the service of the lotus-like feet of Lord of hallowing glory (Viṣṇu) which he acquired while in association with the Lord's devotees who claim nothing as their own, he attained supreme happiness not only to himself but often imparted that felicity to the minds of others which were polluted and miserable by bad company.

43. To his son, who was such a great devotee of the Lord, magnanimous and a highly noble Soul, that Hiraṇyakašipu tried to do harm, Oh king.
Yudhiṣṭhira said:

44. Oh divine sage of excellent vows! We desire to know from you why the father meted out ill-treatment to his son who was so pure, innocent and righteous.

45. Fathers affectionate to their sons do remonstrate their disobedient sons for the sake of imparting education but never harm any like an enemy.

46. How much less would they do so in the case of such sons who are so obedient, righteous and regard the father as a deity.

Oh Brāhmaṇa sage, be pleased to satisfy our curiosity as to how the hatred of the father towards his son culminated in the father’s attempt on the life of his son (or became the cause of the father’s death), My Lord.

CHAPTER FIVE

The Life of Prahāda

Hiranyakashipu attempts to kill Prahāda

Nārada said:

1. As is reported, the glorious Kāvyā (Śukra) was selected by demons to fill the office of the royal priest. His two sons, Śaṅḍa and Amarka, stayed near the palace of the king of Daityas.

2. They taught the course of studies (in politics and such other sciences) to Prahāda and other eligible Asura students sent to them by the king, even though Prahāda was expert in philosophy.

3. Whatever was taught there by the teacher, he (carefully) listened and reproduced it. But he did not approve of the teaching that was on the false notion of distinguishing between (man and man) as friends and enemies.

4. Oh Pāṇḍava, once upon a time, the king of Asuras seated the child on his lap and asked him, “What do you regard as good, my child?”
Prahlāda replied:

5. Oh Prominent Asura! To embodied beings who are always mentally harassed with the false notion of ‘I’ and ‘Mine’, I regard that it is in their interest that they should abandon the hidden-well-like household which is degrading to the Soul and should enter into the woods and seek shelter with Hari.

Nārada said:

6. Having heard the words of his son which were in favour of the hostile party, he laughed (derisively) and exclaimed: “How the understanding of children gets perverted through contact with others (inimical element)!”

7. Let the child be so carefully guarded in his preceptor’s house, that this intellect should not be vitiated by Brāhmaṇas who are the partisans of Viṣṇu in cognito.

8. When brought home (from the palace of Hiraṇya-kaśipu), the royal priests of Daityas sent for him. Praising him in soft words, they enquired of him in coaxing terms and in a conciliatory tone.

9. “Oh child Prahlāda! May you be happy! Please tell (us) the truth; do not tell a lie. What caused this perversion of intellect which is beyond (i.e. not found in) boys of your age?

10. Is this change (distraction) in your mind brought out by others? Or has it taken place automatically due to your innate nature?

Prahlāda said:

11. Obeisance to the glorious Lord whose deluding power (Māyā) has created the wrong concept that ‘this is mine’ and ‘this is another’s’, found in men whose intellect is deluded by Māyā.¹

12. When He is favourable, the beast-like understanding apprehending differentiation that “This is different (from me) and I am different (from him)”, comes to an end.

¹. Vṛ. attributes this delusion to the Lord.
   “vimohitetyanē pāvara-kartṛtvam jñāyate /”
13. It is the Supreme Soul which is looked upon as one's own Self and another, by stupid people to whom His ways are inscrutable and indescribable. (It is however no wonder.) Even god Brahmā and other exponents of the Veda, are stupefied when they enquire about his nature. It is that Soul who has changed my mind (and outlook).

14. Oh Brahman! Just as a piece of iron within the vicinity of a magnet is automatically attracted towards it, my mind, of its own accord (without any ostensible reason), is gravitated to Lord Viṣṇu.

Nārada said:

15. Having spoken (explained) as above, the highly intelligent Prahlāda stopped (speaking). Reproaching him threateningly, the wretched royal servant got enraged (and ordered):

16. “Who is there? Bring me a cane. This boy brings disreputation to us. The fourth expedient (corporal punishment) has been prescribed in the Śāstras, in case of such a wickedminded fellow who ruins his family.

17. This boy is like a thorny tree grown in the forest of sandal trees in the form of Daityas. He serves as a handle to Viṣṇu who is (like) an axe cutting the roots of that forest.”

18. Intimidating him with various expedients like threats (corporal punishment and others), they made Prahlāda to learn (the text dealing with) the first three objects of human life (viz. dharma, artha and kāma).

19. Later on, the teacher was convinced that Prahlāda had mastered (known) the four branches in political strategy (viz. sāma, dāna, dāṇḍa and bheda). After Prahlāda's mother bathed, dressed and adorned him, he was brought to the presence of the king of Daityas.

20. The Asura (Hiraṅyakaśipu) greeted with blessings his child who lay prostrate at his feet. For a long time he hugged him in his arms and felt deep satisfaction and happiness.

21. Placing him on the lap and smelling the crown of his head, he bathed him with tears. Oh Yudhiṣṭhira, then he spoke to the child of cheerful countenance.
Hiranyakasipu said:

22. "My dear child Prahlāda! Please recite some excellent passages that you have learnt well from what your teacher has taught you up to this time, Oh long-lived one!"

Prahlāda said:

23-24. "There are nine forms of devotion to Lord Viṣṇu—(1) to hear the names, episodes etc. of Viṣṇu, (2) to sing of his name and glories, (3) to Remember him (his name), (4) to render service unto him, (5) to worship him, (6) to pay obeisance to him, (7) to dedicate all one's actions to him, (8) to confide to him as a friend, (9) to offer one's body and belongings to his service and care. I regard it as the highest type of learning, if one offers himself completely to the Lord and performs this nine-fold devotion\(^1\) (regards complete dedication as the condition precedent of real devotion)."

25. Hearing these words of his son, Hiranyakasipu, with his lips quivering with rage, reproached Śukra's son (the preceptor's son) as follows:

26. "You wretch of a Brähmana! What does this mean? Wicked fellow! You sided with the enemies and disregarding me completely, you have taught some non-sense to the child.

27. There are wicked persons in this world who assume a friend's garb, but their friendship is treacherous. Their sin (sinfulness) becomes manifest in due time, like the grave diseases of sinners.\(^2\)

Preceptor's (Śukra's) son said:

28. What this son of yours speaks is not taught by me or by any person. Oh foe of Indra! It is his innate intelligence! Oh king! Please control your anger. Do not lay the blame on us.

---

1. JG. has given a long but excellent exposition of Bhakti and its nine forms which deserve perusal in the original.

2. ŚR. quotes a smṛti text according to which certain types of sinners, e.g., murderer of a Brähmana, a habitual drunkard, a debauched person violating his teacher's bed have to suffer from heinous diseases after completing their term in hell. The question is repeated by VQ, VD, GD, and others.
Nārada said:

29. When he was thus replied by (Prahlāda’s) preceptor, the Asura (Hiranyakāśipu) again asked his son: “If this perverted understanding has not been caused by the teaching of your preceptor, whence has it come, you inauspicious boy?”

Prahlāda said:

30. (Unswerving attachment and) firm fixation of the mind on Kṛṣṇa does not arise through (the advice of) another, or of one’s own accord, or by mutual efforts in the case of those who are firmly devoted to their household (as if it were a sacred vow). Nor (is it engendered) in persons who have not controlled their senses, and who now and again enter the darkness of Sāṃśāra, and who again and again ruminate (repeatedly experience) what they have enjoyed (in former births).

31. They whose heart is polluted (by their attachment to worldly objects) do not know Viṣṇu, to be their (real) objective in life and goal. For they look up for guidance to those who regard the external objects as their aim in life, and are like the blind persons led by the blind. They are tied down (like beasts) with Lord Viṣṇu’s long rope in the form of Vedic injunctions prescribing rites to be performed for future good. (These persons are like persons who go to the east in search of an object lost in the west).

32. So long as persons do not seek bath in the dust on the feet of those noble Souls (the devotees of Viṣṇu) who have shed off attachment to worldly objects, the mind of such persons cannot touch (reach) the feet of Lord Viṣṇu (the Lord of long strides as Trivikrama or the Lord of infinite prowess), the object of which is the cessation of Sāṃśāra (the cycle of births and deaths and the miseries involved).”

33. Hardly did the son (Prahlāda) stop speaking, when

1. ŚR. states: Unless one secures the grace of such exalted Souls, the exact implication of Vedānta and the consequent liberation is impossible.

GS. also agrees with this view.

GD. and BP. state that hereby Prahlāda suggests that it was through Nārada’s grace that he got this spiritual revelation.
Hiranyakashipu with his mind blinded with rage, hurled him from his lap, down to the ground.

34. Overwhelmed with unbearable (violent) wrath, and with eyes reddened with anger, he ordered, "This boy deserves capital punishment. Let him be executed immediately. Oh Nairṛtas, take him away from my presence.

35. This (boy) is verily the murderer of my brother. For this wretched fellow, deserting his own well-wishers, worships like a slave the feet of Viṣṇu, the assassin of his paternal uncle.

36. Or even to Viṣṇu what good purpose can he serve, I doubt; for even as a child of five, he forfeited his parental affection which is so hard to sever.

37. If beneficial, even a stranger should be treated as a child, like medicine (though the medicinal herbs grow into the forest—outside and away from one’s home—they are preserved at home). If a son begotten by one’s own self becomes inimical (works against one’s interest) he should be treated like a disease. One should amputate that part of the body which is injurious to the body as a whole, if by removing it, the rest (of the body) can live in happiness.

38. Like an uncontrolled sense-organ, in the case of a sage, he is a veritable enemy masquerading as a friend (son). He should be disposed of by all expedients, e.g. administering poison in food, killing him while sitting unguarded or while asleep."

39-40 Commanded thus by their master, the demons with sharp teeth, terrific faces and reddish hair and beard, armed themselves with tridents, and giving out terrible yells and shouting "Cut him, kill him", pierced Prahlāda in all the vital parts with their tridents while he was sitting quietly.

41. All their attempts on (the life of) Prahlāda proved fruitless and ineffectual, like the pious acts of a person with no past meritorious deeds to his credit; for Prahlāda’s mind was in communion with the glorious Lord who is the Soul of all beings, the incomprehensible Supreme Brahman.

42. When that attempt was thwarted, the king of demons alarmed and he persistently devised other expedients to kill Prahlāda, Oh Yudhīśthira.
43-44. When the Asura could not kill his innocent son by employing elephants guarding the quarters, great serpents, by use of black magic, by hurling him down from mountain peaks, by using illusive powers (māyā), by confining him in dark holes (silos), administering him poison, by starvation, by exposing him to snow, winds, by throwing him in fire and by throwing mountains on him, he was plunged in the deepest anxiety and could not think of any other (effective) measure to kill him.

45. (Hiraṇyakaśipu thought to himself). "This boy has been severely reproached by me now and again. Measures to kill him were also adopted. But by dint of his own power and energy, he has survived unaffected by those tortures and black spells.

46. He is not away from my presence. Though he is still a boy, his mind is not daunted (through my fear). He is so powerful that he will not forget (and forgive) my unrighteousness (and maltreatment) like Śunaḥśepa.¹

47. He is of immeasurable prowess; he entertains fear from nobody as if he is immortal. It is certain that my death will take place by confronting him or possibly it may not (overtake at all)."

48. In this anxious mood, he was sitting with his countenance pale and downcast, when Śaṇḍa and Amarka, the two sons of Śukra spoke to him in private, as follows:

49. "You have single-handedly conquered the three worlds by terrifying all the Lokapālas (guardian deities of the world) by merely contracting your eye-brows. For such a (powerful) Lord as you are, we see no reason for anxiety. The behaviour of children should not be seriously judged as good or bad.

50. Keep him bound down by the noose of Varuṇa so that he should not run away out of fear, till your teacher Śukra returns. A man's understanding may improve with advancement of age and service of the noble ones."

¹ This refers to the legend of Śunaḥśepa in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa. Śunaḥśepa disowned his father Ajigarta for selling him for sacrifice to Hariścandra and adopted another—Viśvāmitra—gōtra.—ŚR.
51. Expressing his assent to the proposals of the preceptor's sons, he ordered, "The duties prescribed for royal householders be taught to him."

52. Oh King! Then they taught in serial order the details only of Dharma, Artha, Kāma, to Prahlāda who was both modest and obedient.

53. (Though taught systematically), Prahlāda did not approve of the teaching of only the first three objects of human life (as mentioned above), as this instruction was meant for those who were interested in pairs like attachment and hatred, and in the enjoyment of objects of senses.

54. When the teacher was not present (at his class) due to some household duties, he was invited by the school-companions of his age who found opportunity for play (and merry-making).

55. Responding to their call in sweet words, the wise Prahlāda, knowing their attachment to him, spoke to them with a smile, out of grace.

56-57. Out of great regard for him, all the boys whose minds were not vitiated by the advice or actions of persons (teachers) who were given to worldly enjoyments and were subject to love, hate etc., set aside all their play-things. With their eyes and hearts fixed on him, they sat round him. The Asura (Prahlāda) who was a great devotee of Viṣṇu and full of compassion and friendship, addressed them.

CHAPTER SIX (Prahlāda's Teaching)*

Prahlāda said:

1. In this world, a wise person should (begin to) practise the righteous duties leading to god-realization, since his

* The text of VJ. gives the following additional five verses:

Prahlāda said:

(1) Alas! You children! Please listen to my words of advice which will lead to your happiness in every way. Consider (see and very childhood; for birth in the human species is not easily attained. Even though it (human life) is transient, it alone can help us to achieve the desired object (viz. Liberation).

2. It is, therefore, advisable that a person should approach the feet of Viṣṇu in this very birth as he is the (real) Ruler, Well-wisher and the very beloved Soul of all beings. (Hence one should adopt the course leading to the attainment of his feet.)

3. Oh descendants of Diti! Being (closely) related to the body, pleasure, like pain, derived from objects of senses, comes to the lot of embodied beings in all species of life (including sub-human beings) through divine dispensation, without any special effort for it.

4. No endeavours, therefore, should be made to seek sensual pleasures, for, that leads to sheer waste of life. Moreover, by such efforts, the sumnum bonum, viz. attainment of the lotus-like feet of Viṣṇu, is not secured. OR Just as one can attain the Supreme Bliss by resorting to the lotus-like feet of think) of your friends who are no more. Do not get blind by playfulness and follow a wrong path.

(2) Boys of yore did not lose their minds completely in sports. From the time of their birth (or since their childhood), they were desirous of seeking knowledge about the Supreme Soul and final liberation (mokṣa). Whatever has been taught to us by teachers (Śaṅda and Amarka, regarding the first three goals of life viz. dharma, artha and kāma) is not acceptable, inasmuch as it represents wrong objectives (which involves us in saṁsāra) as the desirable aims in life.

(3) If a person who is engrossed in the sleep of ignorance is not wakened up to reality by the precept of a teacher, that precept or doctrine should not be believed, as such a teacher is like a blind person leading other blind persons.

(4) Who is an enemy or an indifferent person or a friend in the case of Alman or my case? (None). The same is the case with you. What is the propriety of studying politics? Prosperity and adversity are caused by the Supreme Divine Agency.

(5) Such a person is very rare to be found as does not violate the righteous course leading to the accomplishment of the desire to realize the Supreme Soul—a person who is not under the control of his senses (which are born with him) or his own people (e.g. sons, relatives, friends) and who has transcended his natural (spiritual) blindness and who by following the Niḥrittidharma (path of renunciation), becomes proper (eligible) for this as well as the next world.
Mukunda (Viṣṇu) one cannot obtain this Bliss through such efforts for sensual pleasure).

5. Therefore, having fallen into this fear (-ful samsāra), a clever person should endeavour to attain that blessed state (of security, viz. mokṣa) immediately while one’s body is in sound condition and is not yet incapacitated.

6. The span of human life is (limited to) one hundred years only. Half of that life (viz. fifty years) is wasted away in the case of a man who has not subdued himself (his senses and mind); for consigned to (and absorbed in) the blinding darkness of ignorance, he lies asleep at night.

7. (Out of the balance of fifty years) twenty years are lost while he is ignorant in childhood and is absorbed in play in boyhood; and twenty (more) years are wasted when his body is overwhelmed with senility and is rendered unfit.

8. Maddened and (deeply) attached to household life due to the forcible pull of desires (of sensual pleasures) which are difficult to be fulfilled, and under the powerful delusion (of one’s ego and belongings expressed by ‘I’ and ‘Mine’), he misspends the remaining portion of his life.*

9. What person who has not conquered his senses can have the power to liberate his own self; who is attached to his house-hold (including wife, children and property) and is tightly bound down with unbreakable ties of love and affection (to them).

10. Who indeed would forego his thirst (passion) for wealth which is dearer than life itself—wealth which thieves (in the house broken by them), servants (while on duty) and merchants (while accompanying their merchandise or cargo) barter in exchange of their life.

11. How can a man renounce his beloved sympathetic wife while remembering his dalliance with her in privacy and her sweet consultation and counsel? (How can one do so)

* 8-A Additional verse in VJ.’s text:

See (take into account) also the conflicts of opinions or quarrels of our householders even though related (to each other)—householders who desire to follow the course of samsāra with efforts which are detrimental to the attainment of final beatitude (and not a single moment is left for spiritual progress—VJ.).
with his friends while being tied down with bonds of friendship and with his sweet-lisping children to whom his heart is deeply attached?

12. Remembering his sons and his beloved daughters (who are staying away in the houses of their fathers-in-law), his brothers, sisters and poor helpless parents, his houses furnished with beautiful abundant furniture, hereditary professions or vocations and his cattle (horses, elephants etc.) and retinue of servants, how can one go away from them?

13. Like a silk-worm (which gets imprisoned by enveloping itself in a sheath without any outlet), he, due to his unsated desires and through boundless infatuation, goes on performing actions out of cupidity (in the hope of accomplishing them), holding pleasures relating to sex and palate in high estimation.—How can he become disgusted with the world (and renounce all worldly attachment)?

14. The careless fellow, deeply attached to his family, does not realize that his turn of existence in this world is being wasted away, and that the purpose of his life (viz. attainment of the highest bliss by devotion to God) is being thwarted in his efforts to maintain his family. Though he is afflicted by three types of misery everywhere, he is not disgusted with the world (worldly objects) as he feels that his family is the (source of) delight to him.

15. With his heart always ever set on amassing wealth and knowing full well the punishment meted out here and the consequences of the sin hereafter, the householder of unsubdued senses and with desires unsated, misappropriates another’s wealth.

16. Even a person noted for his erudition in scriptures, who is bent on maintaining his family in the manner described above, is not verily capable of realizing his own Self (OR of realizing himself as to who he is and what he is committing etc.). (Then what of you?) Oh descendants of Danu! He (even if he be well-versed in Śāstras) whose mind is corrupted with the notion of difference between one’s own and another’s (“mine and yours”) enters the dark hell even as an ignorant person.

17. _For the poor fellow whoever he be, who has become a tool of amusement like a toy deer (or a monkey) for (the entertainment of) lascivious women, and who has forged fetters for himself, in the form of progeny, will not be able to liberate himself at any time.

18. Therefore, Oh descendants of Diti, avoiding from a distance the association with Daityas whose minds are absorbed in (enjoyment of) objects of senses, approach for refuge the most ancient God Nārāyaṇa who is the veritable Supreme bliss (liberation) coveted by recluses who have renounced all association with the world.

19. Being the very Soul of all (mobile and immobile) creatures, and being omnipresent and all-pervading, there is not much trouble and exertion in propitiating the unfailing Lord Viṣṇu, Oh sons of Asuras!

20-21. It is none else than the only one Supreme Soul (Brahman) that the Almighty, immutable Ruler who exists in and pervades the higher and the lower order of beings commencing from the immovables (e.g. vegetations etc.) and culminating in god Brahmā, in all the transformations of elements (the inanimate world of matter or bhūtas) in bhūtas (gross elements e.g. the sky, the wind), in guṇas (like sattva) in Pradhāna (the stage in which all guṇas are in a state of equilibrium)¹ and in Principles like Mahat² (which are evolved due to the uneven mixture of guṇas).

22 He, as the Inner Controller (of every being) is the seer, the enjoyer and as such is indicated as ‘the pervader’. He is also the object of perception, the objective world enjoyed and is described as ‘the pervaded’. He is, however, beyond description, and undifferentiated (though he is spoken of as being different).

23* The Supreme Lord is essentially pure consciousness and absolute bliss. But he conceals his glorious Lordly nature

¹. guṇa-sāmya—(i) The primordial matter, Pradhāna—ŚR., SD., GD., BP. etc.
   (ii) At the time of the Pralaya—VJ.

². guṇa-nyatikara—(i) The evolute Mahat—ŚR., SD., GD., BP. etc.
   (ii) At the time of the creation of the world—VJ.

VR. puts forward the Viśiṣṭādvaita theory re: God and the world as follows:

The Lord has Jīva as his special body and the perceptible inanimate conscious world as the gross body. Being incomparable, he is One by his Miśā Power which gives rise to guṇas—the creation of the world.

24. Therefore, eschewing out your demonic nature, show kindness and friendliness to all beings, whereby Lord Viṣṇu (God transcendental to sense perception) will be pleased.

25. When the Lord of infinite excellences, the Prime Cause of all, is pleased, what can there be unattainable (to his devotees)? What is the use to us of the objects of human life: Dharma (artha and kāma) which accrue of their own accord by the product of guṇas (designated as Providence, the result of one's past deeds)? Of what attraction is the Mokṣa (Final Liberation) which is so covetable to all,—to us who sing of the glory of his feet and taste the nectar-like sweetness therefrom?

26. The triad of the highest purposes of human life, viz. dharma (religious merits), artha (attainment of wealth) and kāma (fulfilment of desires), the spiritual lore, the ritualistic lore, logic, politics and various means of livelihood—I regard all these, the subject matter of the Vedas, as true—only if it serves as the means of offering one’s self to the Supreme Person who is the true friend of all. (Otherwise they are meaningless).

27. It is traditionally reported that Lord Nārāyaṇa, the companion of (the sage) Nara, imparted to Nārada this pure and sanctifying knowledge which is so difficult to obtain. It will, however, be attainable to those who have bathed their bodies in the dust of the lotus-like feet of the absolutely devoted votaries of the Lord—votaries who are devoid of all desires except God-realization.

Supreme Being who enters the body to support it but is unaffected by the modifications of the body and hence immutable. The Lord is perfect in his six excellences and he controls the jīva according to his karma.

VJ. He is within everything an antaryāmin, Inner controller. He pervades them from outside, in the form of Time. Under another designation Brahman, he is the one who is indicated both as pervader and the pervaded. He cannot be defined like a material object like a pitcher. Though Omnipresent he is invisible as he is concealed by Miśā or Prakṛti who is the source of Sattva and other attributes so essential for creation.
28. It is from the (sage) Nārada who has realized God that I heard (learnt) formerly this knowledge with the immediate apprehension of truth as well as teaching in the pure course of righteous duties and devotion to the Lord.

Sons of Daityas said:

29. Oh Prahlāda! You and we do not know any other person except the sons of preceptor (Śukrācārya,) as our teachers, as they have been our masters since our childhood.¹

30. Association with the great (sages) is extremely difficult for a child who is (brought up) in the harem. Please remove our doubt by confiding us with some evidence to give credence to your version, Oh gentle one.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Prahlāda, enlightened while in mother’s womb

Nārada continued:

1. When he was thus questioned by the sons of Daityas, the great Asura devotee of the Lord smiled and remembering my teaching, replied to them as follows:

Prahlāda narrated:

2. When our father (Hiraṇyakaśipu) repaired to Mount Mandara to practise religious austerities, the gods made great preparations to wage war against the Dānavas.

3. Indra and other gods began to say thus: “It is really fortunate that the sinful Hiraṇyakaśipu, the scourge of the world, has been eaten up by his own sins, as a serpent is nibbled away by ants.”

4. Having heard of the tremendous military preparations of the gods, leaders of Asura forces capitulated when attacked, and fled in terror to all directions.

¹ We who are engaged in our studies are not seeking God—VJ.
5. All of them were so anxious and in haste to save their lives that they paid no heed to their wives, sons, friends, relatives, house, cattles and other belongings.

6. Desirous of total victory, the gods ransacked and devastated the king's palace, while Indra seized the chief Queen, my mother.

7. Fortunately, by a happy chance, the divine sage Nārada arrived there and saw her being carried away on the road while she was trembling (with fear) and crying like a female osprey.

8. Peremptorily he intervened, "Oh Lord of gods! You should not carry away this innocent woman. Leave her, Oh blessed one, Let go this chaste lady who is the wife of another person."

Indra replied:

9. "There lies in her womb an unbearable force—the seed of the enemy of gods (Hiraṇyakaśipu). Let her stay in my custody till her delivery. I shall accomplish my purpose (by killing the new-born child) and then let her go."

Nārada said:

10. "This (child in the womb) is sinless and an eminent devotee of the Lord. This follower of Ananta is essentially so powerful by his excellences, that he will not meet death at your hands."

11. When addressed thus, Indra respected the words of the divine sage (Nārada) and set her at liberty. He circumambulated her out of devotion to the beloved votaries of the infinite Lord and returned to heaven.

12. Thereupon the sage brought our mother to his hermitage. He consoled her and said, "Oh my daughter, stay here till the return of your husband."

13. Agreeing to that proposal, she, being free from fear (from all quarters) dwelt in the hermitage (lit. presence) of Nārada while the king of Daityas did not return from his terrible austere penance.

14. That pious pregnant lady waited upon the sage with utmost devotion for the well-being of the foetus in the womb and the boon of delivery at any time desired by her.
15. Possessed of that Spiritual Power, the kind-hearted sage granted her both (the boons), and for assuaging her grief and with a view to communicating it to me, he imparted her instruction in the essence of righteousness (viz. devotion unto the Lord) and pure knowledge (regarding the nature of the Soul and the non-Soul).

16. (The memory of) that teaching however faded away in the case of my mother due to the lapse of a long time (that intervened), and also due to her being (after all) a woman. But being specially favoured by the sage, it (the recollection of the precepts) has not left me even up to this moment.

17. If you have faith in my words, even your intellect and understanding will be capable of destroying the (false ego of) identification of the Self with the body etc.¹ Just as that sense has been generated in me through faith, it will appear in the case of women and children as well.

18. Just as, through the agency of (eternal) Time which is capable of bringing about modifications, the six transformations, (viz. birth, existence, growth, ripeness, decay and destruction) are found in the case of fruits of a tree (while they are on the tree which lasts much longer), six modifications beginning with birth are observed in relation to the body (so long as it is associated with the Soul) but not to the Soul (which is eternal and unchangeable).

19. The Soul² is eternal (not subject to creation and destruction), undeteriorating (free from decay), pure (untouched by love, hate etc.), one (without second), the seer

1. vaidsāradī dhi—(1) More keen intelligence in grasping the reality—VR.

2. 5.5—VR. takes this as jīva (individual soul) while VJ. understands Paramātmā (Supreme Soul) by this term and interprets:

VR: This verse describes the essential nature of Jīvātmā in the liberated stage. As distinguished from the body the Jīva is eternal, subject to no deterioration or modifications,untainted by the guṇas of Prakṛti, one as it is of the nature of consciousness running through all bodies, knowing its own body, self-conscious, the support of the body, senses etc., because of the movement of bodies (the motive force behind them), all-
(the intelligent subject), the support (of the universe), the immutable, self-effulgent, the primary cause (of the world), the all-pervading, untouched (by anything) and perfect (or uncovered by Māyā).

20. With the help of the twelve supreme characteristics mentioned above, the learned person should renounce the wrong notions of 'I and Mine' with reference to one's body and belongings, as the notion arises out of delusion (and ignorance).

pervading through his power of knowledge, unassociated with another jīva, and uncovered (with nothing to hide his real nature).

VJ. takes together vv. 19 and 20 and interprets:

(19) Paramātman is eternal by his very nature, suffering from no loss of any member of the body, pure as he is free from the influence of avidyā, attachment etc., the Supreme-most and hence the One, knower of the nature of the body, the support of everything else, subject to no modification or change either due to his innate nature or through the influence of others, Self-seeing (Self-conscious of his Brahmahood), absolutely independent, all-pervading, unattached as he is above Prakṛti, not affected (by external forces, not subject to ignorance or other obscuring factors (19).

(20) He who realizes the ātman (the Supreme Soul) by these twelve distinguishing characteristics would (automatically) give up the false notions of 'I' and 'Mine' with respect to one's body (and property etc.) caused by delusion and ignorance.

VC. states: For, the purification of oneself is caused by the form of devotion called meditation (cintana). The Supreme Soul that is to be meditated is described as follows. VC. here quotes ŚR. verbatim.

SD. explains a few adjectives differently! Kṣetrajña—Knowing all (vyuṣṭi-samuṣṭi) bodies aggregatively and dis-aggregatively. ātaya—the material and instrumental cause for the creation, sustenance etc. of all mobile and immobile. Avukriya—essentially unchangeable but by his eternal powers of mobility and immobility brings about the creation and destruction like the spreading out and withdrawing of the limbs of the tortoise.

SD. contradicts VR. by asserting that this verse does not refer to jīva (jīva-paro nāyam ślokāḥ).

GD. explains that though the characteristics of jīva and Paramātman are different, jīvātman is a part (aṁśa) of Paramātman and as such there is non-difference between them. This non-difference between the two is implied in this verse. The explanation of the epithets is the same as that of ŚR, 21* Just as a metallurgist specialised in gold extraction out of ore, is able to obtain gold from gold-bearing rocks found in gold-fields, by using the requisite processes (of smelting etc.), similarly a person expert in the spiritual lore (including the causal relations, will be able to attain to Brahma- hood in the fields in the form of the bodies (of different jīvas), through the different processes of realizing the Soul (ātman).

22. (After analysis of the whole creation and reducing it to fundamental Principles), Teachers of yore (like Kapila and others) have stated that there are eight Prakṛtis (viz. the Primordial matter or mūla Prakṛti, Mahat (Principle of cosmic Intelligence). ahaṁkāra (ego, I-ness) and five subtle elements, three (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas) as their guṇas (modes of Prakṛti), and sixteen modifications (viz. five gross elements, ten conative and cognitive senses and mind) but the Person or Soul is one, co-ordinating them all.

23. The body is the combination of these all. It is twofold—mobile and immobile. It is here (in the body) that the Soul is to be sought and discriminated, by a process of elimination (viz. This is not the Soul; it is not it).

24. By means of abstract deliberation of the positive and negative concomitance (the omnipresence of the Spirit yet its distinctness from others), by his power of discrimination, and with purified mind and patient reflection over the phenomena of creation, sustenance and the destruction of the universe, that the Soul is to be realized.

25. The states of wakefulness, dream and deep sleep

* (1) VR: The person who realizes the true nature of the Soul as distinguished from the body, not only attains the knowledge of the Supreme-most Person, but realizes the true essential nature.

(2) adhyātma-viś—One who is well versed in Vedānta-sāstra with reference to the Soul: realizes in practice the Sāttvic virtues; expert in the knowledge about elements.

SD: This verse deals with the knowledge of three Principles viz. non-sentient (universe), the sentient (the Soul) and God who, being different from these, controls them.

SD: It is the God or Brahman who is within all, is to be propitiated by all, through all forms of devotion.

 VJ. takes buddhi as jīva and interprets: "Guided and prompted by the Supreme Lord, the jīva experiences the states of wakefulness etc. The presiding Lord who assumes different forms, e. g. Viśva, Taijasa and Prakṛti is different from jīva."
are the functions of the intellect \( \text{buddhi} \). He who is cognisant of (lit. experiences) these (three states) is the transcendent person (who is distinct from the body, senses, the mind etc.), the witness (of these all).

26.* Just as one perceives (the presence of) the wind by means of the different fragrant particles with which it is laden, due to the association of those particles with it (in spite of its distinctness from those particles), one should realize the essential nature of the Soul (\( \text{atman} \)) by the transformations of the intellect which are associated with it, but are repudiated as not being the attributes of the Soul but of the intellect, and are permeated with three \( \text{gunas} \), and born of actions or \( \text{karmas} \) (even though due to his association with intellect—\( \text{buddhi} \)—the Soul appears to be characterised by the modification of the \( \text{buddhi} \)).

27. The \( \text{samsāra} \) comes into being through the ‘gates’ of the intellect (\( \text{buddhi} \)) as it is perpetuated (lit. is fast bound) by the modifications and activities of \( \text{buddhi} \). It is rooted in ignorance, and as such is unreal. It, however, is regarded as the dream (state) of man.

28 Hence you should at the outset, burn down the seed (viz. \( \text{avidyā} \) of the \( \text{karmas} \) which are motivated by the three

* As in v. 25 VJ., interprets \( \text{buddhi} \) as \( \text{jīva} \) and tries to substantiate the \( \text{Dvaita} \) thesis that the \( \text{jīva} \) is different from \( \text{Paramātman} \). To summarize his gloss: The \( \text{jīva} \) (individual Soul) is different from the Lord who possesses three forms viz., \( \text{Viṣṇu} \), \( \text{Taijasa} \) and \( \text{Prajña} \). He directs the three states (e.g. wakefulness, dream and deep sleep). The three states and their \( \text{gunas} \) characterised by the colours white, black and yellow distinguish the grades of \( \text{jīvas} \). To the ignorant, the Lord seems like a \( \text{jīva} \). But the intelligent people (\( \text{prajñājanāḥ} \)) perceive him to be the same consciousness and the bliss incarnate.

 The text of VJ. gives the following additional verse:
As all the actions are created by the mind and are of momentary nature, they resemble the things in dream and wakeful states. They cause grief, delusion and fear to the person experiencing them (which would not have happened had they been unreal).

 According to VR. the seed of \( \text{karmas} \) is ‘the mistake of the body for the Soul’. The way to burn down this seed is to put an end to the stream of \( \text{buddhi} \).
gunas. This causes the cessation of the functioning (lit. current) of buddhi. (This is) Yoga—the way of merger with the Lord.

29. Out of the thousands of expedients (for annihilating the seed of karmas), the one specifically inculcated by the venerable sage Nārada is the proper performance of the acts which will automatically generate deep love and devotion directly unto the Supreme Lord.

30-31. (This is achieved) by rendering devout service to the preceptor (or by a sincere desire to listen devoutly to the teaching of the preceptor), by offering all one’s earnings to him, by associating one’s Self with pious devotees of the Lord, and by propitiating the Lord, by reverential liking for listening to the stories of the Lord, by extolling his excellent attributes and glorious deeds, by meditating on his lotus-like feet and by seeing and worshipping his images.

32. With an implicit belief in the presence of the venerable Supreme Lord Hari in all created beings, one should treat them with due respect at heart, and (as far as possible) offer them their desired objects.

33. In this way devotion unto the Supreme Lord Vāsudeva is practised by persons who have conquered the group of six passions (viz. lust, anger, greed, delusion, pride, jealousy) or of six senses (external five cognitive senses and mind—the internal one). It is by (such) devotion that one develops (devotional love) unto the Lord.

34. When he hears (lit. having heard) the accounts of his great deeds, incomparable attributes (e.g. love towards devotees) and his heroic exploits (e.g. killing of Rāvana) un-achievable by others but carried out by him through his incarnations (like Rāma, Kṛṣṇa) assumed by him in sport, he (the devotee) with his hair standing on end through rapturous delight, and in a voice choked with tears, sings loudly with an open throat, shouts and dances.

35. When like a person possessed by an evil spirit, he sometimes bursts out into laughter here and screams out there;
now he meditates, now he bows down to the people. Frequently he breathes heavily and with his mind absorbed in ātmā, losing his sense of bashfulness, he utters loudly, "Oh Hari!
Lord of the Universe! Oh Nārāyaṇa".

36. (It is) then that a man is set free from all bondages.
His mind and body is attuned to the Lord through contemplation over his pastimes and sportive actions. The seed of ignorance and the consequent (latent) desires being burnt down, by the great device of devotion, he attains to Lord Nārāyaṇa
(from Whom there is no return to saṃsāra.)

37. In the case of embodied beings whose hearts are polluted (with worldly attachment, love etc.), mental communication with Adhokṣaja¹ is the means of breaking the rolling wheel (cycle) of births and deaths. The (spiritually) wise people regard it as the absolute bliss of absorption in Brahma.
Therefore, you do worship the Lord residing in your heart.

38. Oh children of Asuras! What extraordinary effort is required in worshipping Lord Hari Who abides in your heart like space, and Who is your own Self and an intimate friend?
What is the good of acquiring the objects of senses which are commonly attained to by all embodied beings?

39. Wealth, a wife, cattles, sons and others (kinsmen) houses, landed property (or the earth), elephants, treasures, luxuries of life and all desired objects are evanescent. How much pleasure can all these fleeting objects afford to one whose life may cease at any moment?

40. In the same way, definitely susceptible to destruction are the heavenly worlds which are attained to by performance of sacrifices. They are excelled by others (in merit and aﬄuence). Nor are they unpolluted (as they excite jealousy)
—Therefore for the purpose of realizing the Self, do you worship the Supreme Lord with absolute, desireless devotion. For no fault in the Lord has been discerned by the Vedas or the Smṛtis.

1. (i) Vṛ. reads adhokṣajālāpam for adhokṣajālāmbham and states that this verse describes that the narration of and conversation about the glories of the Lord, leads to the bliss of final emancipation.

(ii) Śr. notes v. 1. adhokṣajālāmbam ‘Taking resort to god Viṣṇu.’
41. In this world a person who supposes himself to be learned and wise, many times performs (Vedic, ritualistic and other) actions with the aim of obtaining it (sensual pleasure), but invariably reaps fruit quite contrary to it.

42. The expectation of a person in undertaking the performance of some religious action is for obtaining happiness and release from miseries. But due to this desire or action he who was (full of happiness due to his desirelessness (i.e. before he was possessed with the desire of happiness or the performance of the action) encounters nothing but misery due to his desires.

43. The physical body for (the happiness of) which a man desires to secure objects of enjoyment by performance of actions actuated by motives, is transient and factually belongs to others (as food for carnivorous beasts and birds of prey). It passes away and (again) returns (to the Soul).

44. How much more so must be one’s progeny, wives, houses, wealth and such other things (and in the case of kings their) kingdom, treasury, elephants, ministers, servants and relatives—(all of) which are indirectly connected (through one’s body) and whom he regards as his own.

45* The Soul himself is an ocean of eternal bliss. To him, of what interest are these flimsy things (enumerated above) which are sure to perish along with the body—contemptible things which appear covetable as Purusārtha (ideal in life), but which actually lead to undesirable ends (like hell).

46. Oh Asuras! Consider to what extent can self-interest (pleasure) be derived through sexual enjoyment etc.¹ by embodied beings who have been suffering miseries from their past actions since their conception (in their mother’s womb and other further stages of life in this world till death).

47. The embodied being, with his body obedient to his dictates, begins to perform actions (meritorious or sinful) as

* To those who argue that Lord Viṣṇu assumes incarnation in physical bodies for sensual enjoyment, the verse replies: Hari who is by nature consciousness and bliss is not interested in physical pleasures of the jīva (individual Soul)—VJ.

¹ ŚR. remarks: There is no scope for enjoyment of pleasures under the circumstances.
a consequence of which he extends (builds) a body (of his next incarnation)—(the process continues ad infinitum)as both body and karmas are promoted through ignorance.

48. Therefore, even though wealth, enjoyment and acts of righteousness (the three Purusārthas) are easily available to the devotees of Hari as they depend on Hari, you should, without cherishing any desire (for them), worship Lord Hari, your very Soul who is perfectly desireless.

49. The Supreme Ruler Hari, the beloved Ātman, the controller and indwelling Soul (antaryāmin) of all beings (whose bodies are) created out of the gross elements (e.g. the earth, water etc.) which (in their turn) are evolved by Him.

50. It is by resorting to the feet of Mukunda (Lord Viṣṇu) that a god, an asura (a demon), a human being, a yakṣa or a gandharva—whoever he be—becomes blessed like us.

51-52. Oh Asura boys! It is not the (eminence of) birth as a member of the twice-born family or as a god or as a sage that is sufficient for the propitiation of Hari. Neither righteous conduct, nor extensive knowledge nor charity nor penance, or performance of sacrifices, cleanliness (of body and mind) nor observance of vows is enough for His grace. Lord Hari is pleased through pure (unalloyed) devotion. All the rest is sheer mockery.

53. Hence, Oh descendants of Danu, you focus your devotion on the Almighty Lord Hari who is the Soul of all created beings, by considering everything else as (dear as) your own selves.

54. (Through such devotion) the descendants of Diti demons), Yakṣas, Rākṣasas, women, Śūdras (low caste people), cowherds (like Ābhīras etc.), birds. beasts and even sinful jīvas have attained to immortality (the self-same nature as Acyuta).

55. Unswerving absolute devotion to Govinda (Lord Viṣṇu) which requires viewing His presence in and regard for every creature (mobile or immobile)—this alone has been enunciated in the Śāstras as the highest Purusārtha of man in this world.
CHAPTER EIGHT

Death of Hiranyakasipu and Praise of Nṛsiṁha

Nārada continued :

1. Now, all the Daitya boys listened to the exhortation of Prahlāda and accepted it due to its faultlessness, but not so the teaching of their preceptors.

2. Thereupon, when the son of the preceptor Śukrācārya observed that their mind was exclusively bent on realization of a single purpose (viz. Lord Hari), he got alarmed and immediately he made a factual report of the state of affairs to the king (Hiranyakasipu).

3. Hearing that unpleasant and unbearable misdemeanour on the part of his son, the Daitya, with his body trembling under the impulse of rage, made up his mind to finish with his son.

4-5. Severely reprimanding Prahlāda in a harsh language, though he did not at all deserve it, Hiranyakasipu, cruel by nature as he was, glared askance at him with a wicked look, and heaving heavily like a serpent trodden under foot, he thundered at Prahlāda who, in perfect self-control, stood bent with modesty and with his hands folded.

6. “Oh ill-mannered, stupid wretch, a bane of my family! I shall today despatch you to the abode of Yama, as you have become an obstinate transgressor of my commands.

7. “You stupid fellow! Relying on whose power did you undauntedly violate my command—I, at whose wrath, all the three worlds along with their guardian deities tremble with fear?”

Prahlāda replied :

8. He is verily the source of power not only of me, Oh King, but of yours as well as of all other mighty beings. He is that force that keeps under control all creation, high and low, mobile and immobile, beginning from god Brahmā.

9. He is the Supreme Lord, the Eternal Time (—spirit), of mighty strides and of great prowess. He is the very essence of the mental and organic power, courage, intelligence, physical power and that of sense organs. He is the Supreme Controller of the three guṇas. He alone creates, protects and destroys this universe by His potencies.

10. Do you give up this Asura (demonic) nature of yours. Keep your mind equable and serene. There are no (external) enemies except one’s uncontrolled mind which goes astray. Know that equipoised mind (looking on friends and foes equably) is the highest form of propitiating the Infinite Lord.

11. Some persons (like you) regard themselves as conquerors of the ten cardinal points, even though they have not, in the first place, controlled the six robbers (viz. five senses and the mind) plundering within. Enemies are born due to one’s delusion. How could there be external enemies to the wise who have subdued their mind, and look up all embodied beings as equal.

Hiranyakasipu said:

12. Oh dull-witted fellow! It is obvious that you want to court death. You are, therefore, bragging beyond limits. The words of people who are desirous of death, are certainly incoherent.

13* Hiranyakasipu: Oh unfortunate boy! Where is the Lord of the universe, if there be any other than I?

Prahlāda: He is everywhere (Omnipresent).

Hiranyakasipu: How is it that He is not seen in this pillar?

(Prahlāda observes the pillar and bowing down exclaims:)

“Yes, He is seen.”

14. “As you are vaunting too much, I now sever your head from the trunk. Let Hari whom you trust as a protector, save you.”

*Š.R. treats this as a dialogue between Hiranyakasipu and Prahlāda. Other commentators treat this as the speech of Hiranyakasipu alone.

“Where is the Lord of the universe, if there be any other than I? Oh wretched boy! If he be omnipresent how is it that he is not seen in this pillar?”
15. Thus he repeatedly tormented in rage, his son, a great devotee of the Lord, with reproachful words. (Finding his son gazing at the pillar respectfully with folded hands.) the extremely powerful great Asura, grasping his sword, sprang from his high seat (throne), and knocked the pillar with his fist.

16. Instantaneously there arose in the pillar an immensely terrific crash which rent asunder the shell of the cosmic egg. Hearing the sound as it reached their abodes, god Brahmā and others suspected that to be the time of Pralaya when their regions collapse, Oh child! (Yudhiṣṭhira).

17. Hearing that unprecedented mysterious sound, while proceeding in long strides to kill his son forcibly, he failed to detect within the assembly hall, the source of that crash, at which the leaders of demonic forces were terrified.

18. In order to prove true the utterance of his devotee¹ and to vindicate His (omni-) presence in all creatures and things, He manifested Himself in the pillar of the assembly hall assuming an extremely wonderful form which was neither human nor beastly.

19. Looking (circumspectly) on all sides (for the source of that uncanny roar), he beheld this being coming out from the pillar. (Being astonished, he said to himself:) ‘He is neither a beast nor a man. How wonderful is this Man-lion form!’

20. While Hiraṇyakaśipu was musing thus (about the strange figure), there stood before him the extremely terrible form of the Man-lion with his eyes fierce like molten gold, and his face majestic with dazzling hair of his mane.

¹. ŚR. applies this expression to all devotees including Prahlāda, Sanaka, Nārada, Hiraṇyakaśipu and god Brahmā. Prahlāda said that Lord Hari was in the pillar pointed out by Hiraṇyakaśipu and he came out of that pillar. Sanaka stated the termination of his curse after three births of Jaya and Vijaya and to fulfil that Viṣṇu incarnated to finish the demonic birth. Nārada’s words to Indra about the invincibility of Prahlāda were proved as Hiraṇyakaśipu was not allowed to kill him. Hiraṇyakaśipu’s request for the conditions under which he was not to die were satisfied, and god Brahmā’s boon to Hiraṇyakaśipu was respected by Viṣṇu in Nṛsiṁha form.
21. He had terrible tusks, a tongue sharp like the blade of a razor, and waving like a sword; his face struck terror with its knitted (frowning) eye-brows; His ears were motionless and erect. His mouth and nostrils were open and amazing like a mountain-cavern. He appeared terrible with his parted jaws.

22. He touched the heavens with his stature. He had a short thick neck, broad chest and slender waist. He was covered with hair white like lunar rays, and hundreds of hands on either side, armed with claws.

23. He was unassailable and he put to flight Daityas and Dānavas with all the choicest weapons peculiar to him (e.g. the Sudarśana disc) as well as to others (e.g. the vajra—the thunderbolt).

"Most probably this expedient for my death has been thought out by Hari, the master of the great potency of illusion. But of what avail are his endeavours against me?"

24. Musing thus to himself, the foremost of (lit. the elephant among) the Daityas, armed with a mace (gadā) dashed against Nṛṣimha (the Man-lion) with a roar. But just like a moth falling into the fire, the Asura disappeared in the effulgent nimbus of Nṛṣimha.

25. There was nothing astonishing in the disappearance of the asura (the personified tāmas) into effulgence of Sattva incarnate (viz. Nṛṣimha) who formerly (at the time of creation) drank up all the Tamas (darkness). Then attacking Nṛṣimha in rage, the great Asura struck him with the mace of tremendous force.

26. Like Garuḍa seizing a big serpent Nṛṣimha (who was the wielder of a mace) caught hold of the Asura along with his mace while he was fighting. While the Asura was being played with by Nṛṣimha, he slipped out of his hand like a serpent escaping from the clutches of Garuḍa.

27. Oh Yudhiṣṭhira! Gods and the protectors of all the spheres who were driven out of their abodes (by the Asura) and who concealed themselves behind the curtains of clouds, looked upon this escape as an evil turn (against their interest). The great Asura who freed himself from Nṛṣimha’s hands, thought Nṛsiṃha to be apprehensive of his prowess. Feeling no fatigue in fighting, he armed himself with a sword and shield, and vehemently assailed Nṛsiṃha again.

28. While the Asura was moving up and down with the speed of a hawk, brandishing his sword and shield, leaving no weak point exposed, Hari roared forth a terrific and shrill peal of laughter, and with great rapidity, seized the Asura whose eyes blinked (by Hari's roaring laughter and dazzling splendour).

29. Just as a serpent would seize a mouse, Hari caught hold of the Asura who, afflicted with the tight hold (of Hari) was trying in every way to escape. At the door (on the threshold) of the assembly-hall, he laid him on his thighs, and though the demon's skin remained unscratched by (Indra's) thunderbolt, He sportingly tore him with his claws as Garuḍa does to the most poisonous serpents. (In this way, all the conditions of god Brahmā's boon were observed while killing Hiranyakāśipu).

30. His indignant and terrific eyes were too difficult to gaze at. He was licking the corners of his wide open mouth with his tongue. His face and mane were reddish due (to the stains of) the drops of blood. (Thus) he resembled a lion wearing the garland of the entrails of an elephant after killing it.

31. Throwing aside Hiranyakāśipu whose lotus-like heart was broken open, with his pointed claws, Nṛsiṃha who had a number of stout arms, struck down with his claws, weapons and heels, thousands of his (Hiranyakāśipu's) followers who closed on him from all sides with their arms lifted (to strike him).

32. The rain-clouds shaken by (the movements of) his mane scattered away (exposing to gods the full view of the battle below). Being outshone by his dazzling eyes, the lustre of the planets got eclipsed. Tossed by his breath, the oceans became turbulent. Terrified at his stunning roar, the elephant guards of the cardinal points wailed loudly.

33. Overcrowded with the aerial cars which were tossed up by the hair of his mane, the firmament was pushed up (from its original position). The earth got sorely pressed down under his (overwhelmingly heavy) steps. By his velocity, mountains were uprooted. Both the sky and the quarters were eclipsed by his dazzling splendour.

34. Then he occupied the excellent throne in the assembly-hall (out of curiosity and wonder at the affluence of his servant — the erstwhile Hiranyakasipu). The Lord displayed such concentrated effulgence that no enemy remained in sight. Yet his indignation was not abated, and his countenance appeared so terrific that nobody dared approach him.

35. Hearing that the foremost of Daityas, the veritable brain-fever to the three worlds, has been slain by Hari in a combat, celestial women whose faces were blooming with overwhelming joy, repeatedly poured down upon him showers of flowers.

36. At that time, the whole firmament became crowded with rows of celestial cars of gods who were eager to see him. Heavenly drums and tabors were sounded. Prominent Gandharvas sang and their women danced.

37-39. Oh child! Resorting to that assembly, gods headed by Brahmā, Indra, Śiva and others, sages, manes (Pitṛs), demigods like Siddhas, and Vidyādhāras, great Nāgas, Manus (who preside over aeons called Manvantaras), Prajāpatis (lords of creation), celestial musicians like Gandharvas, Apsaras and Cānaṇas, other demi-gods like Yakṣas, Kimpuruṣas, Vētālas and illustrious Kinnaras and all the attendants of the Lord like Sunanda, Kumuda—all these placed their folded hands to their heads (to pay respects), and from a distance not far from him, severally offered their prayers to the Man-Lion of dazzling splendour, Who was seated (on the throne).

Brahmā said:

40. I bow down to propitiate the Infinite Lord (unlimited by Time, Space etc.) of incomprehensible limitless powers, of marvellous potency and hallowing deeds, who, out of sports, brings about the creation, maintenance and destruction of the universe through the instrumentality of the guṇas, and yet himself remains undecayed and unchanged.
Sri Rudra said:

41. The termination of the cycle of one thousand Yugas is the proper time for the exhibition of Your wrath. (If it be against Hiranyakasipu) this puny demon lies slain. Oh Lord who is affectionate to his devotees! Hiranyakasipu's son your devotee, has approached you. Please protect him (now).

Indra said:

42. Oh Supreme Lord! (As you are our in-dwelling controller and as such the real enjoyer of sacrificial oblations), in protecting us and securing our shares in sacrifices, it is (really) your own share that you have recovered (from the Daityas). The lotus of our heart, Your own abode, which was (till now) seized with the fear of the demon (and was thus crampled), got bloomed forth by You. Oh Lord! Of what account is this sovereignty of three worlds which is to be devoured by Time? To those who wish to serve You, Oh Man-lion, even liberation from Samsara is of little consideration. What of other objectives in human life (like Dharma, Artha and Kama)?

Sages said:

43. (We pay obeisance to You) Oh Most Ancient Person, You taught us the Supreme form of penance, viz. meditation on Your glory, whereby You evolved this universe that lay latent in You. But it was completely obstructed by this demon. By assuming this form of Man-lion for the protection (of Your devotees), You have permitted us to perform it again, Oh protector of Your refugees.

The manes (Pitrs) said:

44. This Asura forcibly misappropriated and swallowed up the balls of rice reverentially offered to us by our off-spring at the time of the Sraddha ceremony, and gulped the water mixed with sesamum seeds proffered to us at the time of ablutions in sacred water. We bow to (You) Lord Nrsimha, the Protector of the righteousness. Who (as it were) restored to us those offerings out of the fat of the Asura's belly split open with Your claws.
Siddhas said:

45. We humbly salute You, Lord Nṛśimha, who tore down with your claws this wicked demon who, by the force of his Yoga and penance, robbed us of our mystic powers acquired by us through Yoga, and was puffed up with pride for his various achievements.

Vidyādharas said:

46. This ignorant fellow, being elated with his physical power and valour, prohibited us the use of our vidyā (the power of becoming invisible etc.) acquired by us through Yogic concentration of various types. We ever respectfully bow to You who, assuming, by Your Māyā power, the form of the Man-lion, slew him like a beast in the encounter.

Nāgas (serpents) said:

47. Salutations unto You Who brought delight to our women by tearing open the chest of this wicked demon who wrested the jewels from our hoods, and abducted our gem-like beautiful wives.

Manus said:

48. We are Manus, the executors of Your commands. Oh Lord, all the bounds of social order (viz. the duties prescribed for different classes—varṇas, and stages in life—āśramas) have been violated by Diti’s son (Hiranyakāśipu). Now that the wicked fellow is withdrawn (killed) by you, Oh Lord, what service should we render unto You? Be pleased to command us, Your servants.

Prajāpatis said:

49. Oh Supreme Lord! We, the Lords of creation, are Your creatures. This demon, due to whose restrictions, we could not verily procreate beings, now lies definitely slain with his bosom split open by You. Oh embodiment of pure Sattva, Your incarnation itself is auspiciousness for the world.

Gandharvas said:

50. Oh Lord! We are Your artistes—singers, dancers and actors. He who by dint of his prowess, might and energy subjugated us to his service, has been reduced to this condition (death) by You. Can anyone straying away from the path of righteousness attain happiness?

Cāraṇaś said:

51. Now that this Asura, the thorn in the heart of the righteous, has been removed (killed) by You, we take shelter under Your lotuslike feet which is the means of emancipation from Sāṁśāra, Oh Hari.

Takṣaś said:

52. By performing actions pleasing to You, we attained prominence amongst Your followers (servants). But here we were subjected to the position of palanquine bearers by this son of Diti. Being aware of the agony caused by him to the world, You finished with him (lit: reduced him to his five constituent elements), Oh Narahari, the twentyfifth principle (controlling the twentyfour principles\(^1\) responsible for the evolution and involution of the universe).

Kimpuruśas said:

53. We are (after all) Kimpuruśas (insignificant beings), but you are the most exalted person, the Almighty Ruler. When denounced by the pious and the good, this wicked fellow was (as good as) dead.

Vaitālikas said:

54. We used to get great worship and respect and wealth by singing of Your pure, sanctifying glory in assemblies and sacrificial sessions. This wicked fellow harshly deprived us of it. We are glad that You have exterminated him like a disease.

---

1. The following is the usual list of Principles according to Sāṅkhya: Puruṣa, Prakṛti, Mahat, Ahamkāra (ego), 5 subtle elements, 10 indriyas (sense organs), the mind and 5 gross elements. Out of these Prakṛti is uncreated; the seven from Mahat are both created and creative; the rest sixteen are created. Puruṣa according to Sāṅkhya is neither created nor creative. (But Bhāgavata invests Puruṣa with all powers of creation.)
Kinnaras said:

55. Oh Master! We hosts of Kinnaras are Your servants who were forced to labour hard without remuneration by this Dāitya. Oh Hari, the wicked fellow is now slain by Your Lordship. Oh Lord Narasimha! Henceforth You be the source of our prosperity.

Viṣṇu’s attendants said:

56. Oh protector! It is today that we have seen this wonderful half-human and half-leonine form which is an auspicious blessing to all worlds. Oh Lord! (Now) we know that this (Hiranyakaśipu) was Your own servant cursed by Brāhmaṇas (Sanaka and others) and (we realize that) death done to him was bestowal of Your grace (on him).

CHAPTER NINE

Prahlāda eulogizes Nṛsiṁha

Nārada continued:

1. Thus all gods and others headed by Brahmā and Rudra dared not go near him who was still possessed (under the influence) of wrath and (hence) unapproachable.

2. The goddess Śrī (who always attends upon Lord Viṣṇu) was personally sent to his presence. But at the sight of the monstrous manifestation, unseen and unheard of before, she was afraid, and did not approach.

3. God Brahmā (ultimately) deputed Prahlāda who was standing near-by, (saying), “Oh dear child, you (at least) approach and propitiate the Lord who has been angry with your father.”

4. Consenting (to Brahmā’s proposal) the child, a great devotee of the Lord, slowly approached him, and folding his palms together, he prostrated himself on the ground before him, Oh king.
5. Seeing the child fallen at his feet, the Lord was thoroughly overwhelmed with compassion. Raising him up, he placed on his head, his lotus-like hand which dispels the fear of those whose minds are fraught with the fear of the serpent in the form of Kāla (Death, Time, the Destroyer).

6. At the touch of his hand, all the inauspiciousness (in the form of impressions left by past actions) in Prahlāda was washed out, and the highest knowledge of the Supreme Brahman instantly dawns upon him. He meditated upon the lotus-like feet of the Lord in his heart. Being deeply gratified at heart, the hair of his body stood on their ends (through joy); his heart got drenched (with devotion) and his eyes were overflowing with tears of joy.

7. Fixing on him his heart and eyes with perfect mental concentration and composure, he praised Nṛśimha in inarticulate words in a voice choked with emotion (love).

Prahlāda said:

8. Is it possible that I who belong to a ferocious race (of Asuras), am eligible to praise Lord Hari when hosts of gods headed by Brahmac and others, contemplative sages and wise Siddhas whose minds are constituted of the products of Sattva (such as righteousness, knowledge and penance) have not been able, even to this moment, to propitiate him by their streams of prayers, glorifying his many excellences (couched in figurative language.).

9. As the Almighty Lord was pleased with the leader of the elephant-herd due to his (whole-hearted unswerving) devotion (unto him), I presume that affluence, noble lineage, beauty, austerities, learning, keenness of senses, complexion, prowess, physical power, determined exertions, intelligence and the eight-fold process of Yoga are of little avail in propitiating the Supreme Person.

10. I consider that a man of the cāṇḍāla (the lowest) caste, who has thoroughly dedicated his mind, speech, deed,

1. This refers to the episode of ‘the elephant and the crocodile’ described infra VIII. 2-4 (Chapters).
wealth and his very life itself to the Lord, is superior to a Brāhmaṇa endowed with the twelve qualities (mentioned in the above verse or enumerated in verses noted below) but is averse to the lotus-like feet of Lord Viṣṇu (the lotus-naveled god); for the Cāṇḍāla (devotee) sanctifies his (whole) race but not so the Brāhmaṇa even though he is highly respected (by the public).

11. The Supreme Lord is perfect in (the realization of) his blissful nature. Hence he does not expect any respect and worship for himself, from the ignorant (as all of us are before him). He is merciful and therefore he accepts it. For whatever respect (-ful worship) is offered unto the Lord, is returned to the devotee himself, just as the decoration of one’s countenance goes to enhance the beauty of the face reflected in the mirror.

12. Therefore, despicable (by birth) as I am, I shall sing of the glory of the Supreme Ruler with all my heart and to the best of my understanding, without any fear or diffidence (about my intelligibility). It is by delineating the glory of the Lord that a man who has entered into Saṁsāra (a product of guṇas) due to the influence of Avidyā (nescience), will be purified.

13. Oh Almighty Ruler! All these gods such as Brahmā and others who are (now) terrified, are merely the executors

1. VR. brings in the Prapatti doctrine of Rāmānuja herein. He raises the objection that due to the association of bhakti (devotion) to Vedānta, only the first three castes (Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya and Vaiśya) are eligible for it. The Bh. P. implies Prapatti (complete surrender to the Will of the Lord)—here for all people, irrespective of castes and sex.

2. ŠR. and other annotators quote from Sanatsujātiya (in M.Bh.) the following list:
   Righteousness, piety (sattva), self-control, austerities, non-jealousy, modesty (kṛti), forbearance, tolerance or envylessness, performance of sacrifices, charity, courage and Vedic-learning—these are the twelve vows to be observed by a Brāhmaṇa.

3. bhūrimānaḥ who is puffed up with pride (ŠR., VD., GS., VR. etc.).

4. ajayāpraviṣṭaḥ—who has entered into the human body, a product of guṇas due to the force of prakṛti—VR.
of the orders of Your Lordship who is a receptacle of pure Sattva and not like us Asuras (who are Your inimical devotees). The sportive activities of the glorious Lord through his beautiful incarnations, are conducive to not only the well-being and prosperity of the world but also for the conferment of the blissful experience of Your sports (and not for striking terror).

14. Now that You have slain the demon today, You be pleased to withdraw Your wrath (wrathful attitude). Even a pious man is delighted at the destruction of a scorpion or a serpent. All the people have now attained to peace and tranquillity and are waiting (for the subsidence of Your anger). All the people will remember this form of Yours for deliverance from fear, Oh Nṛsimha. (Hence the recollection of Your form being enough, there is no need to continue Your angry mood).

15. (As far as I am concerned), I am not at all afraid of Your (present) form with the most ferocious countenance (with a formidable mouth and tongue), Sun-like dazzling eyes and frightful knitting of eyebrows, fearful tusks and the garland of the entrails (of my father) and the mane and conical ears soaked in blood. Nor (am I afraid of) the roar that terrified the elephants guarding the cardinal points, or of Your pointed claws that tore up the enemy, Oh Invincible Lord!

16. I am (really) afraid of the unbearable miseries involved in the inexorable and terrible cycle of transmigrations (samsāra), Oh Lord (who is) compassionate to the miseries. Bound down with (the fetters in the form of my past) actions, I am thrown in the midst of ferocious ones (Daityas). Oh most merciful Lord! When will You be pleased to recall me to Your feet, which is the sole asylum of all beings and is the Final Emancipation?

17 Inasmuch as I am being scorched with the fiery sorrows of separation from the dear ones and association with unpleasant situations and persons, during the course of my transmigrations in different types of births (like celestials, sub-human beings), and the so-called cure from miseries entails miseries, I am wandering about in Samsāra falsely identifying me with the body, Oh Almighty Lord! Be pleased to enlighten me in the remedy (for emancipation from Sāṁśāra), viz. the method of serving You.

18. Oh Nṛśimha! I (who am thus enlightened in the way of serving You) shall be completely free from (the influence of) guṇas (like love, hatred etc.) and associating myself with the enlightened ardent devotees who resort to the asylum of the pair of Your feet, I shall easily tide over all miseries, singing constantly all the while the marvellously sportive activities of my beloved Friend and the Supreme Deity extolled before by god Brahmā.

19. Oh Nṛśimha! In this world, the parents are not (real) protectors of children. Medicine is not the remedy to the suffering patient (who may succumb to death despite medical care). To a person drowning in the sea, a boat is not a (sure) help (as he may go down with it). In the case of embodied beings who (not being favoured with your grace) are disregarded by you, and are afflicted in this sāṁśāra, whatever remedy (against the misery) is regarded as easy, proves to be temporarily effective.

20. Whatever agent, whether ancient (like god Brahmā) or modern (like a human father) and possessing a characteristic nature (dominated by Sattva etc.) is prompted to create or transform a thing into whatever form, from whatever source and for whatever cause or purpose, irrespective of its time, instrumentality, its relatedness to anyone or its separation from anything else—all these are (identical with) you (and none else).

21. When Māyā, with its guṇas (like Sattva and others), is prompted into action by the Time-Spirit through the gracious approval of the Supreme Man (who is only) a part of yours, it creates the subtle astral body which is predominated by the Mind. It is evolved out of karmic activities. It is unconquerable and is predisposed to the performance of ritualistic Vedic

1. ŚR. alternatively: Is there any easy remedy in the case of those embodied beings who, not being favoured... etc.

VR. supports this but to him tanubhṛtāṁ—those who are solely devoted to the nourishment of the body.
rites.\(^1\) It is the wheel of Samsāra which consists of sixteen spokes (in the form of mind, ten cognitive and conative sense-organs and five subtle elements) offered for Jīva’s enjoyment by Avidyā (nescience). What person standing apart from you (i.e. not devoted to you) can (hope to) transgress this, Oh Unborn Lord!

22. Oh Almighty Lord! You have by your inherent power (in the form of consciousness), always kept under perfect control the properties of Buddhi or intellect\(^2\) (such as pleasure, pain, love, avarice etc.) Oh Supreme Controller (of the universe), you are the Time-Spirit who as the director of Māyā, exercise full control over the powers of causal relations\(^3\). Such as you are, be pleased to take me unto your proximity as I have sought your protection. I have been thrown by the Unborn (avidyā) into the wheel (of samsāra) of sixteen spokes and am being crushed in it.

23. The people of this world yearn for longevity, affluence and glory of the celestial guardians of different worlds. But, Oh Lord, I have seen how they were swept away by the contraction of my father’s eyebrow knitted in wrathful laughter. But even he has been dispersed of by you.

24. Therefore, I who know the consequences of the blessings coveted by embodied beings do not seek long life, wealth, glory, sensual pleasure (of anybody) right from those of god Brahmā. Nor do I aspire after the mystic powers which are destroyed by You in the form of the Time-Spirit of immense

1. chandomayam—Full of desires characterised by mental resolves and suspicions—VJ.

VR. contradicts that the word chandas is never used in the sense of desire.

The import of the verse according to VJ. : It is impossible to transgress the wheel of samsāra except through the grace of Lord Hari attained through devotion. People of uncontrolled mind find it hard to secure that grace.

2. ātma-guṇa—(i) Properties inherent in one’s body—VR.
   (ii) Birth, death and such other conditions of the body—VJ.
   (iii) Properties of jīva e.g. pleasure, pain, affection, greed—GD.
   All jīvas like god Brahmā and others and their qualities—SD.

3. vīṣṭīya-visarga-saktīḥ: (i) effects and their means—ŚR.
   (ii) jīvas and Prakṛti—VR.; jīva and Māyā—SD.
   (iii) The world consisting of men, gods etc. and the creation—VJ.
prowess. Do be pleased with me to place me by the side of your servants.

25. Where are the pleasures which are pleasant merely to hear of, but are unreal like the mirage? Where is this body which is the nursery of all diseases? (Such a body is incapable of enjoying the so-called pleasures). The people, however, knowing this all as they do, are too engrossed to quench the fire of desires with drops of honey-like pleasures so difficult to obtain, to get disgusted with this world. (How wonderful is the working of your Māyā!)

26. What a world of difference there is, Oh Lord, between me, born out of rajas in the family of demons (lit. non-gods) dominated with tamas, and your immense grace (towards me)! You were pleased to place your lotus-like palm graciously only on my head but not on that of gods Brahmā, Śiva and the goddess Lakṣmī.

27. Inasmuch as you are the Soul, well-wisher and friend of the world, this notion of inferiority and superiority which is entertained by ordinary beings cannot be there in your case. But your grace, like the favour bestowed by the wish-yielding heavenly tree, depends proportionately on the service performed. Your grace (leading to righteousness etc.) varies directly as per service rendered to you, and not on the ground of superiority and inferiority.

28. Oh Lord! This sansārā is like a well infested with a serpent in the form of birth (and death). People desirous of sensual pleasures are falling into it. Due to the force of association, I was about to fall headlong along with them, but was regarded as his own by the divine sage Nārada and (in the way as you favoured me with your grace), was favoured (with knowledge) formerly (while I was in my mother's womb). Thus, how can I possibly give up the service of your servants (devotees)?

29. When my father, intent upon doing evil, took up a sword and threatened me, "If there be any God other than I, let him protect you while I cut off your head", your act of saving my life and execution of my father was, I think, accomplished to vindicate the word (curse) of the sage (Sanaka, Sanandgana etc.), Oh Infinite Lord.
30. It is you alone who manifest this universe. You exist independently (as the cause) of the universe at the beginning before it came into being, and stay as such in the middle (while the cosmos exists), and after its dissolution as well. Having created this (universe which is the) product of (the permutation and combination of) the guṇas, by dint of your māyā, you re-enter it and appear as many (as protector and destroyer) through them.

31. Oh Lord! You are verily none else but this universe consisting of cause and effect. But you are, however, different from it (as you exist independently before the creation and after the destruction of the universe). Hence the notion of distinction between 'this is mine and this is another's', is nothing but an illusion (and as such) unreal. A thing which depends for its creation, destruction, subsistence and manifestation on another is really identical with it, just as a tree (the effect) is the same as the seed (the cause) which is essentially the same as the earth and its subtle cause.

32. Having withdrawn this universe within yourself by your own agency, and being above desires, you lie on the cosmic waters of the Deluge, absorbed in enjoying your own essential blissfulness, and in perfect rest (inactivity). With your eyes closed in Yogic meditation which transcends sleep by your self-illumination, you stay in the fourth state which lies beyond the three states of wakefulness, dream and deep sleep. Therein you neither cognize Tamas (the characteristic of deep sleep), nor enjoy any guṇas (objects of senses).

* (i) You constitute the entire world consisting of the conscious (individual selves) and the unconscious matter. You maintain your separateness in the beginning, the end and the middle of the universe.—VR.
   (ii) The Śāstras have conclusively proved your separate existence at the creation, destruction and during the sustenance of the universe—VJ.
   (iii) As a matter of fact, rajo-guṇa is the creator, tamo-guṇa, the destroyer, and sattva guṇa the sustainer of the universe but (in spite of) your unconcerned entry into them, you are called the slayer (of Hiranyakasipu) —VC.

 Cf. supra 1.6

 VR.: Oh Lord! This world consisting of sentients and non-sentients is yourself as you are the cause of it and are non-different from it. The notion that the individual Soul is the same as the Controlling Lord (Īśvara)
33. The universe is the body of Him (i.e. Yours) who through His potency called the Time-Spirit, prompted into action the modes of Prakṛti (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas which combine and create the universe). While He, i.e. You lay in the bed of the serpent Śeṣa on the cosmic waters of the Deluge, and while Your Yogic trance was coming to a close, there sprouted forth from Your navel, like a banyan tree from a tiny seed, a large lotus which was (erstwhile) lying hidden in You.

34. The wise seer (Brahmā) who was born of that lotus, did not see anything else than the lotus. Considering that You who were the seed (material cause) pervading himself internally, were outside himself, could not discover You though he immers ed himself into the inundatory waters for a hundred years. Oh how can one find out the seed when the sprout shoots forth from it.

35. That self-born god (Brahmā) was greatly astonished (at his failure to discover the 'seed'), Oh Lord. (He reverted to his place). Seated in the lotus and performing austere penance, he got his heart thoroughly purified in due course. He realized You as pervading in the subtilest form, his own Self consisting of bhūtas (elements), indriyas (cognitive and conative sense-organs) and heart, just as a discriminating person perceives subtle smell pervading the earth.

is unreal, meaningless and is due to Avidyā, just as the notion of the identity of the soul and the body is illusory. So is the identification of the Soul with God. That which causes the origination, sustenance, destruction and manifestation of anything is identical with its material cause, just as the divisions of time are not different from the eternal flow of time or the tree is not different from the soil which germinates the seed.

ŚR., VR. etc. interpret vasu as subtle elements and kāla as the earth, the basis of blue colour etc.

(ii) SD. regards that this verse asserts the difference-cum-non-difference relation between the world and the Brahmaṇ. That on which the origination, maintenance, manifestation and destruction of a thing depends is both different and identical with it, as a plant is both different and not different from the soil from which it grows.

(iii) GD. emphasizes that this world of causal relationship is identical with the Lord. He is essentially transcendental to the world (Pra-paśc). The whole world being the Lord's and identical with him, the notion of difference is unreal.
36. In the same way, Brahmā visualized You as the Supreme (cosmic) person endowed with thousands of faces, feet, heads, thighs, noses, mouths, ears, eyes and decorated with rich ornaments and furnished with weapons. The disposition of Your various limbs was indicated by different parts of the universe (nether world and other regions). You assumed this form by Your Māyā power. And he (Brahmā) was filled with great joy.

37. Assuming the form of a horse-necked god, Your worshipful self killed the extremely powerful enemies of the Vedas, Madhu and Kaiṭabha by name who were the very embodiments of rajas and tamas. You thus restored the corpus of the Vedas to him (Brahmā). The Vedas declare that Your most beloved person consists of pure Sattva.

38. In this way, Oh Supreme Person, You incarnate Yourself, as a human or a subhuman being, as a sage or a god, or as a fish and protect the world, and kill the enemies of the people. You uphold the path of righteousness suitable to that particular Yuga (epoch). You remain unmanifest in the Kali age and hence You are designated Triyuga.

39. Oh Lord of Vaikuṇṭha! This mind of mine, vitiated as it is by sins, extroversion, extremely morbid, lustfulness and afflicted with joy, grief and three yearnings (for progeny, prosperity and popularity), finds no interest in Your stories. How can I, a poor wretch with such a mind, contemplate on Your essential nature?

40. Oh Acyuta! My ungratified palate drags me in one direction and sexual desire (lit. the genital organ) pulls me to a different direction, while the senses of touch, hearing and the abdomen gravitate me to some other direction. My olfactory sense, the constantly moving eye and faculties of action draw me in different directions—all these pull (in different directions) like a number of co-wives dragging their lord of the house (to their bed-rooms).

41. Be pleased to cast a gracious look at these ignorant people who, as a consequence of their actions, have fallen in the Vaitarani in the form of Samsāra and are frightened extre-

1. Vaitarani—a mythological river bordering on the region of Yama, the god of death. It is full of blood, bones, hair etc. and rushes very rapidly and hence unfordable.
mely with the terror of successive births, deaths and sufferings (from want of food), and who entertain the notions of friendship to bodies whom they consider their own and enmity towards others. Out of compassion for their plight, be pleased to protect them by ferrying them today across the \textit{samsāra}-Vaitaranī, Oh Lord who stays beyond (\textit{samsāra})!

42. Oh Lord! You are the father (creator and guide) of all. What exertion could there be in lifting up these ignorant people (from \textit{samsāra}) to You who are the cause of the creation, sustenance and destruction of the universe? Oh friend of the afflicted! It is quite meet that the great should verily be gracious unto the ignorant. To us who already serve Your beloved devotees such rescuing from \textit{samsāra} is immaterial (as we are sure to be liberated. It is to others that you be pleased to show Your favour).

43. As my mind is immersed in the rare nectar of your prowess, I am not at all afraid of the (so-called) unfordable Vaitaranī, Oh Supreme Lord! I feel grieved for these ignorant fellows who being averse (to this nectar of singing the great deeds of the Lord) carry on the burden of the family etc. in the hope of securing pleasures caused by objects of senses, which again are illusory.

44. Oh Lord, sages, desirous of self-emancipation, generally meditate on you silently in solitude. But they are indifferent to the interests of others. Leaving aside these helpless creatures, I do not long to attain the final beatitude for me alone. Nor do I see any refuge other than you for these, who are wandering in \textit{samsāra}.

45. The so-called pleasures of a householder’s life such as sexual intercourse and others are positively insignificant, contemptible and leading to a chain of miseries like the scratching of one itching hand with another. Lascivious people though subjected to various miseries, are never satiated (by enjoying the pleasures) in this world. It is only some person endowed with strength of mind and wisdom who (through your grace) can repress their passion of lust like the temptation to scratch (an itching limb).

46. Oh Inner Controller! Means conducive to the attainment of emancipation, viz. observance of the vow of silence, listening to sacred books, performance of austerities, studies of spiritual texts, discharging one's religious duties, exposition of the Śāstras, living in solitude, chanting of the Lord's name and concentration of mind in Yoga—all these generally become only the means of livelihood for those whose senses are uncontrolled (and who wish to sell these for worldly gains). In the case of hypocrites it is doubtful whether these might be of any use even for earning the livelihood (as they are likely to be exposed easily).

47. The Vedas have revealed your two symbolic forms, the cause and effect (or the Prakṛti and the atoms) which are like the seed and (its) sprout. You are devoid of any form or colour, yet the universe of causal relation is not other than (different from) you. It is by means of the Yoga of Devotion that persons who have controlled their senses, can visualize you directly, both in the cause and its consequence, just as people can perceive fire in (the friction of) the two pieces of wood. Knowledge about you cannot be attained by any other means. (Hence you are pervading everything as its cause).

48. You are (the elements such as the air, fire, earth, sky, water and objects of senses (viz. sound, touch, sight, taste, and smell), the (five) vital airs, the cognitive and conative organs, the heart, the intellect and the Ego (or deities presiding over senses and the mind). Everything possessed of qualities¹ (gross) or devoid of qualities (subtle) is you. There is nothing other than you even if it be conveyed by Mind or Speech, Oh great Lord!

49. Neither these guṇas (viz. sattva, rajas and tamas) nor the deities presiding over the guṇas or endowed with guṇas such as Mahat and others (viz. mahat, ahaṃkāra, five subtle and five gross elements, and ten indriyas—cognitive and conative senses) nor the mind etc. nor the various beings including gods and mortals—all these having a beginning and an end—comprehend you, Oh most highly praised God. It is, therefore, that wise men endowed with high intellect, after careful deliberation (of this) give up the study of the Vedas (and other acts prescribed therein), and worship you alone with concentrated mind.

50. Therefore, Oh most worshipful Lord! How can a person cherish devotion to you who are the goal of the highest order of ascetics (the parama-hamsas), without the (following) six constituents of worship, viz., (1) paying obeisance to the Lord, (2) singing of his glory, (3) offering of all acts to the Lord, (4) waiting on you (worship in the form of service), (5) meditation on the feet of the Lord and (6) listening to the recital of stories of the Lord.

_Nārada said:

51. When, in spite of the Lord's transcendence to attributes, the excellences of the Lord were highly extolled with deep reverence and devotion by his devotee Prahlāda, the Lord was pleased with him. Restraining his anger, he spoke to Prahlāda who was respectfully bowing to Him.

_The Lord said:

52. ‘Oh gentle Prahlāda! May good betide you! Oh the best among the Asuras! I am verily pleased with you. Ask whatever boon you like. I am the bestower of all the desires of men.

53. For, Oh long-lived one, even a glimpse of Mine is difficult to get to those who have not propitiated me. Having but once visualized me, a being never suffers an affliction any more.

54. Hence noble and pious Souls who are highly fortunate and are desirous of attaining bliss, try to propitiate me with all their heart, as I am the Lord (and bestower) of all blessings.’

_Nārada said:

55. Even though Prahlāda, the best of Asuras, was thus tempted with boons which excite allurement in all beings, he desired none of them, as he was exclusively devoted to the Lord (expecting no reward for his unflinching devotion).
CHAPTER TEN

Prahlāda enthroned. The conquest of Tripura

Nārada said:

1. The child, Prahlāda who looked upon all that (offer of boons etc.) as an impediment to the practice of Bhakti-Yoga (Yoga of Devotion), slightly smiled, and addressed Lord Nṛśimha (the Lord of the sense organs) as follows:

Prahlāda said:

2. Pray, do not tempt me who am addicted by nature (lit. birth) to pleasures, with (the promise of) those boons. Being afraid of contacts with them and in (sheer) disgust of them, I have resorted to you with the desire of securing liberation (from samsāra).

3. Oh Lord! Meseems it is with the desire of ascertaining the characteristics of a real servant or devotee that your worship directed me to choose objects of pleasure which are the seeds of the transmigration of the Self (samsāra) and are like so many knots binding the heart.

4. Otherwise that (offer) would have been impossible from you who are full of mercy. Oh Father of all! He who hankers after blessings from you, is but a merchant, and not a real servant (devotee).

5. Verily he is not a real servant who desires to secure worldly pleasures (in return for services) from his master. Nor is he a real master who grants such comforts to play the lord upon his servant.

6. But I am your devotee who cherishes no desire and you are the Master who expect nothing (from your servant). Here, between us, there is no object (to be gained) as between the king and his servant.

1. Some editions add here:

naṣṭo-drṣṭas tamasvāndhe tvamekāḥ pāradasanah!

You are the only guide to lead across to the other shore of the ocean of samsāra, the people who have lost their eye-sight in blinding darkness.

2. After this line Andhra edition adds:

Sa vai śvāmi, sa vai bhṛtyo, gupalubdhau na kāmukau!

Verily he is the master and he is the servant. They are so due to their appreciation of qualities, but not for any gain or pleasure.
7. Oh foremost one among the bestowers of boons! If (at all) you want to confer any boons on me, Oh Lord, I seek of your Worship the boon that no desire should germinate in my heart.

8. For, with the rise of desires, the (powers of) the senses, the mind, the vital air, the Soul, righteousness, fortitude, judgment, modesty, prosperity, energy, memory and truth come to an end (once for all).

9. When a man gets rid of desires fixed (deep) in the heart, then alone he becomes fit to attain to thy status, Oh lotus-eyed Lord.

10. (Now I remember the Mantra to which I was initiated by Nārada.)

Salutations to You, Oh Almighty Lord, the Supreme Person, the High-Souled One, Hari, the wonderful lion, Supreme Brahman and Paramātmā.

Lord Nṛsimha said:

11. Those who are exclusively devoted to Me like you, never expect from Me any blessing in this or in the next world Still (it is my order that you shall enjoy throughout this Manvantara the luxuries of the overlordship of the Daityas here.

12. You continue to enjoy listening to my stories so dear to you. Realize within your own heart Me, the Lord present in all beings, and the presiding deity of sacrifices. Dedicating all your activities to Me, worship Me, in meditation.

13. Having exhausted your merit by enjoying pleasure and sin by doing meritorious actions (or by prāyastītta—expiatory rites) and given up your body in course of time, and spread such extremely pure renown as to be sung in heaven, you shall attain to Me completely liberated from all bonds.

* Here ŚR. quotes Katha Upa. 2.3.14—

Tadā sarve śravacyante kāmāsya 'yaḥ hrdi śrītāḥ/
aḥa marṣye mṛtyuṁto bhūrātyatra Brahma pamaññate/

When one gets rid of all the desires residing (fixed) in one's heart, the mortal becomes immortal immediately and attains oneness with Brahman in this very life.
14. A person who recites this song (prayer) sung by you to Me and remembers you and Me, becomes free from the bondage of karman in due course.

Prahlāda said:

15-17. Oh Supreme Lord! The Lord of those who graciously confer boons! I seek from you this boon that my father, ignorant of Your being the Divine Light, and with his mind overwhelmed (lit. pierced through) with indignation, reviled you who are the veritable Father of the World and the Master, by calling You the murderer of his brother, and through wrong outlook, behaved sinfully to me, Your devotee. May (my father) be absolved of the terrible sins which are too difficult to be crossed, even though he must have been purified when he was glanced at by you who are compassionate to the afflicted.

The Lord said:

18. Oh sinless righteous saint! Inasmuch as you, the purifier of the family, have been born in his house, your father along with twentyone generations of his fore-fathers stands absolved of all sins.

19. Wherever my devotees, extremely serene, impartial in outlook, noble in character and of pious behaviour, are present, they sanctify that country (along with its inhabitants) even if it be sinful like that of Kikāta.

20. Oh Lord of Daityas! They (My devotees) who, out of devotion unto Me, have become devoid of desires (which are at the root of anger, violence etc.), do not trouble any creature in any category of beings, high or low, by any means.

1. ŚR. explains that as Hiranyakāśipu was the 3rd in generation from god Brahmā, here the twentyone generations of his previous birth are implied.

VG. adds: Twentyone generations of forefathers in your (Prahlāda's) twentyone previous incarnations are included here.

2. mad-bhāvena gatasprabh—Realizing my presence everywhere, they entertain no jealousy against anyone—VJ.
21. In this world, there are men who follow your way of life and become My devotees. But certainly, you stand as a model to all my devotees.

22. Oh child Prahlāda! (As a formality) perform the obsequies of your father who has been thoroughly purified through contact with My person (and has become hence sinless). Now, being blest with you as a pious son, he will certainly attain to higher worlds.

23. As directed by exponents of the Vedas, you occupy the throne of your father. Concentrating your mind on Me, carry out your duties with complete devotion to Me. Oh child!

Nārada said:

24. In compliance of the command of the Lord, Prahlāda also performed all the funeral rites of his father. And he was installed as a king by excellent Brāhmaṇas (and governed as per instructions of the Lord.)

25. Seeing the countenance of the Man-Lion Hari graciously pleased, Brahmā who was surrounded with gods, praised Him with holy Vedic hymns and submitted (as follows):

Brahmā said:

26. Oh God of gods! The Supreme Ruler of all! The Creator of all beings! Oh the First born one! It is fortunate that You have slain the wicked demon, the tormentor of the world.

27. It was this demon who, having secured boons from me, could not be killed by anyone of my creation. Being arrogant with (the powers acquired by) penance and Yoga and with prowess he violated the code of righteousness.

28. Luckily, his son, though a child, is a pious Soul and a great devotee of Yours. Fortunately he has been saved by You from death, and he has now attained to You.

29. Oh Lord! He who, with concentrated mind, contemplates on this form of Yours, will be protected on all sides from fear—even from the god of death wishing to kill one.
Nṛsiṁha said:

30. Oh lotus-born god! No such boon is to be conferred by you on Asuras. A boon bestowed on those who are cruel by nature, is harmful like feeding serpents with milk.

Nārada said:

31. Oh king Yudhiṣṭhira! Having spoken thus, Lord Hari Who is normally invisible to all beings and Who was worshipped by god Brahmā, vanished on that very spot.

32. Then Prahlāda worshipped god Brahmā, Śiva, Prajāpatiṣ and gods—all of whom were parts of the Almighty Lord—and bowed them with his head.

33. Thereafter, the lotus-seated god Brahmā, together with sages headed by Śukra, crowned Prahlāda as the Lord of Daityas and Dānavas.

34. Then, having felicitated Prahlāda and bestowed their highest blessings on him, the gods headed by Brahmā who were worshipped by him again, returned to their respective places, Oh King.

35. In this way, the two attendants of Viṣṇu (Jaya and Vijaya) who were born as sons to Diti (due to the imprecation of Brāhmaṇas) were killed by Hari, present in their heart due to the hostile attitude adopted by them towards Hari.

36. And due to the curse of a Brāhmaṇa, both of them were born again as the demons Kumbhakarṇa and Rāvaṇa of ten heads, who were killed by Rāma’s arrows.

37. While lying on the field of battle with their hearts pierced with Rāma’s arrows, both of them quitted their physical bodies with their hearts fixed on Him (Rāma), as (it happened) in their previous birth (as Hiraṇyākṣa and Hiraṇyakaśipu).

38. Both of those (attendants of Viṣṇu) were now born here as Śiśupāla and Dantavakra. It is in Your very presence that they merged in Lord Hari by entertaining continuous enmity towards Him.

39. Kings who were the enemies of Kṛṣṇa shed off, at the end of their life, whatever sins they have committed in the previous life, and become like unto Him through constant meditation like a caterpillar which, through constant brooding, is transformed into a wasp.
40. Just as votaries of the Lord, through their unflinching devotion to Hari attain to perfect identity with Him, (nimical) kings like Śiśupāla and others, through their constant brooding over Him (as their enemy) attained to similarity of form like Him.

41. I have answered to you in details all the queries made by you and also the identity with Hari attained by His enemies like the son of Damaghoṣa (Śiśupāla).

42. This is the sacred story of the (Man-lion) incarnation of the noble-souled Krṣṇa, the devotee of Brāhmaṇas—a story (containing the narration) of slaying the two ancient Daityas (viz. Hiranyākṣa and Hiranyakaśipu).

43-44. This narration includes the life (and character) of Prahlāda, the great votary of the Lord, and (a detailed description of) his devotion, knowledge non-attachment and also of the true nature and an account of the glorious deeds of Hari who is the Lord of the creation, maintenance and the destruction (of the universe). (It describes) the great revolutions in the positions of gods and demons in course of time.

45. In this chronicle has been described the righteous path of the devotees of the Lord which leads to the attainment of (one-ness with) Him; and all topics relating to the soul (spiritual knowledge) have been thoroughly discussed.

46. Whoever, after reverentially listening to this heroic narrative of the deeds of Viṣṇu, recites it to others is liberated from the bonds of Karmas (good or bad).

47. Whoever piously with concentrated mind the sportive actions of Lord Viṣṇu (the Most Ancient Person) in assuming the Lion form and slaying Hiranyakaśipu, the leader of the legions of demons, and listens to (lit. having listened to) the (recital of the) hallowing glory of the demon Hiranyakaśipu's son (Prahlāda), the foremost among the righteous, attains to the region (Mokṣa) which is beyond the range of fear.

48. (Oh Yudhiṣṭhira!) You are certainly immensely more fortunate in this world (as compared with Prahlāda etc. his spiritual preceptor Nārada, as well as your forefathers and other great sages) inasmuch as great sages who sanctify the world, pay visit to you from all quarters, and the Supreme Brahman Himself, concealing His greatness in the guise of a human being, resides with you in your houses.

49. This Kṛṣṇa who is your dear friend and well-wisher, your maternal uncle’s son, your very adorable self, guide and advisor carrying out your behests (as your representative or charioteer), is verily the Brahman who is the embodiment of the ecstatic experience of the absolute Supreme bliss (unconditioned by any upādhi) which is sought after by the great.

50. May Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Lord of the Sātvatas whose direct essential nature has not been actually comprehended or described with their intellect by gods like Śiva and Brahmā, and who has been devoutly worshipped by us through silent meditation and renunciation, be gracious unto us. [The Supreme Brahman does not reside in Prahlāda’s palace. Nor do sages go there to have an audience with him. Nor does He act like a cousin. Hence, Oh Yudhisṭhira and Pāṇḍavas, you are immensely more fortunate than Prahlāda and we.]

51. Oh Yudhisṭhira! He is that very Lord who, in days of yore, extended the glory of god Rudra as it was eclipsed by Maya, the master of innumerable delusive powers.

The King (Yudhisṭhira) asked:

52. Be pleased to describe to us in which action Maya destroyed the glory of god Śiva and the way in which Lord Kṛṣṇa (re-established and) enhanced it.

Nārada said:

53. Asuras who were completely vanquished in the battle by gods who were strengthened by Lord Kṛṣṇa, sought the refuge of Maya the Supreme Preceptor of all conjurors (experts in the arts of illusion or magic).

54. The master-conjuror constructed three (flying-fortress-like) cities made of gold, silver and iron respectively. Their movements (arrival and departure) were undetectable and the (war) materials and equipments provided therein were beyond the conception of gods (And he handed these over to Asuras).

55. Remembering their old hostility, the leaders of Asura armies destroyed the three worlds along with the rulers, themselves remaining invisible with the help of those (flying) cities, Oh King.

56. Oh King, thereupon all residents of the three worlds, along with their rulers, approached god Śiva and prayed, “Be pleased, Oh God, to protect us, Your own people (who are practically) destroyed by Asuras residing in three (flying) cities.

57. Out of grace unto the celestials, the almighty god Śiva reassured the gods not to be afraid, and fitted an arrow (charged with mystic powers) to his bow, and discharged the missile at the (flying) cities.

58. Fiery arrows, like streams of rays emanating from the orb of the Sun, shot forth from that shaft and the cities, being screened by them, became invisible.

59. Struck with those shafts, all the citizens of those cities, fell dead. But the great Yogi Maya brought them and put them into a well of nectar (excavated by him in the cities).

60. At the touch of the resuscitating fluid prepared by him (Maya), they sprang to life with adamantine bodily frames endowed with extraordinary vigour, like fires of the lightening tearing open the clouds.

61. Finding god Śiva (the bull-banneed god) frustrated in his undertaking and dejected, this Lord Viṣṇu devised an expeditient for it.

62. This Lord Viṣṇu assumed the form of a cow and Brahmā became the calf. Entering the cities at midday, he drank out the nectar from the well of that (immortalizing) fluid.

63-65. Though witnessing it, the Asuras (guarding the well) became too bewildered to prevent it. Knowing that and remembering that it was destined to be so, Maya, the past-master in devising expediens addressed the following (words) to the guards of that well of nectar who were stricken with grief: “No one whether a god, a demon, a man or any other being is capable of thwarting what has been ordained by Fate regarding one’s own Self or another or of both.”

Then by His own potencies, He (Lord Kṛṣṇa) devised the equipment of battle (war-materials) for god Śiva.
66. By means of His powers like righteousness, wisdom, renunciation, affluence, asceticism, knowledge, action and others, (He created for god Śiva) a chariot, a charioteer, the flag, horses, a bow, an armour, shafts and others.

67-68. Clad in the armour and seated in the chariot, god Śiva took up his bow and arrow. At noon, at the auspicious time, called Abhijit, Hara (Śiva) fixed the shaft to the bow and burnt down the three impregnable cities. Kettledrums were sounded in the sky which was crowded with hundreds of celestial cars.

69. Gods, sages, manes (pitṛs) and leaders of Siddhas shouted “Victory” in joyous exclamation, and poured showers of flowers. The troupes of celestial nymphs danced in ecstasy.

70. Having thus burnt down the three (flying) cities, the venerable god Śiva (destroyer of cities) returned to his own residence while being praised by Brahmā and others.

71. Such and others are the exploits of this Hari who with his Māyā Potency imitates the human form (i.e. way of life) that the heroic achievements of the Preceptor (or father) of the world which purify the worlds are sung by sages. What else should I relate next?

CHAPTER ELEVEN

The Eternal Path of Religion

Śri Śuka said:

1. Having heard the narrative—so highly praised in the assemblies of the righteous and devotees of the Lord like (god Brahmā and others)—of Prahlāda (the ruler of Daityas), the leader of illustrious devotees of the Lord, whose mind was absorbed in the meditation of God Viṣṇu, Yudhiṣṭhira was filled with delight. He again made a further query of Nārada, the son of the self-created god Brahmā.
Yudhiṣṭhira said:

2. I am anxious to hear from you, Oh Omniscient sage the eternal Law—the righteous course of conduct prescribed for men—enjoining the duties to be performed by persons belonging to different classes of society (varṇa) and stages in life (āśrama)—the observance of which (Dharma) leads one to attain knowledge and devotion.

3. Your worshipful self is the son of no other than the highest deity, Brahmā, the Lord of all created beings. Out of his sons, you have been the most beloved one by virtue of your asceticism, Yogic powers and meditation of the Lord, Oh Brahman! (You must, therefore, have learnt from him the secret of dharma).

4. Merciful, pious, tranquil Brāhmaṇas like you who are devoted exclusively to Nārāyaṇa know the highest secret of Dharma but not others (the so-called Law-givers—Śmaṭikāras).

Nārada said:

5. Saluting the venerable birthless God Nārāyaṇa, the source of Dharma, I shall explain to you the Eternal Law as I heard it from (His) Nārāyaṇa’s lips.

6. He incarnated along with his part-manifestation Nara, as the son of Dharma and Mūrti, the daughter of Dakṣa. He still continues to perform penance for the welfare of the people, at the hermitage at Badarikā.

7. For Lord Hari, the embodiment of all Vedas, is the source of Dharma; Smṛtis are codified by those who knew him. And it is by abiding by that Dharma that one’s Soul gets pleased, Oh King.1

8-12. (1) Truthfulness, (2) mercy, (3) asceticism, (4) purity, (5) endurance, (6) power of discrimination between right and wrong, (7-8) control of mind and the senses, (9) non-violence, (10) celibacy, (11) charity, (12) the study of Vedas or repetition internally of prayers to god, (13) straightforwardness, (14) contentment, (15) service unto thou who regard all beings as equals, (16) gradual withdrawal from worldly activities, (17) Observation of the fruitlessness of human actions, (18) refraining from useless talk, (19) investigation of the nature of the Soul (and its distinctness from the body), (20) equitable distribution of food, eatables etc. among creatures according to their worth (and needs), (21) to look upon them, especially human beings as one’s own self and as the deity, Oh Pāṇḍu’s son (Yudhiṣṭhira); (22) hearing (the holy name or stories of the Lord), (23) chanting of his name, (24) contemplation on, (25) service of, (26) worship of, (27) Bowing to, (28) rendering service to God, (29) behaving as his friend and (30) dedication of oneself to Hari who is the goal of the noble Souls—these thirty characteristics are said to constitute the highest dharma of all human beings whereby the Soul of the Universe is propitiated and pleased, Oh King.

13. He is called a dvija or twice-born one whose (sixteen) purifying rites (accompanied by recitation of mantras) have been performed without any break in succession, and to whom god Brahmā has designated as such. Performance of sacrifices, study of scriptures and charity are prescribed for all twice-born classes (viz. Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya and Vaiśya) who are of pure birth and conduct. It is for these that duties incumbent on different stages in life (āśrama) are prescribed.

14. Scriptural study and others (such as teaching, performance of sacrifice, charity and acceptance of gifts) six (in all) are prescribed for the Brāhmaṇas. Non-acceptance of gifts is laid down for the other (Kṣatriyas). The means of livelihood of a king who protects his subjects, is derived from taxes levied on subjects, with the exception of Brāhmaṇas (who were exempted from taxation).

15. The Vaiśya is to maintain himself by agriculture (cattle-breeding) and trade, and should follow the Brāhmaṇas. A Śūdra is to render service to the twice-born castes whose means of livelihood constitute his means of subsistence also.

16. Means of livelihood for Brāhmaṇas is of four types: (1) various occupations (e.g. agriculture, cattle breeding), (2) acceptance of articles modestly (without asking any one for anything), (3) begging for grain from door to door like Tâyāvaras (vagrant mendicants) and (4) gleaning grains of corn from the leftover of the threshing floor in the field (śīla) or of the market place (uñcha)—these types are in the ascending order of preference.
